Cooper-Hewitt Museum Library

Gift of

DOROTHY MESERVE BILLINGS.

Smithsonian Institution Libraries

92 Hale Mrs S. J.
Biography of Distinguished women

WOMAN'S RECORD;

OR,

Sketches of all Distinguished Women

Truly yr friend
Sarah J. Hale

BIOGRAPHY OF DISTINGUISHED WOMEN;

CT

3202

H16

1876

NMAH

OR,

WOMAN'S RECORD,

FROM THE CREATION TO A.D. 1869.

ARRANGED IN FOUR ERAS.

WITH

SELECTIONS FROM AUTHORESSES OF EACH ERA.

BY

SARAH JOSEPHA HALE

AUTHRESS OF "NORTHWOOD," "THE VIGIL OF LOVE," ETC., ETC.

Give her of the fruit of her hands, and let her own works praise her in the gates. Solomon.

For the woman is the glory of the man.—St. Paul.

ILLUSTRATED BY TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY PORTRAITS,

ENGRAVED ON WOOD

By LOSSING AND BARRITT.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, WITH ADDITIONS.

NEW YORK:

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1876, by HARPER & BROTHERS,
In the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

INSCRIBED

TO THE

Men of America;

WHO SHOW, IN THEIR LAWS AND CUSTOMS, RESPECTING

WOMEN,

IDEAS MORE JUST AND FEELINGS MORE NOBLE THAN WERE EVER

EVINCED BY MEN OF ANY OTHER NATION:

MAY

“WOMAN’S RECORD”

MEET

THE APPROVAL OF THE SONS

OF OUR

GREAT REPUBLIC;

THE WORLD WILL THEN KNOW THE Daughters are Worthy of Honour.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

A LIVING book like "WOMAN'S RECORD" should at intervals be revised and enlarged. In presenting to the public this new edition, the publishers beg leave to call attention to the excellence of the plan and the perfectness of its execution. The progressive History of Women was the plan, and the New Index (see next page) will show that the history has been brought down to the present year, 1869. The publishers have positive proof that the contents of this book are highly valued, not only from the sales of the previous editions, but from the use that has been made of it by distinguished authors and editors, at home and abroad, in preparing works about women. The editor of a work published in London, who has made up his own book chiefly from "WOMAN'S RECORD," frankly confesses his obligations to the American work, and has judged it worthy to be placed before his own countrywomen.

He says in his preface: "Such a complete record of womanly excellence and ability cannot fail of being highly interesting and useful; and it must be evident to all that the task of its compilation must have been one of great labor and research; far more, indeed, than the present editor can claim credit for—his work having been chiefly that of condensation from a large and costly volume published in America, and entitled "WOMAN'S RECORD," by Mrs. Hale, who states in her preface that it cost her three years of hard study and labor—a volume which in itself is a striking example of feminine ability in authorship."

INDEX

OF NEW NAMES ADDED, AND NAMES OF THOSE DECEASED SINCE THE FIRST EDITION.

NAMES OF THE LIVING.

	Page		Page
BAKER, LADY.....	900	KEMBLE, MRS.....	712, 901
BLACKWELL, ELIZABETH.....	584, 898	LINTON, E. L.....	895
BONHEUR, ROSA.....	900	McCORD, LOUISA S.....	894
BRADDON, MISS.....	900	METHODIST WOMEN.....	899
CABALLERO, FERNAN.....	900	MOWATT, ANNA CORA.....	904
CHARLES, MRS.....	900	MULOCK, DINAH M. (Mrs. Craik).....	896, 902
CHISHOLM, CAROLINE.....	889	MUHLBACH, LOUISA.....	902
COUTTS, MISS BURDETT.....	634, 900	NIGHTINGALE, FLORENCE.....	902
DAVIS, MRS.....	899	NORTON, HON. CAROLINE.....	761, 902
DUNLAP, JULIA.....	899	OLIPHANT, MRS.....	902
EASTLAKE, LADY.....	849, 890	PHELPS, ELIZABETH S.....	896
EDWARDS, AMELIA B.....	899	PUTNAM, MARY LOWELL.....	896
EDWARDS, MRS.....	899	RANYARD, MRS.....	899
ELIOT, GEORGE.....	901	ROSSETTI, CHRISTINA G.....	902
ELLET, MRS.....	644, 901	SAND, GEORGE (Madame Dudevant).....	641, 902
EUGENIE, EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH.....	901	SOMERVILLE, MRS.....	789, 902
EVANS, AUGUSTA J.....	901	STOWE, HARRIET BEECHER.....	837, 898, 902
FARRAR, MRS.....	827, 899	SWISSHELM, JANE C.....	898
FERN, FANNY.....	898	TAUTPHÆUS, BARONESS.....	892
FULHAME, MRS.....	892	TERHUNE, MRS.....	902
GOLDSCHMIDT, MADAME (Jenny Lind).....	728, 898	THACKERAY, MISS.....	903
GUERIN, EUGENIE DE.....	901	THOMAS, ANNIE.....	899
HAMILTON, GAIL.....	901	VICTORIA, QUEEN OF GREAT BRITAIN.....	806, 903
HOSMER, HARRIET.....	901	WETHERILL, THE MISSES (Warner).....	898, 903
HOSMER, MARGARET.....	901	WAUGH, IDA.....	899
HOWE, JULIA WARD.....	831, 899	WHITNEY, MRS. A. D. T.....	903
HOWITT, ANNA MARY.....	898	WOOD, MRS. HENRY.....	903
INGELOW, JEAN.....	901	YONGE, MISS.....	903

LIST OF THE DEAD.

In this second revision we have a long list of the departed; some of the most distinguished lights of feminine genius have been withdrawn from earth; noble women, who have made the world better and happier by the example of their lives, as well as by their literary works, have ceased from their labors. Let us honor their memories, and record their names anew.

	Page		Page
AMELIA, EX-QUEEN OF FRANCE.....	566	HECK, BARBARA.....	904
ANGOULEME, DUCHESS D'.....	889, 903	HENTZ, CAROLINE LEE.....	697, 904
ARNIM, BETTINA VON.....	569, 903	JAMESON, ANNA.....	706, 904
BAILLIE, JOANNA.....	574, 888	KENT, DUCHESS OF.....	715, 904
BREMER, MISS.....	586, 898, 903	KIRKLAND, CAROLINE M.....	716, 904
BRONTË, CHARLOTTE.....	597, 903	LESLIE, ELIZA.....	721, 904
BROWNING, MRS. BARRETT.....	605, 898, 903	LYON, MARY.....	892
BURD, ELIZA HOWARD.....	903	MAXWELL, LADY.....	894
COLERIDGE, SARA.....	629, 890	MITFORD, MARY RUSSELL.....	744, 904
CORNWALLIS, MISS.....	903	MORGAN, LADY.....	747, 904
DACRE, LADY.....	640, 890	PACKER, HARRIET L.....	896
EMBURY, EMMA C.....	653, 904	RACHEL, ELIZA FELIX.....	778, 904
FELLER, MADAME.....	864, 904	RUMFORD, COUNTESS OF.....	896
FERRIER, MARY.....	661, 904	SALE, LADY.....	898
FLETCHER, MARY.....	890, 904	SIGOURNEY, LYDIA HUNTLEY.....	782, 904
FOLLEN, ELIZA LEE.....	664, 904	TROLLOPE, MRS.....	801, 904
GASKELL, MRS.....	664, 904	WELBY, AMELIA B.....	811, 896
GOULD, HANNAH F.....	844, 904	WESLEY, SUSANNA.....	896
GORE, MRS.....	680, 904	WRIGHT, FANNY (Madame Darusmont).....	842, 898
HAVEN, ALICE B. (Cousin Alice).....	755, 904

INTRODUCTORY—NEW AND OLD.

IN the Second Edition, issued 1855, a few names were added. See Index, page xxxiv.

This Third Edition is prepared in order to give WOMAN her true Saxon name; also, to add a Synopsis for "Woman's Record" (see page 899) from 1855 to 1868,—thus making the work complete.

The opinions of the Press have been highly approving; the author trusts this Edition will meet with increased favour, as each year brings the public mind more into harmony with the views advanced, namely,—that on the right influence of women depends the moral improvement of men; and that the condition of the female sex decides the destiny of the nation. American Legislators are awakening to these truths; within the last fifteen years, laws more equitable in regard to the property and rights of married women have been enacted; the education of girls is more liberally provided for; "Colleges" and "Schools of Design for Women" have been incorporated; Medical Science is opened to women; their fitness to be physicians for their own sex admitted; and over three hundred women have received the full diploma of M. D. As teachers, young women are taking the place of men everywhere in our public schools, to the acknowledged improvement of national education.

During the present century, these ideas of the true mission of woman have been developed. Within the last fifty years more books have been written by women and about women than all put forth in the preceding five thousand eight hundred years of the world. The greater portion of these books have appeared within the last thirty years—and "Woman's Record" is the exponent of all.

The Publishers, it must be seen, have done their part well. The series of Engravings furnish a gallery of Portraits that, besides their usefulness in stamping on the mind of the reader a more permanent impression of each individual character thus illustrated, furnish an interesting study to the curious in costume and the adept in taste.

Then, the Selections afford an opportunity of judging the merits of feminine literature; the choicest gems of thought, fancy, and feeling are here treasured, sought out from works in different languages, and brought together in the uniform design of a perfect Cyclopædia of reference and comparison as regards woman and her productions. No work extant is similar to mine; for this reason, I am sure it will be welcomed. The world wants it.

“There are so many women of richly cultivated minds,” says a British critic, “who have distinguished themselves in letters or in society, and made it highly feminine to be intelligent, as well as good, and to have elevated as well as amiable feelings, that by-and-by the whole sex must adopt a new standard of education.”*

Now, my work is prepared to be both an aid and incentive to such progress. In order for this, three things are indispensable: to understand what God intended woman should do; what she has done; and what farther advantages are needed to fit her to perform well her part.

“The General Preface” is designed to answer the first query; also the “Remarks” at the beginning of each Era, and hints scattered through the book, will, I trust, be of service in the elucidation.

To show what she has done, I have gathered from the records of the world the names and histories of all distinguished women, so that an exact estimate of the capabilities of the sex might be formed by noting what individuals have accomplished through obstacles and discouragements of every kind.

The third proposition, growing naturally out of the two preceding, is answered by considering their import.

If God designed woman as the preserver of infancy, the teacher of childhood, the inspirer or helper of man’s moral nature in its efforts to reach after spiritual things; if examples of women are to be found in every age and nation; who, without any special preparation, have won their way to eminence in all pursuits tending to advance moral goodness and religious faith, then the policy, as well as justice of providing liberally for feminine education, must be apparent to Christian men. “The excellent woman is she who, if her husband dies, can be a father to their children,” says Goëthe. If read aright, this would give the woman every required advantage.

Like all moral and social changes, the one now going on in the public mind concerning woman has its absurdities and its errors. When mists are rising, they often take fantastic shapes and reveal ugly features in the landscape; but truth, like the sun, will at last make all clear and beautiful of its kind.

It has been my earnest endeavour to throw this true light over the important themes discussed.

The Bible is the only guarantee of woman’s rights, and the only expositor of her duties. Under its teachings, men learn to honour her. Wherever its doctrines are observed, her influence gains in power. All human good is founded in goodness. If the Gospel is the supreme good revealed to the world, and if this Gospel harmonizes best with the feminine nature, and is best exemplified in its purity by the feminine life, giving to the mother's instinctive love a scope, a hope, a support which no religion of human device ever conferred or conceived, then surely God has, in applying this Gospel so directly to her nature, offices, and condition, a great work for the sex to do. "Christ was made of a woman;" woman must train her children for Christ. Is this an inferior office?

* See article on Mrs. Hemans, in Blackwood’s Magazine, 1849.

Wherever the Bible is read, women's talents are cultivated and esteemed. In this "Record" are about two thousand six hundred names, including those of the Missionary Women; out of this number less than two hundred are from heathen nations, yet these constitute at this moment nearly three-fourths of the inhabitants of the globe, and for the first four thousand years, with the single exception of the Jewish people, were the world.

Is not this conclusive evidence that God's Word is woman's shield, His power her protection, and His gifts her sanction for their full development, cultivation, and exercise?

In preparing "Woman's Record" I have been aided by several friends in Europe, who have procured for me books and portraits not to be found in our country. Mrs. Mary Howitt has been very kind in her assistance, and I am happy to thank her thus publicly. Professor Charles E. Blumenthal rendered acceptable service by furnishing translations of a number of the Sketches of distinguished women of Germany. My American friends have also been ready to assist: W. Gilmore Simms, Esq. wrote the Sketch of Miss Lee, and the Rev. Dr. Stevens and Rev. Dr. Kip furnished each a Sketch. Those to whom I have applied for information, have, in almost every instance, given all in their power, and cheered me kindly with their encouragement. I hope they will find the finished work worthy of approval.

The volume is larger than was at first intended, but materials increased, new ideas were to be set forth and clearly illustrated; I have not exhausted the theme.

One object is, however, accomplished: the picture of Woman's Life, as it has been developed to the world from the Creation to the present date, is here truly and completely displayed.

I am far from considering this outward semblance her best or loveliest praise. Millions of the sex whose names were never known beyond the circles of their own home influences, have been as worthy of commendation as those here commemorated. Stars are never seen either through the dense cloud or bright sunshine; but when daylight is withdrawn from a clear sky they tremble forth: so women's Genius is made visible only where God's Word has cleared from the mental horizon the gross clouds of heathen error, while His Providence has withdrawn from the individual woman that support and protection from man which is her sunshine over the rough ways of the world. Hitherto she has usually won fame through suffering: let those who envy the bright ones remember this.

But, as the stars of heaven guide the mariner safely over the night-enveloped waters, so these stars of humanity are required to show the true progress of moral virtue through the waves of temptation and sin that roll over the earth. The greater the number, and the more light they diffuse, the greater will be the safety of society.

When men fully comprehend this, they will bless feminine genius, and fashion their own literature to a higher standard of moral taste, and a nobler view of human destiny. Says the gifted author of Pendennis, "Women are pure, but not men. Women are unselfish, but not men."

In truth, the moral sense of men, though as yet imperfect, has rarely erred so widely as to show, in works of imagination even, any ideal of masculine nature so perfect in moral virtues as the feminine. In the conflicts of contending duties, in the trials of love and temptations of passion, the masters of dramatic art, great poets and novelists, never fall into the sin against nature of making their men better than their women.

The ideal of the angelic in humanity is, in Christian literature, always feminine. When this instinctive perception of woman's mission becomes an acknowledged and sustained mode of moral progress, it will be easy for the sex to make advances in every branch of literature and science connected with human improvement; and the horizon will be studded with stars.

Now, some readers may think I have found too many celebrities; others will search for omissions. There was never a perfect work, so mine must bear the general lot of criticism. All I ask is, that the contents be well understood before judgment is rendered.

PHILADELPHIA, July 4th, 1851.*

(This Third Edition, revised, was completed November, 1868.)

LIST OF PORTRAITS.

The larger portion of our Portraits have been obtained directly from Europe for this work; Rome, Florence, Paris and London, contributing to form our Gallery. The originals were executed by the most celebrated artists. We have not room for particulars respecting these gems of art, excepting a few of the most rare. Portraits of the living American ladies are chiefly from pictures or Daguerreotypes, taken expressly for this "Record."

FIRST ERA.

	Page
1. AGRIPPINA, JULIA, DAUGHTER OF GERMANICUS.....	21
2. ANDROMACHE, copied and enlarged from a picture on an ancient gem, representing Andromache, her husband Hector, and her son Astyanax	24
3. ASPASIA.....	26
4. CARMENTA	29
5. CLEOPATRA, copied from an ancient Egyptian coin	31
6. OLYMPIAS, MOTHER OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT, enlarged from an ancient gem.....	50
7. PORTIA	52
8. SAPPHO	56
9. SEMIRAMIS, copied from an ancient gem.....	58
10. TAMYRIS, copied and enlarged from an ancient gem	60

SECOND ERA.

11. AGNES SOREL.....	68
12. ANNE BOLEYN.....	72
13. ARC, JOAN OF.....	76
14. BEATRICE PORTINARI.....	82
15. BLANCHE OF CASTILE.....	84
16. BORGIA, LUCREZIA.....	86
17. BRUNORO, BONA LOMBARDI.....	88
18. CATHARINE SFORZA.....	91
19. CATHARINE, ST.	92
20. COLONNA, VITTORIA.....	93
21. CORNANO, CATERINA.....	94
22. D'ANDOLO, or BRANCALEONE GALEANA	95
23. ERMENGARDE.....	99
24. FAUSTINA, ANNIA GALERIA	102
25. GAMBARA VERONICA	105
26. GOZZADINI, BETISIA	107
27. HELENA, MOTHER OF CONSTANTINE, copied from a picture upon a Greek manuscript, written in the Ninth Century	108
28. HELOISE.....	109
29. ISABELLA OF ARRAGON.....	113
30. ISABELLA OF CASTILE.....	114
31. ISAURE, CLEMENCE	115
32. JOANNA, COUNTESS OF HAINAULT AND FLANDERS.....	117
33. JOANNA OF NAPLES.....	118
34. JOANNA II. OF NAPLES	119
35. JULIA DOMNA, copied from a bust in the collection of Montfaucon.....	119
36. LAURA, MADONNA	121
37. LEIVA, MARIA VIRGINIA	121
38. LOUISA OF SAVOY.....	122
39. MARGARET, COUNTESS OF TYROL.....	125
40. MARGARET OF DENMARK.....	126
41. MARGARETTA OF SAXONY	128
42. MATILDA, COUNTESS OF TUSCANY	132
43. MATTUGLIANA, MEA	132
44. NOGAROLA, ISOTTA.....	133

	Page
45. PACHECO, DONNA MARIA.....	134
46. PHILIPPA OF HAINAULT.....	136
47. POMPEIA PLOTINA.....	137
48. ROSSI, PROPERZIA DE	140
49. SABINA JULIA	140
50. SFORZA, BIANCA MARIA VISCONTI.....	143
51. TENDA, BEATRICE.....	145
52. THEODELINDA	146
53. ZENOBIA SEPTIMIA, copied and enlarged from a gem with a Palmyrenian inscription	149

THIRD ERA.

54. ACCORAMBONI, VITTORIA	153
55. ADAMS, MRS. ABIGAIL	154
56. ADAMS, MISS HANNAH.....	159
57. AGOSTINA, MAID OF SARAGOSSA	161
58. ALBRIZZI, TEOTOCHI ISABELLA	166
59. ANNE OF AUSTRIA	168
60. ANNE, QUEEN OF ENGLAND	169
61. ARBLAY, MADAME D'.....	171
62. ARRAGON, JOAN OF.....	180
63. BACCIOCHI, MADAME MARIE ANNE ELISE	195
64. BARBAULD, MRS. ANNE LETITIA	196
65. BASSI, LAURA MARIA CATHARINE.....	204
66. BELLINI, GUISEPA, COUNTESS OF	208
67. BERTANA, LUCIA.....	209
68. BLESSINGTON, COUNTESS OF	212
69. BONAPARTE, MADAME RAMOLINA MARIA LETITIA	216
70. BORGHESE, MARIE PAULINE, PRINCESS DE.....	217
71. BRINVILLIERS, MARIE MARGUÉRITE, MARCHIONESS DE	222
72. CAMPAN, MADAME	236
73. CAPELLO, BIANCA.....	239
74. CAROLINE AMELIA ELIZABETH	242
75. CATHARINE DE MEDICIS	248
76. CATHARINE I., ALEXIEONA	250
77. CATHARINE II., ALEXIEONA.....	251
78. CENCI, BEATRICE.....	253
79. CHRISTINA, QUEEN OF SWEDEN	259
80. CLIFFORD, ANNE	263
81. CORDAY, CHARLOTTE.....	266
82. COTTIN, MADAME SOPHIE.....	272
83. DARLING, GRACE.....	280
84. DESHOULIÈRES, MADAME	288
85. DEVONSHIRE, DUCHESS OF.....	289
86. DWIGHT, MRS. ELIZABETH BAKER.....	292
87. EDGEWORTH, MISS MARIA	293
88. ELIZABETH, QUEEN OF ENGLAND	299
89. ERAUSO, CATALINA DE.....	305
90. ESTE, ELEONORA D'	307
91. FANSHAWE, LADY	309
92. FEDOROWNA, MARIA	312
93. FERNANDEZ, MARIA MADDELENA MORELLI.....	312
94. FOUGERET, MADAME.....	316
95. FRY, ELIZABETH.....	318
96. GENLIS, MADAME DE.....	322
97. GEOFFRIN, MADAME DE.....	325
98. GONZAGA, COLONNA JULIA.....	329
99. GONZAGA, COLONNA IPPOLITA.....	330
100. GREY, LADY JANE	333
101. GUIZOT, MADAME CHARLOTTE PAULINE.....	336
102. GWYNNE, ELEANOR	338
103. HEMANS, MRS. FELICIA DOROTHEA.....	344
104. HERSCHEL, MISS CAROLINE LUCRETIA.....	353
105. INCHBALD, MRS.	360
106. JOSEPHINE, EMPRESS	366

	Page
107. JUDSON, MRS. ANNE HASSELTINE.....	367
108. JUNOT, LAURA, DUCHESS D'ABRANTES.....	370
109. KAMAMALU	371
110. KAUFFMAN, MARIA ANGELICA.....	373
111. LONDON, MISS, OR MRS. M'LEAN	383
112. LAVALETTE, COUNTESS DE	388
113. L'ENCLOS, NINON DE	390
114. MADISON, MRS.	396
115. MAINTENON, MADAME DE.....	398
116. MARIA THERESA, EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA.....	404
117. MARIE ANTOINETTE, QUEEN OF FRANCE.....	406
118. MARLBOROUGH, DUCHESS OF.....	408
119. MARS, MADMOISELLE.....	409
120. MARY I, QUEEN OF ENGLAND.....	415
121. MARY II, QUEEN OF ENGLAND	417
122. MARY DE MEDICIS.....	418
123. MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.....	419
124. MERCER, MISS MARGARET	424
125. MICHIEL, RENIER GIUSTINA	428
126. MNISZECH, MARINA, CZARINA OF MUSCOVY.....	429
127. MOHALBI, GARAFILIA.....	431
128. MONTAGU, LADY MARY WORTLEY	434
129. MONTESPAN, MADAME DE	440
130. MONTPENSIER, DUCHESS DE	441
131. MORE, MRS. HANNAH.....	442
132. MOTHER ANNA	447
133. MOTTE, MRS. REBECCA.....	448
134. NECKER, MADAME.....	450
135. NEWCASTLE, DUCHESS OF.....	452
136. NEWELL, MRS. HARRIET.....	453
137. OSGOOD, MRS. FRANCES SARGENT.....	458
138. PICHLER, MADAME CAROLINE.....	468
139. POCAHONTAS	474
140. POMPADOUR, MARCHIONESS DE	477
141. PORTER, MISS JANE.....	473
142. ROLAND, MADAME.....	490
143. RUSSEL, LADY RACHEL	494
144. SEVIGNÉ, MARCHIONESS DE	501
145. SFORZA, BONA	504
146. SHREWSBURY, COUNTESS OF.....	505
147. SIRANI, ELIZABETTA	507
148. SMITH, MISS CHARLOTTE	508
149. SMITH, MRS. SARAH LANMAN	511
150. STAËL, MADAME DE.....	517
151. STEWART, MRS. HARRIET BRADFORD	521
152. STUART, ARABELLA.....	522
153. TALLIEN, MADAME THERESA	526
154. TAMBRONI, CLOTILDE	526
155. TIGHE, MRS. MARY.....	532
156. TRIMMER, MRS. SARAH	539
157. VALLIÈRE, DUCHESS DE LA.....	541
158. WARREN, MRS. MERCY.....	546
159. WASHINGTON, MRS. MARTHA	550
160. WHEATLEY, PHILLIS.....	552
161. ZINGA, ANNA	561

FOURTH ERA.

162. AMELIE MARIE, EX-QUEEN OF THE FRENCH	566
163. ANCELOT, MADAME.....	567
164. BAILLIE, JOANNA	574
165. BEECHER, MISS ESTHER CATHERINE	578
166. BELLOC, MADAME LOUISA SWANTON.....	583
167. BREMER, MISS FREDERIKA.....	585
168. BRIDGMAN, MISS LAURA.....	592

	Page
169. CARLEY, MISS ALICE	615
170. CLARKE, MISS SARA JANE	624
171. COOK, MISS ELIZA	629
172. COUTTS, MISS ANGELA BURDETT	634
173. CUSHMAN, MISS CHARLOTTE	638
174. DUDEVANT, MADAME	641
175. ELLET, MRS. ELIZABETH F.	645
176. ELLIS, MRS. SARAH STICKNEY	649
177. EMBURY, MRS. EMMA CATHARINE	653
178. FARLEY, MISS HARRIET	657
179. FULLER, SARAH MARGARET, OR MARCHIONESS D'OSSOLI	666
180. GILMAN, MRS. CAROLINE	670
181. GIRARDIN, MADAME DELPHINE	674
182. GORE, MRS. CHARLES, copied for this work by Miss MARGARET GILLIES, of London	676
183. HALL, MRS. ANNA MARIA	691
184. HENTZ, MRS. CAROLINE LEE, from a miniature by her husband, Prof. HENTZ	697
185. HOWITT, MRS. MARY, from a picture by Miss MARGARET GILLIES	699
186. ISABELLA II., QUEEN OF SPAIN	703
187. JAGIELLO, MISS APOLLONIA	705
188. JUDSON, MRS. EMILY C.	710
189. KEMBLE, MRS. FRANCES ANNE	712
190. LESLIE, MISS ELIZA	721
191. LEWIS, MRS. ESTELLE ANNA	727
192. LIND, MADEMOISELLE JENNY	728
193. LYNCH, MISS ANNE C.	731
194. MARIA II., DA GLORIA	733
195. MARSH, MRS., from a picture drawn and painted for this work by Miss M. GILLIES, of London	735
196. MARTINEAU, MISS HARRIET	739
197. MORGAN, SYDNEY, LADY	747
198. MOWATT, MRS. ANNA CORA	754
199. NEAL, MRS. ALICE BRADLEY	755
200. NICHOLS, MRS. GOVE	757
201. NORTON, HON. MRS.	761
202. PARDOE, MISS JULIA	765
203. PHELPS, MRS. ALMIRA HART LINCOLN	770
204. RACHEL, MADEMOISELLE	773
205. SEDGWICK, MISS CATHARINE MARIA	777
206. SIGOURNEY, MRS. LYDIA HUNTLEY	782
207. SMITH, MRS. ELIZABETH OAKES	786
208. SOMERVILLE, MRS. MARY	789
209. SONTAG, MADAME HENRIETTA	792
210. SOUTHWORTH, MRS. EMMA D. E. NEVITTE	794
211. STEPHENS, MRS. ANN S.	796
212. TROLLOPE, MRS.	801
213. VICTORIA, QUEEN OF ENGLAND	806
214. WEBER, MISS HELENE MARIE	809
215. WELBY, MRS. AMELIA B.	811
216. WILLARD, MRS. EMMA	816
217. HAIGHT, MRS. SARAH ROGERS	828
218. HEWITT, MRS. MARY E.	829

BENEFACTRESSES.

219. CHASE, MRS. ANN	859
220. COLQUHOUN, LADY	861
221. FELLER, MADAME	864
222. HILL, MRS. FRANCES M.	868
223. PETER, MRS. SARAH	870
224. WHITTLESEY, MRS. ABIGAIL GOODRICH	872

SUPPLEMENT.

225. DONNE, MARIA DALLE	876
226. HALL, MRS. SARAH	877
227. LEE, MISS MARY E.	879
228. MATILDA, QUEEN OF HENRY I.	882
229. ELIZABETH OF FRANCE	884

INDEX.

	Page		Page
ABARCA, MARIA DE.....	153	AÏSSÉ, DEMOIS.....	163
ABASSA.....	67	AISHA.....	69
ABDY, MRS.....	839	ALACOQUE, MARIA.....	164
Thy Maiden Name.....	839	ALBANY, LOUISA, COUNTESS OF.....	164
Where shall I die?.....	839	ALBEDYHL, BARONESS D'.....	164
ABELLA.....	67	ALBEMARLE, ANNE CLARGES, DUCHESS
ABIGAIL.....	19	OF.....	164
ABINGTON, FRANCES.....	153	ALBERETTI, VERDONI THÉRÈSE.....	565
ABISHAG.....	19	ALBRET, CHARLOTTE D', DUCHESS DE
ACCA-LAURENTIA.....	20	VALENTINOIS.....	164
ACCIAIOLA, MAGDALENE.....	153	ALBRET, JEANNE D', OF NAVARRE.....	164
ACCORAMBONI, VITTORIA.....	153	"Impromptu" Poem.....	165
ACKLAND, LADY HARRIET.....	154	ALBRIZZI, TEOTOCHI ISABELLA.....	166
ACME.....	20	ALCESTE.....	22
ADA.....	20	ALCINOË.....	22
ADAMS, ABIGAIL.....	154	ALDRUDE.....	69
Extracts from her Letters.....	154	ALEXANDRA, QUEEN OF JUDEA.....	23
ADAMS, HANNAH.....	159	ALEXANDRA, MOTHER OF MARIAMNE... ..	23
ADAMS, SARAH FLOWER.....	874	ALICE, QUEEN OF FRANCE.....	69
Funeral Hymn.....	874	ALICE OF FRANCE.....	76
ADELAÏDE.....	67	ALLIN, ABBY.....	823
ADELAÏDE.....	67	ALOARA.....	70
ADELAÏDE.....	67	ALOYSIA, SIGEA.....	166
ADELAÏDE.....	67	ALPAÏDE.....	70
ADELICIA.....	67	ALPHAISULI.....	70
ADORNI, CATHARINE FIESCHI.....	160	ALTOVITI, MARSEILLE D'.....	166
ADRICHOMIA, CORNELIA.....	160	AMALASONTA.....	70
AFRA.....	67	AMALTHËA.....	23
AGATHA.....	67	AMBOISE, FRANCES D'.....	71
AGESISTRATA.....	20	AMELIA, 'ANNA.....	166
AGNES, ST.....	68	AMELIA, MARIA FREDERICA AUGUSTA..	565
AGNES OF HUNGARY.....	68	AMELIA MARIA, EX-QUEEN OF THE
AGNES DE MERANIA.....	68	FRENCH.....	566
AGNES OF FRANCE.....	68	AMERICAN MISSIONARY WOMEN.....	889
AGNES SOREL.....	68	AMHERST, LADY.....	873
AGNESI, MARIA GAETANA.....	160	AMMANATI, LAURA BATTIFERI.....	167
AGNODICE.....	20	ANACOANA.....	71
AGNOULT, COUNTESS D'.....	565	ANASTASIA.....	71
AGOSTINA, THE MAID OF SARAGOSSA ..	160	ANASTASIA, ST.....	71
AGREDA, MARIE D'.....	160	ANCELOT, VIRGINIE.....	567
AGRIPPINA, WIFE OF GERMANICUS.....	20	An Old Peeress.....	567
AGRIPPINA, JULIA.....	21	ANCHITA.....	23
AGUILAR, GRACE.....	162	ANDREINI, ISABELLA.....	167
Poem from the Magic Wreath.....	162	ANDROCLEA.....	23
AIGUILLON, DUCHESS D'.....	162	ANDROMACHE.....	24
AIKEN, LUCY.....	163	ANDROMEDA.....	24
AIROLA, ANGELICA VERONICA.....	163	ANGELBERGA, OR INGELBERGA.....	71

	Page		Page
ANGITIA.....	24	ARUNDEL, LADY BLANCHE.....	181
ANGOULÈME, MARIE THÉRÈSE CHAR-		ARUNDEL, MARY.....	181
LOTTE, DUCHESS D'.....	568	ASCHAM, MARGARET.....	181
ANGUSCIOLA, SOPHONISBA.....	167	ASENATH.....	26
ANGUSCIOLA, LUCIA.....	168	ASKEW, ANNE.....	182
ANNA, OF TYRE.....	24	ASPASIA.....	26
ANNA, THE PROPHETESS.....	71	ASPASIA, OR MILTO.....	27
ANNE OF BOHEMIA.....	72	ASTELL, MARY.....	182
ANNE BOLEYN.....	72	ASTORGAS, MARCHIONESS OF.....	183
ANNE OF BEAUJEU.....	74	ATHALIAH.....	28
ANNE OF BRITTANY.....	74	ATTENDULI, MARGARET DE.....	80
ANNE OF CLEVES.....	75	AUBESPINE, MAGDALEN DE L'.....	183
ANNE OF CYPRUS.....	75	AUNOY, COUNTESS D'.....	183
ANNE OF HUNGARY.....	75	AUSTEN, JANE.....	184
ANNE OF RUSSIA.....	75	From "Northanger Abbey."
ANNE, DUCHESS OF THE VIENNOIS.....	75	The Heroine's Childhood.....	185
ANNE OF WARWICK.....	75	The Heroine at a Ball.....	186
ANNA IWANOWNA, EMPRESS OF RUSSIA.....	168	A Walk and Conversation.....	188
ANN AMELIA, PRINCESS OF PRUSSIA....	168	The Romance of Mystery.....	191
ANNE OF AUSTRIA.....	168	AUSTIN, MRS.....	840
ANNE, QUEEN OF ENGLAND.....	169	AVOGADRO, LUCIA.....	183
ANNE OF FERRARA.....	171	AXIOTHEA.....	28
ANNE DE GONZAGUE.....	171	AYCARD, MARIA.....	851
ANTIGONE.....	24	AYESHA.....	80
ANTONIA MAJOR.....	24	AYSA.....	194
ANTONIA MINOR.....	24	AZZI DE FORTI, FAUSTINA.....	194
ANTONINA.....	75
APOLLONIA, ST.....	76	BABOIS, MADAME VICTOIRE.....	194
ARBLAY, MADAME D'.....	171	BACCIOCHI, MARIE ANNE ELISE.....	195
From "Evelina."		BACHE, SARAH.....	195
A Pretended Highway Robbery.....	173	BACON, ANNE.....	196
From "The Diary."		BAILEY, MARGARET L.....	823
A Day of Happiness in a Palace.....	175	BAILLIE, JOANNA.....	574, 888
A Royal Reading Party.....	176	From "De Montfort."
Poetry in a Palace.....	177	Description of Jane De Montfort.....	575
Letter to a Friend in Affliction.....	177	True Love.....	576
The King's Birth-day.....	177	Picture of a Country Life.....	576
ARBOUVILLE, COUNTESS D'.....	874	The Wife.....	576
ARC, JOAN OF.....	76	The Widow and her Children.....	576
ARCHIDAMIA.....	79	The Tomb of Columbus.....	576
ARCHINTA, MARGHERITA.....	179	Address to Miss Agnes Baillie.....	577
ARETAPHILA.....	25	Jealousy.....	577
ARETE.....	25	BANDELLINI, TERESA CORELLA.....	854
ARGYLL, DUCHESS OF.....	859	BANDETTINI, THERESA.....	196
ARIADNE.....	79	BARBARA.....	81
ARIOSTA LIPPA.....	79	BARBAULD, ANNA LETITIA.....	196
ARLOTTA.....	80	On Education.....	198
ARMYNE, LADY MARY.....	179	On Inconsistency in our Expectations.....	201
ARNAUDE DE ROCAS.....	180	Washing Day.....	202
ARNAULD, ANGELIQUE.....	180	Painted Flowers.....	202
ARNAULD, MARIE ANGELIQUE.....	180	BARBE DE VERRUE.....	81
ARNAULD, CATHARINE AGNES.....	180	BARBIER, MARY ANN.....	203
ARNIM, BETTINA VON.....	569	BARNARD, LADY ANNE.....	203
Letters.....	570	Auld Robin Gray.....	203
ARNOULT, SOPHIE.....	180	BARNES, SUSAN REBECCA.....	823
ARRAGON, JOAN OF.....	180	BARONI, ADRIANNE BASILE.....	203
ARRAGON, TULLIA D'.....	181	BARRY, COUNTESS DU.....	203
ARRIA.....	80	BARTON, ELIZABETH.....	204
ARSINOE, OF EGYPT.....	25	BASINE, or BASIN.....	81
ARSINOE, OF THRACE.....	25	BASSEPORTE, MADELEINE FRANCES.....	204
ARSINOE, OF EGYPT.....	26	BASSI, LAURA MARIA CATHARINE.....	204
ARTEMISIA I.....	26	BASTIDE, JENNY.....	851
ARTEMISIA II.....	26	BATHSHEBA, or BATHCHUAH.....	28
		BATTISTATI, LOUISA.....	573

	Page		Page
BAUCIS.....	23	The Waefu' Heart.....	211
BAYARD, ELISE JUSTINE.....	823	Auld Robin Forbes.....	211
BAYNARD, ANNE.....	205	BLANCA, N. LE.....	211
BAWR, MADAME.....	851	BLANCHARD, MADAME.....	211
BEALE, MARY.....	206	BLANCHE OF CASTILE.....	84
BEATRICE OF BURGUNDY.....	81	BLANCHE OF PADUA.....	85
BEATRICE OF PROVENCE.....	81	BLANCHE DE BOURBON.....	85
BEATRICE PORTINARI.....	81	BLAND, ELIZABETH.....	211
BEAUFORT, JOAN.....	82	BLEECKER, ANNE ELIZA.....	211
BEAUFORT, MARGARET, COUNTESS OF		Return to Tomanick.....	212
RICHMOND AND DERBY.....	82	BLESSINGTON, COUNTESS OF.....	212
BEAUMARNAIS, FANNY, COUNTESS DE.....	206	Lord Byron in 1823.....	213
Épître aux Femmes	206	Lord Byron's Ill-temper.....	213
BEAUMONT, MADAME LE PRINCE DE.....	206	Lord Byron's Regard for his Wife.....	214
BECTOR, CLAUDE DE.....	206	A Birth-day.....	214
BEECHER, ESTHER CATHARINE.....	578	A New Year.....	214
The Evening Cloud.....	580	Of Dancing and Dress in France.....	214
To the Monotropa.....	580	BLOMBERG, BARBARA.....	215
Obedience to the Divine Law.....	580	BOADICEA.....	85
BEHN, APHRA.....	207	BOCCAGE, MARIE ANNE DU.....	215
BEKKER, ELIZABETH.....	207	A M. Bailey.....	216
BELGOSO, PRINCESS DE.....	854	BOGART, ELIZABETH.....	824
BELLAMY, GEORGIANA.....	207	He came too late.....	824
BELLEVILLE, JANE DE.....	82	An Autumn View.....	824
BELLINI, GUISEPA, COUNTESS.....	208	BOIS DE LA PIERRE, LOUISE MARIE.....	216
BELLOC, LOUISE SWANTON.....	583	BOLTON, SARAH T.....	824
BENDISH, BRIDGET.....	208	BONAPARTE, MADAME LETITIA.....	216
BENGER, ELIZABETH OGILVY.....	208	BONTEMS, MADAME.....	217
BENTON, MARY.....	888	BORA, or BORE, CATHARINE VON.....	86
BENWELL, MARY.....	208	BORGHESE, MARIE PAULINE, PRINCESS
BERENGARIA OF NAVARRE.....	82	DE.....	217
BERENICE.....	28	BORGIA, LUCREZIA.....	86
BERENICE.....	28	BOUGNET, MADAME.....	218
BERENICE.....	28	BOULLOUGNE, MAGDELAINE DE.....	218
BERENICE.....	28	BOURETTE, CHARLOTTE.....	218
BERENICE.....	28	To M. De Fontenelle.....	218
BERENICE.....	28	BOURGAIN, THÉRÈSE.....	218
BERENICE.....	28	BOURGET, CLEMENCE DE.....	218
BERENICE.....	29	BOURIGNON, ANTOINETTE.....	219
BERENICE.....	29	BOVETTE DE BLEMUR, JACQUELINE.....	219
BERENICE.....	83	BOVEY, CATHARINE.....	219
BERGER, MADAME.....	858	BOVIN, MADAME.....	873
BERNARD, CATHARINE.....	208	BRACHMAN, LOUISE.....	219
BERNERS, JULIANA.....	83	BRADSTREET, ANNE.....	219
BERSALA, ANN.....	83	Lines addressed to her Husband.....	220
BERTANA, LUCIA.....	209	Contemplations.....	220
Sonnet.....	209	Elegy.....	221
BERTHA.....	83	BRAGELONGE, AGNES DE.....	86
BERTHA, or BERTRADE.....	84	BRAMBATI, EMILIA.....	221
BERTHA.....	84	BRAMBATI, ISOTTA.....	221
BERTRADE.....	84	BRATTON, MARTHA.....	221
BETHMAN, FREDERICA.....	208	BRAY, MRS.....	840
BIBI, JAND.....	215	BREESE, MARY.....	221
BIGNE, GRACE DE LA.....	84	BREGY, CHARLOTTE SAUMAISE, COUNT-
BILDERJIK, KATHARINE WILHELMINA		ESS DE.....	221
BILLINGTON, ELIZABETH.....	215	BREMER, FREDERIKA.....	586
BILLIONI, N. BUSSA.....	215	Advice to a Young Wife.....	588
BLACK, MRS.....	210	Resolutions of a Young Wife.....	589
BLACK, MISS.....	210	Of Children.....	590
BLACKWELL, ELIZABETH.....	210	A Christian.....	590
BLACKWELL, ELIZABETH.....	584	Betrothment.....	590
BLAKE, KATHARINE.....	209	Marriage.....	590
BLAMIRE, SUSANNA.....	210	A Happy Family.....	591
The Nabob.....	210	Wisdom.....	591
		Prayer.....	591

	Page		Page
Philanthropy	591	The Lover and his Declaration	231
Devotion.....	591	Laura refuses Colonel Hargrave	232
Virtue.....	591	BUCHAN, COUNTESS OF.....	88
Twin Sisters	592	BUCHAN, ELSPETH.....	234
BRENTANO, SOPHIA	221	BUCHARDEHT, THÉRÈSE VON.....	853
BRIDGET, ST.....	86	BUFFET, MARGARET	234
BRIDGMAN, LAURA	592	BULWER, LADY	840
The Good-natured Girl	596	BUNINA, ANNA	857
BRINVILLIERS, MARIE MARGUÉRITE, MARCHIONESS DE	222	BURE, CATHARINE.....	234
BROCCHI, GABARDI.....	855	BURLEIGH, LADY MILDRED.....	234
BRONTË, CHARLOTTE.....	597	BURNET, ELIZABETH	235
Lowood Scenery, from "Jane Eyre".....	598	BURY, LADY CHARLOTTE.....	841
The Meeting.....	599	BURY, ELIZABETH	235
The Parting	600
Married Life.....	602	CALAGE, DE PECH DE	235
From "Shirley".....	602	CALAVRESE, MARIA	235
BROOKE, CHARLOTTE.....	840	CALDERON DE LA BARCA, FRANCES.....	841
BROOKE, FRANCES	222	Of the Women of Mexico.....	841
BROOKS, MARIA.....	223	CALLCOTT, LADY.....	874
Ode to the Departed	223	CALPHURNIA.....	89
Hymn.....	225	CALPURNIA.....	29
The Moon of Flowers	225	CAMARGO, MARIE ANNE CAPI DE	236
To Niagara	225	CAMILLA	29
Song.....	225	CAMPAN, MADAME DE.....	236
Friendship.....	225	Mesmer and his Magnetism.....	236
Prayer.....	226	The Emperor Alexander.....	237
Description of Egla	226	To Her only Son.....	237
Meles and Egla contrasted	226	Woman's Influence.....	238
Zophiel listening while Egla sings.....	226	Cultivation of the Arts.....	238
Morning.....	226	CAMPBELL, DOROTHEA PRIMROSE.....	619
Ambition.....	227	Moonlight	616
Virtue.....	227	CAMPBELL, JULIET H.....	925
BROOKS, MARY E.	824	A Story of Sunrise.....	825
Psalm CXXXVII.....	824	CAMPIGLIA, MADDELENA.....	238
Oh, never believe, Love	825	CANTARINI, CHIARA.....	238
BROSSIER, MARTHA	228	CANTOFOLI, GENEVRA.....	238
BROWN, CATHARINE.....	227	CAPELLO, BIANCA	239
BROWN, FRANCES.....	604	CAPILLANA	89
The Spanish Conquests in America.....	605	CARACCILO, MARIA RAFFAELLA.....	855
Dreams of the Dead	605	CAREW, LADY ELIZABETH	243
BROWNE, MARY ANNE	228	Revenge of Injuries	243
The Heart and Lyre.....	228	CAREY, ALICE.....	615
Man's Love	229	Lights of Genius.....	615
Woman's Love.....	229	Pictures of Memory	616
She was not made for Happiness.....	229	The two Missionaries	616
Memory	229	The Charmed Bird.....	616
Kindred Spirits	230	To the Evening Zephyr.....	616
Jaques Balmot.....	230	The Past and the Present	616
BROWNING, ELIZABETH BARRETT	605	The Handmaid	617
Adam's Prophecy of Woman	606	Death's Ferryman.....	617
The Sleep	607	Watching.....	617
Romance of the Swan's Nest.....	607	Visions of Light.....	617
The Mother's Prayer	608	CAREY, PHEBE.....	618
The Child and the Watcher.....	608	Song of the Heart.....	618
Work and Contemplation.....	608	Resolves	618
The Lady's Yes	608	Our Homestead	618
Discontent.....	609	Parting and Meeting	619
Patience taught by Nature.....	609	CARLEMIGELLI, ASPASIE.....	240
Cheerfulness taught by Reason.....	609	CARLEN, EMILIE.....	610
Cowper's Grave	609	Erika, from "The Rose of Thistle Island"	611
BRUN, FREDERIKE CHRISTIANE.....	230	Gabriella	612
BRUN, MADAME L.	230	The Divorcee, from "The Magic Goblet".....	614
BRUNEHAUT.....	87	CARLISLE, ANNE	241
BRUNORO, BONA LOMBARDI	88	CARMENTA, OR NICOSTRATA	29
BRUNTON, MARY.....	230
From "Self-Control."
Sketch of the Heroine.....	231

	Page		Page
CAROLINE WILHELMINE DOROTHEA.....	241	CHEZY, WILHELMINE CHRISTINE VON..	259
CAROLINE MATILDA	241	CHILD, LYDIA MARIA.....	619
CAROLINE MARIA.....	242	The Neighbour-in-Law	620
CAROLINE AMELIA ELIZABETH.....	242	Politeness	623
CARTER, ELIZABETH	243	Beauty	623
Letter from Miss Carter	244	CHIAMARA	36
Extracts from Epictetus.....	246	CHOIN, MARIE EMILIE JOLY DE.....	259
From "The Enchiridion"	246	CHRISTINA, QUEEN OF SWEDEN	259
CARTISMANDUA.....	89	CHRODIELE.....	92
CASALINA, LUCIA	247	CHUDLEIGH, LADY MARY	262
CASE, LUELLE J. B.	826	CIBBER, SUSANNA MARIA	262
Energy in Adversity.....	826	CICCI, MARIA LOUISA.....	262
CASSANA, MARIA VITTORIA.....	247	CINCHON, COUNTESS OF.....	262
CASSANDRA.....	29	CIRANI, ELIZABETH.....	262
CASSIOPEIA	30	CLAIRON, CLARA JOSEPHA DE LA TUDE	268
CASTELNAU, HENRIETTE JULIE DE.....	247	CLARA	92
CASTRO, ANNE DE	247	CLARKE, MARY COWDEN.....	624
CASTRO, INEZ DE	89	CLARKE, SARA JANE.....	624
CATALANI, ANGELICA.....	247	My Lays	625
CATELLAN, MARGUERITE DE.....	248	Ariadne	625
CATHARINE OF ARRAGON.....	89	The March of Mind.....	626
CATHARINE SFORZA	90	There was a Rose	626
CATHARINE, ST., OF SIENNA	91	I never will grow old	626
CATHARINE, ST., OF ALEXANDRIA.....	91	My first Fishing	627
CATHARINE OF VALOIS.....	91	The Intellectual Woman.....	628
CATHARINE, ST., OF BOLOGNA	92	Woman's Heart	628
CATHARINE DE MEDICIS	248	Woman's Gratitude.....	628
CATHARINE PARR	249	The Poet's Mission.....	628
CATHARINE OF BRAGANZA.....	250	CLAYPOLE, ELIZABETH.....	263
CATHARINE ALEXIEONA.....	250	CLELIA	36
CATHARINE II., ALEXIEONA.....	251	CLELIA	92
CATHARINE PAULOWNA.....	253	CLEMENTS, MARGARET.....	265
CECONIA, or CESENIA	30	CLEOBULE, or CLEOBULINE	31
CENCI, BEATRICE.....	253	CLEOPATRA	31
CENTLIVRE, SUSANNAH	254	CLERMONT, CLAUDE CATHARINE DE.....	263
CERETA	92	CLEVELAND, BARBARA VILLIERS, DUCH-
CEZELLI, CONSTANCE.....	254	ESS OF	263
CHALLIE, MADAME DE.....	851	CLIFFORD, ANNE.....	263
CHAMBERS, MARY.....	255	CLIVE, CATHARINE	264
CHAMPMESLE, MARIE DESMARES DE....	255	CLOTILDE, WIFE OF CLOVIS.....	92
CHANDLER, CAROLINE H.	825	CLOTHILDE, QUEEN OF THE GOTHs.....	93
CHANDLER, MARY.....	255	CLYTEMNESTRA.....	32
CHANDLER, ELIZABETH MARGARET	255	COCHRANE, GRIZEL.....	265
The Devoted	255	COCKBURN, CATHARINE.....	265
CHAPMAN, PRISCILLA	873	COLERIDGE, SARA HENRY	629
CHAPONE, HESTER	255	A Mother over her Child, &c.....	629
Affectation	256	Love.....	629
Scandal.....	256	COLIGNI, HENRIETTA, COUNTESS DE.....	265
A Timely Word	256	COLONNA, VITTORIA.....	93
The Two Commandments	256	COLQUHOUN, LADY	861
CHARIXENA	30	COMNENA, ANNA.....	93
CHARKE, CHARLOTTE	257	COMSTOCK, SARAH D.....	875
CHARLOTTE, PRINCESS OF WALES.....	257	CONSTANCE	94
CHASE, ANN.....	859	CONTARINI, GABRIELLA CATERINA.....	94
CHATEAUBRIAND, FRANCES DE.....	257	CONTAL, LOUISE	266
CHATEAUROUX, DUCHESS DE	257	CONTI, MARGARET LOUISE, PRINCESS DE	266
CHATELET, MARCHIONESS DE	258	CONTI, PRINCESS DE	266
CHELIDONIS.....	30	COOK, ELIZA.....	629
CHELONIS.....	30	Silence	630
CHEMIN, CATHARINE DU.....	258	Buttercups and Daisies.....	630
CHENY, HARRIET V.	825	A Love-song	631
CHERON, ELIZABETH SOPHIA	258	I miss thee, my Mother.....	631
		Oh! never breathe, &c.	631
		The Tree.....	631

	Page		Page
The Clouds.....	632	DAMO	34
Hallowed be Thy Name.....	632	DAMOPHILA.....	34
Through the Waters.....	632	DANCY, ELIZABETH.....	280
Stanzas to the Young.....	633	D'ANDALO, or BRANCALEONE GALEANA.....	95
Washington.....	633	DANGEVILLE, MARY ANNE BOTOL.....	280
The last Good-bye.....	633	DANTI, THEODORA.....	95
COOPER, MISS.....	836	DARLING, GRACE.....	280
COPLEY, MRS.....	842	DARRAH, LYDIA.....	281
COPPOLI, ELENA.....	94	DARUSMONT, FRANCES.....	842
CORDAUD, ISABELLA DE.....	94	DASCHKOFF, CATHARINE ROMANOWNA.....	281
CORDAY, CHARLOTTE.....	266	DASH, COUNTESS.....	641
CORINNA.....	32	DAVIDSON, LUCRETIA MARIA.....	282
CORINNA, or CRINNA.....	33	To a Friend.....	283
CORNANO, CATERINA, QUEEN OF CYPRUS.....	94	The Guardian Angel.....	283
CORNARO, HELENA LUCRETIA.....	271	To a Star.....	284
CORNELIA, MOTHER OF THE GRACCHI.....	33	Stanzas.....	284
CORNELIA, WIFE OF POMPEY.....	34	Lines.....	284
CORNELIA, DAUGHTER OF CINNA.....	34	Fragment.....	284
CORTESI, GIOVANNI MARMOCCHINI.....	271	DAVIDSON, MARGARET MILLER.....	284
COSEL, COUNTESS OF.....	271	To my Mother.....	285
COSSON DE LA CRESSONNIÈRE, CHAR-		DAVIES, LADY ELEANOR.....	285
LOTTE CATHARINE.....	272	DEBORAH, THE JUDGESS.....	34
COSTA, MARIA MARGARITA.....	272	Song of Triumph.....	35
COSTELLO, LOUISA STUART.....	842	DEBORAH.....	285
COSWAY, MARY.....	272	DEDICATION.....	5
COTTIN, SOPHIE.....	272	DEFFAND, MADAME DU.....	285
Temptations.....	273	Les Deux Ages de l'Homme.....	286
Life.....	273	DEKKEN, AGATHE.....	286
The Exiles and their Home.....	273	DELANY, MARY.....	286
Winter in Siberia.....	274	DELLAH.....	34
The Mother and Daughter.....	274	DELORME, MARION.....	287
Crossing the Volga.....	275	DEROCHES, MADELEINE REVUO.....	287
The Mite given in Charity.....	275	DERVORGILLE, LADY.....	90
COUTTS, ANGELA GEORGINA BURDETT.....	634	DESCARTES, CATHARINE.....	287
COUVREUR, ADRIANNE LE.....	276	DESHOULIÈRES, ANTOINETTE.....	288
COWLEY, HANNAH.....	276	Les Moutons.....	288
COXE, MARGARET.....	826	DESMOND, COUNTESS OF.....	95
CRAON, PRINCESS DE.....	851	DESMOULINS, LUCILLE.....	289
CRATESIPOLIS.....	34	DEVONSHIRE, GEORGIANA CAVENDISH,
CRAVEN, ELIZABETH, LADY.....	276	DUCHESS OF.....	289
CRAWFORD, ANNE.....	277	The Passage of the Mountain of St. Gothard.....	290
CRÈQUY, MARCHIONESS DE.....	277	DEYSTER, ANNE.....	290
CRETA, LAURA.....	277	DIDO, or ELISSA.....	36
CREUSA.....	34	DIGBY, LETTICE.....	290
CROMWELL, ELIZABETH.....	277	DINAH.....	37
CROWE, CATHARINE.....	635	DINNIES, ANNA PEYRE.....	826
The Future that awaits us.....	636	Lines.....	826
Dreams.....	636	The Wife.....	827
Presentiments.....	636	DIOTIMA.....	37
Apparitions.....	637	DIX, DOROTHEA L.....	862
Troubled Spirits.....	637	DODANE, DUCHESS OF SEPTIMANIE.....	96
CRUZ, JUANA INEZ DE LA.....	277	DODD, MARY ANNE HANMAR.....	827
CUBIÈRE, MADAME DE.....	851	DÔTE DE TROYES.....	96
CULMAN, ELIZABETH.....	278	DOMIER, ESTHER.....	290
CUNEGONDE.....	95	DONNE, MARIA DALLE.....	876
CUNITIA, or CUNITZ, MARIE.....	278	DORCAS, or TABITHA.....	96
CUSHMAN, CHARLOTTE.....	637	DOUVRE, ISABELLA DE.....	96
CYNISCA.....	34	DRUSILLA, LIVIA.....	96
CZARTORYSKI, ISABELLA, PRINCESS.....	875	DRUSILLA.....	96
		DRUZBACKA, ELIZABETH.....	877
DACIER, ANNE.....	279	DUBOIS, DOROTHEA.....	290
DACRE, LADY.....	640	DUCLOS, MARIE ANNE.....	291
DAMER, MRS. DAWSON.....	841	DUDEVANT, MARIE AURORE.....	641
DAMER, ANNE SEYMOUR.....	280

	Page		Page
Extracts.....	642	Flattery.....	652
Letters of a Traveller.....	643	Single Life.....	652
From "Consuelo".....	644	ELPIS.....	98
DUERINGSFIELD, IDA VON.....	853	ELSTOB, ELIZABETH.....	304
DUFFERIN, LADY.....	843	EMBURY, EMMA CATHARINE.....	653
DUFRESNOY, MADEMOISELLE.....	291	The One Fault.....	653
DUMÉE, JOAN.....	291	The Widow's Wooer.....	656
DUMESNIL, MARIE FRANCES.....	291	Never Forget.....	656
DUMONT, MADAME.....	291	Stanzas.....	657
DUPRÉ, MARY.....	291	EMMA OF FRANCE.....	98
DURAND, CATHARINE.....	291	EMMA OF NORMANDY.....	98
DURAS, DUCHESS OF.....	291	ENGLISH, HESTER.....	304
DUROFF, MADEMOISELLE.....	857	ENNETIÈRES, MARIE D'.....	304
DUSTON, HANNAH.....	291	EPINAY, LOUISE D'.....	304
DUYN, MARGUERITE DE.....	96	EPONINA.....	99
DWIGHT, ELIZABETH BAKER.....	292	ERAUSO, CATALINA DE.....	304
DYER, MARY.....	292	ERDMUTHE, SOPHIE, MARGRAVINE
		OF.....	306
EAMES, ELIZABETH J.....	827	ERINNA.....	37
EAMES, JANE A.....	827	ERMENGARDE, or HERMENGARDE.....	99
EANFLED.....	97	ERNECOURT, BARBARA OF.....	306
EBBA.....	97	ESCOBAR, MARINE D'.....	306
EBOLL, ANNE DE MENDOZA LA CERDA..	292	ESLING, CATHARINE H. W.....	827
EDESIA.....	97	ESSARS, CHARLOTTE DES.....	306
EDGEWORTH, MARIA.....	293	ESTAMPES, ANNE OF PISSELIU, DUCH-
Only Children.....	296	ESS OF.....	307
The Power of Sympathy.....	297	ESTE, ELEONORA D'.....	807
Music as an Accomplishment.....	297	ESTHER, QUEEN.....	27
The Best Accomplishments.....	297	ESTHER OF POLAND.....	100
Literary Education.....	298	ESTRADA, MARIA D'.....	307
On Prudence.....	298	ESTRÉES, GABRIELLE D'.....	308
Economy.....	298	ETHELBURGA.....	100
EDITHA.....	97	ETHELDREDA, ST.....	100
EGEE.....	37	ETHELFLEDA, or ELFLEDA.....	100
EGERTON, LADY FRANCES.....	843	EUDOCIA.....	100
EGLOFFSTEIN, JULIA, COUNTESS VON..	853	EUDOCIA, or EUDOXIA.....	101
ELEANOR OF AQUITAINE.....	97	EUDOCIA FEODOROWNA.....	308
ELEANOR, ST.....	97	EUPHEMIA, FLAVIA ÆLIA MARCIA.....	101
ELECTRA.....	37	EURYDICE, AN ILLYRIAN.....	38
ELEONORE OF TOLEDO.....	298	EURYDICE OF MACEDONIA.....	38
ELGIVA.....	97	EURYDICE, WIFE OF ARIDÆUS.....	38
ELISABETH.....	98	EUSEBIA, AURELIA.....	101
ELIZABETH OF YORK.....	98	EUSEBIA, ABBESS OF ST. CYR.....	101
ELIZABETH, QUEEN OF ENGLAND.....	299	EUSTACHIUM.....	102
Verses written at Woodstock.....	301	EVE.....	38
Letter to her Sister Mary.....	302
ELISABETH OF FRANCE.....	302
ELIZABETH OF AUSTRIA.....	302	FAINI, DIMANTE.....	308
ELIZABETH CHARLOTTE, DUCHESS OF		FALCONBERG, MARY, COUNTESS OF.....	102
ORLEANS.....	303	FALCONBERG, MARY, VISCOUNTESS OF..	309
ELISABETH, MADAME.....	303	FALCONIA, PROBA.....	102
ELIZABETH CHRISTINA.....	303	FANE, ELIZABETH.....	309
ELIZABETH PETROWNA.....	303	FANNIA.....	102
ELLET, ELIZABETH F.....	644	FANSHAWE, ANN HARRISON, LADY.....	309
From "Women of the American Revolution"	645	FANTASTICI, ROSELLINA MASSIMINA....	657
Sodus Bay.....	648	FARLEY, HARRIET.....	657
To the Lance-fly.....	648	The Window Darkened.....	659
ELLIS, SARAH STICKNEY.....	649	Deal Gently.....	660
Man and Woman.....	650	FARRAR, MRS.....	827
The Lot of Woman.....	650	FARREN, MISS.....	310
Woman's Disinterestedness.....	650	FARNESE, FRANCESCA.....	310
The Husband and Wife.....	651	FATIMEH.....	102
Secret Sorrows.....	652	FAUGERE, MISS.....	311
Delicacy.....	652

	Page		Page
FAUGERES, MARGARETTA V.	311	Questions for Myself	319
FAUSTINA, ANNIA GALERIA	102	The Effect of the Bible on Female Pri-
FAUSTINA, ANNIA	102	soners	319
FAUSTINA, FLAVIA MAXIMIANA	103	Capital Punishment	319
FAVART, MARIE JUSTINE BENOITE	311	FULLER, FRANCES A.	827
FAWCETT, HELEN	843	FULLER, MEETA VICTORIA.....	827
FAYETTE, LOUISE DE LA.....	311	FULLER, SARAH MARGARET.....	665
FAYETTE, MARIE MADELEINE, COUNT-		A Night in Michigan.....	667
ESS DE	311	The Prairie	667
Lettre à Madame de Sévigné.....	311	American Women	668
FEDELE, CASSANDRA.....	312	True Marriage.....	669
FEDOROWNA, MARIA.....	312	Female Progress.....	669
FELICITAS.....	103	On leaving the West	670
FELLER, HENRIETTA, MADAME.....	864	To Allston's Picture of the Bride.....	670
FERGUSON, ELIZABETH GRAEME	312	The Sacred Marriage.....	670
FERNANDEZ, MARIA MADDELENA MO-		FULLERTON, LADY GEORGIANA.....	843
RELLI	312	FULVIA	40
FERRIER, MISS.....	661	GABRIELLE DE BOURBON.....	105
A Bustling Wife	662	GABRIELLI, CATHARINE	319
Sunday	662	GAÇON DUFOUR, MARIE A JOHANNE.....	319
Disappointed Love.....	664	GAETANS, AURORA	319
Sudden Poverty	664	GAIL, SOPHIE	320
Second Love	664	GAILLARD, JANE.....	320
FERRIOL, MADAME DE.....	313	GALERIA.....	105
FICKER, CHRISTIANE D. S.	314	GALIGAI, ELEONORA	320
FIDELIS, CASSANDRA	103	GALLITZIN, AMALIA, PRINCESS.....	320
FIELDING, SARAH	314	GAMBARA, VERONICA.....	105
FIORINA, ELIZABETTA	855	GARRICK, EVA MARIA	320
FISHER, CATHARINE.....	314	GASKILL, MRS.	844
FISHER, MARY	314	Out of Employ	844
FISKE, CATHARINE	866	GASTON, MARGARET	321
FLAXMAN, ANN.....	314	GAUSSEM, JEANNE CATHARINE.....	321
FLORA	40	GAY, SOPHIE	670
FLORE DE ROSE	103	GENERAL PREFACE.....	35
FLORINE.....	103	GENEVIEVE, ST.	106
FOA, EUGENIA.....	852	GENEVIEVE, DUCHESS OF BRABANT.....	106
FODOR, MAINVILLE, JOSEPHINE.....	315	GENLIS, STEPHANIE FELICITÉ, COUNT-
FOIX, MARGARET DE, DUCHESS D'EPER-		ESS DE	322
NON	315	Laws	322
FOLLEN, ELIZA LEE.....	664	Virtue	322
The Exiled Stranger.....	664	Prejudice.....	323
Winter Scenes in the Country.....	665	Music	323
FONSECA, ELEONORA, MARCHIONESS DE	316	A Scene in the Two Reputations.....	323
FONTAINES, COUNTESS DE	877	GENTILESCHI, ARTEMISIA.....	325
FONTANA, LAVINIA.....	316	GEOFFRIN, MADAME.....	325
FONTANGES, DUCHESS DE	316	GERBERGE.....	106
FORTE-MODERATA.....	316	GERMAINE, SOPHIA.....	877
FORCE, CHARLOTTE ROSE DE CAUMENT		GERSDORF, WILHELMINA VON.....	853
DE LA.....	316	GETHIN, LADY GRACE	326
FOUGERET, ANNA FRANCESCA DONTRE-		GHIRARDELLI, LAURA FELICIA	326
MONT.....	316	GILMAN, CAROLINE.....	670
FOUQUÉ, CAROLINE AUGUSTE DE LA		Family Education.....	671
MOTTE.....	317	Young Men	673
FRANCISCA, or FRANCES	317	The Southern Wife.....	673
FRANKLIN, ELEANOR ANN	317	Mistakes of Strangers.....	674
FRANZ, AGNES	317	The Mocking-Bird in the City	674
FRATELLINI, GIOVANNA	317	GINASSI, CATERINA.....	326
FREDEGONDE.....	104	GIRARDIN, DELPHINE	674
FREILIGRATH, IDA.....	853	From "La Canne de Balzac".....	675
FREYBERG, BARONESS VON.....	853	GISELLE.....	106
FRITIGILA	105	GLAPHYRA	40
FROHBERG, REGINA	318	GLAUBER, DIANA	326
FRY, ELIZABETH.....	318	GLEIM, BETTY	327

	Page		Page
GLENORCHY, WILHELMINA MAXWELL, LADY.....	327	GUIZOT, ELISE MARGARETTA	336
GODEWYCK, MARGARETTA	327	GUYARD, ADELAIDE SABILLE.....	337
GODIVA	106	GUYON, JEANNE MARIE BOUVIER DE LA MOTTE.....	337
GODWIN, MARY WOLSTONECRAFT	327	GWYNNE, ELEANOR.....	338
GOMEZ, MAGDALENE ANGELINA PAIS-SON DE	328	HABERT, SUSAN DE	338
GONZAGA, BARBA VON	106	HACHETTE, JEANNE	108
GONZAGA, CECILIA DE.....	107	HAGAR.....	40
GONZAGA, ELEONORA.....	107	HAHN-HAHN, IDA, COUNTESS OF.....	683
GONZAGA, ISABELLA DI	107	From "Reisbriefe," a Letter.....	684
GONZAGA, COLONNA JULIA, DUCHESS OF TRAIETTO.....	328	Restlessness of Spring.....	684
GONZAGA, LUCRETIA	329	Nice	684
GONZAGA, COLONNA IPPOLITA	330	France	685
GORE, MRS. CHARLES.....	676	Avignon.....	685
From "Self," a Novel.....	677	Constantinople	685
How to Manage the World.....	678	The Pyramids.....	685
Society.....	678	HAIGHT, MRS.	828
The Female Spendthrift	678	HALE, SARAH JOSEPHA.....	686
GEORGE, ANITA.....	857	The Hand and its Work	687
GOTTSCHED, LOUISA ADELGUNDA VICTORIA	330	Worship in the Temple.....	688
GOUGES, MARIE OLYMPE DE.....	330	Worship in the Forest	688
GOULD, HANNAH FLAG	680	A Blind Girl's Idea of the Ladies.....	688
The Moon upon the Spire.....	680	A Thought	689
The Snow-flake.....	681	The Watcher.....	689
The Scar of Lexington.....	681	The Light of Home	689
Forest Music	681	I sing to Him.....	689
The Ship is ready	681	Iron.....	689
The Ground-Laurel.....	682	The Power of Music	690
The Pebble and the Acorn	682	It snows	690
Name in the Sand.....	682	The Mother's Mission.....	691
GOURNEY, MARY DE JARS, LADY OF.....	330	HALKET, LADY ANNE.....	338
GOZZADINI, BETISIA.....	107	HALL, ANNA MARIA.....	691
GRACE, MRS.	331	Marian's Character.....	692
GRAFFIGNY, FRANÇOISE D'HAPPON-COURT.....	331	Blue-Stockings.....	694
GRAHAM, ISABELLA.....	331	Sentimental Young Ladies	694
Widowhood.....	332	Woman for Woman.....	694
GRAHAM, MARIA.....	844	The Public Singer	694
GRANT, ANNE.....	332	Prejudice.....	695
On a Sprig of Heath.....	332	Emulation.....	695
GRAY, MRS.	844	HALL, LOUISA JANE.....	695
GREEN, FRANCES H.	827	The Parting.....	696
GREVILLE, MRS.	333	Dying Fancies	696
Prayer for Indifference.....	333	Miriam to Paulus, &c.	696
GREY, LADY JANE	333	Miriam to her Betrothed Lover	696
Lines written in Prison.....	334	HALL, SARAH.....	877
GREY, MRS.....	683	HAMILTON, ELIZABETH	339
GRIERSON, CONSTANTIA	334	The Benefits of Society.....	340
GRIFFITH, ELIZABETH.....	335	On Imagination.....	340
GRIFFITH, MRS. MAJOR.....	844	A Peep at Scottish Rural Life, &c.	340
GRIGNAN, FRANCES, COUNTESS DE.....	335	HAMILTON, LADY	342
GROSS, AMALIE VON	683	HANKE, HENRIETTA WILHELMINA	696
GROSVENOR, COUNTESS H.	844	HANNAH.....	41
GROTIUS, MARY.....	335	HARCOURT, AGNES DE	378
GROUCHY, SOPHIE.....	335	HARCOURT, HARRIET EUSEBIA	342
GUERCHEVILLE, MARCHIONESS DE.....	107	HASER, CHARLOTTE HENRIETTA.....	342
GUEST, LADY CHARLOTTE	845	HASTINGS, ELIZABETH	342
GUILLAUME, JAQUETTE	335	HASTINGS, LADY FLORA.....	343
GUILLELMA	107	Italy	343
GUILLET, PERNETTE DU.....	108	The Swan-Song.....	343
GUIZOT, CHARLOTTE PAULINE.....	336	HASTINGS, MARCHIONESS OF.....	878
		HAUFFE, FREDERICA	343
		HAYS, MARY	878
		HECUBA.....	41
		HEDWIG, AMELIA VON.....	344
		HELEN.....	41

	Page		Page
HELENA, MOTHER OF CONSTANTINE.....	108	Imitation de Marot.....	357
HELENA, DAUGHTER OF CONSTANTINE	108	HOUSTON, MRS.	845
HELENA, MOTHER OF IRATES.....	108	A Steamboat Company.....	845
HELOISE.....	108	HOWARD, CATHARINE.....	357
HELVETIUS, MADAME.....	344	HOWARD, ANNE, VISCOUNTESS IRWIN...	357
HEMANS, FELICIA DOROTHEA.....	344	HOWE, JULIA WARD.....	831
The Switzer's Wife.....	347	A Mother's Love.....	831
Gertrude, or Fidelity, &c.....	348	HOWITT, MARY.....	699
The Grave of a Poetess.....	349	Away with the Pleasure.....	701
The Mother's Love.....	349	Song of Edah.....	701
Woman and Fame.....	349	Song of Margaret.....	701
Song.....	350	The Fairies of the Caldon-Low.....	701
Man and Woman.....	350	The Use of Flowers.....	702
The Spells of Home.....	350	Father is Coming.....	702
Woman on the Field of Battle.....	351	The Children.....	702
Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers.....	351	HROSWITHA, HELENA VON ROSSEN.....	111
Sabbath Sonnet.....	351	HUBER, MARY.....	357
The Poetry of the Psalms.....	351	HUBER, THERESA.....	358
HENDEL-SCHUTZ, HENRIETTA.....	352	HUGHS, MARY.....	845
HENRIETTA OF ENGLAND.....	351	HULDAH.....	42
HENTZ, CAROLINE LEE.....	697	HUILLE, HENRIETTE.....	853
The Apostate is the True Believer.....	698	HÜLSHOFF, ANETTE.....	853
De Lara's Love.....	698	HUNGARIAN WOMEN.....	858
Zoraya's Love.....	698	HUNTER, ANNE.....	358
The Snow-Flake.....	698	Song.....	358
HERBERT, MARY, COUNTESS OF PEM- BROKE.....	353	The Lot of Thousands.....	358
HÉRITIÈR, MARIE JEANNE L'.....	353	HUNTINGDON, SELINA, COUNTESS OF...	358
Rondeau.....	353	HUTCHINSON, ANNE.....	358
HERO.....	41	HUTCHINSON, LUCY.....	359
HERON, CECILIA.....	353	HYDE, ANNE, DUCHESS OF YORK.....	360
HERODIAS.....	110	HYPATIA.....	111
HERSCHEL, CAROLINE LUCRETIA.....	353
HERSILIA.....	41	ICASIA.....	112
HEWITT, MARY E.....	829	INCHBALD, ELIZABETH.....	360
The Spirit-Bond.....	829	INDEX.....	15
The Bride's Reverie.....	829	INGEBORGE, or INGELBURGA.....	112
The Child of Fame.....	829	INGLIS, ESTHER.....	362
HEYWOOD, ELIZA.....	355	INGONDE, or INGUNDIS.....	112
HILDA, ST.....	110	INGRIDA.....	113
HILDEGARDIS.....	110	INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.....	7
HILL, FRANCES M.....	868	IPHIGENIA.....	43
HILTRUDIS.....	111	IRENE.....	113
HIPPARCHIA.....	41	IRETON, BRIDGET.....	362
HIPPODAMIA.....	42	IRGE.....	113
HODSON, MARGARET.....	845	ISABELLA OF ARRAGON.....	113
Margaret of Anjou.....	845	ISABELLA OF CASTILE.....	114
Maternal Love.....	845	ISABELLA OF FRANCE.....	114
HOFLAND, BARBARA.....	355	ISABELLA, WIFE OF EDWARD II OF ENGLAND.....	114
HOHENHAUSER, PHILIPPINE AMALIA ELISE VON.....	355	ISABELLA OF VALOIS.....	114
HOHENHEIM, FRANCISCA, COUNTESS VON.....	355	ISABELLA OF LORRAINE.....	115
HOOPER, LUCY.....	355	ISABELLA, QUEEN OF HUNGARY.....	362
To Old Days we remember.....	355	ISABELLA II, QUEEN OF SPAIN.....	703
Time, Faith, Energy.....	356	ISAURE, CLEMENCE.....	115
HOPKINS, LOUISA PAYSON.....	830	IVREA, MANZOLI DEL MONTE.....	855
HOPTON, SUSANNA.....	356
HORSFORD, MARY GARDINER.....	830	JACOBS, SARAH.....	831
My Native Isle.....	830	JAEI, or JAHEL.....	43
A Dream, &c.....	830	JAGIELLO, APPOLONIA.....	704
HORTENSIA.....	42	JAMES, ANNA P.....	879
HORTENSE DE BEAUHARNAIS BONA- PARTE.....	356	JAMES, MARIA.....	831
HOUDETOT, COUNTESS D'.....	357	JAMESON, ANNA.....	706
		Artists.....	707

INDEX.

	Page		Page
Women Artists, Singers, Actresses.....	707	KEMBLE, FRANCES ANNE.....	711
Female Gamblers.....	708	A Night of Terror.....	712
English Pride.....	708	Arrival at Valence, &c.....	714
The Duty of Travellers.....	708	My own Spirit.....	714
Conversation.....	708	Rome.....	714
From "Loves of the Poets".....	708	A Fair and Virtuous Woman.....	714
From "Winter Studies," &c.....	708	Woman's Heart.....	714
Education.....	708	An Old Home.....	714
Authoresses.....	709	Song.....	715
Dr. Johnson and Women.....	709	Sonnet.....	715
JANE OF FLANDERS.....	116	A Mother's Memories.....	715
JARDENS, MARIE CATHARINE DES.....	363	Absence.....	715
JARZOFF, MADEMOISELLE.....	857	Lines from the Italian.....	715
JEANNE DE BOURBON.....	116	KENT, DUCHESS OF.....	715
JEANNE OF FRANCE AND NAVARRE.....	116	KERALIO, MADAME DE.....	373
JEMIMA, KEZIA, AND KERENHAPPUCK..	43	KHAULA.....	120
JEWSBURY, MARIA JANE.....	363	KILLIGREW, ANNE.....	373
Picture of Mrs. Hemans.....	364	KILLIGREW, CATHARINE.....	374
The Weeper at the Sepulchre.....	364	Lines to Mildred Cecil.....	374
Birth-day Ballads.....	365	KINGSTON, DUCHESS OF.....	374
Song.....	365	KINNEY, E. O.....	831
Passing Away.....	365	Cultivation.....	831
JEZEBEL.....	43	The Quakeress Bride.....	832
JOAN, THE POPESS.....	879	KIRCH, MARY MARGARET.....	374
JOANNA, or JANE OF NAVARRE.....	116	KIRCHGESSNER, MARIANNE.....	374
JOANNA, COUNTESS OF HAINAULT AND		KIRKLAND, CAROLINE M.....	716
FLANDERS.....	117	New Settlers in the West.....	717
JOANNA OF NAPLES, I.....	118	Improvement and Enjoyment.....	717
JOANNA OF NAPLES, II.....	118	A Debating Society in the West.....	717
JOCASTA.....	43	The Influence of Dress.....	718
JOCHEBED.....	43	Dress of Servants.....	718
JOHNSON, LADY ARABELLA.....	365	Dress of Ladies.....	719
JOHNSON, ESTHER.....	365	KLOPSTOCK, MARGARET.....	375
JOHNSTONE, MRS.....	709	Letters.....	375
JORDAN, DOROTHEA.....	366	KNORRING, BARONESS.....	858
JOSEPHINE, EMPRESS.....	366	KOERTEN, JOANNA.....	376
JUDITH OF BETHULIAH.....	44	KONIGSMARK, COUNTESS OF.....	376
JUDITH OF BAVARIA.....	119	KRUDENER, JULIANNA, BARONESS OF...	376
JUDSON, ANNE HASSELTINE.....	367	KULMAN, MADAME.....	857
Letter to her Brother-in-law.....	368
JUDSON, SARAH BOARDMAN.....	369	LABANA.....	121
Poem.....	369	LABBÉ, LOUISA.....	377
JUDSON, EMILY C.....	709	LABROUSE, CLOTILDE SUZETTE.....	378
The Farewell.....	710	LACOMBE, ROSE.....	378
My Bird.....	711	LAFAYETTE, MADAME DE.....	378
The Two Mammas.....	711	LA FERTE IMBAULT, MARCHIONESS DE	379
JULIA, DAUGHTER OF JULIUS CÆSAR...	44	LAFITE, MARIE ELIZABETH DE.....	379
JULIA, DAUGHTER OF AUGUSTUS.....	45	LAIS.....	45
JULIA DOMNA.....	119	LAMB, LADY CAROLINE.....	379
JULIA MAMMEA.....	120	LAMB, MARY.....	379
JULIA MÆSA.....	120	LAMBALLE, PRINCESS DE.....	380
JULIA SCÆMIUS.....	120	LAMBERT, ANNE THÉRÈSE, MARCHIO-
JULIA OF CARTHAGE.....	120	NESS DE.....	380
JULIANA.....	370	Extrait des Avis d'une Mère à son Fils....	380
JULIANNA.....	120	Extrait des Avis d'une Mère à sa Fille....	380
JUNOT LAURA, DUCHESS D'ABRAMES..	370	Portrait de Fenelon.....	381
KAMAMALU.....	371	LAMBERT, MISS.....	846
KAPIOLANI.....	372	LAMBRUN, MARGARET.....	381
KARSCH, ANNA.....	372	LAMIA.....	45
KAUFFMAN, MARIA ANGELICA.....	373	LA MOTTE VALOIS, COUNTESS DE.....	382
KAVANAGH, JULIA.....	846	LANDA, CATHARINE.....	382
KEAN, ELLEN.....	712	LONDON, LETITIA ELIZABETH.....	382
KELLEY, FRANCES MARIA.....	373	Youth.....	384
		Enthusiasm.....	384
		Imagination.....	384

	Page		Page
Aphorisms.....	384	LIST OF AUTHORITIES.....	904
Woman's Destiny.....	385	LIST OF FEMALE MISSIONARIES.....	891
The Poet's Power.....	385	American Board of Missions.....	891
Musings.....	385	Baptist.....	897
Lines of Life.....	385	Episcopalian.....	899
Female Faith.....	386	Presbyterian, (Old School).....	900
Eve of St. John.....	386	LIST OF PORTRAITS.....	11
Love.....	387	LITTLE, SOPHIA.....	832
Last Verses of L. E. L.....	387	LIVIA.....	46
LANE, JANE.....	382	LIZARDIÈRE, MADEMOISELLE.....	881
LANNOY, COUNTESS OF.....	387	LLANGOLLEN, LADIES OF.....	879
LAODICE OF TROY.....	45	LLOYD, MARY.....	393
LAODICE OF PONTUS.....	45	LOCKE, JANE E.....	832
LAODICE OF SYRIA.....	45	LOCUSTA.....	46
LAPIERRE, SOPHIE.....	388	LOGAN, MARTHA.....	393
LARCOM, LUCY.....	832	LOGES, MARIE BRUNEAU.....	393
LASHFORD, JOAN.....	388	LOHMAN, JOHANNAH FREDERICA.....	393
LAST WORDS.....	902	LOHMAN, EMELIE F. SOPHIA.....	393
LAURA.....	121	LOIS AND EUNICE.....	122
LAVALLETTE, EMILIE, COUNTESS DE.....	388	LONDONDERRY, MARCHIONESS OF.....	846
LAWSON, MARY LOCKHART.....	832	LONGEVITY.....	888
LEAH.....	45	LONGUEVILLE, DUCHESS DE.....	393
LEÆNA.....	46	LOQUEYSIE, MADAME DE.....	858
LEAPOR, MARY.....	389	LOSA, ISABELLA DE.....	122
LEE, ANN.....	389	LOUDON, MRS.....	846
LEE, HANNAH F.....	719	LOUIS, MADAME.....	394
Beginning Life.....	720	LOUISA OF SAVOY.....	122
The Reward.....	720	LOUISA AUGUSTA WILHELMINA AMALIA.....	394
Living beyond the Means.....	720	LOUVENCOURT, MARIE DE.....	394
LEE, ELEANOR PERCY.....	832	LOWE, MISS.....	847
LEE, MARY E.....	879	LOWELL, MARIA.....	832
LEE, SOPHIA.....	389	The Morning-Glory.....	832
LEELA OF GRANADA.....	121	LUCAR, ELIZABETH.....	394
LEGGE, ELIZABETH.....	389	LUCCHESINI, GUIDICCEINI LAURA.....	394
LEIVA, MARIA VIRGINIA DE.....	121	LUCILLA.....	123
L'ENCLOS, ANNE, or NINON DE.....	389	LUCRETIA.....	46
LENNGRENN, ANNA MARIA.....	389	LUCY, ST.....	123
LENNOX, CHARLOTTE.....	391	LUMLEY, JOANNA, LADY.....	394
LENORMAND, MADEMOISELLE.....	391	LUSSAN, MARGARET DE.....	394
LEONTIUM.....	46	LYNCH, ANNE CHARLOTTE.....	730
LESCAILE, CATHARINE.....	391	Love.....	731
LESLIE, ELIZA.....	721	Jealousy.....	731
Love at First Sight.....	722	Faith.....	731
The English Radical, &c.....	723	Aspiration.....	731
The Fortune-Teller.....	724	The Honey-Bee.....	731
LESPINASSE, MADEMOISELLE DE.....	391	Bones in the Desert.....	731
LEVI, JUSTINE DE.....	121	A Thought by the Sea-Shore.....	732
LEWALD, FANNY.....	725	LYNN, ELIZA.....	847
Social Intercourse in Italy.....	725	Sunset near Thebes.....	847
Conversations in Rome.....	726	LYSER, CAROLINE LEONHARDT.....	732
Lottery Tables.....	726	MACAULEY, CATHARINE.....	394
Smorfia, a Dream-book, &c.....	726	MACDONALD, FLORA.....	395
LEWIS, ESTELLE ANNA.....	727	MACOMBER, ELEANOR.....	881
Beauty.....	727	MADISON, MRS.....	396
Sorrow.....	727	MÆROE.....	47
Woman's Love.....	727	MAILLARD, MADEMOISELLE.....	397
My Study.....	727	MAINE, DUCHESS DE.....	397
The Lovers.....	727	MAINTENON, MADAME DE.....	398
The Cruise of Aureana.....	728	Letters.....	399
LICHTENAU, WILHELMINA, COUNTESS OF.....	392	MAKEDA.....	47
LINCOLN, COUNTESS OF.....	393	MALATESTI, BATTISTA.....	123
LIND, JENNY.....	728	MALEGUZZI-VALERI, VERONICA.....	400
LIOBA.....	122	MALEPIERRA, OLYMPIA.....	400

	Page		Page
MALESCOTTI, MARGHERITA	400	A Scene on the Nile	742
MALIBRAN, MARIE FELICITÉ.....	400	MARTINEZ, MARIANNE	415
MANDANE	48	MARTINOZZI, LAURA	415
MANLEY, MRS.	400	MARY	128
MANSON, MARIE FRANÇAISE CLAIRISSE	401	MARY, WIFE OF CLEOPHAS.....	130
MANZONI, GIUSTI FRANCESCA	401	MARY, MOTHER OF MARK.....	130
MARA, GERTRUDE ELIZABETH.....	401	MARY AND MARTHA.....	130
MARATTI, ZAPPI FAUSTINA.....	402	MARY MAGDALENE.....	130
MARCET, JANE	732	MARY OF FRANCE.....	130
MAREZOLL, LOUISA.....	854	MARY OF BRABANT.....	130
MARGARET OF ANJOU	124	MARY OF ANJOU.....	131
MARGARET, COUNTESS OF TYROL	125	MARY OF ENGLAND	131
MARGARET, ST.	125	MARY OF BURGUNDY	131
MARGARET OF ENGLAND.....	126	MARY OF ARRAGON	131
MARGARET OF BURGUNDY.....	126	MARY THERESA, WIFE OF LOUIS XIV....	415
MARGARET OF SCOTLAND.....	126	MARY OF CLEVES.....	415
MARGARET OF PROVENCE	126	MARY I., QUEEN OF ENGLAND	415
MARGARET OF DENMARK.....	126	MARY II., QUEEN OF ENGLAND.....	417
MARGARET OF VALOIS.....	127	MARY OF HUNGARY	417
MARGARET OF YORK.....	127	MARY LECZINSKA	418
MARGARET OF GERMANY.....	127	MARY BEATRICE D'ESTE.....	418
MARGARET, DUCHESS OF PARMA.....	402	MARY DE MEDICIS.....	418
MARGARET OF FRANCE.....	402	MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS.....	418
MARGARET, DUCHESS OF SAVOY.....	403	Sonnet	422
MARGARET LOUISA OF LORRAINE.....	403	MASHAM, LADY DAMARIS	422
MARGARETTA OF SAXONY	127	MASHAM, ABIGAIL.....	422
MANIA, WIFE OF GENIS.....	48	MASQUIÈRES, FRANÇOISE.....	422
MARIA THERESA.....	403	MATILDA, WIFE OF HENRY I. OF ENG- LAND.....	131
MARIA II., QUEEN OF PORTUGAL.....	733	MATILDA, or MAUD, EMPRESS OF GER- MANY.....	131
MARIA CHRISTINA.....	734	MATILDA, WIFE OF WILLIAM THE CON- QUEROR.....	132
MARIE ANTOINETTE AMELIA.....	405	MATRAINI, CLARA CANTARINI.....	423
MARIE ANTOINETTE, QUEEN OF FRANCE	405	MATTUGLIANI, MEA.....	132
MARIE LOUISE.....	405	MAUPIN, N. AUBIGNY.....	423
MARIAMNE	48	MAURY, MRS.	882
MARINA, DONA.....	407	MAY, CAROLINE.....	833
MARINELLA, LUCRETIA	407	Lilies.....	833
MARINELLI, LUCREZIA.....	407	Thoughts	833
MARKHAM, MRS.	847	MAY, EDITH	833
MARLBOROUGH, DUCHESS OF	407	Prayer	833
MARLEY, LOUISE FRANÇOISE, MARCHIO- NESS DE VIELBOURG	409	Frost Pictures.....	834
MARON, THERESA DE.....	409	MAYO, ABIGAIL.....	882
MARQUETS, ANNE DE.....	403	MAYO, S. C. EDGARTON	423
MARS, HYPPOLITE BOUTET	409	Types of Heaven.....	423
MARSH, ANNE.....	735	The Shadow-Child.....	423
Woman's Influence.....	736	MAZARIN, HORTENSE MANCINI, DUCH- ESS OF.....	424
A Sad Spectacle	737	M'CARTEE, JESSIE G.	834
A Narrow Mind.....	737	M'CREA, JANE.....	882
An English Garden.....	737	M'INTOSH, MARIA J.	742
The Christian	737	Woman's Work.....	743
Seduction	738	The Mother's Power.....	743
Illegitimacy	738	The Daughter's Destiny.....	743
MARTHA, SISTER	409	MEDIA.....	48
MARTIA.....	128	MEGALOSTRATA.....	48
MARTIN, ELIZABETH AND GRACE.....	410	MEIGS, MARY NOEL.....	834
MARTIN, MRS. BELL	882	MELLON, HARRIET, DUCHESS OF ST. ALBANS.....	424
MARTIN, SARAH.....	410	MERAB	48
MARTINEAU, HARRIET.....	739	MERCER, MARGARET	424
Christianity	740	Conversation.....	427
On Celibacy.....	741
Marriage.....	741
Children.....	741
Love and Happiness	742

	Page		Page
MEREDITH, MRS.	847	MOSCHENI, CONSTANZA.....	856
The Blue-bell.....	847	MOSEBY, MARY W.	883
MERIAN, MARIA SIBYLLA.....	427	MOTHER ANNA, OR ANN OF SAXONY.....	447
MESSALINA VALERIA.....	132	MOTT, LUCRETIA.....	752
MESSALINA, WIFE OF NERO.....	133	MOTTE, REBECCA.....	448
MÈTEYARD, ELIZA.....	848	MOTTEVILLE, FRANCES BERTRAND DE.....	449
METRANA, ANNA.....	428	MOWATT, ANNA CORA.....	754
MICHAL.....	48	MURATORI, TERESA.....	449
MICHEL, RENIER GIUSTINA.....	428	MUSSASA.....	449
MILESI, BIANCA.....	855	MYBERG, MADAME.....	858
MILLER, LADY.....	428	MYRTIS.....	49
MILTON, MARY.....	428
MINGOTTI, CATHARINE.....	429	NAOMI.....	49
MINUTOLI, LIVIA.....	429	NEAL, ALICE BRADLEY.....	755
MIRBEL, MADAME DE.....	883	The Bride's Confession.....	755
MISSIONARY SOCIETIES.....	896	Old Letters.....	756
MIRIAM.....	49	The Day of Rest.....	756
MITCHELL, MARIA.....	743	Dedication of the "Gossips," &c.	756
MITFORD, MARY RUSSELL.....	744	NEALE, ELIZABETH.....	449
Whitsun-Eve—My Garden.....	745	NECKER, SUZANNE.....	449
Characters.....	746	NELLI, SUOR PLANTILLA.....	451
Mrs. Lucas and her Daughters.....	746	NEMOURS, DUCHESS DE.....	451
Home and Love.....	747	NEUBER, CAROLINE.....	451
MNISZECH, MARINA, CZARINA OF MUS- COVY.....	429	NEUMANN, MADAME.....	854
MOHALBI, GARAFILIA.....	431	NEWCASTLE, DUCHESS OF.....	451
MOLSA, TARQUINIA.....	432	Queen Mab.....	452
MOMORO, SOPHIE.....	431	Mirth and Melancholy.....	452
MONICA.....	133	NEWELL, HARRIET.....	453
MONIMA.....	49	NICHOLS, MARY SARGENT GOVE.....	757
MONK, HON. MRS.....	431	Medical Practice.....	758
MONTAGU, ELIZABETH.....	432	General View, &c.	760
Letters.....	433	NICHOLS, REBECCA L.	834
MONTAGU, LADY MARY WORTLEY.....	434	NITOCRIS.....	49
Extracts from her Letters.....	435	NOË, CANEDI MADDALENA.....	761
Lines written soon after her Marriage.....	439	NOGAROLA, ISOTTA.....	133
Reply to Pope.....	440	NOGAROLA, ARCO D'ANGELA.....	134
Experience late.....	440	NORDEN-FLEICHT, CHEEDERIG CHAR- LOTTE DE.....	454
MONTANCLOS, MADAME DE.....	440	NORTON, HON. MRS.....	761
MONTÉGUT, MADAME DE.....	440	Lines to the Duchess of Sutherland.....	762
MONTENAY, GEORGETTE DE.....	440	Twilight.....	763
MONTESPAÑ, MADAME DE.....	440	Obscurity of Woman's Worth.....	763
MONTI, CONSTANZA.....	855	Weep not for Him that Dieth.....	763
MONTMORENCY, CHARLOTTE MARGARET.....	440	Sonnet.....	764
MONTPENSIER, DUCHESS DE.....	441	Sonnet to my Books.....	764
MONTPENSIER, JACQUELINE LONGVIC, DUCHESS DE.....	441	Man and Woman.....	764
MORATA, OLYMPIA FULVIA.....	441	London Outcasts.....	764
MORE, HANNAH.....	442	Common Blessings.....	764
Extracts from "Hints for Forming," &c.	446	The Blind.....	764
From "Florio".....	446	From "Music on the Wave".....	764
From "Sensibility".....	446	The Widow.....	764
A Mother's Love.....	447	NORTON, LADY FRANCES.....	454
A good Conscience.....	447	NOVELLA.....	134
Favour is Fleeting.....	447
Faith.....	447	OBERLIN, MADELEINE SALOME.....	454
Wisdom.....	447	OCTAVIA, WIFE OF MARC ANTONY.....	50
Trust in God.....	447	OCTAVIA, WIFE OF NERO.....	134
MORELLA, JULIANA.....	442	OLDFIELD, ANNE.....	455
MORGAN, SYDNEY, LADY.....	747	OLGA.....	134
My first Rout in London.....	749	OLIVER, SOPHIA HELEN.....	836
Good Mothers.....	750	OLYMPIAS.....	50
Women in Asia.....	751	O'NEILL, MISS.....	455
MORLEY, COUNTESS OF.....	848	OPIE, AMELIA.....	456
		Two Years of Wedded Life.....	456

	Page		Page
The Orphan Boy's Tale.....	457	PERILLA.....	51
Song.....	457	PERPETUA, VIVIA.....	135
Song.....	457	PETER, SARAH.....	870
ORLANDINE, EMILIA, OF SIENNA.....	457	PETIGNY, MARIE LOUISE ROSE LE-
ORLEANS, DUCHESS D'.....	457	VÈSQUE.....	466
ORLEANS, MARIE D'.....	483	Le Papillon.....	467
ORPAH.....	51	PETRONILLA.....	135
OSGOOD, FRANCES SARGENT.....	458	PFIEFFER, CHARLOTTE BIRCH.....	767
May-Day in New England.....	459	PHÆDYMA.....	51
Stanzas.....	459	PHANTASIA.....	51
Love the lightest.....	460	PHEBE.....	136
The Baby blowing back, &c.....	460	PHELPS, ALMIRA H. LINCOLN.....	770
Ellen's first Tooth.....	460	Works of Fiction.....	771
The little Slumberer.....	460	Moral Influence.....	772
The Child playing with a Watch.....	461	Education.....	772
Little Children.....	461	Energy.....	772
To my Pen.....	461	The Mother's Hopes.....	772
The Soul's Lament for Home.....	461	An Infant's first Ideas.....	772
New England's Mountain Child.....	462	Effect of Excitements.....	772
Music.....	462	The Child and Nature.....	773
Garden Gossip.....	462	The Wonders of Nature.....	773
The Unexpected Declaration.....	462	PHERETIMA.....	51
Beauty's Prayer.....	462	PHILIPPA OF HAINAULT.....	136
Song.....	463	PHILIPS, CATHARINE.....	467
To the Spirit of Poetry.....	463	Against Pleasure.....	467
A Weed.....	463	A Country Life.....	468
Silent Love.....	464	PHILIPS, ANNE H.	835
Caprice.....	464	PHILISTES.....	51
Aspirations.....	464	PHILLA.....	52
Labour.....	464	PHILOTIS.....	51
OSTERWYK, MARIA VAN.....	465	PHRYNE.....	52
PACHECO, DONNA MARIA.....	134	PICHLER, CAROLINE.....	468
PADILLA, MARY DE.....	135	PICKERING, ELLEN.....	884
PAKINGTON, LADY DOROTHY.....	465	PIENNE, JOAN DE HALLUIN.....	469
PALADINI, ARCHANGELA.....	465	PILKINGTON, LETITIA.....	469
PAMPHILA.....	135	PINCKNEY, MARIA.....	469
PANTHEA.....	51	PINDAR, SUSAN.....	835
PANZACCHIA, MARIA ELENA.....	465	The Shaded Flower.....	835
PAOLINI, MASSIMI PETRONELLA.....	465	PINELLA, ANTONIA.....	470
PARADIES, MARIA THERESA.....	466	PIOZZI, or THRALE, ESTHER LYNCH.....	470
PARDOE, JULIA.....	765	The Three Warnings.....	472
Amusements of the Court of Francis I.....	766	PIPELET, CONSTANCE MARIE DE THÈIS.....	473
Training a Beauty.....	766	Epître aux Femmes.....	473
The Religion of Fashion.....	766	PISCOPIA, CORNARO ELENE.....	473
Uses of Adversity.....	767	PISE, or PISAN, CHRISTINE DE.....	136
PARTHENAY, ANNE DE.....	466	PIX, MARY.....	473
PARTHENAY, CATHARINE DE.....	466	PIZZOLI, MARIA LUIGI.....	473
PARYSATIS.....	51	PLACIDIA.....	137
PASTA, JUDITH.....	767	BLANCHÉ, MATILDA.....	848
PAULA, ST.....	135	PLANCINA.....	52
PAULINA, A ROMAN LADY.....	135	PLUMPTRE, ARABELLA.....	474
PAULINA, WIFE OF SENECA.....	135	PLUNKETT, MRS.....	474
PEABODY, ELIZABETH F.....	835	POCAHONTAS.....	474
PEARSON, MARGARET.....	466	POICTIERS, DIANE DE, DUCHESS DE
PEIRSON, LYDIA JANE.....	769	VALENTINOIS.....	475
Old Trees.....	769	POLLA ARGENTARIA.....	137
Women in the Wilderness.....	769	POLLEY, MARGARET.....	476
The Mother.....	769	POLISH FEMALE WRITERS.....	856
The Poetess.....	770	POLYXENA.....	52
The Shadows.....	770	POLYXO.....	52
To Sleep.....	770	POMPADOUR, MARCHIONESS DE.....	476
PENELOPE.....	51	POMPEIA PLOTINA.....	137
PENNINGTON, LADY.....	466	PONSONBY, CATHARINE.....	848
PENTHESILEA.....	51	PONTHIEU, ADELAIDE.....	138
PERCY, ELIZABETH.....	467

	Page		Page
POOL, RACHEL VAN.....	477	The Soul's Power.....	776
POOLE, MRS.	848	ROCHE, MARIE SOPHIE DE LA	489
POPE, MARIA	477	ROCHES, MESDAMES DES	489
POPELINIÈRE, MADAME DE.....	477	ROCHIER, AGNES DU	139
PORTER, ANNA MARIA.....	477	RODHIA	139
PORTER, JANE.....	478	ROHAN, ANNE DE.....	489
From "The Scottish Chiefs"	478	ROHAN, FRANCES DE.....	489
PORTIA.....	52	ROHAN, MARIE ELEONORE DE.....	490
PORTSMOUTH, DUCHESS OF.....	481	ROLAND, MARIE JEANNE	490
POZZO, ISABELLA DAL.....	481	ROPER, MARGARET	492
POSTANS, MRS.	848	ROSA, ANNA DI	492
PRIE, N. DE BERTELOT, MARCHIONESS		ROSALBA, CARRIERA.....	492
DE.....	481	ROSAMOND.....	139
PRITCHARD, HANNAH.....	481	ROSAMOND DE CLIFFORD.....	139
PRISCA	138	ROSARES, ISABELLA DE.....	139
PROBA	138	ROSE, SUSAN PENELOPE.....	492
PULCHERIA.....	138	ROSSI, BLANCHE DE.....	139
PULCHERIA ÆLIA.....	138	ROSSI, PROPERZIA DE.....	139
PYRRHA	53	ROSTOPCHIN, COUNTESS.....	857
QUEENSBURY, DUCHESS OF.....	884	ROWE, ELIZABETH	492
		From "Meditations".....	493
RACHEL, WIFE OF JACOB.....	53	Ode to Love.....	493
RACHEL, MADEMOISELLE.....	773	ROWSON, SUSANNAH.....	493
RADCLIFFE, ANN	481	ROXANA	56
Description of the Castle of Udolpho.....	483	ROZÉE, MADEMOISELLE	494
From the "Italian"	483	RUFINA, CLAUDIA.....	140
English Travellers visit a Neapolitan Church	483	RUSSEL, LADY RACHEL	494
RADEGONDE, ST.	138	Extracts from her Letters.....	495
RAHAB.....	54	RUTH	56
RAMBOUILLET, MARCHIONESS DE.....	484	RUTILIA	56
RAMSAY, MARTHA LAURENS.....	484	RUYSCH, RACHEL.....	497
Extracts from her Letters.....	484	RYVES, ELIZA.....	497
RANCOURT, SOPHIE.....	486	SABINA, JULIA	140
RAVIRA, FELETTTO ELEONORA OF CASALE	486	SABINA, POPPÆA	141
READ, CATHARINE	486	SABLIÈRE, MADAME DE LA	497
REBEKAH.....	54	ST. LEGER, HON. ELIZABETH.....	497
RECAMIER, MADAME DE	486	SAINT CECILIA.....	171
REEVE, CLARA.....	486	SAINT-NECTARE, MAGDALEN DE.....	497
REISKE, ERNESTINE CHRISTINE	487	SAINT-PHALIER, FRANÇOISE THÉRÈSE
REMARKS ON THE FIRST ERA	17	DE	497
REMARKS ON THE SECOND ERA	65	SAINT DES PREZ.....	141
REMARKS ON THE THIRD ERA	151	SALE, LADY.....	849
REMARKS ON THE FOURTH ERA.....	563	SALOME, SISTER OF HEROD	141
RENARD, CECILE	487	SALOME, DAUGHTER OF HERODIAS.....	141
RENÉE DE FRANCE, DUCHESS OF FER-		SALOME, WIFE OF ZEBEDEE.....	141
RARA.....	488	SALVIONI, ROSALBA MARIA	497
REYBAUD, MADAME CHARLES	774	SAMSON, DEBORAH.....	497
RHODOPE.....	55	SANDFORD, MRS.	849
RICCOBONI, MARIE LABORAS-MEZIÈRES	488	SAPPHIRA, WIFE OF ANANIAS.....	142
RICH, FRANCES	488	SAPPHIRA OF GUELDRES	142
RICHMOND, DUCHESS OF.....	488	SAPPHO.....	56
RIEDELSEL, FREDERICA, BARONESS OF..	488	SARAH, OR SARAI.....	57
RIGBY, MISS.....	849	SARTE, DAUPHINE DE.....	498
RIZPAH.....	55	SAUSSURE, MADAME NECKER DE.....	886
ROBERT, CLEMENCE.....	852	SAWYER, CAROLINE M.	836
ROBERTS, EMMA	885	Pebbles	836
ROBINSON, THÉRÈSE ALBERTINE		SCACERNI, PROSPERI ANGELA.....	776
LOUISE	775	SCALA, ALEXANDRA	142
Selfishness.....	776	SCALIGERI, LUCIA	498
Loving unworthily	776	SCHOPENHAUER, JOHANNA FROSINA....	498
Grief and Guilt.....	776	SCHOPPE, AMALIA VON.....	773

	Page		Page
SCHROEDER, SOPHIA	498	The Thriving Family.....	785
SCHURMAN, ANNA MARIA.....	499	SINCLAIR, CATHARINE.....	850
SCOTT, LADY ANNE	498	SIRANI, ELIZABETTA.....	506
SCOTT, JULIA H.	886	SIRIES, VIOLANTE BEATRICE.....	507
SCRIBONIA.....	58	SISIGAMBIS, or SISYGAMBIS.....	59
SCUDERI, MAGDALEINE DE.....	499	SMITH, CHARLOTTE	507
SEDGWICK, CATHARINE MARIA.....	777	Flora's Horologe	508
The Opinions of a Yankee Spinster.....	778	The Cricket.....	509
The Training of a Belle	778	Sonnets.....	509
Thoughts of a Dying Mother.....	779	SMITH, ELIZABETH	509
True Politeness.....	779	SMITH, ELIZABETH OAKES	785
Mr. Aitken's Philosophy.....	779	Dreams of Childhood.....	786
The Poor Rich Man's Blessings	779	Waking Dreams.....	786
His Advice to his Children.....	779	Love.....	786
His Remarks on Manners.....	779	Religion.....	787
SEGUIER, ANNE DE.....	500	From "Woman and her Needs".....	787
SEIDELMANN, APOLLONIA.....	500	Female Physician.....	787
SELENA	58	The Wronged Mother and her Son	785
SELVAGGIA, RICCIARDA	142	The Child Spirit.....	787
SEMIRAMIS.....	58	The Recall, or Soul Melody.....	788
SENENA, or SINA	142	The Water.....	788
SERMENT, LOUISE ANASTASIE.....	500	Faith.....	788
SERVILIA	58	Religion.....	788
SESSI, MARIANNE AND ANNA MARIA....	500	The Wife.....	789
SETON, LADY.....	142	The Grief-Child.....	789
SETURNAN, MADAME	500	SMITH, EMMELINE S.	837
SÉVIGNÉ, MADAME DE.....	501	SMITH, MRS. HARRISON.....	887
Extracts from her Letters.....	501	SMITH, SARAH LANMAN.....	511
SEWARD, ANNA.....	503	Influence of Thankfulness and Cheerfulness	512
Extract from a Letter.....	503	Satisfaction in Employment.....	512
SEWELL, ELIZABETH M.	849	Writings of Jane Taylor.....	512
SEYMOUR, ANNE, MARGARET, AND JANE	503	Quiet Usefulness.....	513
SEYMOUR, JANE	503	Excitement.....	513
SFORZA, BONA	503	Selfishness.....	513
SFORZA, CHRISTIERN, DUCHESS OF		A Thought in Broadway	513
MILAN	504	Anxiety respecting Public Interests.....	513
SFORZA, BIANCA MARIA VISCONTI.....	143	Sideboard Ornaments	513
SFORZA, IPPOLITA	143	Expensive Churches	513
SHAKOVIA, ELIZABETH.....	857	Means of Happiness	513
SHARPE, LOUISA	850	Self-Indulgence.....	513
SHELLEY, MARY WOLSTONECRAFT.....	780	Being of God	513
The Creation of the Monster.....	781	Contentment.....	513
Love.....	781	Habits of Thought respecting Christ.....	513
SHELOMITH.....	58	Heaven	514
SHEREEN, or SHIRIN, or SIRA.....	504	State of Women in Syria.....	514
SHERIDAN, FRANCES.....	504	Qualifications for an American, &c.	514
SHERWOOD, MRS.	781	SMITH, SARAH LOUISA P.	510
SHINDLER, MARY B.	836	The Huma.....	510
SHIPRAH AND PUAH.....	59	The Heart's Treasures	510
SHORE, JANE.....	143	Trust in Heaven	511
SHREWSBURY, COUNTESS OF.....	505	SOMMERY, N. FONTENELLE DE.....	515
SHUCK, HENRIETTA.....	886	SOMERVILLE, MARY	789
SIDDONS, SARAH.....	506	God and his Works	790
SIDLAR, LUISE.....	854	Varieties of the Human Race	790
SIGOURNEY, LYDIA HUNTLEY	782	Air.....	790
From Letters of a Mother's, &c.	783	Food	791
Power of a Mother.....	783	Education	791
The Mother's Teachings.....	783	Benevolence	791
Woman's Patriotism.....	783	Influence of Christianity.....	791
Sketch of a Family.....	783	SONTAG, HENRIETTA	791
The Mother of Washington.....	784	SOPHIA OF HISPALI.....	143
Prayer for Missions.....	785	SOPHIA OF WOLFENBUTTEL	515
A Butterfly on a Child's Grave	785	SOPHONISBA.....	59
The Alpine Flowers	785	SOR, CHARLOTTE.....	852
		SOUTHCOTT, JOANNA.....	516
		SOUTHEY, CAROLINE ANNE.....	792
		I never cast a Flower away.....	792

	Page		Page
The Treaty.....	792	TARNOW, FANNY.....	800
Autumn Flowers.....	792	TARPEIA.....	60
To Death.....	792	TARQUINIA.....	60
SOUTHWORTH, EMMA D. E. NEVITTE.....	793	TARRAKANOFF, N., PRINCESS DE.....	527
Early Impressions.....	794	TATNALL, MRS.....	873
Infancy.....	794	TASTU, SABINE CASIMIR AMABLE VO-
Childhood.....	794	REST.....	800
Unhappy Marriages, &c.....	794	TAYLOR, JANE.....	527
Mismanagement of Children.....	795	The Things that are unseen, &c.....	527
Ill-health.....	795	Experience.....	528
Early Courtship.....	795	The Philosopher's Scales.....	528
Dangers of Society to the Young.....	795	TECHMESSA.....	61
SOUZA, MARIA FLAHAULT DE.....	516	TELESILLA.....	61
SPIILBERG, ADRIANNA.....	517	TEMPEST, MISS.....	850
SPIILIMBERGO, IRENE DI.....	517	TENCIN, MADAME DE.....	529
SPROAT, ELIZA S.....	837	TENDA, BEATRICE.....	145
STAAL, MADAME DE.....	517	TEODORO, DANTI.....	530
STAËL, ANNE LOUISE GERMAINE, MA-		TERENTIA.....	61
DAME DE.....	517	TERRACINA, LAURA.....	530
Woman.....	518	THAIS.....	61
Conversation.....	518	THALESTRIS.....	61
Education.....	519	THEANO.....	61
Poetry.....	519	THECLA.....	146
Taste.....	519	THÉIS DE CONSTANCE, MARIE, PRIN-
STANHOPE, LADY HESTER.....	519	CESS OF SALM-DYCK.....	800
STATIRA.....	59	THIERRY, MADAME.....	800
STEELE, MRS. ANNE.....	521	THEODELINDA.....	146
STENGEL, FRANZISKA VON.....	854	THEODORA.....	146
STEPHENS, ANN S.....	796	THÉOT, CATHARINE.....	530
Our Homestead.....	797	THERESA, ST.....	530
The Prisoner's Trial.....	798	THÉROIGNE DE MERICOURT, ANNE JO-
STEPHENS, KATHARINE.....	521	SEPH.....	533
STEWART, HARRIET BRADFORD.....	521	THESSALONICA.....	61
STOWE, HARRIET BEECHER.....	837	THICKNESSE, ANNE.....	531
The Tea Rose.....	837	THISBE.....	61
STRATONICE.....	59	THOMA.....	146
STRICKLAND, MISS AGNES.....	798	THOMAS, ELIZABETH.....	531
British Queens.....	799	THURSTON, LAURA.....	888
Roman Catholic Queens.....	799	THUSNELDA.....	146
Protestant Queens.....	799	THYMELE.....	61
STUART, ARABELLA.....	522	THYNNE, FRANCES, DUCHESS OF SO-
STUART, FRANCES, DUCHESS OF RICH-		MERSET.....	531
MOND.....	522	The Dying Christian's Hope.....	531
SUFFOLK, HENRIETTA, COUNTESS OF ...	523	TIBERGEAU, MARCHIONESS DE.....	531
SULPITIA.....	143	TIGHE, MARY.....	531
SURVILLE, CLOTILDE DE.....	144	The Marriage of Cupid and Psyche.....	532
SUZE, HENRIETTA COLIGNY DE LA.....	524	Psyche gazes on Love asleep.....	533
SYBELLA.....	144	Jealousy.....	533
SYBILLA, or SYBIL.....	59	Lovers' Quarrels.....	534
SYMPHOROSA.....	144	Delay of Love compensated.....	534
TAGGART, CYNTHIA.....	524	TIMOCLEA.....	61
The Happiness of Early Years.....	524	TIMCEA.....	61
Ode to the Poppy.....	525	TINTORETTO, MARIETTA.....	534
TALBOT, CATHARINE.....	525	TISHEM, CATHARINE.....	535
TALLEY, SUSAN ARCHER.....	838	TOLLET, ELIZABETH.....	535
TALLIEN, THERESA.....	525	TOMLINS, ELIZABETH S.....	535
TAMAR, or THAMAR.....	60	TONNA, CHARLOTTE ELIZABETH.....	536
TAMARIS.....	60	The Advantages of Order.....	536
TAMBRONI, CLOTILDE.....	526	Brothers and Sisters.....	536
TAMYRIS, or TOMYRIS.....	60	The Evils of Tight Lacing.....	537
TANAQUIL, or CARA CECILIA.....	60	Employment.....	537
TANSKA, CLEMENTINA.....	856	The Bible.....	537
TARABOTI, CATERINA.....	527	TORNABUONI.....	147

	Page		Page
TORRELLA, IPPOLITA	538	VILLEBRUNE, MARIE DE	544
TOSINI, EUTROPIA	538	VILLEDIEU, HORTENSE DE	544
TOWNSEND, ELIZA	800	Madrigal	544
The Incomprehensibility of God	801	VILLENEUVE, GABRIELLE DE	544
TRANTHAM, BETSEY	538	VIMIERS, COUNTESS OF	888
TRIMMER, SARAH	538	VIOT, MARIE ANNE HENRIETTE	544
Letter to Hannah More	539	VIPSANIA	62
TROLLOPE, MRS.	801	VIRGINIA	62
TROSINE	61	VOLUMNIA	63
TULHAME, MRS.	850	VON DER WART, GERTRUDE	148
TULLIA	62
TULLIA, or TULLIOLA	62	WALDIE, MISS	850
TUTHILL, LOUISA C.	803	WAKEFIELD, PRISCILLA	545
A Daughter's Duty	803	WALPURGA, or WALPURGIS	148
Behaviour to Servants	803	WALTERS, HENRIETTA	545
Home Habits	803	WARE, KATHARINE AUGUSTA	545
Society	804	A New-Year's Wish	545
Conversation	805	Loss of the First-Born	545
Christianity	805	WARFIELD, CATHARINE	838
Independence	805	WARNE, ELIZABETH	545
Principles	805	WARREN, MERCY	546
Consistency	805	Suspicion	546
Cheerfulness	805	Remorse	546
Self-Government	805	Fortune	546
TUTHILL, CORNELIA	838	Ardelia	546
TWAMLEY, LOUISA A.	838	Decline of Public Virtue	546
TWIERLEIN, ADERKEID VON	854	Civil War	546
TYMICHA	62	The Courage of Virtue	546
		WARWICK, MARY, COUNTESS OF	546
ULRICA, ELEONORA	539	WASHINGTON, MARY	547
URGULANIA	147	WASHINGTON, MARTHA	549
URGULANILLA	147	WASSER, ANNA	551
URRACA, or PATERNA	147	WATTS, JANE	551
URSINS, PRINCESS DES	540	WEBER, HELENE MARIE	809
UTTMAN, BARBARA	541	Synopsis of "Tracts," &c.	809
		WEISSERTHURM, JOHANNA F. V. VON	551
VALADA	147	WELBY, AMELIA B.	811
VALDOR, or WALDOR, MADAME	852	My Sisters	811
VALENTINE	147	To a Sea-shell	811
VALERIA	147	The Old Maid	812
VALLIÈRE, DUCHESS DE LA	541	The Rainbow	812
VALMORE, MADAME	852	Hopeless Love	813
VANHOMRIGH, ESTHER	542	The Last Interview	813
VAN LENNER, MARY ELIZABETH	888	WELLS, ANNA MARIA	839
VAN NESS, MARCIA	543	Nature	839
VARANO DI COSTANZA	148	WELSER, PHILIPPINE	551
VARIOUS FRENCH AUTHORS	852	WEST, ELIZABETH	551
VARNHAGEN, RACHEL	543	WEST, JANE	551
VAROTARI, CHIARA	543	WESTMORELAND, COUNTESS OF	552
VASHTI	62	WESTON, ELIZABETH JANE	552
VELEDA, or VELIEDA	148	WHARTON, ANNE, COUNTESS OF	552
VERDIER, MADAME DE	543	WHEATLEY, PHILLIS	552
VERELST, MADEMOISELLE	543	The Death of the Rev. George Whitfield ..	553
VERNEUIL, MARCHIONESS DE	544	WHITMAN, SARAH HELEN	813
VERONESE, ANGELA	856	To the Spirit of Poetry	814
VERRUE, COUNTESS OF	544	The Waking of the Heart	814
VESTRIS, MADAME	850	The Maiden's Dream	814
VERGA, SILVIA	856	Stanzas with a Bridal Ring	815
VICTORIA, QUEEN OF GREAT BRITAIN ..	806	A Song of Spring	815
VICTORINA	148	A still Day in Autumn	815
VIENT, MADAME	544	Retrospection	816
VIGNE, ANNE DE LA	544	WHITTLESEY, ABIGAIL GOODRICH	872
VIGRI, CATERINA	544	WILKINSON, ELIZA	553
		WILKINSON, JEMIMA	553

	Page		Page
WILLARD, EMMA.....	816	American Mind.....	821
The Ocean Hymn.....	818	A Farewell to America.....	821
Greek Normal School.....	818
How to Teach.....	818	XANTIPPE.....	63
What to Teach.....	819
Care of Health.....	819	YATES, MARY.....	559
Motive Power of the Blood.....	819	YEARSLEY, ANNE.....	560
WILLIAMS, ANNA.....	553	To Stella.....	560
On a Lady singing.....	553	YOUNG, CHARLOTTE.....	850
WILLIAMS, HELEN MARIA.....	554	Evening.....	850
Trust in Providence.....	554	YOUNG WRITERS AND OTHERS.....	823
WILSON, MRS.....	555	American.....	823
WINCHELSEA, COUNTESS OF.....	554	British.....	839
A Nocturnal Reverie.....	554	French.....	851
Life's Progress.....	554	German.....	853
WINCKEL, THERESA EMILIA HENRI- ETTA.....	555	Italian.....	854
WINKLE, MADEMOISELLE DE.....	854	Polish.....	856
WINTER, LUCRETIA WILHELMINA.....	558	Russian.....	857
WOFFINGTON, MARGARET.....	558	Spanish.....	857
WOLF, ARNOLDINA.....	558	Swedish.....	858
WOLF, MRS.....	558	ZAIDA.....	149
WOOD, JEAN.....	559	ZANARDI, GENTILE.....	560
WOODBIDGE, ABBY DWIGHT.....	839	ZANARDI-BOTTIONI, SPECIOSA.....	856
WOODMAN, HANNAH J.....	839	ZANWISKI, CONSTANTIA, PRINCESS CZARTONYSKA.....	560
WOODVILLE, ELIZABETH, QUEEN OF ENGLAND.....	148	ZAPPI, FAUSTINA.....	560
WORONZOFF, ELIZABETH.....	559	ZENOBI SEPTIMIA.....	149
WORTLEY, LADY EMMELINE STUART....	820	ZINGA, ANNA.....	560
Extracts from "Travels in the United States"	820	ZOBEIDE, or ZOEBD-EL-KHEMATIN.....	150
Dreams.....	821	ZOE, WIFE OF LEO VI.....	150
		ZOE, DAUGHTER OF CONSTANTINE IX.....	150

~~~~~

SECOND SUPPLEMENT, PAGE 889.

ANGOULÉME, DUCHESS D'.....	889	LYON, MARY.....	892
BLACKWELL, ELIZABETH.....	898	McCORD, LOUISA S.....	894
BREMER, MISS.....	898	MAXWELL, LADY.....	894
BROWNING, MRS.....	898	METHODIST MISSIONARY WOMEN.....	911
		MULOCK, MISS.....	896
CHISHOLM, CAROLINE.....	889
CÓLERIDGE, SARA.....	890	PACKER, HARRIET L.....	896
		PHELPS, ELIZABETH S.....	896
DACRE, LADY.....	890	PUTNAM, MARY LOWELL.....	896
EASTLAKE, LADY.....	890	RUMFORD, COUNTESS OF.....	896
FERN, FANNY.....	898	SALE, LADY.....	898
FLETCHER, MARY.....	890	SOUTHEY, MRS.....	898
FULHAME, MRS.....	892	STOWE, HARRIET BEECHER.....	898
		SWISSHELM, JANE G.....	898
GOLDSCHMIDT, MADAME.....	898
		WELBY, AMELIA B.....	896
HAUTPHOES, BARONESS.....	892	WESLEY, SUSANNAH.....	896
HOWITT, ANNA MARY.....	898	WETHERELL, ELIZABETH.....	898
		WRIGHT, FANNY.....	898

GENERAL PREFACE.

THE want of the world is moral power. Philosophy has become clear-sighted to the importance of physical and mental improvement; new discoveries in science are rife on every side, each one designed to aid man in his appointed task of subduing the earth; but who has found out the way to attain that moral power which only can enable him to govern his own spirit, and thus fit him to rule in righteousness and peace over the world he is conquering?

Schools of learning educate the mind, but not the soul; the world's school develops physical energies, sharpens the senses, enlightens the understanding, incites the passions; but does not purify the heart. Even the blessed Gospel, as set forth by its appointed teachers, fails to move the mass of mankind the right way. There is a dead weight of earthly propensities pressing down the Christian world; every advance in material prosperity and intellectual power brings in its train an increase of degradation and misery to a large class of society, and new devices of crime and sin to darken history and discourage hope.

Are these things always to continue? Is the theory of those philosophers, who hold that mankind will remain to the end of time in this miserable state of perpetual change without moral advancement, true? Not if the Word of God is true. A better time is promised,—the “good time,” when “the work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance for ever.”* And the time will surely arrive, as the prophet predicted, when beholding by the spirit what the nations of the earth should become, he declared—“They shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree; and none shall make them afraid.”†

There must then be somewhere an agent to promote this radical change, and, in harmony with the Gospel, and by the aid of the divine blessing, carry on and out the moral advancement of society.

Now I believe (allow me to use the “pronoun in the first person singular,” as I only am responsible for the views this preface contains) that I have found the true source of moral power in human nature, and also the way in which this power must be regulated and applied to ensure the absolute moral advancement of mankind. I believe, and trust I shall make it apparent, that WOMAN is God's appointed agent of morality, the teacher and inspirer of those feelings and sentiments which are termed the virtues of humanity; and that the progress of these virtues, and the permanent improvement of our race, depend on the manner in which her mission is treated by man.

There are learned theologians who hold that the human heart is utterly corrupt by reason of the “first transgression.” Other theologians, equally learned, reject this doctrine of total depravity, affirming that there are good dispositions or qualities inherent in human nature, which may be cultivated and become noble moral virtues.

Without entering into the arguments on either side of this question, permit me to say that my doctrine satisfies both. Man, by the “fall,” was rendered incapable of cultivating, by his own unassisted efforts, any good propensity or quality of his nature. Left to himself, his love becomes lust, patriotism, policy, and religion, idolatry. He is naturally selfish in his affections; and selfishness is the sin of depravity. But woman was not thus cast down. To her was confided, by the Creator's express declaration, the mission of disinterested affection; her "desire" was to be to her husband—not to herself; she was endowed with the hope of the Good, which, in the fulness of time, developed by her Seed, that is, by Christ, would make war with the Evil, and finally overcome Sin, Death, and the Grave.

---

* Isaiah, Chap. xxxii., verse 17.

† Micah, Chap. iv., verse 40

And now let us turn to the holy Bible, the only record of truths which teach divine wisdom, for confirmation of these ideas I have ventured to propound.

I entreat my readers, men, who I hope will read heedfully this preface, to lay aside, if possible, their prejudices of education, the erroneous views imbibed from poetical descriptions and learned commentaries, respecting the Creation and the Fall of Man. Go not to Milton, or the Fathers, but to the Word of God; and let us from it read this important history, the foundation of all true history of the natural character and moral condition of mankind.

"And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.

"So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.

"And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth."*

Here we are instructed that the term man included woman; the twain in unity, the female being the complement of the male, formed the perfect being made in the "likeness of God." Such was the recorded result of the human creation; the particular process of the formation of man is afterwards described.

"And the Lord God made man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into him the breath of life; and man became a living soul."—Genesis, Chapter II., ver. 7.

The process of the creation of woman is detailed in the same chapter, verses 18, 21, 22, 23, 24.

"And the Lord God said, It is not good that man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him.

"And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof;

"And of the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man.

"And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man.

"Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they shall be one flesh."

Who can read this, and not fail to perceive that there was a care and preparation in forming woman which was not bestowed on man?

Why was this recorded, if not to teach us that the wife was of finer mould, destined to the most spiritual offices,—the heart of humanity, as her husband was the head? She was the last work of creation. Every step, from matter to man, had been in the ascending scale. Woman was the crown of all,—the last, and must therefore have been the best in those qualities which raise human nature above animal life; the link which pressed nearest towards the angelic, and drew its chief beauty and strength from the invisible world.†

Men, ay, good men, hold the doctrine of woman's inferiority, because St. Paul says she was created "for man." Truly she was made "for man," but not in the sense this text has heretofore been interpreted. She was not made to gratify his sensual desires, but to refine his human affections, and elevate his moral feelings. Endowed with superior beauty of person, and a corresponding delicacy of mind, her soul was to "help" him where he was deficient, — namely, in his spiritual nature. She was made for him, not to minister to, and thus increase his animal appetites, but to purify his tastes and exalt his hopes. She was made "a help meet for him" in Paradise; and that he there needed her help shows that he was not perfect while standing alone. She must have been nearer perfection than he in those qualities which were to "help" him. She had not his strength of body or his capacity of understanding to grasp the things of earth; she could not help him in his task of subduing the world; she must, therefore, have been above him in her intuitive knowledge of heavenly things; and the "help" he needed from her was for the "inner man." This will be shown more clearly as we proceed.

* Genesis, Chapter I., verses 26, 27, 28.

† See Biography of Eve, page 38.

Permit me, however, to remark here, that I am not aiming to controvert the authority of the husband, or the right of men to make laws for the world they are to subdue and govern. I have no sympathy with those who are wrangling for "woman's rights;" nor with those who are foolishly urging women to strive for equality and competition with men. What I seek to establish is the Bible doctrine, as I understand it, that woman was intended as the teacher and the inspirer for man, morally speaking, of "whatsoever things are lovely, and pure, and of good report." The Bible does not uphold the equality of the sexes. When created, man and woman were unlike in three important respects.

- 1st. The mode of their creation was different.
- 2d. The materials* from which each was formed were unlike.
- 3d. The functions for which each was designed were dissimilar.

They were never equal; they were one; one in flesh and bones; one in the harmony of their wills; one in the unison of their souls; one in their hope of earthly happiness; one in the favour of God. Thus perfect was their union in Eden while they were innocent. Yet as in their corporeal forms woman was the more refined and delicate, so her spirit (by the term, I mean heart, soul, mind, including all the affections and passions) was purer and holier than man's. He was formed of the earth, and had in the greater development those powers of mind which are directed towards objects of sense; she, formed from his flesh and bones, had in greater development those powers of mind which seek the affections. But these differences did not hinder their union; such diversities only served to enhance the intensity and enlarge the variety of their enjoyments. It is not disparity of intellect, nor difference in the innocent enjoyments of life, which cause the miseries of the married pair; it is disunion of hearts and hopes, the conflicts of passion and will; these mar domestic bliss. There was nothing to disturb the serenity of Eden till sin entered; then we learn how the sexes differed.

In the Biography of Eve, I have given a particular account of the manner of the "fall;" showing that the man and woman were together when the serpent tempted her; and that the idea of her being out alone gathering flowers is as fabulous as the story of Proserpine. The Bible says:—"And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave unto her husband with her; and he did eat." Genesis, Chap. III., ver. 6.

Most commentators, men, of course, represent woman as the inferior, and yet the most blamable. She could not have been both. If man, who had the greater strength of body, had also the greater wisdom of mind, and knew, as he did, that the serpent was a deceiver, then surely man was the greater criminal. He should have restrained or at least warned his wife.

---

* Chemically tested, their bodily elements were similar; like diamond from carbon, woman had been formed from man; yet the refining process which increased her beauty and purity did not alter this elemental identity; and hence they were one in the flesh.

The Bible, however, is the authority to guide us in understanding which was the guilty transgressor; which sinned because loving the things of earth more than the wisdom of God. St. Paul says that—"The woman, being deceived, was in the transgression;" thereby affirming that if she had understood what was to follow, she would not have disobeyed.

That this is the true interpretation of the apostle's words is made sure by the trial of the guilty pair, and their sentence from their Creator, who knew their motives and could weigh their sin.

Woman pleaded that she was deceived—"The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat."

The man said—"The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat."

That Adam intended, in thus accusing his wife, covertly to throw the blame on God for creating her, seems probable from the severity with which his sentence is worded. He is judged as though he was the selfish criminal, disobeying God from sensuous inclinations—"of the earth, earthy;"—his sin is so great, that the ground is "cursed for his sake;"—like a felon he is condemned to hard labour for life; and his death, connected with his origin from dust, is set before him in the most humiliating light. The only ray of hope to which he could turn was the promise made to his wife; thus showing him that she was still considered worthy of trust, and must therefore have been the least culpable. A corroboration of this is found in the sentence pronounced against the serpent or spirit of Evil which had deceived her; the clause reads thus:—"And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." Gen. III. 5.

Now mark the words:—God says,—"I will put enmity between thee and the woman." Is not here the assurance that the woman had still in her nature the disposition towards good, which should be opposed to evil in this world? How could there be "enmity" between her and the tempter, if her heart was wholly corrupt? The conflict with sin was to be first waged by her and with her. How could this be, unless she was then endowed with the germ of divine grace, which, unfolded by the breath of the Holy Spirit, would, in the fulness of time, be honoured by her glorious "Seed," the Saviour, who would "put all His enemies under His feet?"

This "enmity" between sin and the woman, which is as positively predicted as the coming of Christ, and His conflict with the powers of Evil, has never been noticed by any writer on the Bible. Yet the history of the world proves it is true, that to degrade and demoralize women is one of the first and most persevering efforts of false religions, of bad governments, and of wicked men.

The difference between the sin of the man and that of the woman, and the condition in which they stood before their omniscient Judge, may well be illustrated by a passage from the sermon of a learned and pious clergyman,* who had no thought, however, of this application. The text was from Psalms, CXIX., ver. 11. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." In the course of the sermon this true and striking description of human nature occurs:—"Man is what the affections make him. His body, in its physical powers, obeys the behests of his HEART. Mind, in its wondrous faculties, is also moulded by the same influence. The Will bows to the Affections; the Judgment is reversed by its decisions; Reason yields to its power; and Conscience even is taught to echo what the HEART desires."

It is the record of the Bible that the heart of the woman desired wisdom. Even in the act of disobedience she did not withdraw her heart wholly from God. True, she sinned, because she disobeyed, or in other words, aspired above her human condition, which God had forbidden. Yet her aspirations were heavenward, while the man disobeyed wilfully and from sensuous motives; he had no faith in the tempter's promises, no hope of obtaining heaven's wisdom—he ate to please his wife!

---

* Rev. Dr. Stevens, Rector of St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia, now Bishop of Pennsylvania.

Another extract from this excellent sermon is important as an illustration of my views; the preacher truly says,—“The destinies of life lie not in the intellect, but in the dispositions and affections of man. The truths of the Bible brought to bear upon the heart will produce this change, (regeneration;) nothing else can. Hence, if God's word be hid in one's heart, it will lead him to renounce sin and lead a new life, following the commandments of God.”

Now, bear in mind that the “word,” which after the “fall” was given to direct the human race, is all contained in the declaration of God concerning the woman and her Seed;—there was no other Law or Gospel, no other word of promise, given for eighteen hundred years. That Eve kept this word hid in her heart, is made sure by what she said on the birth of Cain: “I have gotten a man from the Lord.” She believed God's word; she clung to His promise, even when her soul was pierced with such sore affliction as might have been almost an excuse for distrust: “God hath appointed me another seed instead of Abel, whom Cain slew,” was her pious reflection, when Seth was given her. While she thus had the word of God hid in her heart, could she have been utterly depraved?

The sentence of her punishment proves also her comparative innocence. She is not accused of disobedience against God; the word of hope is given her before she hears her doom; and that doom shows the possession of warm sensibilities and fond affections, even a heart of flesh.—“I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception: in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.” Gen. III. 16.

The human pair were judged apart; they were still “one in the flesh,”—but sin had disjoined them from the sense of mutual reliance on God, and consciousness of perfect love towards each other, when the wife was placed under the rule of her husband. Had she been made inferior to him in mind, heart, soul, where would have been her punishment? She would naturally, inevitably, have fallen into this inferior position. But if her nature was more refined, more spiritual, a nearer assimilation with the angelic, and therefore the highest degree of excellence in the human, then to be subjected to the coarser, earthlier, more sensuous nature of man, would be a sad and humiliating lot. Much did she need the gracious word she had received and could keep “hid in her heart,” that her Seed should at last triumph over the tempter who had wrought her woe; and that although she must bear oppression and endure sorrow, yet she should not fall into the utter depths of sin; there should be “enmity” between her nature and the spirit of Evil. Moreover, that she did, at first, hold the sovereignty of the earth in equal trust with man, is as surely true as that, after the “fall,” her husband was appointed to “rule over” her. God gave them joint dominion;* but she had sought to be wise above her human condition; by this door, sin had entered Eden; the effect of sin was to separate the creature from the Creator; the earthly triumphed over the heavenly, the sensual over the moral; man would rule; and that woman, with the word hid in her heart, was subjected to him, could not separate her happiness from his, but must work out the moral sense of her sex through the physical strength of his, was the only way of improvement, of salvation for the race.

This, then, is the doctrine of the Bible, that, when banished from Eden, man was ordained to become the Worker or Provider; the Protector; and the Lawgiver.

Woman was to be the Preserver; the Teacher or Inspirer; and the Exemplar

Had each performed the part assigned, in love, and faith, and truth, the world would have become an Eden to the human family; but sin was with them, to poison their happiness, divide their hopes, and corrupt their inclinations. This declension would, if my views are true, naturally begin on the part of the man. The Bible shows, by the record of the first murder, that it did so begin, and thus it continued. The more man exercised his physical strength and cultivated his intellectual powers, directing these, as in a state of nature he always has done, for selfish ends, earthward, the less he appreciated the delicate sensibilities of the companion God had given him, whose excellence was in the purifying power she should have held over his grosser passions. But he hated the true and the good, when these checked his animal propensities, and only prized the beautiful in woman's outward form, because it ministered to his sensual desires. He could not, or he would not, understand that her mission was to help him in his spiritual nature, his warfare with sin; and so he forced her to become the slave of his power or the toy of his lusts. Woman was compelled to yield; but her nature had an innate spiritual strength which he could not wholly overcome. There was for her no resource but in this superior subtlety of her moral sense; she could not resist his stronger arm, but she could turn his passions against each other, and against himself. She did this. *Delilah and Sampson are illustrations of these truths. And thus the sexes, being in this false position, continued to corrupt each other more and more during the four thousand years before the coming of Christ.

---

* See Genesis, Chap. I., verse 28.

It was not to exhibit the great deeds of my sex, as the world understands greatness, that I undertook the task of preparing this Record of celebrated Women. Viewed in the light, or rather shadow of earthly value, woman has done little worthy of fame, little to advance the material interests of society, or build up the renown of nations. But I venture to assert that in the moral progress of mankind woman has been God's most efficient agent, the co-worker with His Providence, in those remarkable events which have changed the fate of nations, brought light out of darkness, and given impulse and direction to the souls of men, when these sought to advance the cause of righteousness.

In order to give more clearness to my views, I have divided the work into eras, or portions of time, so that the progress of woman and her influence may be distinctly traced.

Era First includes the forty centuries from the creation to the Messiah's advent. During all this time, women had only their natural gifts of a lovelier organization of form and a purer moral sense, to aid them in the struggle with sin which had taken possession of the brute strength and human understanding of men.†

---

* See page 36.

† What this struggle was, and how the "enmity" of the "serpent," or wicked men who represent the devil on earth, was manifested towards the "woman," may be inferred from the present condition of women among heathen nations. Mrs. Ann H. Judson gives the following account; no one who has visited India, or read its history, will question her accuracy.

"In Bengal and Hindostan, the women, in the higher classes, are excluded from the society of men. At the age of two or three years, they are married by their parents to children of their own rank in society. On these occasions, all the parade and splendour possible are exhibited; they are then conducted to their father's abode, not to be educated, not to prepare for the performance of duties incumbent on wives and mothers, but to drag out the usual period allotted in listless idleness, in mental torpor. At the age of thirteen, fourteen, or fifteen, they are demanded by their husbands, to whose home they are removed, where again confinement is their lot. No social intercourse is allowed to cheer their gloomy hours; nor have they the consolation of feeling that they are viewed, even by their husbands, in the light of companions. So far from receiving those delicate attentions which render happy the conjugal state, and which distinguish civilized from heathen nations, the wife receives the appellation of my servant, or my dog, and is allowed to partake of what her lordly husband is pleased to give at the conclusion of his repast! In this secluded, degraded situation, women in India receive no instruction; consequently, they are wholly uninformed of an eternal state. No wonder mothers consider feminine existence a curse; hence their desire to destroy their girls, and to burn themselves with the bodies of their deceased husbands. This last circumstance might imply some attachment, were it not a well-known fact that the disgrace of a woman who refuses to burn with the corpse of her husband is such, that her nearest relations would refuse her a morsel of rice to prevent her starvation."

Another dreadful picture of the "enmity" of sin or wicked men to the "woman," is drawn by Mr. J. J. Jarvis, in his "History of the Hawaiian or Sandwich Islands." He had been a resident there, and was well acquainted with the character and condition of the people. He says:—"Oppressive as Era Second includes the time from the birth of Christ to the year 1500. Woman had now the aid of the blessed Gospel, which seems given purposely to develop her powers and sanction her influence. And that the laws Christ enjoined on his followers are pre-eminently favourable to the development of womanly faculties, while they repress or denounce the peculiar characteristics usually called manly, is an irrefragable proof that her nature was the best. We can trace the effect of Christianity everywhere by its tendency to elevate woman; that is, give her that rightful place of honour which makes her "the glory of the man;" and through the reaction of her purifying influence on her husband and children we trace the gradual improvement of society.

Era Third contains sketches of the eminent women who have lived and died since the year 1500. These were favoured with another great advantage. The Gospel had emancipated the soul of woman; the invention of printing gave freedom to her mind. Instead of the ignorance in which, like slaves, the sex had been kept, the cultivated intellect and superior manual ingenuity of their rulers were now made to contribute to their rapid advancement. The results of this mental cultivation on the feminine character are most cheering. The philosopher, seeking to disseminate truth; the philanthropist, eager to do good; the patriot, aiming to exalt his country; the Christian, in earnest to promote his religion—will each and all find in educated woman, as the Bible represents her mission, and this Record shows her influence and her works, their best earthly helper, counsellor, encourager and exemplar.

Era Fourth is devoted to the living, who are already known by their writings. A new element of improvement, now in course of rapid development, is destined to have a wonderful effect on the feminine mind and character. This element is individual liberty, secured by constitutional laws. Such freedom gives all the true light and life nations derive from the Word of God, because this liberty is of the Bible; and only where religious freedom and civil liberty have made some progress, is the Bible permitted to be freely read.

The BIBLE is woman's Magna Charta; in it is set forth her duties and her destiny. Allow me to request those who desire to learn what the Scriptures teach concerning women, were the laws to the men, they were far more so upon the women. Their sex was but an additional motive for insult and tyranny. The right of blood gave to the highest woman the power to rule; but she, equally with the humblest dependent, was subject to the iron law of the "tabus." Neither could eat with men; their houses and their labours were distinct; their aliment was separately prepared. A girl from birth to death was allowed no food that had touched her father's dish. The choicest of animal and vegetable products were reserved for the son,—for the daughter, the poorest; and the use of many kinds, such as pork, turtle, shark, bananas, and cocoanut, were altogether interdicted. Whatever was savoury or pleasant, man reserved for his own palate; while woman was made bitterly to feel her sexual degradation. When young and beautiful, a victim of sensuality; when old and useless, of brutality."

---

Nor is this "enmity" of sin to the "woman" confined to heathen nations. Everywhere among those called Christians, are wicked men, "earthly, sensual, devilish," to use the apostle's words, who strive to degrade and pollute woman. An account in this same "History" shows the worse than brute wickedness of the commanders of vessels touching at the Islands. These fiends in human shape strove to reintroduce the licentiousness which had prevailed before the arrival of the missionaries, and the conversion of the people to Christianity; and there was exhibited a complete picture of the "enmity" of the "serpent" or sin to the "woman," (that is, to her moral influence, for she can have none when becoming a slave to the lusts of man,) and also of the "enmity" of his seed or wicked men to her Seed, or Christian men. The officers of these vessels were Englishmen and Americans—one* was an officer in the American navy; and these men, brought up in Christian communities, were not ashamed to allow their sailors to menace and attack the missionaries, who prevented them from obtaining their victims.

* See Jarvis's "History of the Sandwich Islands," pp. 263-4-5. Also, Tracy's "History of Missions," p. 184, for the name of this miserable man. I will not stain the pages of this work with the relation of the conduct of one who disgraced the American flag, by using the power it gave him for the pollution of woman, and degraded the mother who bore him, by his "enmity" to the moral purity of her sex.

to read carefully the first four chapters of Genesis; and then every portion connected with the histories of the Bible Women,* named in this Record. And there is one chapter in the New Testament particularly important in its bearing on this subject; I allude to I. Corinthians, Chapter XI., verses from the 1st to the 16th. This chapter has never, in my opinion, been rightly understood. It contains the first exposition of St. Paul on what is now familiarly termed "the woman question," or her right to equal privileges with man, in the family, the church, and the state. In this chapter, and subsequently in others, the apostle gives his opinions, which those who advocate the doctrine of man's supremacy consider as settling the question entirely in their favour; while the champion of "Woman's Rights" always shirks the decisions of St. Paul, seemingly inclined to reject his authority, and even deny the truth of divine revelation, rather than submit to the clear letter of instruction in duties the apostle sets forth.

But I believe his teachings were the result of divine inspiration; that every command he gave was not only binding on the men and women of his day, but will continue to be the law of the true church till the end of time. I do not wish to have a word expunged, a rule altered, nor a command evaded. What I desire is to have the meaning of St. Paul rightly understood; it seems to me this has never been; therefore I trust those who make the Bible their study, wise theologians and learned commentators, will pardon my attempt to show the true interpretation.

Rightly to understand the apostle, we must find out the doctrine he sought to establish and illustrate; which was, as I read the chapter, (Cor. I. XI.,) the same truth which God revealed when declaring to the serpent—"I will put enmity between thee and the woman." What can this declaration mean, if it does not imply that the woman held the moral lever of the world? The apostle teaches the same doctrine. Let us examine the manner in which he enforces it.

Under the Jewish dispensation, the woman was included in the covenant by the admission of the man only, because the duties of religion or worship were ceremonial; and therefore, as works, belonged to the province of men. That they had all the outward offices of religion assigned to them, shows they were farther from God than women were. Of two children, let one be naturally strong, stubborn, selfish, sinful; the other delicate, docile, disinterested, devout;—would not a good and wise Father be most concerned for the worst child; take most care in his training; set him tasks to perform, to keep his duties in remembrance, and prove his zeal? Even thus has God dealt; the Hebrew men were appointed to perform all the ceremonies of the Law, while the women kept its word hid in their hearts, and did not require to "go up three times each year to Jerusalem, and sacrifice to the Lord," in order to prove that they worshipped the true God. But when the Gospel was revealed, its spiritual worship harmonized with woman's nature, and she made public profession of her faith in Christ. It was natural that some of the women converts, in their devoted zeal, should think they had now the right to bear public testimony to the truth; and it was doubtless in consequence of such pretension by them or their men friends on their behalf, that the apostle's remarks and rules were required. He begins by reasserting the law of God, as

---

* Eve, Sarah, Rebekah, Jochebed, Deborah, Hannah, Huldah, and others, from the Old Testament; and Anna, Elizabeth, Mary of Nazareth, and others, from the New Testament. He will find the Hebrew woman was the chosen agent of the moral providences of God to that nation, from the time the Saviour was promised to Eve, till this her "Seed" appeared; and further, that to woman the Saviour revealed first, and in the clearest manner, his spiritual mission.

Then turn to the history of the heathen nations, and see the dreadful condition of the women where the "enmity" of men, in their natural state, is acted out against moral goodness; and, of course, they value woman only as she ministers to their sensuous desires and sensual lusts. They will allow no manifestation of mental or moral power in her; she is bound down in chains of servile ignorance. Yet God revealed to these poor oppressed women His truth, and chose them as His agents. Rahab and Ruth were called to save from utter extermination the stock of those wicked nations God would destroy. Through the woman line, as the purest and best, the Gentiles were made progenitors of Christ, and heirs of his Gospel.

declared to Eve, that man should rule, and woman's lot was submission. He does not, in this chapter, forbid her to teach publicly, but rather seems to favour it, by giving directions how she should be apparelled for such a vocation; yet as he afterwards absolutely forbids her, it is reasonable to conclude these directions were only preliminary to his final decision. As God gave him light, he declared the will of God.* But in these directions concerning her apparel, he reveals most surely and clearly the high spiritual office of woman. She must not uncover her head; while man is commanded to uncover his. Is it not the privilege of the superior to remain covered in the presence of the inferior? The passage reads thus:—

Verse seventh.—“For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man.”

That is, man represents in the government of the world the authority of God, and also His creative power, so to speak, in bringing, by industry and art, order out of confusion, and restoring earth to its pristine fruitfulness; while woman, representing the moral power and personal beauty of humanity, “is the glory of the man.” He wears the crown of gold, but she is the pure diamond which makes the crown glorious. This will be more clearly explained soon.

Verse eighth.—“For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man.”

True; the man was from the “dust of the ground;” therefore her origin from “his flesh and bones” must have been more pure and delicate than his.

Verse ninth.—“Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man.”

This proves incontestibly the more perfect nature of the woman; she was needed to make the man perfect; help him to sustain his part in Paradise; and be his “glory” when he should have been redeemed by the blood of Christ.

Verse tenth.—“For this cause ought the woman to have power on her head, because of the angels.”

Theologians and commentators have sought in vain the solution of this emphatic declaration of the apostle; yet it is the key-stone of his doctrine, and upholds the whole structure of divine truth. What, then, does St. Paul mean, when he says—“The woman ought to have power on her head, because of the angels?” He is declaring that woman represents to the angels who “minister to the saints,” and watch around every place where the true God is worshipped, the moral nature of humanity, created at first in the “likeness of God;” and which, when redeemed from sin and clothed with immortality, is destined to rise superior to angelic nature.

That the redeemed are “to judge angels,” to “become heirs of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ,”† is positively declared. The Saviour had derived his human nature from woman, his human soul from her soul; his exhibitions of human passions, feelings, sentiments, were such as woman most naturally exhibits; all the Christian virtues are congenial to the feminine character. Did not the Son of God veil his divinity in the most perfect nature of humanity? That He came in the form of man, was necessary to draw men to Him; they are beings of sense, of outward observance, of authority and law. They require to have works to perform in order to train them for his kingdom. The angels could not see in man, whose life was in the outer world, a type of the spiritual purity which, redeemed by the blood of Christ, should become superior to the heavenly intelligences. But woman, permitted to appear even in the house of God with her head covered, bearing in humble silence glory which made “the glory of the man,” not obliged to struggle for dominion over earth, but cultivating the sweet charities of home, and all those tender, spiritual affections which elevate the human above animal nature, on her meek head the angels beheld the “power” which would become, in its development, “above angels.” Therefore, on every

* See I. Corinthians, XIV., 34, 35; also, Tim. II., 11, 12.

† See Cor. VI. 3; and Rom. VIII. 17.

Sabbath, in every place where the Christian's God is worshipped, and men bow with heads uncovered, while women are permitted to wear covering on their heads, the superior moral purity of women is proclaimed as by a voice from heaven. Angels are witnesses that "the woman is the glory of the man."

This glory she would forfeit, should she attempt "to usurp authority over him." And while the wife is commanded to reverence and obey her husband, is he not the superior?

In the estimation of the world he is, because he holds the highest place in the family; but the tenure of his office proves her superior moral endowments. The wife must reverence and obey her husband, because "he is the saviour of the body;"*—that is, the worker or provider, the protector, and the lawgiver. God placed man in this office; every office so given demands obedience and reverence; and the wife should, unhesitatingly, submit to this law.

But the command to men is—"Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it." Now, love is always called forth by qualities of character in the being beloved, while reverence and obedience may belong to the external condition only.

We are commanded to "love God," while we are only "to honour the king." Throughout the Bible, the injunction "to love" always directs the heart, morally speaking, towards the good; lifts up the soul towards an object above it; draws the mind to contemplate a being more perfect than itself. It is the word always used to designate the homage men owe to God. There is in the Bible only one single application of the word reverence to the feelings men should cultivate towards God; this occurs in Hebrews, Chap. XII., ver. 28, where the apostle is enforcing the duty of submitting to the chastenings of God as to a Father; the term reverence, as there applied, savours more of human than of heavenly things. Invariably it is love God requires of his creatures; love, called forth by the contemplation of His holy attributes; love elevating the nature of the one who entertains it towards a higher nature. Love is then a purifying process, an emotion directed towards a better object; and God, by commanding husbands to love their wives, has set his seal to this doctrine—that women are holier than men. The world also bears witness to the doctrine; for, of all the sinful deeds done on earth, nine-tenths are committed by men, or caused by their wickedness.

The church bears witness to the truth of this doctrine; more than three-fourths of the professed followers of Christ are women.

Men themselves bear witness to the truth of this doctrine; there is not a man, brought up under the influence of Christianity, who would dare lay open before woman the scenes of iniquity which he has witnessed or in which he has participated. He feels, as he enters the presence of a virtuous woman, a moral restraint which he does not feel in the presence of the most holy man. It is no excuse to say that he must be abroad in the world, which is full of temptations to vice, while she can live in the pure atmosphere of home. What makes the world a sink of iniquity, but the wickedness of man? What makes the home a place of safety, but the innocence—comparatively speaking—of woman? Even when woman sins, it is because she is "deceived" by the tempter; not that she loves iniquity. The Saviour's stern rebuke to those who brought before him the woman "taken in adultery," is a proof in point. Deeply he drove the dagger of self-accusation into the heart of every accuser; and as their violated vows, wicked devices, and brutal lusts, rose like dark and foul spectres before them, how like branded felons they staggered and slunk away, priest and ruler, pharisee and publican, from the holy light of truth He had opened before them! And thus it will break upon many men who hold themselves righteous, at the last day, when the secrets of their wickedness are discovered, and the "enmity" they have dared act out against the moral purity of the woman will be shown as the sin next in enormity to their rejection of her Seed!

---

* See Ephesians, Chap. V.; verses, from 22 to 33.

But the woman, the poor, feeble, fallen woman, who no sooner heard her Saviour's voice than she confessed him—called him "Lord"—how kind was the word of Jesus to her! He knew her dependent condition, her wrongs, her temptations, her sorrows, her repentance. He did not condemn her, while condemning the sin. In judging between the sexes, he has left this record, that man is the greatest sinner; and hence Christian lawgivers should take warning and example, restrain their own passions, and make laws to punish their own sex; while carefully protecting the honour, safety, and happiness of women.

I anticipate the time when wise and good men will consider this subject of providing for the well-being of woman as their most important earthly duty. Hitherto the mass of men in Christian countries may be said to be at "enmity" with any improvement of women that does not gratify their own sensuous propensities. Women are free to adorn their persons; but if they seek to cultivate their minds, it is treason against the prerogative of man. The source from whence the jealousy of women's intelligence springs, is not fear that they will excel in learning; it is hatred of the moral influence the sex would wield, were they better instructed. Sensuality and selfishness always dread enlightened women. Charles II. wanted none but pretty fools around him; and Napoleon was more afraid of Madame de Staël than of a regiment of armed foes. An obtuseness of the moral sense, even in good men, has prevented them from perceiving the capacity of women to aid the cause of human improvement. What but this torpor of soul could have kept the Christian world from reading aright this declaration of God—that there should be "enmity" between sin and the woman? It has passed into a proverb, that every eminently great man owes his talents as well as virtues to his mother; yet still to cast contempt on feminine intellect has been and is the fashion with the greater portion of Christendom.

Can a stream rise higher than its fountain; or a weak root nourish a lofty tree; or a light burn clear unless fed with pure oil? Thus the genius and the goodness of the mother are manifested through her sons, while unmindful of the source from whence this higher standard of humanity is derived, far the greater portion of the advantages of education are conferred on man. Some of my own sex, feeling the injustice of these things, are seeking to "emancipate" themselves, and contending for the right of entering the arena of business and public life equally with men. The attempt will never succeed. Thanks be to heaven, woman cannot put off the moral delicacy of her nature. Could she do so, it would be as if Venus, leaving her sweet office of shining the morning and the evening star, should become a fiery comet, and rush through the sky, bringing dismay with her light, and causing a deeper darkness as she passed away. The first woman left to her daughters one duty to perform, because God has imposed it,—the obedience of each wife to her own husband; and she left also the holy privilege which motherhood gives over childhood, and the high honour of a human nature akin to that of Jesus Christ.

But with the privileges we must take the position of women; leave the work of the world and its reward, the government thereof, to men; our task is to fit them for their office, and inspire them to perform it in righteousness. Nor is feminine influence, though hidden from the public eye, of small importance. The most mighty agent in the material world is least known. The sun brilliant and powerful, gives light and heat to our planetary system; all eyes may see his glory, all nature bask in his beams;—but the mightier influence of gravitation, which binds Orion and the Pleiades with our planet, controls the universe, and reaches—perchance—to the throne of God; who has seen gravitation, or can estimate its power?

Thus it is in the moral world. The forms of religion and the force of laws, which men make and administer with pomp and observance, impose on the imagination, and may regulate the conduct; but how feeble are these to touch the heart and improve the character of mankind, compared with the unseen spiritual influence which the loving deeds and kind words of pious Christian women possess!

The Record I have prepared will show these things; and will, moreover, bring to light one curious fact, never before, I believe, noticed, but which goes far to prove that the woman was never formed, had she remained in innocence, to take an equal share in the work of Eden. Setting aside her delicacy of organization, woman has very little of that kind of genius termed mechanical or inventive. Among these hundreds of celebrated ladies, not one has ever made herself famous by great discoveries in physical science, or by any wonderful invention in the arts. Nor is it the lack of learning which has caused this uniform lack of constructive talent. Many ignorant men have studied out and made curious inventions of mechanical skill; women never. I am constrained to say, I do not believe a woman ever would have invented the compass, the printing-press, the steam-engine, or even a time-piece. Seeking to find out the reason for this lack of mechanical skill in the woman, I have studied the Bible, history, philosophy, and life; my position and pursuits have favoured the research; I believe I have found the cause; but those who hold the doctrine of sexual equality will be no doubt shocked to hear that I am convinced the difference between the constructive genius of man and woman is the result of an organic difference in the operations of their minds. That she reasons intuitively, or by inspiration, while he must plod through a regular sequence of logical arguments, is admitted by all writers on mental philosophy; but there is another difference which has not been noticed. Woman never applies her intuitive reasoning to mechanical pursuits. It is the world of life, not of things, which she inhabits. Man models the world of matter.

These manifestations are precisely such as would result from the differences in the nature of the two sexes, as I have described them in Adam and Eve. And also we here find the perfect solution of the assertion of St. Paul, that man "is the image and glory of God; but the woman is the glory of the man."—An image is something visible; the glory of God which men see, is in the things He has created; consequently, to create is to show forth, or be the "glory of God. Man is the maker or creator on earth: true, he cannot absolutely make or create a particle of matter; but he can, by new combinations, create innumerable differences in the particles of matter; and make, apparently, new elements and new things. He, therefore, represents on earth the Creator's glory

But to create is not man's greatest glory; it is to worship God in spirit and in truth. The manifestation of this worship is moral goodness. Woman cannot create or make, like man; but, better than he, she worships God in spirit and in truth; and thus, showing forth the beauty of moral goodness, becomes "the glory of the man."

Hence it is apparent that those who are seeking to elevate women through industrial pursuits and competition with men in the arts, will never succeed. The wife cannot work with materials of earth; build up cities; mould marble forms; or discover new mechanical inventions, to aid physical improvement. She has a better, a holier vocation. She works in the elements of human nature; her orders of architecture are formed in the soul;—Obedience, Temperance, Truth, Love, Piety,—these she must build up in the character of her children; often, too, she is called to repair the ravages and beautify the waste places which sin, care, and the desolating storms of life, leave in the mind and heart of the husband she reverences and obeys. This task she should perform faithfully, but with humility; remembering that it was for woman's sake Eden was forfeited, because Adam loved his wife more than his Creator; and that man's nature has to contend with a degree of depravity into which the woman, by the grace of God, has never descended. Yes, the wife should be humble. She is dependent on her husband for the position she holds in society; she must rely on him for protection and support. She should look up to him with reverence as her earthly guardian, the "saviour of the body," and be obedient. Does any wife say her husband is not worthy of this honour! Then render it to the office with which God has invested him as head of the family; but use your privilege of motherhood to train your sons so that they may be worthy of this reverence and obedience from their wives. Thus, through your sufferings, the world may be made better; every faithful performance of private duty adds to the stock of public virtues.

And man: should he not bear himself humbly, from the remembrance that to woman's loving care he is indebted for preservation during helpless infancy; that his mind takes its impress from her daily teachings; from her example he derives faith in those affections and virtues which are the life of the soul; that "God has chosen the weak things of this world to confound the things which are mighty;" and given to woman the moral sceptre under which men must pass before they can be prepared to enter heaven?*

Humility is a Christian virtue equally necessary for both sexes; by giving to each one particular endowments to which the other must pay honour, all cause for boasting and rivalry is removed from both; each should seek to promote the other's happiness and glory, and then the true happiness and glory of both would be won.

It is the moral influence woman is destined to wield which makes imperative the necessity for her education.† If the mind which stamps the first and most indelible impression on the child is in a state of mental darkness, how can the true light be communicated? A mother will teach the best she knows to her son; but if she does not understand the true, she will, of necessity, imbue his mind with the false. Woman has a quicker capacity for comprehending moral truth or sentiment than man, but she cannot explain this truth, nor expose error to his comprehension, unless her intellect has been, in some measure, trained like his. Men have little sympathy with intuitive knowledge, or feeling—"pure Reason"—in the doctrine of Kant: hence they must have the truth set before them in its relations with "practical Reason." The mother who can in this intelligible manner aid the mind of her son in his pursuit of knowledge, will have over him a double control; he will honour as well as love her. And the pious woman who can give, clearly and wisely, a "reason for her hope," will often silence the proud infidel who scoffs at believing what is only felt to be true.

The examples in this "Record" prove the beneficial results of education on the woman's mind and character, and also show that men gain happiness and glory when aiding and encouraging the genius of women. There is rarely an example where the father has given his daughter a liberal education, but she has nobly and sweetly repaid his care, added enjoyment to his life, and honour to his memory. There is scarcely an instance where the husband has admired and cherished the intellectual gifts of his wife, but these have proved to himself a blessing, a "help," and a "glory." The wide field of my plan, gathering records‡ of women from every age, country, condition and character, presents an opportunity, never before accessible, of ascertaining the scope of feminine talent, and the effect the cultivated intellect of the sex, when brought to bear on Christian civilization, would exercise. It must be manifest to every person who will examine this subject, that the "woman is the glory of the man," and that her condition settles the destiny of humanity. In every country where men are at "enmity" with her moral and intellectual influence, there the race is barbarian, brutal, or

---

* I am far from intending to represent that every individual woman is better, morally speaking, than any individual man. The broad lines of distinction between the sexes is what I am describing; there are innumerable shades of moral character in both; some women appear nearly as devoid of moral sensibility as men; while these last, when trained by pious mothers, or renewed by divine grace, approach the womanly standard of feeling. A few instances of the highest moral purity have been found in men; Joseph is an example. When a man is thus, as it were, clothed in righteousness, he exhibits to the world a spectacle of the sublimity of moral virtue above that of woman. Our own Washington is another example; he acted out, by his strong will, the holy precepts of his mother; the grandeur of her goodness was made visible through his brave soul; the awe which this moral virtue inspired surrounded him, while he lived, with a majesty above that of kings, and has made his memory the glory of his country, and a blessing to the world.

† At the close of the work, some suggestions will be offered respecting the means and ends of feminine education, showing how the cultivated intellect of woman may be best employed to her own and the general good. Many wise men are doubtful of the expediency of giving to girls a thorough education, lest they should become unfitted for their feminine duties, and obtrusive in encroaching on the prerogatives of the other sex. There is no danger from either of these results, if the Bible doctrine is clearly recognized and obeyed. Ignorance is not goodness, nor is it "bliss." The higher the standard of woman's excellence the higher will be man's glory.

‡ The "list of authorities" will be found at the close of the work.

bigoted. Wherever woman is most kindly protected and most highly honoured, there the race enjoys the greatest degree of civil freedom and social happiness, and is most rapidly advancing in intelligence, prosperity, and civilization.*

This result will become every year more apparent, if woman's education and influence go on progressively; because, as woman rises, she will elevate, proportionably, the mind and life of man. Such is her mission; for though human nature in both sexes is rendered sinful or prone to sin by the "fall," yet woman's nature has never sunk to the brute sensuality of man's; this comparative purity has kept her mind, as regards morality, above the standard which even the most Christian men fix for their own sex. This assertion requires no laboured proof. Look around on society—who are the conservators of domestic purity, of social decorum, of public sentiment? The moral sense† is the highest natural faculty or element of the human soul; woman has this moral sense, the intuitive feeling of disgust for sensuality, vice, and falsehood; the intuitive feeling of love for the innocent, beautiful, and true, better developed and more active than is found in the other sex.

I might here cite many authorities to show that good and great men have had glimpses of these truths, that they have felt what woman has done, what she may do, and what she will become, when men, acknowledging her moral mission, shall allow her the education and opportunity necessary for its fulfilment. I have room now for only a few of these; at the close of the volume I shall recur to the subject.

"The little of true piety which yet exists on earth we owe to women much more than to theologians. Our religion is that of our mother," says the learned Aimé-Martin. "The mother is endowed, and endowed by God himself, with all the qualities which should render her fit to become the principal agent in the moral and intellectual development of her child," says the good Pestalozzi. "What the elevation of woman has done for the reform of social manners, her educated mind is doing for our books," says our own eloquent Bethune. "On the cultivation of the minds of women depends the wisdom of men," says the penetrating Sheridan. "The future destiny of the child is always the work of the mother," said the sagacious Napoleon.

But higher than these testimonies of good, learned and great men to the influence of the feminine soul, comes the authority of God's Word. That the eulogy on woman was uttered by a wicked and voluptuous king, who had dishonoured the sex by abolishing, so far as his example had power, the true idea of marriage, militates nothing against its divine truth. Like Balaam, Solomon was compelled to speak what the Lord permitted; had it been otherwise, had that selfish sensualist commended what he practised, the Bible would have been no better than the Koran. It is because the written counsel even of this bad man was wise and good, that we feel the inspiration of the Holy Spirit dictated to his conscience that remarkable declaration and prophecy concerning woman, in the chapter of his praises of the feminine virtues:—"Strength and honour are her clothing; and she shall rejoice in time to come."

---

* The United States of North America is the land of modern chivalry, where the moral qualities of woman are most highly valued, and her station in society as "the glory of the man" most fully acknowledged. The remarkable effect this has had on the destiny of the nation was comprehended by M. de Tocqueville, who observed the result, though he did not analyze the process. At the close of his work on America, he remarks, that if he were required to point out the cause of the wonderful advancement in prosperity and civilization of the American people, he should reply—"It was the superior character of their women."

† By moral sense, I mean that feeling, or sentiment, which not only distinguishes between right and wrong, but inclines to the right—an enlightened conscience; or "the primitive law of the heart," as the German philosopher expressed it. Faith in God is a feeling or faculty of the soul above this moral sense; but such saving grace or faith is the supernatural gift of God. (See Ephesians, II. 8.)

REMARKS ON THE FIRST ERA.

~~~~~

WE shall include in this era the time from the Creation to the birth of Christ; and, of course, the names of all the distinguished women recorded in the annals of the world for four thousand years. A long period; but much of it concealed in thick darkness; only here and there a faint, far-off star of hope may be descried breaking through the gloom of sin, ignorance and misery cast over the lot of the woman.

During these forty centuries she had only the peculiar attributes of her feminine nature to aid her in the struggle for progress, which was the law of humanity after the first pair were driven forth on the rough world, as happiness had been their privilege while abiding in Eden. Man had now the ground, "cursed for his sake with briars and thorns," to subdue; and, harder still, his own earthly passions to combat. Woman, though she was not commanded to work, was placed under the power of the man; and soon she, who was formed and endowed to be his soul's help-meet, his bosom friend, was degraded into the toy of his sensual lusts, or the slave of his physical strength.

We do not know how long the woman's spirit struggled against the vile degradation polygamy imposes on the sex; but we find that death-doom of her moral influence recorded at an early period of the world's history. Might then took the place of right; and for nearly eighteen centuries the spiritual affections of woman were completely overshadowed by the sensual passions of man. Excepting our first mother, no feminine mind has left its impress on the sin-blotted page of those long centuries. Woman's nature must have yielded to the tide of wickedness that swept over the antediluvian world, because it is recorded, "all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth." No wonder the race was destroyed, if the mothers had become utterly corrupt in their "imaginationa." If the heart of woman was "only evil continually," there could be no hope of reform. But the Bible places this dreadful wickedness to man's account. "The earth was filled with violence," does not apply to the conduct of the dependent sex. Yet the poison of sin had reached the core of humanity—woman's heart: all were corrupted; all perished.

The flood was over, and the most contaminating sin blotted out. No polygamist was permitted to pollute the ark. The four husbands and their four wives came forth to the empire of a world they were to subdue and improve. The race of mankind was now to continue till the end of time; and the law of human improvement was made sure by giving to woman a new and great advantage. Human life was shortened; and thus the mother's influence most wonderfully increased. Allow ten years as the period of childhood, when the mother's authority over her sons is predominant; then compare the length of Noah's life with that of Moses, and it will be apparent how greatly feminine influence was extended when man's life was shortened from 950 years to 120 years. In the former case, her period of power over her sons was 1 to 95; in the latter, 1 to 12.

We have, in the general preface, explained what we consider the distinctive characteristics of woman's nature; and how these were intended to make her God's best, as she was his last work of creation. Also, in the biography of Eve, we have dwelt on these themes; and we now call the reader's attention to the remarkable corroboration of our theory which, in the first era, the glimpses of the Hebrew women, reflected from the faithful mirror of divine history, afford.

If, as we affirm, the peculiar tendencies of woman's mind are insight, or the wisdom that seizes intuitively on the true and the good; also the moral sense, which turns instinctively, so to speak, heavenward; then we ought to find woman more elastic in hope, more fervent in faith, more idealized in sentiment, more disinterested in affection, than man. Is she not so? Do we not look to woman for love and tenderness? Do we not find that she is more easily impressed with the truth of divine revelations, when these exceed the reasoning powers of man? Was there a woman who saw the miracles of Christ and doubted? Obstacles in the path of duty that to man's reason seem as mountains, are to her faith but mole-hills. And when the black cloud of fear fills the horizon, and he listens for the thunder, she is looking upward for the rainbow.

Thus, though her physical strength and worldly knowledge be far inferior to man's, yet her firm trust in heaven, her faithful truth in love, her disinterested zeal in duty, win the palm of victory in conflicts that he abandons in despair.

The Bible history of woman clearly illustrates these important truths; showing that when the faith and resources of men have been utterly overwhelmed, then the salvation of the cause of improvement has been her work. Thus maternal love, faith and energy, preserved Moses to be the Law-Giver for the world; made Samuel the High Priest of the Lord; seated Solomon on the throne of David. Each one of these events was of great and momentous import, not only to the destiny of the Hebrew nation, but to the progress of mankind. Deborah was the Deliverer of Israel when not a Hebrew man dared lift his hand in defence of his country till she led the way. Esther saved the Jews when no man could have stayed the decree of death. In short, from the time when the promised Seed was reaffirmed to the descendants of Sarah, "a mother of nations," the Hebrew women kept the hope of "Shiloh" ever in their race. This divine faith, like a living light, passing from hand to hand, shines out in the characters of the Hebrew women from Sarah to Huldah the prophetess, who had the light of God's law when the high priest was in darkness. It is worthy, too, of note, that the Bible furnishes no record of an apostate Hebrew woman; while the Hebrew men could not be restrained from licentiousness, idolatry and apostasy.

Among the heathen nations, the mission of woman is less distinctly traced, because the revelation of the hope in motherhood was lost. There was no "Shiloh," or Redeemer, expected. Still the feminine nature displayed its inherent tendencies, a spiritual feeling more refined, and a moral sense more delicate, than man's; these constituted her insight, intuition or wisdom (call it which you will), which made her appreciate the true and the good with more readiness and more sympathy than man. If it were not so, why was the idea of woman invested with supreme wisdom and goodness? Why was she deified and worshipped for those higher attributes of human nature; Justice, as she was in Themis; Wisdom, in Minerva; and Chastity, or Virtue, in Diana?

We shall not, in our work, give the histories of the different goddesses (which properly belongs to mythology); though, undoubtedly, all were representations of real women, or of those qualities which the wisest of heathen men believed were types of feminine character; qualities more inherent or better developed in woman than in man.

But we would wish those who take an interest in our researches to examine carefully the character of each distinguished woman we here introduce by the standard suggested. Compare the conduct of the woman with that of the man of her own era and condition. Compare Cleopatra with Marc Antony. She was wicked; but she was less selfish, less gross in her wickedness than he. She was true to her country and her people; he was a traitor to the first, and a deserter of the last. Patriotism was the highest virtue of the heathen mind. Which of these two persons showed the most patriotism? And which mind was the victor?

So, too, of Aspasia. She was the creature of the corrupt institutions which man, by his superior physical strength, sensuous passions and unjust laws, had imposed on social life. Yet, degraded as she was, Pericles, the hero of the Athenians, was her slave; and Socrates, the wisest of the heathen sages, her admirer and friend. Thus the woman's spirit held sway over the subtle Greek! Aspasia was better than those she subdued. They had degraded humanity by degrading woman; thus compelling her to seek that influence by unholy means which should have been the right of every Athenian wife, namely, that of social equality and companionship with her husband.

In Rome, while the ideal of woman was the divinity which gave the priest oracles and the people laws, domestic purity was preserved. If the Sibyl and Egeria were only the fictions of artful men, yet that these men had recourse to the feminine spirit for their purest wisdom, shows their estimation of woman's mind. The Vestal virgins represented the highest attributes of heavenly goodness, Purity and Mercy. Nor was it till the Roman men were banded together and absent from their homes in their long wars, thus losing the softening, purifying influence of their mothers, wives and daughters, that the frightful demoralization of the nation was reached. For the first five hundred years not an instance of divorce occurred. While the wife was honoured, woman continued worthy of honour. When men repudiated their wives, as Cicero did his, for no fault, but only to gratify his selfish propensities, and the multitude of divorces had created a virtual polygamy, in which the women participated, then the Roman Empire fell to rise no more. The Lucretias were the life of the Republic; the Messalinas, the death of the Empire. Yet the licentious example was set by the men;—they made the laws; and always the women were better than the men of their time.

W O M A N ' S R E C O R D

FIRST ERA.

FROM THE CREATION TO THE BIRTH OF JESUS CHRIST.

A.

ABIGAIL,

WIFE of Nabal, a rich but churlish man, of little understanding, of the tribe of Judah, lived probably near Maon, one of the most southern cities of Judah. When David, who had taken refuge from the pursuit of Saul in the wilderness of Paran, sent ten young men to request assistance from Nabal, who was then employed in shearing his numerous flocks, Nabal surlily refused to give of his substance to strangers, although David had protected his shepherds from injury during his residence among them. Then David, in his indignation, ordered four hundred of his men to arm themselves, and went to put Nabal and his family to the sword. But Abigail, whose wisdom equalled her beauty, hearing of what had passed, and foreseeing the result of her husband's refusal, hastened to prepare provisions, without Nabal's knowledge, with which she met and appeased David. When Abigail returned from her interview with David, she found her husband at a feast, and intoxicated; so that she said nothing of the affair to him till the next day. Then, when he heard of the danger he had escaped, his heart was so struck with fear that he died in ten days. When David was informed of Nabal's death, he sent messengers to Abigail, to request that she would become his wife; to which she consented, and accompanied the servants of David on their return.

The old commentators are unanimous in their commendations of the character and conduct of Abigail. Father Berruyer, the Jesuit, in his "History of the People of God," has been an excellent painter on this subject. "Nabal's riches," says he, "consisted in vines and corn, but especially in pasture grounds, in which a thousand goats and three thousand sheep grazed. However, these large possessions were nothing in comparison of the treasure he possessed in the chaste Abigail, his wife, the most accomplished woman of her tribe. Nabal, unhappily for Abigail, was not worthy of her, and never couple were worse matched. The wife was beautiful, careful, prudent, a good housewife, vastly good-natured, and indefatigably vigilant; but as for the husband, he was dissolute, capricious, headstrong, contemptuous; always exasperated at good advice, and never failing to make a bad use of it; in a word, a man whose riotous intemperance the virtuous Abigail was perpetually obliged to bear with, to atone for his extravagant sallies, or dissemble his follies; besides, he was an infidel, and as depraved an Israelite as his wife was regular and fervent."

Whether all these fancies of the learned Jesuit be true or not, the history, as the holy Book records it, is highly in favour of the intellectual powers as well as personal attractions of Abigail. Her speech to David is replete with beauties, and is a model of the oratory of thought applied to the passions, to the prejudices, and the previous associations of David. Read it in Samuel, I. Book, chap. xxv., verses from 24 to 31, and then judge of the effect it must have had on her auditor, when his heart burst forth, as it were, in this reply:

"And David said to Abigail, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which hath sent thee this day to meet me.

"And blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, which hast kept me this day from coming to shed blood, and from avenging myself with mine own hand."

These events occurred, B. C. 1057.

ABISHAG,

THE Shunamite, a beautiful young virgin, who cherished David, king of Israel, in his old age, and was afterwards desired by his son Adonijah, as a wife; which request caused him to be put to death by the command of Solomon, who looked upon it as an indication that Adonijah wished in other respects also to take David, their father's place. A learned commentator thus tells the story:—"The king, (David,) though he had been so robust in his youth, seemed to decay daily. His afflictions, labours, fatigues, and perpetual wars, had exhausted him so much, that entering on his seventieth year, his natural heat seemed on the point of being extinguished; while his mind was as vigorous as ever, and he still governed with so much wisdom and authority, as made his life precious. His physicians, in order to prolong it, hit upon an expedient which succeeded, at least, for some time. All Israel was sought through to find out a proper person, and the choice fell on Abishag, the Shunamite, a young, beautiful, and virtuous woman. He made her his wife, and she was 'with him both night and day; but though he married her, they always lived together in a state of continence.'" That Abishag was considered the honourable wife of king David, and was so, according to the customs of that dark age, there is no doubt; she was innocent, yet the wickedness of polygamy is apparent in this gross transaction. The sons of David were, in consequence of this sin of their father, involved in a quarrel which cost the life of the eldest, and stained Solomon's hands with his brother's blood.

ACCA-LAURENTIA or ARCA-LAURENTIA,

WAS wife of the shepherd Faustulus, and nurse to Remus and Romulus. She was deified by the Romans, to whom the flamen of Jupiter once a year offered a sacrifice, on a holiday instituted to her honour. She lived about B. C. 760.

ACME,

WAS a Jewish lady, retained in the service of Livia, the wife of Augustus Caesar. She was bribed by Antipater, the son of Herod the Great, to engage in his interest; but one of her attempts to serve him proved fatal to herself; for having forged a letter in the name of Salome, that king's sister, to her mistress Livia, in order to expose the former to Herod's resentment, the imposture was detected, and she was punished with death. Antipater was suffered to escape, though the greater criminal.

ADA,

A SISTER of Artemisia, queen of Caria, married Hidricus. After her husband's death she succeeded to the throne of Caria, but was expelled by her younger brother, Pexodores, who, in order to maintain himself in his usurpation, gave his daughter in marriage to a Persian lord called Orondates; and he, afterwards, became king of Caria, and defended Halicarnassus against Alexander the Great. The revolutions which happened at that time, proved favourable to Ada; she implored the protection of the conqueror Alexander against Orondates, the usurper of her kingdom. Alexander gave her a very kind reception, and restored her to the authority she had formerly enjoyed over all Caria, after he had taken the city of Halicarnassus. Ada, woman-like, thought to give some testimony of her gratitude by sending him all sorts of refreshments, sweetmeats, pastry, delicate viands, and the best cooks she could hear of; but Alexander answered that he had no occasion for such things; for Leonidas, his tutor, had formerly furnished him with much more excellent cooks, by teaching him, that he who would have an appetite to his dinner, must rise early and take a walk; and if he is desirous of making a delicious supper, he must eat moderately at dinner.

Why will not mothers be more careful to teach these wise lessons to their sons?

AGESISTRATA,

WIFE of Eudamidas II., and mother of Agis IV., king of Sparta, was a woman of great wealth and influence among her people. She had brought up her son very voluptuously; but when he became king, he resolved to restore the ancient severe discipline and mode of living of the Spartans, and began by setting the example himself. Agesistrata at first opposed the reformation, by which she would lose much of her wealth; afterwards she not only approved of her son's design, but endeavoured to gain the other women to join her, as they had great influence in the community, and the greatest difficulty was expected to arise from their opposition; but instead of uniting with her, they applied to Leonidas III., the other king of Lacedæmon, to frustrate the designs of his colleague. In consequence of the disturbances that ensued, Agis was obliged to take refuge in one of the temples; but one day, on his returning to his sanctuary from a bath, he was seized and thrown into prison. Agesistrata, and Archidamia, grandmother of Agis, used all their influence, but in vain, to induce the ephori to allow Agis to plead his cause before his own people. They were, however, allowed to share his prison, when one of the ephori, who was in debt to Agesistrata, by his intrigues succeeded in having them all strangled at once. Agesistrata met her unexpected death with calmness and composure, about B. C. 300.

AGNODICE,

AN Athenian virgin, who disguised her sex, to learn medicine. She was taught midwifery by Herophilus, an eminent physician, born in B. C. 506, and when employed always discovered her sex to her patients. This procured her so much practice, that the male physicians accused her of corruption before the Areopagus. She confessed her sex to the judge, and a law was immediately made allowing all free-born women to learn midwifery.

AGRIPPINA,

THE daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, the only child of Augustus, married Germanicus, the son of Drusus, and nephew to Tiberius, to whom she bore nine children. Three of them died in infancy, and among the remaining six were Caligula, afterwards emperor, and Agrippina, the mother of Nero. On the death of Augustus (A. D. 14) Germanicus and his wife were with the army, on the banks of the Rhine, where they had much difficulty in restraining the mutinous soldiery from proclaiming Germanicus in opposition to his uncle. On this occasion Agrippina, by her resolution and courage, showed herself worthy of her descent from Augustus; and the following year she exhibited the same qualities, in repressing a general panic that had seized on the soldiers during her husband's absence, and preventing them from disgracing themselves. Agrippina was with her husband, in Syria, when he fell a victim to the arts of Piso and Plancina. Her resentment at this treatment was such as to draw upon her the anger of Tiberius; and when, after a widowhood of seven years, she requested him to give her a husband, he evaded her petition, knowing well that the husband of Agrippina would be a dangerous enemy. At length she so offended the emperor, by showing him that she suspected him of an intention to poison her, that he banished her to the island of Pandataria, and at last closed her life by starvation, October 13, A. D. 33. The rage of Tiberius was not appeased by the death of Agrippina; he had injured her too deeply to forgive himself, and so he sought to appease his hatred by persecuting her children—and her two eldest sons were his victims.

The character of Agrippina presents some of the strongest points, both of the good and bad, in Roman life. She was frank, upright, sternly courageous, and unimpeachably virtuous. She was faithful and loving to her husband, watchful and anxious for her children. Yet with all this, she was excessively proud of her noble descent; fiery and impetuous in passion, indiscreet in speech, and imprudent in conduct. This is a mixed character, but a shining one. It was one which fell short of Cornelia, but excelled all common fame. Compared with Tiberius, she was an angel in conflict with a demon.

AGRIPPINA.

JULIA, great-granddaughter of Augustus, and daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born amidst the excitement of war, in a Roman camp, on the shores of the Rhine,—and reared under the laurels of her father's conquests, and the halo of her mother's grandeur. Her father's death occurring at a very early period of her life, her first perception of the career opened to her might have been derived from the sympathy and respect accorded by the Roman people to her family, even in the presence of her father's murderers.

Some historians have attributed to her a spirit of vengeance, which, though the accusation is not well substantiated, might indeed have been fostered by the trials of her life, commencing with her early estrangement from her glorious mother, which was followed by her persecution, first by the infamous Sejanus, and after the death of her husband Domitius, by her brother Caligula—who accused her before the senate, of participation in a conspiracy, forced them to condemn her, and had her driven into exile, where she remained in constant fear of a violent death.

On the death of Caligula, Agrippina, recalled from exile, was married to the consul Crispinus, whose sudden death was ascribed by her enemies to poison administered by his wife. Five years after this, Pallas proposed her to Claudius as the successor of Messalina, and after the interval of a year, during which Agrippina had much to contend with from rivalry and intrigue, the obstacle opposed to this marriage by the ties of consanguinity was relieved by a special law, and the daughter of Germanicus ascended the throne of Augustus, and ruled the empire, from that moment, in the name of her imbecile husband. Under her brilliant and vigorous administration, faction was controlled, order re-established, and that system of espionage abolished which had filled Rome with informers and their victims. The reserve and dignity of her deportment produced a reform in the manners of the imperial palace, and her influence over her husband was of a most salutary nature.

Tacitus has loaded the memory of Agrippina with the imputation of inordinate ambition, and, though there is probably considerable calumny in these charges, it may be supposed that a temperament like hers did not shrink from the arbitrary and cruel acts which might be thought necessary to her safety or advancement. Still, the woman must be judged by the circumstances under which she lived, and with reference to the morality of her contemporaries; and, so judged, she rises immeasurably superior to the greatest men associated with her history.

Agrippina was the first woman who acquired the privilege of entering the capitol in the vehicle assigned to the priests in religious ceremonies, and on all public occasions she took an elevated seat reserved for her, near the emperor.

On the occasion of the adoption of her son to the exclusion of the emperor's own child by Messalina, the infant Britannicus, she received the cognomen of Augusta; and to the prophetic augur who bade her "beware, lest the son she had so elevated might prove her ruin," she replied, "Let me perish, but let Nero reign." In this answer we have the secret of her great actions, and the motive for all her imputed crimes. Amidst all her lofty aspirations, her indomitable pride, her keen sense of injuries inflicted, her consciousness of power acquired, there was one deep and redeeming affection; this brilliant despot, the astute politician of her age, was still, above all and in all — a mother!

The marriage of her son to Octavia, the emperor's daughter, consummated the hopes and views of Agrippina, and relieving her from maternal anxiety, allowed her to give up her mind entirely to the affairs of state; and owing to her vigorous guidance of the reins of government, the last years of the reign of Claudius were years of almost unequalled prosperity in every respect — and this indolent and imbecile emperor died while the genius and vigour of his wife were giving such illustrations to his reign.

Agrippina has been accused of poisoning her husband, but on no sufficient grounds — his own gluttony was most probably the cause of his death. But that Agrippina's arts seated her son on the throne of the Cæsars, there can be no doubt.

In all this great historical drama, who was the manager, and most efficient actor? woman, or man? Whose was the superior mind? who was the intellectual agent? Was it the wily Seneca? the ductile Burrhus? the sordid army? the servile senate? the excitable people? or the consistent, concentrated Agrippina; who, actuated by one all-absorbing feeling, in the pursuit of one great object, put them all in motion? that feeling was maternal love, that object the empire of the world!

Nero was but eighteen years old when he ascended the throne; and, grateful to her whose genius had placed him there, he resigned the administration of affairs into her hands, and evinced an extraordinary tenderness and submission to his august mother. The senate vied with him in demonstrations of deference to her, and raised her to the priesthood, an assignment at once of power and respect.

The conscript fathers yielded to all her wishes; the Roman people had already been accustomed to seeing her on the imperial tribunal; and Seneca, Burrhus, and Pallas became but the agents of her will. In reference to the repose and prosperity of the empire under her sway, Trajan, in after years, was wont to compare the first five years of Nero's reign with those of Rome's best emperors.

Agrippina must have early discovered Nero's deficiency in that physical sensibility, and those finer sympathies which raise man above the tiger and vulture. She is reported to have said, "The reign of Nero has begun as that of Augustus ended; but when I am gone, it will end as that of Augustus began:" — the awful prophecy was soon accomplished. The profound policy by which she endeavoured to prolong her own government, and her watchfulness over the young Britannicus, are sufficient evidences that the son so loved in the perversity of maternal instinct must have eventually laid bare the inherent egotism and cruelty of his nature.

When, on the occasion of a public reception given to an embassy from the East, Agrippina moved forward to take her usual place beside Nero, he, with officious courtesy and ironical respect, sprang forward and prevented the accomplishment of her intention. After this public insult, Agrippina lost all self-control, and uttered passionate and impolitic words that were soon conveyed to the emperor, and by awakening his fears, let loose his worst passions. After murdering Britannicus to frustrate her designs, imprisoning her in her own palace, and attempting to poison her, a reconciliation took place between Nero and Agrippina, of which the mother was the only dupe, for the world understood the hollowness of her son's professions of affection, and all abandoned her.

Nero was now resolved on the death of his mother, and took great pains in arranging an artful scheme to accomplish it — which was frustrated by Acronia, who voluntarily received the blow intended for her mistress. Agrippina escaped then, but was soon afterwards murdered by Anicetus, who, commissioned by her son, entered her chamber with a band of soldiers and put an end to her life, after a glorious reign of ten years; during which she was distinguished for personal and intellectual endowments, and gave peace and prosperity to the empire she governed. Her faults belonged to the bad men and the bad age in which she lived — the worst on record: her virtues and her genius were her own. She inherited them from Agrippa, the friend and counsellor of Augustus, and from Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus.

The mind of this extraordinary woman was not wholly engrossed by the arts of intrigue or the cares of government; she found time to write her own Memoirs or Commentaries on the events of her time, of which Tacitus availed himself for his historical works. Pliny also quotes from her writings.

ALCESTE,

DAUGHTER of Pelias, and wife of Admetus, king of Thessaly. Her husband was sick, and, according to an oracle, would die, unless some one else made a vow to meet death in his stead. This was done secretly by Alceste, who became ill as Admetus recovered. After her death, Hercules visited Admetus, and promised his friend that he would bring back his wife from the infernal regions. He compelled Pluto to restore Alceste to her husband. Euripides has made this story the subject of a tragedy.

ALCINOË,

DAUGHTER of Polybius the Corinthian, and wife of Amphilocheus, fell in love with one Xanthus of the Isle of Samos, who lodged at her house. This is not the strangest thing in the story of her life; the subject of surprise is to see that it was Minerva who inspired her with this disease of love, to punish her because she had not paid all she had promised to a poor woman who had worked for her. This woman prayed to Minerva to avenge her, and behold her prayers were heard. Alcinoë, by the care of this goddess, became so desperately in love with her lodger, that she left her home and little children, and embarked with him. But during the voyage she reflected upon her conduct; and as she called to mind her young husband and her children, she wept in despair. All the promises of Xanthus to marry her were of no avail to console her grief,—and she threw herself into the sea. This story shows that the ancient heathen had a true sense of the great importance of being just to the poor.

ALEXANDRA,

QUEEN of Judea, widow and successor of Alexander Jannæus, a wise and virtuous princess, who, contrary to the example of her husband, studied to please her subjects, and preserved peace and prosperity during her reign of seven years. She died in the seventy-third year of her age, B. C. 70. She was the mother of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, and the latter years of her reign were disturbed by the attempt of her younger son, Aristobulus, to obtain the sovereignty, as he had been exasperated by the favour his mother showed to the sect of the Pharisees, and the authority she allowed them.

ALEXANDRA,

DAUGHTER of Hyrcanus, and mother of Aristobulus and Mariamne, wife of Herod the Great, was a woman of superior powers of mind. When Herod appointed Ananel, a person of obscure birth, high-priest, instead of her son Aristobulus, who had a right to that office, her spirited conduct caused him to depose Ananel in favour of Aristobulus. Herod, displeased at her interference, had her confined and guarded in her own palace; but Alexandra, receiving an invitation from Cleopatra to come to Egypt, with her son, attempted to escape with him, in two coffins; they were discovered, however, and brought back. Herod, jealous of the affection of the Jews for Aristobulus, had him drowned, which so much affected Alexandra, that she at first resolved on committing suicide; but finally decided to live, that she might revenge herself on the murderer. She interested Cleopatra in her cause, who induced Anthony to send for Herod to exculpate himself from the charge, which, by presents and flattery, he succeeded in doing. And when Herod returned he again ordered Alexandra to be confined. But Alexandra showed great terror, if the account be true, and cowardice, when the jealousy of Herod induced him to order the death of his wife Mariamne. Though she knew the innocence of her daughter, she was so much alarmed for fear she should share the same fate, that she sought every opportunity of traducing her, and praising the justice of Herod.

After the death of Mariamne, Herod's grief so overcame him, that he lost his health, and was at times deranged. While in this state, he retired to Samaria, leaving Alexandra at Jerusalem. Alexandra attempted to obtain possession of the fortresses near the capital, that she might eventually become mistress of the city; Herod being informed of her attempts, sent orders that she should be immediately put to death, which was done, about B. C. 27.

AMALTHÆA,

THE name of the sibyl of Cumæ, who is said to have offered to Tarquin II., or, The Proud, king of Rome, B. C. 524, nine books, containing the Roman destinies, and demanded for them three hundred pieces of gold. He derided her, for supposing that he would give so high a price for her books; she went away and burning three of them, returned and asked the same price for the other six; this being again denied, she burnt three more, and offered the remaining three, without lessening her demand. Upon which Tarquin, consulting the pontiffs, was advised to buy them. These books, called the "Sibylline Oracles," were in such esteem, that two magistrates were created to consult them upon extraordinary occasions. The books, and the story about them, were probably fabrications of the priests of Rome, to impose on that superstitious people, and increase their own importance, by occasionally quoting and interpreting these oracles. The story is also of importance in showing the spiritual influence the mind of woman exerted over that proud nation which owed its greatness to the sword. Even there the strength of man was fain to seek aid from the quicker intellect and more refined moral sense of woman.

ANCHITA,

WIFE of Cleombrutus, king of Sparta, was mother of Pausanias, who distinguished himself at the battle of Platæa. Afterwards, he disgusted his countrymen by his foolish and arrogant conduct, whom he also agreed to betray to the Persian king, on condition of receiving his daughter in marriage. His treason being discovered, he took refuge in the temple of Minerva, from which it was not lawful to force him. His pursuers therefore blocked up the door with stones, the first of which, in the proud anguish of a Spartan mother, was placed by Anchita. Pausanias died there of hunger, B. C. 471.

ANDROCLEA,

CELEBRATED for her love to her country, was a native of Thebes in Bœotia. That state was at war with the Orchomenians, and the oracle declared that they would be victors if the most noble among them would suffer a voluntary death. Antiopœnus, father of Androclea, the most illustrious person in Thebes, was not disposed to sacrifice himself. Androclea and her sister Alcis fulfilled this duty in their father's stead; and the grateful Thebans erected the statue of a lion to their memory in the temple of Diana.

ANDROMACHE,

WIFE of the valiant Hector, son of Priam king of Troy, and the mother of Astyanax, was daughter of Eetion, king of Thebes, in Cilicia. After the death of Hector, and the destruction of Troy, B. C. 1184, she was given to Pyrrhus, son of Achilles, and one of the most celebrated Greek warriors, who married her. Helenus, son of Priam, was also a captive to Pyrrhus, and having given him advice, which resulted favourably, Pyrrhus bestowed Andromache upon him, with part of the country of Epirus. She had children by Pyrrhus; and some authors are of opinion that all the kings of Epirus, to that Pyrrhus who made war against the Romans, were descended from a son of Andromache. This princess had seven brothers, who were killed by Achilles, together with their father, in one day. One author tells us, that she accompanied Priam when he went to desire Achilles to sell him the body of Hector; and that to move him to greater compassion, she carried her son with her, who was an infant. She was of a large stature, if the poets are good authority; but though her beauty of person would never have made her celebrated like Helen, the purity of her mind and the beauty of her character have given her a much nobler celebrity. The tragedy of Euripides is a monument to her memory; and her dialogue with Hector in the Sixth Book of the Iliad is one of the most beautiful parts of that poem.

ANDROMEDA,

Was daughter of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia and of Cassiopeia. Cassiopeia having boasted that her daughter surpassed the Nereides, if not Juno herself, in beauty, the offended goddesses called on Neptune, their father, to revenge the insult. He not only inundated the territory of Ethiopia, but sent a horrid sea-monster which threatened universal destruction. The oracle declared that the wrath of Neptune could be appeased only by the delivery of Andromeda to the monster. In this extremity Perseus beheld her when he was returning from his victory over Me-duza. Touched by compassion and love, Perseus offered to kill the monster, on condition that the virgin should be given him in marriage. Cepheus promised this, and kept his word. In memory of the exploits of Perseus, Andromeda was placed by Pallas among the stars.

ANGITIA,

SISTER of Medea, and daughter of Ætes, king of Colchis, taught antidotes against poison and serpents. She lived about, B. C. 1228.

ANNA,

DAUGHTER of Belus, king of Tyre, and sister of Dido, whom she accompanied in her flight to Carthage. She was worshipped as a goddess by the ancient Romans, under the title of Anna Perenna, and sacrifices were offered to her both publicly and privately.

ANTIGONE,

Was daughter of Œdipus, king of Thebes, by his sister Jocasta. This incestuous union brought a curse on the innocent Antigone; yet she never failed in her duty to her father, but attended him in his greatest misfortunes. She was slain by the usurper Creon, whose son Hæmon, being in love with her, killed himself upon her tomb. Her death was avenged on Creon by Theseus, and her name has been immortalized in a tragedy by Sophocles. She lived about, B. C. 1250.

ANTONIA MAJOR,

THE eldest daughter of Marc Antony and Octavia, sister to Augustus, was born B. C. 39. She married L. Domitius. Some of the most illustrious persons in Rome were descended from her. Also it was her misfortune that the infamous Messalina and Nero were her grandchildren.

ANTONIA MINOR,

SISTER of the preceding, was born B. C. 38 or 37. She married Drusus, brother of Tiberius, whose mother, Livia, had married the emperor Augustus. After a victorious campaign in Germany, Drusus died when on his way to Rome to receive the reward of his exploits. The despair of Antonia at this affliction knew no bounds. Their union and virtues, in a dissolute court, had been the admiration of Rome. Three children, Germanicus, Claudius, afterwards emperor, and Livilla, were the fruits of this marriage.

Antonia, though widowed in the bloom of beauty and the prime of life, refused all the splendid connections which courted her acceptance; and, rejecting the solicitations of Augustus to reside at his court, she passed her time in retirement, and in educating her children. She gained the respect and confidence of Tiberius, who had succeeded Augustus, by informing him of a conspiracy formed by his favourite Sejanus against his life.

Domestic calamities seemed to pursue this princess. Her son Germanicus, endowed with every noble quality, adored by the army, the idol of the people, and the presumptive heir to the throne, died suddenly in Syria, probably poisoned by order of the emperor. Agrippina, wife of Germanicus, returned to Rome, bearing in an urn the ashes of her husband, and joined with Antonia in demanding, but in vain, vengeance of the Senate.

Claudius, her younger son, dishonoured the family by his stupidity and vices; and Livilla was convicted of adultery and the murder of her husband. She was given up by Tiberius to Antonia, who, with the spirit of the ancient Romans, confined her in a room and left her to perish of hunger.

Antonia died in the early part of the reign of her grandson Caligula, who, by his neglect and open contempt, is supposed to have hastened her death. She was probably about seventy-five when she died. Of her private life little is known. She was celebrated for her beauty, chastity, and integrity. Pliny speaks of a temple dedicated to her.

A RETAPHILA,

OF Cyrene, wife of Phædimus, a nobleman of that place, lived about, B. C. 120. Nicocrates, having usurped the government of Cyrene, caused Phædimus to be slain, and forcibly espoused his widow, of whose beauty he had become enamoured. Cyrene groaned under the cruelty of the tyrant, who was gentle and kind only to Aretaphila. Determined to free her country from this cruel yoke, Aretaphila obtained several poisons in order to try their strength. Her drugs were discovered, and her design suspected. Calbia, mother of Nicocrates, insisted that she should be tortured, and after some delay Nicocrates consented. But even in the extremity of her anguish, Aretaphila persisted in her first explanation, that the drugs were intended merely to compose love philters for the preservation of his affections. Nicocrates afterwards entreated her forgiveness, but she remained inexorable.

Aretaphila had one daughter by her first marriage, whom she had united to Lysander, brother of Nicocrates, and through whom she persuaded Lysander to rebel against the tyrant. He was successful in his attempt, and Nicocrates was deposed and assassinated. But after Lysander's accession to the throne, he neglected Aretaphila's advice, and imitated the cruelties and the tyranny of his brother.

Disappointed in her son-in-law, she sent secretly to Anabus, a prince of Lybia, to ask him to invade Cyrene, and free it of its oppressors. When Anabus had arrived near Cyrene, Aretaphila, in a secret conference with him, promised to place Lysander in his hands, if he would retain him prisoner as a tyrant and usurper. For this service, she promised him magnificent gifts and a present in money. She then insinuated into the mind of Lysander, suspicions of the loyalty of his nobles and captains, and prevailed on him to seek an interview with Anabus, in order to make peace.

Lysander and Aretaphila accordingly set forward unarmed and unattended to the camp of Anabus. When they approached it, Lysander's courage failed him, and he would have retreated. But his mother-in-law urged him on, saying,

"Should you now return, you would be stamped as a coward and a traitor; as a man who faithless, perfidious himself, was incapable of a generous confidence."

Again, when on the point of meeting Anabus, Lysander hesitated; but Aretaphila seized his hand, and drawing him forward, gave him up to Anabus.

The tyrant was detained in the camp till the stipulated presents arrived. The people of Cyrene, when they learned what had happened, flocked in crowds to the camp of Anabus, and throwing themselves at the feet of Aretaphila, they acknowledged her as their saviour and their queen. Lysander was taken back to the city, fastened in a leather bag, and thrown into the sea; and Calbia was burnt at the stake. It was then decreed that the administration of the government should be given to Aretaphila, assisted by a council of the nobles. But she declined the honour, preferring the privacy of domestic life. She retired to her own habitation amidst the prayers and blessings of the people.

A RETE,

WAS the daughter of Aristippus of Cyrene, who flourished about, B. C. 380, and was the founder of the Cyrenaic system of philosophy. Arete was carefully instructed by her father; and after his death she taught his system with great success. She had a son, Aristippus, to whom she communicated the philosophy she received from her father.

ARSINOË,

DAUGHTER of Ptolemy I., son of Lagus, king of Egypt, and of Berenice, was married to Lysimachus, king of Thrace. Lysimachus fell in battle in Asia, and his kingdom of Macedonia was taken possession of by Seleucus. Seven months afterwards, Seleucus was assassinated by Ptolemy Ceraunus, elder brother of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who also put to death the two children of his half-sister Arsinoë, after he had inveigled her into a marriage with him. Their mother he then banished to the island of Samothracia, where she remained till she was summoned to Egypt to become the second wife of her brother, Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, king of that country, who reigned from B. C. 284 to 276. This is the first instance of the unnatural custom of incestuous marriages which prevailed among the Greek kings of Egypt. Though Arsinoë was now quite advanced, her brother was much attached to her, and called one of the districts of Egypt after her. She is said to have founded a city, called by her own name, on the banks of the Achelous, in Ætolia.

ARSINOË,

A DAUGHTER of Lysimachus, king of Thrace, was the first wife of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, by whom she had three children, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Berenice. Suspecting her of plotting against his life, Ptolemy banished her, and she fled to Cyrene, where she was finally received by Magas, half brother of the king.

Egypt. Magas married her, and adopted her daughter, Berenice. Berenice was betrothed to Demetrius, son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who came from Macedonia to marry her; but instead, transferred his affections to Arsinoe, which led to his assassination, and the marriage of Berenice to Ptolemy III., who was probably her brother, by which the kingdoms of Egypt and Cyrene were again united. The history of this princess is very confused; and there is much difference of opinion on the subject.

ARSINOE,

DAUGHTER of Ptolemy III. Euergetes, was married to her brother, Ptolemy IV. Philopater; she is called Eurydice by Justin, and Cleopatra by Livy. She was present at the battle of Rhabia, a city not far from Gaza, in Palestine, fought between her husband and Antiochus the Great, B. C. 217, and is said to have contributed not a little to gain the victory. Ptolemy afterwards, seduced by the charms of Agathoclea, ordered Arsinoe to be put to death.

ARTEMISIA,

DAUGHTER of Lygdamis, became queen of Caria, in Asia Minor, when her husband died. According to Herodotus, she was one of the most distinguished women of antiquity. She attended Xerxes in his expedition against Greece, B. C. 480, and furnished five ships, which were only inferior to those of the Sidonians. In the council of war before the battle of Salamis, she strongly represented to Xerxes the folly of risking a naval engagement, and the event justified her opinion. In the battle she displayed so much courage, that Xerxes exclaimed, "The men behave like women, and the women like men!" To her Xerxes intrusted his children, that they might be safely transported to his kingdom, when, agreeably to her advice, he abandoned Greece, to return to Asia.

These great qualities did not secure her from the weakness of love; she was passionately fond of a man of Abydos, whose name was Dardanus, and was so enraged at his neglect of her, that she put out his eyes while he was asleep. This, however, instead of diminishing her passion, seemed to increase it. At length she consulted the Delphic oracle, to learn how to conquer her love; and being advised to go to Leucadia, the ordinary resort of desperate lovers, she, like the poet Sappho, took the fatal leap from that promontory, and was drowned and buried there. Many writers confound this Artemisia with the wife of Mausolus, who lived some time after.

ARTEMISIA II.,

THE queen of Caria, wife of Mausolus, immortalized by her attachment to her husband, built for him, at his death, the celebrated and stately tomb, that was considered one of the seven wonders of the world. It was called the Mausoleum, and from it all other magnificent sepulchres have received the same name. It was built by four architects, and the expense of its construction was enormous; the philosopher Anaxagoras exclaimed, when he saw it, "How much money changed into stones!"

Artemisia frequently visited the place where her husband's ashes were deposited; mixed the earth that covered him with water, and drank it, for the purpose, as she said, of becoming the living tomb of her departed lord. She offered the richest prizes to those who should excel in composing a panegyric on his virtues. Yet in the midst of all her grief, she did not suffer it to interfere with the duties of her elevated position, but took the command of her army in a war against the Rhodians, in which she is said to have shown undaunted bravery. She took possession of the city of Rhodes, and treated the inhabitants with great severity. She caused two statues to be erected: one of the city of Rhodes, habited like a slave, and the other of herself, branding the city with a hot iron. Vitruvius adds, that the Rhodians never dared to remove that trophy from its place; such an attempt being prohibited by their religion; but they built a wall around it, which prevented it from being seen. She lived in the fourth century before Christ.

ASENATH,

DAUGHTER of Potiphar or Potiphara, and wife of Joseph, prime minister to Pharaoh, king of Egypt, is supposed by some to be the daughter of the same Potiphar, whose wife had caused Joseph's imprisonment, and that Asenath had endeared herself to Joseph by taking his part in his adversity, and vindicating him to her father.

ASPASIA,

OF Miletus, and daughter of Axiochus, lived principally at Athens. She gained the affections of Pericles, who, according to Plutarch, divorced his first wife, with her own consent, in order to marry Aspasia. We are told little of her beauty, but much of her mental powers and cultivation. In eloquence, she surpassed all her contemporaries. She was the friend, and, according to Plato, the instructress of Socrates, who gives her the high praise of "having made many good orators, and one eminent over all the Greeks, Pericles, the sor of Xanthippus." On this and similar authority we learn, that Pericles was indebted to Aspasia for much of his high mental cultivation. The Athenians used often to bring their wives to hear her converse, notwithstanding what was said of her immoral life. She is accused of having excited, from motives of personal resentment, the war of Peloponnesus; yet, calamitous as that conflict proved to Greece, Aspasia inflicted on the country still more incurable evils. Her example and instructions formed a school at Athens, by which her dangerous profession was reduced to a system.

Aspasia, on occasion of a check of the Athenian army, came herself into the assembly of the people, and pronounced an oration, inciting them to rally and redeem their cause; her speech was allowed to be far more eloquent than those of Gorgias, and other famous orators who spoke on the same conjuncture.

Hermippus, a comic poet, prosecuted Aspasia for impiety, which seems to have consisted in disputing the existence of their imaginary gods, and introducing new opinions about celestial appearances. But she was acquitted, though contrary to the law, by means of Pericles, who is said to have shed tears in his application for mercy in her behalf.

It should not be omitted that some modern writers have maintained opinions on the life of Aspasia very different from those popularly entertained. They say, the woman whom Socrates respected, the woman who for years was the bosom counsellor of so eminent a man as Pericles, never could have been devoid of personal purity; vice palls; vice may please by charms of exterior, but never could keep up mental enthusiasm such as Aspasia certainly excited and retained with Pericles. They suggest that aspersions were thrown upon her character by Aristophanes, to wound Pericles through her bosom; but that the friend, the adviser, the sympathizing companion of the man who has been called Princeps Gracia, was not a courtesan. We may here recall some verses of Croly, who, in a note to the poem now quoted, evidently leans to the opinions just stated.

"And throned immortal by his side
A woman sits with eye sublime,
Aspasia, all his spirit's bride;
But if their solemn love were crime,
Pity the beauty and the sage
Their crime was in their darken'd age."

Socrates, who was the intellectual admirer of this fascinating woman, in his Dialogue of Æschines, gives an account of the method which Aspasia took, in order to persuade Xenophon and his wife to observe the reciprocal duties of a married state in the best manner. The persons in the Dialogue are Aspasia, Xenophon, and his wife, whom Mr. Le Clerc supposes from a passage in Laertius to have been named Philesia.

"Tell me, Philesia," says Aspasia, "whether, if your neighbour had a piece of gold of more value than your own, you would not choose it before your own?" "Yes," answered Philesia. "If she had a gown, or any of the female ornaments, better than your's, would not you choose them rather than your own?" "Yes," answered she. "But," says Aspasia, "if she had an husband of more merit than your own, would not you choose the former?" Upon this Philesia blushed. Aspasia then addressed herself to Xenophon. "If your neighbour, Xenophon, had an horse better than your own, would not you choose him preferably to your own?" "Yes," answered he. "If he had an estate or farm of more value than your own, which would you choose?" "The former," answered he, "that is, that which is more of value." "But if his wife was better than your own, would not you choose your neighbour's?" Here Xenophon was silent upon this question. Aspasia therefore proceeded thus: "Since both of you, then, have refused to answer me in that point only, which I wanted you to satisfy me in, I will tell you myself what you both think: for you, Philesia, would have the best of husbands, and you, Xenophon, the best of wives. And therefore if you don't endeavour that there be not a better husband and wife in the world than yourselves, you will always be wishing for that which you shall think best; you, Xenophon, will wish you might be married to the best of wives, and Philesia, that she might have the best of husbands."

Pericles died at the age of seventy, B. C. 429; and after this we hear nothing of Aspasia, excepting that she transferred her affections to Lysicles, a grazier, who, in consequence of her influence, became, for a time, one of the leading men in Athens.

ASPASIA, or MILTO,

MISTRESS of Cyrus the younger, was born about 421, B. C. of free parents, at Phocis, in Ionia. She was brought up virtuously but in poverty, and being very beautiful, with a profusion of light curling hair, very uncommon in that country, she attracted the notice of one of the satraps of Cyrus, who forced her father to give her to him for the seraglio of this prince. Her modesty, dignity, and grief had such an effect on Cyrus, that he made her his wife in every thing but the name, consulting her in the most important affairs, and following her counsels. He changed her name to Aspasia, that being the appellation of the celebrated wit and beauty of Miletus. Aspasia bore her honours with the greatest moderation, and availed herself of the change in her fortunes only to rescue her father from his poverty. When Cyrus was killed, B. C. 401, in the ambitious attempt to dethrone his brother Artaxerxes, Aspasia was taken prisoner and brought before the conqueror. Artaxerxes treated her with the greatest attention, and made her the first among his women, although he could not marry her, as his wife Statira was still living. He ordered her to be clothed in magnificent apparel, and to be sumptuously lodged; but it was long before his attentions or kindness could efface the memory of Cyrus, whom she had tenderly loved. She showed the utmost indifference, through her whole life, to her own personal aggrandizement, and would seldom accept any present which she did not need. On one occasion Cyrus had sent her a chain of gold, remarking that "It was worthy the wife of a king;" but she requested him to send it to his mother Parysatis. This so pleased Parysatis, that she sent Aspasia many grand presents and a large sum of gold, all of which Aspasia gave to Cyrus, after praising the generosity of his mother.

"It may be of service to you," said she, "who are my riches and ornament."

ATHALIAH,

THE daughter of Ahab king of Samaria, and of Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal king of the Sidonians, was wife of Jehoram, king of Judah, who walked in the idolatrous ways of the house of Ahab. Jehoram died in the year B. C. 885, and the kingdom devolved on Ahaziah their son. Ahaziah reigned only one year, and on his untimely death, Athaliah 'arose and slew all the seed-royal of the house of Judah,' although they were her grand-children, and ascended the throne B. C. 884, and reigned six years. At the end of that time, Joash, a son of Ahaziah, who had been concealed six years in the temple by his aunt Jehosheba, the wife of Jehoida the high-priest, was produced by Jehoida before the priests and soldiers, and anointed king. Athaliah hastened to the temple and attempted to excite a reaction in her own favour by raising a cry of treason, but in vain, for Jehoida gave instant orders that she should be removed from the sacred enclosure and slain. This command was immediately obeyed, B. C. 878. The discovery of Joash is the subject of a tragedy by Racine, written by command of Madame de Maintenon.

AXIOTHEA,

A FEMALE philosopher of the age of Plato, whose lectures she attended in male attire.

B.

BATHSHEBA, or BATHCHUAH,

DAUGHTER of Eliam Ammiel, was wife of Uriah the Hittite. While her husband was absent at the siege of Rabbah, David, king of Israel, accidentally saw her and fell violently in love with her. In consequence of this, he contrived the death of her husband, and married her. Bathsheba's eldest child by David died, but she bore four others to him, of whom Solomon and Nathan are reckoned in the genealogy of Jesus Christ.

Bathsheba is represented as very beautiful; and she must have been a woman of extraordinary powers of mind, as she exercised over her husband, king David, such paramount influence. Though he had, by his other wives, several sons older than Solomon, and Adonijah seems to have been his favourite, yet she induced him to promise that Solomon her son should succeed to the throne. The scene in David's death-chamber, when, at her appeal, the old king calls back, as it were, the full powers of his strong mind to give her again the solemn promise that her son shall reign, is sufficient confirmation of her influence. After David's death she was treated with profound reverence by her son, king Solomon. The period of her death is not recorded; but the last time she is mentioned, when she "sat on the right hand" of her son, who was "on his throne," was about B. C. 1012.

BAUCIS,

A PHRYGIAN woman, wife of Philemon, who received Jupiter and Mercury kindly, after these gods had been denied hospitality in the whole country, while travelling in disguise. A deluge afterwards destroyed all but Philemon and Baucis, who entreated the gods to make their cottage a temple, in which they could officiate as priest and priestess, and that they might die together. Both of these requests were granted. Their story has been a favourite theme of poetry.

BERENICE (1),

ONE of the four wives of Ptolemy I., the founder of the dynasty of the Lagidæ in Egypt, and the mother of Ptolemy II., called Philadelphus. She had another son, Magas, by a former husband, who was afterwards king of Cyrene.

BERENICE (2),

A DAUGHTER of Ptolemy II., Philadelphus, and sister of Ptolemy III., Euergetes. She was married to Antiochus II., king of Syria, who divorced his wife Laodice on the occasion. But after the death of Philadelphus, Antiochus divorced Berenice and took back Laodice, who, enraged at her husband's having married Berenice, murdered them both, as well as a son Berenice had by Antiochus, B. C. 248.

BERENICE (3),

THE daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Arsinoe, married her brother Euergetes. Being passionately attached to him, she made a vow to consecrate her beautiful locks to Venus, in case of his safe return from a dangerous expedition. He came home unhurt, and she performed her vow; but some time after, the hair disappeared from the temple, and Conon, the astronomer, published that they had been placed among the stars; and he gave to a constellation the name of Berenice's hair, which it still retains. She was put to death by her own son, B. C. 221.

BERENICE (4),

SOMETIMES called Cleopatra, was the only legitimate child of Ptolemy VIII. (Soter II.), reigned six months, and was then murdered by her husband, Alexander II., to whom she had been married only nineteen days.

BERENICE (5),

A DAUGHTER of Ptolemy IX., Auletes, who began to reign in Egypt B. C. 81, was sister of the celebrated Cleopatra. While her father was at Rome, from B. C. 58 to B. C. 55, Berenice was made regent; but on the restoration of Auletes, he put his daughter to death. Berenice first married Seleucus, whom, it is said, she caused to be strangled; and afterwards, Archelaus, who was also put to death by Auletes.

BERENICE (6),

OF Chios one of the wives of Mithridates Eupator, king of Pontus, B. C. 123, generally called Mithridates the Great, was put to death by his command, together with his other wives, lest they should fall into the hands of his conqueror, Lucullus.

BERENICE (7),

DAUGHTER of Costoborus and Salome, Herod the Great's sister, was married first to her cousin Aristobulus, son of Herod and Mariamne. He, belonging to the Asmonean race, and having a brother who married the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, often upbraided Berenice that he had married below himself in wedding her. Berenice related these discourses to her mother, and exasperated her so furiously that Salome, who had great influence over her brother Herod, made him suspicious of Aristobulus, and caused him to order the murder of his own son. Berenice married again; and, having lost her second husband, went to Rome, and got into the favour of Augustus; and also of Antonia, wife of Drusus, son of Augustus, which, in the end, proved of great service to Herod Agrippa, her son by Aristobulus.

C.

CALPURNIA,

DAUGHTER of Lucius Piso, of an ancient and an honourable family in Rome, married Cæsar, after his divorce from his third wife, Pompeia. In her, Cæsar found a wife such as he desired, whose propriety of conduct placed her "above suspicion." To her virtues she added beauty, talents, prudence, an extraordinary eloquence, and a generosity and magnanimity of mind truly Roman. Unmoved by all reverses of fortune, she showed herself equally dignified when wife to Cæsar, senator of Rome, as when consort to the master of the world. Warned, as she thought, in a dream, of her husband's fate, she entreated him not to leave his house on the ides of March; but, urged by the conspirators, he disregarded her prayers, and was assassinated before his return, March 15th, B. C. 44.

Calpurnia, superior to the weakness of ordinary minds, pronounced publicly, in the rostra, the funeral eulogium of her husband in an impressive and eloquent manner. Having declared a loss like hers to be irreparable, she passed the remainder of her life in mourning, secluded in the house of Mark Antony, to whom she entrusted the treasures and papers of Cæsar, that she might be the better enabled to avenge his death.

CAMILLA,

DAUGHTER and successor of Metabus, king of the Volsci, and ally of Turnus in his contests with Æneas in Italy. She was killed on the field of battle. She is celebrated by Virgil for her valour.

CARMENTA, or NICOSTRATA,

AN ancient poetess of Latium, flourished before the foundation of Rome, in which, afterwards, divine honours were paid her. According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Carmenta was born in Arcadia, where she was known by her name of Nicostрата. Her son Evander being implicated in an unintentional homicide, she found means for an emigration, which she conducted herself, about 60 years prior to the Trojan war. She led her followers into Italy, and established her son Evander as king of that country, which afterwards contained Rome. She found it inhabited by a savage race, without religion, without courtesy, without agriculture. She taught them to sow grain, she polished them by introducing poetry and music; and she built their first temple, and lifted their thoughts to a superintending Deity. For these great benefits she was revered as prophetess, priestess and queen, and received her celebrated name of Carmenta, in allusion to the oracular power with which she was supposed to be gifted.

That she was a woman of wonderful genius and a remarkably practical mind, there can be little doubt; as the Romans would not otherwise have acknowledged, for such a length of time, her talents and merits. In their proudest days, the Romans never forgot the honours due to the benefactress of their rude ancestors. Cicero speaks of an officer in his day called Flamen Carmentalis, who had charge of the rites instituted by this ancient prophetess. Virgil alludes to this remarkable woman in the eighth book of the Æneid :—

Dehinc progressus, monstrat et aram,
Et Carmentalem Romano nomine portam,
Quam memorant Nymphæ priscum Carmentis honorem
Vatis fatidice.

It is supposed to be from her name that verses were named Carmina by the Latins. She was well skilled in the Greek language, and of extraordinary learning for the age in which she lived.

CASSANDRA,

DAUGHTER of Priam, king of Troy, was regarded as a prophetess; and, during the siege of Troy, uttered various predictions of impending calamity.

ties, which were disregarded at the time, but verified in the event. During the plunder of Troy, B. C. 1184, she took refuge in the temple of Minerva, where she was barbarously treated by Ajax. In the division of the spoil, she fell to the lot of Agamemnon, who brought her home, where she excited the jealousy of Clytemnestra. In consequence, Cassandra and Agamemnon were both murdered by Clytemnestra and her paramour. She is said to have been very beautiful, and to have had many suitors in the flourishing time of Troy.

CASSIOPEIA,

DAUGHTER of Arabus, and wife of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia, to whom she bore Andromeda. She dared to compare her daughter's beauty to that of the Nereides, who besought Neptune for vengeance. The god complied by laying waste the dominions of Cepheus by a deluge and a sea-monster. In astronomy, Cassiopeia is a conspicuous constellation in the northern hemisphere.

CECONIA, or CESENIA,

WIFE of Caligula, emperor of Rome, was killed by Julius Lupus, A. D. 41, while weeping over the body of her murdered husband. When she saw the assassin approaching, and discovered his purpose, she calmly presented her breast to his sword, urging him to finish the tragedy his companions had begun. Her two daughters died by the same hand.

CHARIXENA,

A VERY learned Grecian lady, who composed many pieces in prose and verse. One of her poems is entitled "Cromata." She is mentioned by Aristophanes.

CHELIDONIS,

DAUGHTER of Leotychides, and grand-daughter of Timœa, wife of Agis, king of Sparta, married Cleonymus, son of Cleomenes II., king of Sparta. Cleonymus was disliked by the Lacedæmonians, on account of his violent temper, and they gave the royal authority to Atreus, his brother's son. Chelidonis also despised him and loved Acrotatus, a very beautiful youth, the son of Atreus. Cleonymus left Lacedæmon in anger, and went to solicit Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, to make war against the Lacedæmonians. Pyrrhus came against the city with a large army, but was repulsed. The Spartans, on his approach, had resolved to send the women, by night, to Crete for safety; but Archidamia came, sword in hand, into the senate, complaining that they were thought capable of surviving the destruction of their country. The women laboured all night on the abutments, with the exception of Chelidonis, who put a rope around her neck, resolving not to fall alive into the hands of her husband. Acrotatus did wonders, and was received with acclamations on his return as a conqueror to the city, which was saved chiefly by the patriotism of the women, inspired by Chelidonis. She lived about 280 B. C.

CHELONIS,

DAUGHTER of Leonidas, king of Sparta, B. C. 491, was the wife of Cleombrutus. Her father was deposed by a faction, who placed Cleombrutus on the throne in his stead. Chelonis refused to share her husband's triumph, and retired with her father into a temple in which he had taken sanctuary. Leonidas, some time after, was permitted to retire to Tægea, whither Chelonis accompanied him.

A change occurring in the feelings of the populace, Leonidas was restored, and Cleombrutus obliged to take refuge, in his turn, in the sanctuary. Chelonis now left her father for her husband. Leonidas repaired, with an armed force, to the sanctuary, and bitterly reproached Cleombrutus, who listened in silence, with the injuries he had received from him. The tears of Chelonis, who protested that she would not survive Cleombrutus, softened Leonidas, and he not only gave his son-in-law his life, but allowed him to choose his place of exile. To the entreaties of Leonidas that Chelonis would remain with him, she returned a resolute refusal; and, placing one of her children in her husband's arms, and taking the other in her own, she went with him into banishment.

CHIOMARA,

THE heroic wife of Ortiagon, a Gaulish prince, equally celebrated for her beauty and her chastity. During the war between the Romans and the Gauls, B. C. 186, the latter were entirely defeated on Mount Olympus. Chiomara, among many other ladies, was taken prisoner, and committed to the charge of a centurion. This centurion, not being able to overcome the chastity of the princess by persuasion, employed force; and then, to make her amends, offered her her liberty, for an Attic talent. To conceal his design from the other Romans, he allowed her to send a slave of her own, who was among the prisoners, to her relations, and assigned a place near the river where she could be exchanged for the gold.

She was carried there the next night by the centurion, and found there two relations of her own, with the gold. While the centurion was weighing it, Chiomara, speaking in her own tongue, commanded her friends to kill him, which they did. Then cutting off his head herself, she carried it under her robe to her husband, Ortiagon, who had returned home after the defeat of his troops. As soon as she came into his presence she threw the head at his feet. Surprised, as he might well be, at such a sight, he asked whose head it was, and what had induced her to do a deed so uncommon with her sex? Blushing, but at the same time expressing her fierce indignation, she declared the outrage that had been done her, and the revenge she had taken. During the remainder of her life, she strenuously retained her purity of manners, and was treated with great esteem.

CLELIA,

ONE of the Roman virgins given as a hostage to Porsenna, when he came to restore the Tarquins, Stealing from his camp by night, she crossed the Tiber on horseback. Porcenna sent to demand her, and she was given up to him; but he dismissed her with her companions for the great esteem he had of her virtue. The Senate erected an equestrian statue to her.

CLEOBULE, or CLEOBULINE,

DAUGHTER of Cleobulus, prince of Lindos, in Greece, who flourished B. C. 594, was celebrated for her enigmatical sentences, or riddles, composed chiefly in Greek verse.

CLEOPATRA,

WAS the eldest daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt. On his death, B. C. 51, he left his crown to her, then only seventeen years old, and her eldest brother Ptolemy, who was still younger, directing them, according to the custom of that family, to be married, and committing them to the care of the Roman Senate. They could not agree, however, either to be married or to reign together; and the ministers of Ptolemy deprived Cleopatra of her share in the government, and banished her from the kingdom. She retired to Syria, and raised an army, with which she approached the Egyptian frontier. Just at this time, Julius Cæsar, in pursuit of Pompey, sailed into Egypt, and came to Alexandria. Here he employed himself in hearing and determining the controversy between Ptolemy and Cleopatra, which he claimed a right to do as an arbitrator appointed by the will of Auletes; the power of the Romans being then vested in him as dictator. But Cleopatra laid a plot to attach him to her cause by the power of those charms which distinguished her in so peculiar a manner. She sent word to Cæsar that her cause was betrayed by those who managed it for her, and begged to be allowed to come in person and plead it before him. This being granted, she came secretly into the port of Alexandria in a small skiff, in the dusk of the evening; and to elude her brother's officers, who then commanded the place, she caused herself to be tied up in her bedding and carried to Cæsar's apartment on the back of one of her slaves. She was then about nineteen; and though, according to Plutarch, not transcendently beautiful, yet her wit and fascinating manners made her quite irresistible. Her eyes were remarkably fine, and her voice was delightfully melodious, and capable of all the variety of modulation belonging to a musical instrument. She spoke seven different languages, and seldom employed an interpreter in her answer to foreign ambassadors. She herself gave audience to the Ethiopians, the Troglodytes, Hebrews, Arabians, Syrians, Medes, and Parthians. She could converse on all topics, grave or gay; and put on any humour, according to the purpose of the moment. So many charms captivated Cæsar at once; and the next morning he sent for Ptolemy and urged him to receive Cleopatra on her own terms; but Ptolemy appealed to the people, and put the whole city in an uproar. A war commenced, in which Cæsar proved victorious; and Ptolemy, while endeavouring to escape across the Nile in a boat, was drowned. Cæsar then caused Cleopatra to marry her younger brother, also named Ptolemy, who, being a boy of eleven, could only contribute his name to the joint sovereignty. This mature statesman and warrior, who had almost forgotten ambition for love, at length tore himself from Cleopatra, who had borne him a son, Cæsarion, and went to Rome.

After his departure, Cleopatra reigned unmo-
lest; and when her husband had reached his fourteenth year, the age of majority in Egypt, she poisoned him, and from that time reigned alone in Egypt. She went to Rome to see Cæsar, and while there lodged in his house, where her authority over him made her insolence intolerable to the Romans. His assassination so alarmed her that she fled precipitately to her own country, where, out of regard to the memory of Cæsar, she raised a fleet to go to the assistance of the triumvirs, but was obliged by a storm to return.

After the battle of Philippi, Antony visited Asia, and, on the pretext that Cleopatra had furnished Cassius with some supplies, he summoned her to appear before him at Tarsus, in Cilicia. Cleopatra prepared for the interview in a manner suited to the state of a young and beautiful eastern queen. Laden with money and magnificent gifts, she sailed with her fleet to the mouth of the Cydnus. There she embarked in a vessel whose stern was of gold, sails of purple silk, and oars of silver that kept time to a concert of several instruments. She herself was lying under a canopy of cloth of gold, dressed like Venus rising out of the sea; about her were lovely children like Cupids fanning her; the handsomest of her women, habited like Nereids and Graces, were leaning on the sides and shrouds of the vessel; the sweets that were burning perfumed the banks of the river, which were covered by crowds of people, shouting, that "the goddess Venus was come to visit Bacchus for the happiness of Asia;" while Antony sat alone and unattended.

Cleopatra succeeded in her object; Antony became her captive; and the impression her beauty and splendour had made on him was completed and rendered durable by the charms of her society. Her influence over him became unbounded, and she abused it to the worst purposes. At her request, her younger sister, Arsinoë, was assassinated; and she scrupled no act of injustice for the aggrandizement of her dominions. After Antony had spent a winter with her at Alexandria, he went to Italy, where he married Octavia. Cleopatra's charms, however, drew him back to Egypt; and when he had proceeded on his expedition against Parthia, he sent for her into Syria, where she rendered him odious by the cruelties and oppressions she urged him to practice. After his return, he bestowed upon her many provinces, by which he incurred the displeasure of the Roman people. When the civil war broke out between Antony and Octavianus, afterwards Augustus Cæsar, emperor of Rome, Cleopatra accompanied Antony, and added sixty ships to his navy. It was by her persuasion that the deciding battle was fought by sea, at Actium. She commanded her own fleet; but her courage soon failed her, and before the danger reached her she fled, followed by the whole squadron and the infatuated Antony, who, however, was very angry with Cleopatra on this occasion, and remained three days without seeing her. He was at length reconciled to her, and, on the approach of Octavianus, they both sent publicly to treat with him; but, at the same time, Cleopatra gave her ambassadors private instructions for negotiating with him separately. Hoping to secure the kingdom of Egypt for herself and her children, she promised to put it into the hands of Octavianus; and, as a pledge for the performance, she delivered up to him the important city of Pelusium.

Near the temple of Isis she had built a tower, which she designed for her sepulchre; and into this was carried all her treasures, as gold, jewels, pearls, ivory, ebony, cinnamon, and other precious woods; it was also filled with torches, faggots, and tow, so that it could be easily set on fire. To this tower she retired after the last defeat of Antony, and on the approach of Octavianus; and when Antony gave himself the mortal stab, he was carried to the foot of the tower, and drawn up into it by Cleopatra and her women, where he expired in her arms.

Octavianus, who feared lest Cleopatra should burn herself and all her treasures, and thus avoid falling into his hands and gracing his triumphal entry into Rome, sent Proculus to employ all his art in obtaining possession of her person; which he managed to do by stealing in at one of the windows. When Cleopatra saw him, she attempted to kill herself; but Proculus prevented her, and took from her every weapon with which she might commit such an act. She then resolved to starve herself; but her children were threatened with death if she persisted in the attempt. When Octavianus came to see her, she attempted to captivate him, but unsuccessfully; she had, however, gained the heart of his friend, Dolabella, who gave her private notice that she was to be carried to Rome within three days, to take a part in the triumph of Octavianus. She had an asp, a small serpent, whose bite is said to induce a kind of lethargy and death without pain, brought to her in a basket of figs; and the guards who were sent to secure her person, found her lying dead on a couch, dressed in her royal robes, with one of her women dead at her feet, and the other expiring. The victor, though greatly disappointed, buried her, with much magnificence, in the tomb with Antony, as she had requested. She was in her thirty-ninth year at the time of her death; she left two sons and a daughter by Antony, whom she had married after his divorce from Octavia, besides her son by Cæsar, whom Octavianus put to death as a rival. With her terminated the family of Ptolemy Lagus, and the monarchy of Egypt, which was thenceforth a Roman province. Cleopatra was an object of great dread and abhorrence to the Romans, who detested her as the cause of Antony's divorce from Octavia, and the subsequent civil war. Her ambition was as unbounded as her love of pleasure; and her usual oath was, "So may I give law in the capitol." Her temper was imperious, and she was boundlessly profuse in her expenditures; nor did she ever hesitate to sacrifice, when it suited her own interest, all the decorums of her rank and sex. But we must remember, also, that she lived in an age of crime. She was better than the men her subtle spirit subdued,—for she was true to her country. Never was Egypt so rich in wealth, power and civilization, as under her reign. She reconstructed the precious library of her capital; and when the wealth of Rome was at her command, proffered by the dissolute Antony, who thought her smiles cheaply bought at the price of the Roman empire, Cleopatra remarked,—“The treasures I want are two hundred thousand volumes from Pergamus, for my library of Alexandria.”

Her children, by Antony, were carried to Rome, to grace the triumph of Octavianus. Octavia, Antony's repudiated wife, took charge of them; and Cleopatra, the daughter, was afterwards married to Juba, king of Mauritania.

CLYTEMNESTRA

Was the daughter of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, and Leda, and twin-sister of Helen. She bore her husband, Agamemnon, two daughters, Sphigenia and Electra, and one son, Orestes. During the absence of Agamemnon, in his wars against Troy, she became enamoured of Ægisthus, and assisted him to murder Agamemnon on his return. She then, together with Ægisthus, governed Mycene for seven years. Orestes, at length, killed them both.

CORINNA,

A POETESS, to whom the Greeks gave the appellation of the Lyric Muse, was a native of Tanagra, in Bœotia. She flourished in the fifth century B. C., and was a contemporary of Pindar, from whom she five times won the prize in poetical contests. Her fellow-citizens erected a tomb to her in the most frequented part of their city. Only a few fragments of her works are extant. She did justice to the superiority of Pindar's genius, but advised him not to suffer his poetical ornaments to intrude so often, as they smothered the principal subject; comparing it to pouring a vase of flowers all at once on the ground, when their beauty and excellence could only be observed in proportion to their rarity and situation. Her glory seems to have been established by the public memorial of her picture, exhibited in her native city, and adorned with a symbol of her victory. Pausanias, who saw it, supposes her to have been one of the most beautiful women of her age; and observes that her personal charms probably rendered her judges partial,—a very masculine idea.

CORINNA, or CRINNA,

Of the Isle of Telos, lived about B. C. 610. She wrote a fine poem in the Doric language, consisting of three hundred verses. Her style is said to have resembled that of Homer. She died at the age of nineteen.

CORNELIA,

THE mother of the Gracchi. In this lady every circumstance of birth, life, and character, conspired to give her a glowing and ever-living page in history. Two thousand years have passed away, and yet her name stands out as freshly, as if she had been cotemporaneous with Elizabeth and Mary. She was the daughter of Scipio Africanus, the conqueror of Hannibal. Such descent could hardly have received an addition of glory or distinction. But, such was the life of Cornelia, that even the fame of Scipio received new lustre. She was married to a man, who, though he filled many high Roman offices, yet derived still greater dignity from her virtues. This was Tiberius Gracchus, the grandson of Sempronius, who was eulogized by Cicero for wisdom and virtue. He was thought worthy of Cornelia, and the event proved that one was as remarkable as the other, for what in that age of the world must have been deemed the highest excellencies of the human character. Tiberius died, leaving Cornelia with twelve children. Her character was such, that Ptolemy king of Egypt paid his addresses to her, but was rejected. She devoted herself to the care of her house and children; in which she behaved with the sweetest sobriety, parental affection, and greatness of mind. During her widowhood, she lost all her children except three, one daughter, who was married to Scipio the younger, and two sons, Tiberius and Caius Gracchus. Plutarch remarks, that "Cornelia brought them up with so much care, that though they were without dispute of the noblest family, and had the happiest geniuses of any of the Roman youth, yet education was allowed to have contributed more to their perfections than nature." This remark may show in forcible colours the vast influence of mothers in the education of youth. It is certain that there is no natural genius which may not be improved by education, and it is equally certain that no human being can have as much influence on that education as the mother. When a Campanian lady once displayed her jewels before Cornelia, requesting to see hers in return, Cornelia produced her two sons, saying, "These are all the jewels of which I can boast."

She also gave public lectures on philosophy in Rome, and was more fortunate in her disciples than her sons. Cicero says of her, that, "Cornelia, had she not been a woman, would have deserved the first place among philosophers."

Cornelia, like all the leading women of Rome, had imbibed the heroic, or ambitious spirit of the age. She is said to have made remarks to her sons which seemed to spur them on more rapidly in their public career. The result was not very fortunate. For though her sons sustained the highest name for purity of character; though they have come down to us, distinguished as the Gracchi, and though they were associated with the popular cause, yet their measures were so revolutionary and violent, that they were both destroyed in popular tumults.

Cornelia survived the death of her sons, which she bore with great magnanimity. They had been killed on consecrated ground, and of these places she said, that "they were monuments worthy of them." She lived subsequently a life of elegant and hospitable ease, surrounded by men of letters, and courted by the great. We cannot have a better idea of the close of her life, and of the high estimation in which she stood, than by the very words of Plutarch. This writer closes the lives of the Gracchi with the following account of Cornelia:

"She took up her residence at Misenum, and made no alteration in her manner of living. As she had many friends, her table was always open for the purpose of hospitality. Greek, and other men of letters she had always with her, and all the kings in alliance with Rome expressed their regard by sending her presents, and receiving the like civilities in return. She made herself very agreeable to her guests, by acquainting them with many particulars of her father Africanus, and of his manner of living. But what they most admired in her was, that she could speak of her sons without a sigh or a tear, and recount their actions and sufferings as if she had been giving an account of some ancient heroes. Some therefore imagined that age and the greatness of her misfortunes had deprived her of her understanding and sensibility. But those who were of that opinion seem rather to have wanted understanding themselves; since they know not how much a noble mind may, by a liberal education, be enabled to support itself against distress; and that though, in the pursuit of rectitude, Fortune may often defeat the purposes of Virtue, yet Virtue, in bearing affliction, can never lose her prerogative."

The whole life of Cornelia presents a beautiful character; and from the facts which have come down to us we may draw these inferences: 1. Cornelia must have been educated in a very superior manner by her father. For in no other manner can we account for her knowledge and love of literature; nor for the fact, that while yet young she was regarded as worthy of the most virtuous and noble men of Rome. 2. She must have been, from the beginning, a woman of fixed principles and undaunted courage; for, in no other manner can we give a solution to her rejection of the king of Egypt, her unremitting care of her family, the high education of her sons, and the great influence she held over them. 3. She must have cultivated literature and the graces of conversation; for, how else could she have drawn around the fireside of a retired widow, the men of letters and even the compliments of distant princes?

From all this we may draw the conclusion that it is quite possible for a lady to be a woman of letters, and yet a good housekeeper, a good mother, a very agreeable companion, and a useful member of society. It is true, that all women cannot have the same early advantages, the same parental care, the same rich opportunities, and the same splendid line of life. Yet how few are they who have improved, to the same advantage, the talents with which they have really been endowed! And, yet more, how few are the fathers and mothers who think these riches of the immortal mind at all equivalent to the petty accomplishments of fashion? Yet it is these high qualities of mind alone which remain, like the eternal laws of nature, after all the modes of fashion and the revolutions of time. From this living fountain flows all the bubbling, sparkling, running waters of life. It overflows beyond the boundaries of life, and enriches every territory of distant posterity.

In her lifetime a statue was raised to her, with this inscription: Cornelia mater Gracchorum. She died about 230 years before Christ.

CORNELIA,

A DAUGHTER of Metellus Scipio, who married Pompey, after the death of her first husband, P. Crassus. She was an eminently virtuous woman, and followed Pompey in his flight to Egypt, after his defeat by Cæsar at Pharsalia, B. C. 48; and saw him murdered on his landing. She attributed all his misfortunes to his connection with her.

CORNELIA,

DAUGHTER of Cinna, and first wife of Julius Cæsar. She became the mother of Julia, Pompey's wife, and was so beloved by her husband that he pronounced a funeral oration over her corpse.

CRATESIPOLIS,

A QUEEN of Sicyon, celebrated for her valour, after the death of her husband, Alexander, B. C. 314.

CREUSA,

DAUGHTER of Priam, king of Troy, and of Hecuba his wife, married Æneas, by whom she had Ascanius. When Troy was taken, B. C. 1184, she fled in the night with her husband; but in the confusion they were separated, and Æneas could not recover her. Some assert that Cybele saved her, and that Creusa became a priestess in her temple.

CYNISCA,

DAUGHTER of Agesilaus, king of Sparta, B. C. 400, was celebrated by the Lacedæmonians for excelling in the Olympic games. Her brother, to show his contempt for these exercises, with difficulty persuaded her to enter the lists; for he thought those amusements would not be held in estimation, if a woman could obtain the prize.

D.

DAMO

DAUGHTER of Pythagoras, the philosopher, was one of his favourite disciples, and was initiated by him into all the secrets of his philosophy. Her father entrusted to her all his writings, enjoining her not to make them public. This command she strictly obeyed, though tempted with large offers, while she was struggling with the evils of poverty. She lived single, in obedience to her father's wishes, and exhorted other young women, whose education she took charge of, to do the same. She was born at Crotona, in Italy, and lived about B. C. 500.

DAMOPHILA,

WIFE of Damophilus, the Grecian philosopher, was the contemporary, relation, and rival of Sappho. She composed a poem on Diana, and a variety of odes on subjects connected with the passion of love. She is mentioned by Theophilus, in his life of Apollonius Thyaneus. She flourished about B. C. 610.

DEBORAH,

A PROPHETESS and judge in Israel, and the most extraordinary woman recorded in the Old Testament. She lived about a hundred and thirty years after the death of Joshua. The Israelites were in subjection to Jabin, king of the Canaanites, who for twenty years had "mightily oppressed" them. Josephus says, "No humiliation was saved them; and this was permitted by God, to punish them for their pride and obstinacy;" according to the Bible, for their "idolatry and wickedness." In this miserable and degraded condition they were, when "Deborah, a prophetess, the wife of Lapidoth," was raised up to be the "judge" and deliverer of her people. By the authority God had sanctioned, in giving her superior spiritual insight and patriotism, she called and commissioned Barak to take 10,000 men of the children of Naphthali and of Zebulun, and go against Sisera and his host. According to Josephus, this armed host of Canaanites consisted of 300,000 infantry, 10,000 cavalry, and 3000 chariots; the Bible does not give the number, but names "nine hundred chariots of iron," and the army as "a multitude." Barak seems to have been so alarmed at the idea of defying such a host of enemies, or so doubtful of succeeding in gathering his own army, that he refused to go, unless Deborah would go with him. Here was a new and great call on her energies. She had shown wisdom in counsel, superior, we must infer, to that of any man in Israel, for all the people "came up to her for judgment;"—but had she courage to go out to battle for her country? The sequel showed that she was brave as wise; and the reproof she bestowed on Barak for his cowardice or want of faith, is both delicate and dignified. She had offered him the post of military glory; it belonged to him as a man; but since he would not take it, since he resolved to drag a woman forward to bear the blame of the insurrection, should the patriot effort fail; the "honour" of success would be given to a "woman!" And it was. But Deborah's spirit-stirring influence so animated the army of the Israelites, that the numerical force of the Canaanites was of no avail. When she said to Barak, "Up; for this is the day in which the Lord hath delivered Sisera into thine hand;" her battle-cry inspired him with faith, and he rushed "down from Mount Tabor, and 10,000 men after him." "The Lord discomfited Sisera and all his chariots, and all his host;" being, if Josephus is right, a hundred to one against the little army of Barak, besides the "nine hundred iron chariots;" of the mighty host of Sisera, not a man escaped. What a victory to be achieved, by the blessing of God, under the guidance of a woman! After the battle was won and Israel saved, then Deborah, who had shown her wisdom as a judge and her bravery as a warrior, came forth to her people in her higher quality of prophetess and priestess, and raised her glorious song, which, for poetry, sublimity and historic interest, has never been exceeded, except by the canticle of Moses. It is true that Barak's name is joined with hers in the singing, but the wording of the ode shows that it was her composition; as she thus declares,—"Hear, O ye kings; give ear, O ye princes; I, I, will sing unto the Lord; I will sing to the Lord God of Israel." Then she pathetically alludes to the wasted condition of her country, when the "highways were unoccupied, and the travellers walked through by-ways."—"The villages ceased, they ceased in Israel, until that I, Deborah, arose, that I arose a mother in Israel."

How beautiful is her character shown in the title she assumed for herself! not "Judge," "Heroine," "Prophetess," though she was all these, but she chose the tender name of "Mother," as the highest style of woman; and described the utter misery of her people, as arousing her to assume the high station of a patriot and leader. It was not ambition, but love, that stirred her noble spirit, and nerved her for the duties of government. She is a remarkable exemplification of the spiritual influence woman has wielded for the benefit of humanity, when the energies of man seemed entirely overcome. Her genius was superior to any recorded in the history of the Hebrews, from Moses to David, an interval of more than four hundred years; and scriptural commentators have remarked, that Deborah alone, of all the rulers of Israel, has escaped unreprieved by the prophets and inspired historians. The land under her motherly rule had "rest forty years." See "Judges," chapters iv., v.

The Rev. H. H. Milman, in his "History of the Jews," thus comments on the genius of this extraordinary woman.

"Deborah's hymn of triumph was worthy of the victory. The solemn religious commencement—the picturesque description of the state of the country—the mustering of the troops from all quarters—the sudden transition to the most contemptuous sarcasm against the tribes that stood aloof—the life, fire, and energy of the battle—the bitter pathos of the close—lyric poetry has nothing, in any language, which can surpass the boldness and animation of this striking production. But this hymn has great historic as well as poetic value. It is the only description of the relation of the tribes to each other, and of the state of society during the period of the Judges. The northern tribes—Zebulun, Issachar, Naphtali—appear in a state of insurrection against their oppressors: they receive some assistance from Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin. The pastoral tribes beyond Jordan remain in unpatriotic inactivity. Dan and Asher are engaged in their maritime concerns; a curious fact, for we have no other intimation of any mercantile transactions of the Hebrews—as these expressions seem to imply—earlier than the reign of Solomon. Of Judah and Simeon there is no notice whatever, as if they had seceded from the confederacy, or were occupied by enemies of their own.

Thus sang Deborah and Barak, son of Abinoam,
In the day of victory thus they sang:
That Israel hath wrought her mighty vengeance,
That the willing people rushed to battle,
Oh, therefore, praise Jehovah!

Hear, ye kings! give ear, ye princes!
I to Jehovah, I will lift the song,
I will sound the harp to Jehovah, God of Israel!
Jehovah! when thou wentest forth from Seir!
When thou marchdest through the fields of Edom
Quaked the earth, and poured the heavens,
Yea, the clouds poured down with water:
Before Jehovah's face the mountains melted,
That Sinai before Jehovah's face,
The God of Israel.

In the days of Shamgar, son of Anath,
In Jael's days, untrodden were the highways
Through the winding by-path stole the traveller,
Upon the plains deserted lay the hamlets,
Even till that I, till Deborah arose,
Till I arose in Israel a mother.

They chose new gods;
War was in all their gates!
Was buckler seen, or lance,
'Mong forty thousand sons of Israel?

My soul is yours, ye chiefs of Israel!
And ye, the self-devoted of the people,
Praise ye the Lord with me!
Ye that ride upon the snow-white asses:
Ye that sit to judge on rich divans;
Ye that plod on foot the open way,
Come meditate the song.

For the noise of plundering archers by the wells of water
Now they meet and sing aloud Jehovah's righteous acts;
His righteous acts the hamlets sing upon the open plains,
And enter their deserted gates the people of Jehovah.

Awake, Deborah! Awake!
Awake, uplift the song!
Barak, awake! and lead thy captives captive
Thou son of Abinoam!

With him a valiant few went down against the mighty,
With me Jehovah's people went down against the strong

First Ephraim, from the Mount of Amalek,
And after thee, the bands of Benjamin!
From Machir came the rulers of the people,
From Zebulun those that bear the marshal's staff;
And Issachar's brave princes came with Deborah,
Issachar, the strength of Barak:
They burst into the valley on his footsteps.

By Reuben's fountains there was deep debating—
Why sat'st thou idle, Reuben, 'mid thy herd-stalls—

Was it to hear the lowing of thy cattle?
By Reuben's fountains there was deep debating—

And Gilead lingered on the shores of Jordan—
And Dan, why dwelled he among his ships?—
And Asher dwelled in his sea-shore havens,
And sate upon his rocks precipitous.
But Zebulun was a death-defying people,
And Naphthali from off the mountain heights.

Came the king and fought,
Fought the kings of Canaan,
By Taanach, by Megiddo's waters,
For the golden booty that they won not.

From the heavens they fought 'gainst Sisera,
In their courses fought their stars against him:
The torrent Kishon swept them down,
That ancient river Kishon.
So trample thou, my soul, upon their might.

Then stamped the clattering hoofs of prancing horse
At the night, at the flight of the mighty.

Curse ye Meroz, saith the angel of the Lord,
Curse, a twofold curse upon her dastard sons:
For they came not to the succour of Jehovah,
To the succour of Jehovah 'gainst the mighty.
Above all women blest be Jael,
Heber the Kenite's wife,
O'er all the women blest, that dwell in tents.

Water he asked—she gave him milk,
The curded milk, in her costliest bowl.

Her left hand to the nail she set,
Her right hand to the workman's hammer—
Then Sisera she smote—she clave his head;
She bruised—she pierced his temples.
At her feet he bowed; he fell; he lay;
At her feet he bowed; he fell;
Where he bowed, there he fell dead.

From the window she looked forth, she cried,
The mother of Sisera, through the lattice:
"Why is his chariot so long in coming?
Why tarry the wheels of his chariot?"
Her prudent women answered her—
Yea, she herself gave answer to herself—
"Have they not seized, not shared the spoil?
One damsel, or two damsels to each chief?
To Sisera a many-coloured robe,
A many-coloured robe, and richly brodered,
Many-coloured, and brodered round the neck."

Thus perish all thine enemies, Jehovah;
And those who love thee, like the sun, shine forth,
The sun in all its glory.*

DELILAH,

OF Sorek, a Philistine woman, who enticed Samson to reveal to her the secret of his supernatural strength, which was in his hair. This she caused to be cut off, and thus delivered him, helpless, into the hands of his enemies.

The history of Samson is the history of the triumphs of woman's spiritual nature over the physical strength and mental powers of man. Samson's birth, character and mission were first revealed to his mother; the angel appearing twice to her before her husband was permitted to see the heavenly messenger. All the preparatory regimen to ensure this wonderful son was appointed as the mother's duty; and when the angel of the Lord was revealed, the man's earthly nature was overwhelmed with fear; the woman's spiritual nature held its heavenly trust unshaken. The arguments of the wife, to comfort and sustain her husband, are as well-reasoned as any to be found in man's philosophy.

* "In the above translation an attempt is made to preserve something like a rhythmical flow. It adheres to the original language, excepting where an occasional word is but rarely inserted, for the sake of perspicuity."

Next, the "woman in Timnath," the wife of Samson, persuaded him to tell her his riddle or enigma, then considered a remarkable proof of genius to make. His wisdom was weakness weighed with her attractions. But his great physical strength remained a secret still. It was the especial gift of God, confided to him that he might become the deliverer of his nation. Yet this endowment was rendered of little real avail, because he devoted it to unworthy purposes, either to gratify his sensual passions or to escape the snares into which these had led him. The last trial of his strength, mental and bodily, against the subtlety of the woman's spirit, proved her superior power. Delilah conquered Samson, and in the means she employed she was far less culpable than he; because she was his paramour, perhaps his victim, and he the heaven-gifted champion of Israel. Read the history as recorded in the Bible, not in Milton's "Samson Agonistes," where the whole is set in a false light. Delilah was not the wife of Samson. She owed him no obedience, no faith. But his strength was consecrated to God—he was the traitor, when he disclosed the secret. See Judges, from chapters xiii. to xvii. These events occurred B. C. 1120.

DIDO, or ELISSA,

A DAUGHTER of Belus, king of Tyre, who married Sichæus of Sicharbas, her uncle, priest of Hercules. Her brother, Pygmalion, who succeeded Belus, murdered Sichæus, to get possession of his immense riches; and Dido, disconsolate for the loss of her husband, whom she tenderly loved, and dreading lest she should also fall a victim to her brother's avarice, set sail, with a number of Tyrians, to whom Pygmalion had become odious from his tyranny, for a new settlement. According to some historians, she threw into the sea the riches of her husband, and by that artifice compelled the ships to fly with her, that had come by the order of the tyrant to obtain possession of her wealth. But it is more probable that she carried her riches with her, and by this influence prevailed on the Tyrian sailors to accompany her. During her voyage Dido stopped at Cyprus, from which she carried away fifty young women, and gave them as wives to her followers. A storm drove her fleet on the African coast, where she bought of the inhabitants as much land as could be surrounded by a bull's hide cut into thongs. Upon this land she built a citadel, called Byrsa; and the increase of population soon obliged her to enlarge her city and dominions.

Her beauty, as well as the fame of her enterprise, gained her many admirers; and her subjects wished to compel her to marry Jarbas, king of Mauritania, who threatened them with a dreadful war. Dido asked for three months before she gave a decisive answer; and during that time she erected a funeral pile, as if wishing by a solemn sacrifice to appease the manes of Sichæus, to whom she had vowed eternal fidelity. When all was prepared, she stabbed herself on the pile in presence of her people; and by this uncommon action obtained the name of Dido, or "the valiant woman," instead of Elissa. Virgil and others represent her as visited by Æneas, after whose departure she destroyed herself from disappointed love; but this is a poetical fiction, as Æneas and Dido did not live in the same age. After her death, Dido was honoured as a deity by her subjects. She flourished about B. C. 980.

DINAH,

THE only daughter of the patriarch Jacob. Her seduction by prince Shechem; his honourable proposal of repairing the injury by marriage, and the prevention of the fulfilment of this just intention by the treachery and barbarity of her bloody brethren Simeon and Levi, are recorded in Gen. xxxiv. But every character in the Bible has its mission as an example or a warning, and Dinah's should be the beacon to warn the young of her sex against levity of manners and eagerness for society. "She went out to see the daughters of the land;" the result of her visit was her own ruin, and involving two of her brothers in such deeds of revenge as brought a curse upon them and their posterity. And thus the idle curiosity or weak vanity of those women who are always seeking excitement and amusement, may end most fatally for themselves and those nearest connected and best beloved. Dinah lived B. C. 1732.

DIOTIMA,

ONE of the learned women who taught Socrates, as he himself declared, the "divine philosophy." She was supposed to have been inspired with the spirit of prophecy; and Socrates learned of her how from corporeal beauty to find out that of the soul, of the angelical mind, and of God. She lived in Greece, about B. C. 468.

E.

EGEE,

QUEEN of the African Amazons, of whom it is related, that she passed from Lybia into Asia, with a powerful army, with which she made great ravages. Opposed by Laomedon, king of Troy, she set his power at defiance; and, charged with an immense booty, retook the way to her own country. In repassing the sea, she perished with her whole army.

ELECTRA,

DAUGHTER of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, was the sister of Iphigenia and Orestes. Her step-father Ægisthus would not allow her to marry any of her suitors who were princes, lest her children should avenge the murder of Agamemnon; but he married her to a man of humble rank in Argos, who left her a virgin. At the time of her father's death she saved her brother Orestes, and afterwards instigated him to murder Ægisthus and Clytemnestra. When Orestes was tortured by the furies on account of these murders, Electra was informed by the oracle of Delphi that he was slain by a priestess of Diana; this so excited her that she was about to kill Iphigenia, who had just entered the temple as a priestess of Diana, with a firebrand, when Orestes appeared. Electra afterwards married Pylades, the friend of Orestes.

ERINNA,

A GRECIAN lady cotemporary with Sappho: composed several poems, of which some fragments are extant in the "Carmina Novem Poetarum Seminarum," published in Antwerp, in 1568. She lived about B. C. 595. One of her poems, called "The Distaff," consisted of three hundred hexameter lines. It was thought that her verses rivalled Homer's. She died at the age of nineteen, unmarried.

There is another poetess of the same name mentioned by Eusebius, who flourished in the year B. C. 354. This appears to have been the poetess mentioned by Pliny as having celebrated Myro in her poems.

ESTHER,

A JEWISH maiden, whose great beauty raised her to the throne of Persia, whereby she saved her countrymen from total extermination. Esther was an orphan, brought up by her cousin Mordecai, who was of the tribe of Benjamin, the great-grandson of Kish, one of the captives taken from Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Mordecai was probably born in Babylon; but he was a devout worshipper of the God of Israel. He had adopted Esther as his own daughter;—and when after king Ahasuerus had repudiated his first queen Vashti, and chosen the "fair and beautiful" Jewish maid, then her uncle, who had strictly enjoined her not to let it be made known to the king that she was a Jewess, left Babylon for Susa, where he often waited at the gate to see his niece and hear of her welfare.

About this time Ahasuerus passed an ordinance, importing, that none of his household, under penalty of death, should come into his presence while he was engaged in the administration of justice. If, however, he extended the golden sceptre towards the intruder, the penalty was to be remitted. Not long after, two of the chamberlains of the king conspired against him; the plot was disclosed to Mordecai, and, through the medium of Esther, the king was apprised of his danger. Mordecai received no reward for this service, except having the transaction entered in the records of the state, and being allowed the privilege of admission to the palace.

Haman, an Amalekite, now became the chief favourite of king Ahasuerus;—Mordecai, probably proud of his Jewish blood, and despising the base parasite, refused to bow down to him in the gate, as did all the king's servants. This affront, so offensive to Haman's pride, determined him not only to destroy Mordecai, but all the captive Jews throughout the wide dominions of king Ahasuerus.

The favourite made such representations to the king concerning the Jews, that a proclamation for their entire destruction was promulgated.

The result is known to all who have read the "Book of Esther;"—how this pious and beautiful woman, trusting in heaven and earnestly employing her own influence, succeeded in defeating the malice of the Amalekite; "Haman was hanged on the gallows he had prepared for Mordecai." The relationship of Esther and Mordecai was made known to the king, who gave Haman's office to the noble Jew, and from that time took him into his confidential service and promoted him to the highest honours. Between the king and his lovely wife the most perfect confidence was restored. Indeed from what is said by the prophet Nehemiah, who wrote some ten or twelve years later, and who represented the queen as sitting beside the king when petition was made concerning the Jews, we must infer she was ever after his counsellor and good angel.

The learned are not agreed who this Ahasuerus was; Josephus asserts, that he is the same as the Artaxerxes Longimanus of profane history; and the Septuagint, throughout the whole book of Esther, translates Ahasuerus by Artaxerxes. Indeed the great kindness shown by Artaxerxes to the Jews, can hardly be accounted for, except on the supposition that they had so powerful an advocate as Esther to intercede for them. Some writers, however, assert that he is the same as Darius Hystaspes, king of Persia, B. C. 521, who allowed the Jews to resume the building of their temple. But whoever the Ahasuerus of this history might be, its interest centres in Esther. In her example the influence of woman's pious patriotism is exhibited and rewarded. Esther was deeply indebted to Mordecai for his care and zeal in her education; still, had she not possessed, and exercised too, the highest powers of woman's mind—faith in God, and love, self-sacrificing love for her people—the Jews must have perished. This wonderful deliverance has, from that time to this—more than twenty-three centuries—been celebrated by the Jews, as a festival called "the days of Purim," or, more generally, "Esther's Feast." This great triumph occurred B. C. 509.

EURYDICE,

AN Illyrian lady, is commended by Plutarch, for applying herself to study, though already advanced in years, and a native of a barbarous country, that she might be enabled to educate her children. She consecrated to the muses an inscription, in which this circumstance is mentioned.

EURYDICE,

WIFE of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, in the fifth century before Christ, was the mother of Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, father of Alexander the Great, and of one daughter, Euryone. From a criminal love she had for her daughter's husband, she conspired against Amyntas; but he discovered the plot, through one of his daughters by a former wife, and forgave her. On the death of Amyntas, Alexander ascended the throne, but he perished through the ambition of his mother, as well as his brother and successor, Perdiccas. Philip, who succeeded them, preserved his crown from all her attempts, on which she fled to Iphicrates, the Athenian general. What became of her afterwards, is not known.

EURYDICE,

WIFE of Aridæus, the natural son of Philip, king of Macedonia, who, after the death of Alexander the Great, was made king for a short time. Aridæus had not full possession of his senses, and was governed entirely by his wife. After a reign of seven years, Aridæus and Eurydice were put to death, B. C. 319, by Olympias, mother of Alexander the Great, who had conquered them.

EVE,

THE crowning work of creation, the first woman, the mother of our race. Her history, in the sacred Book, is told in few words; but the mighty consequences of her life will be felt through time, and through eternity. We shall endeavour to give what we consider a just idea of her character and the influence her destiny exercises over her sex and race.

The Bible records that "the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." Yet he was not perfect then, because God said, "It is not good for man to be alone." Would a perfect being have needed a helper? So God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam; and while he slept God took one of the ribs of the man; "And the rib which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man. And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man." It was this twain in unity, to which allusion is made in the 1st chap. of Genesis, 27th and 28th verses. The creation is there represented as finished, and the "image of God was male and female;" that is, comprising the moral excellences of man and woman; thus united, they formed the perfect being called Adam.

It is only when we analyze the record of the particular process of creation, and the history of the fall, and its punishment, that we can learn what were the peculiar characteristics of man and woman as each came from the hand of God. Thus guided, the man seems to have represented strength, the woman beauty; he reason, she feeling; he knowledge, she wisdom; he the material or earthly, she the spiritual or heavenly in human nature.

That woman was superior to man in some way is proven, first, by the care and preparation in forming her; and secondly, by analogy. Every step in the creation had been in the ascending scale. Was the last retrograde? It must have been, unless the woman's nature was more refined, pure, spiritual, a nearer assimilation with the angelic, a link in the chain connecting earth with heaven, more elevated than the nature of man. Adam was endowed with the perfection of physical strength, which his wife had not. He did not require her help in subduing the earth. He also had the large understanding which could grasp and comprehend all subjects relating to this world—and was equal to its government. “He gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field;” and that these names were significant of the nature of all the animals, thus subordinated to him, there can be no doubt. Still, the sacred narrative goes on—“But for Adam there was not found any help meet for him;” that is, a created being who could comprehend him and help him where he was deficient,—in his spiritual nature. For this help woman was formed,—and while the twain were one, Adam was perfect. It was not till this holy union was dissolved by sin that the distinctive natures of the masculine and the feminine were exhibited.

Let us examine this exhibition. Adam and his wife were placed in the garden of Eden, where grew the “tree of the knowledge of good and evil,” the fruit of which they were forbidden to eat on pain of death. The woman, being deceived by the serpent, or spirit of evil, into the belief that the penalty would not be inflicted, and that the fruit would confer on them, the human pair, a higher degree of spiritual knowledge than they then possessed—“Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil,” was the promise of the subtle tempter—“she took of the fruit, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her, and he did eat.” Such is the precise account of the fall. Commentators have imputed weakness of mind to the woman, because the tempter assailed her. But does it not rather show she was the spiritual leader, the most difficult to be won, and the serpent knew if he could gain her the result was sure? Remember that her husband was “with her”—the serpent addressed them both—“Ye shall be as gods,” &c. Now, is it not reasonable to suppose that the nature (the human pair was then one,) best qualified to judge of these high subjects, would respond? The decision was, apparently, left to her. The woman led; the man followed. Which showed the greatest spiritual power, the controlling energy of mind? In the act of disobedience the conduct of the woman displayed her superior nature. The arguments used by the tempter were addressed to the higher faculties of mind as her predominant feelings, namely, the desire for knowledge and wisdom. With her these arguments prevailed; while man, according to his own showing, had no higher motives than gratifying his sensuous inclinations; he ate, because his wife gave him the fruit. Precisely such conduct as we might expect from a lower nature towards a higher; compliance without reason or from inferior considerations.

We next come to the trial of the guilty pair, and their sentence from the mouth of their Maker. Every word confirms the truth of the position, that woman’s moral sense was of a higher standard than man’s. She was first sentenced. Meekly and truly had she confessed her fault; the unerring sign of a noble spirit betrayed into sin when striving for glory. Her temporal punishment implied deep affections and acute sensibilities, requiring endowments of a spiritual and intellectual character. She was to suffer “sorrow” for her children, and be subjected to the rule of her husband, to whom her desire “shall be;” that is, her hopes of escaping from the ignorance and inferiority to which he would consign her, must be centred on winning, by her love, gentleness and submission, his heart; and through the influence of her purer mind, infused into their children, finally spiritualize his harder and more earthly nature. Her doom was sad, but not degrading; for though like an angel with wings bound, she was to minister to her husband, yet a promise of wondrous blessings for her seed preceded her sentence. Not so with Adam. He had shown at every step that his mind was of a different stamp. He had disobeyed God from a lower motive; and when arraigned, instead of humility, he showed fear and selfishness. He sought to excuse himself by throwing the blame on his wife. True, he was not deceived. His worldly wisdom had not been dazzled by the idea of gaining heavenly wisdom, which he probably did not covet or estimate as she did. His sentence was in accordance with his character, addressed to the material rather than the spiritual in human nature. Like a felon he was condemned to hard labour for life, on the ground cursed for his sake. And he was further degraded by reference to his origin—“from the dust;” and consigned to death and the grave! Not a ray of hope was given the man, save through the promise made to the woman!

Does it not mark her purer spiritual nature that, even after the fall, when she was placed under her husband’s control, she still held his immortal destiny, so to speak, in her keeping? To her what a gracious promise of future glory was given! Her seed was to triumph over the tempter which had deceived her. She was not only to be delivered from the power of the curse, but from her was to come the deliverer of her earthly ruler, man.

After the sentence was promulgated, we find instant acknowledgement that the mysterious union, which had made this first man and woman one being in Adam, was altered. There was no longer the unity of soul; there could not be where the wife had been subjected to the husband. And then it was that Adam gave to woman her specific name—Eve, or the Mother.

Thus was motherhood predicated as the true field of woman’s mission, where her spiritual nature might be developed, and her intellectual agency could bear sway; where her moral sense might be effective in the progress of mankind, and her mental triumphs would be won. Eve at once comprehended this, and expressed its truth in the sentiment, uttered on the birth of her first-born, “I have gotten a man from the Lord.” When her hopes for Cain were destroyed by the fratricidal tragedy, she, woman-like, still clung to the spiritual promise, transferring it to Seth. The time of her death is not recorded.

According to Blair’s chronology, Adam and Eve were created on Friday, October 28th, 4004 B. C.

F.

FLORA,

A FAMOUS courtesan of Rome, who loved Pompey so devotedly, that though at his entreaties she consented to receive another lover, yet when Pompey took that opportunity to discontinue his visits entirely, she fell into such despair as showed she had the true woman's heart, although so polluted by her degradation that its holiest feelings were made to become her severest tortures. Flora was so beautiful that Cecilius Metellus had her picture drawn and kept in the temple of Castor and Pollux.

FULVIA,

AN extraordinary Roman lady, wife of Marc Antony, had, as Paterculus expresses it, nothing of her sex but the body; for her temper and courage breathed only policy and war. She had two husbands before she married Antony — Clodius, the great enemy of Cicero, and Curio, who was killed while fighting in Africa, on Cæsar's side, before the battle of Pharsalia. After the victory, which Octavius and Antony gained at Philippi over Brutus and Cassius, Antony went to Asia to settle the affairs of the East. Octavius returned to Rome, where, falling out with Fulvia, he could not decide the quarrel but with the sword. She retired to Præneste, and withdrew thither the senators and knights of her party; she armed herself in person, gave the word to her soldiers, and harangued them bravely.

Bold and violent as Antony was, he met his match in Fulvia. "She was a woman," says Plutarch, "not born for spinning or housewifery, not one that would be content with ruling a private husband, but capable of advising a magistrate, or ruling the general of an army." Antony had the courage, however, to show great anger at Fulvia for levying war against Octavius; and when he returned to Rome, he treated her with so much contempt and indignation, that she went to Greece, and died there of a disease occasioned by her grief.

She participated with, and assisted her cruel husband, during the massacres of the triumvirate, and had several persons put to death, on her own authority, either from avarice or a spirit of revenge. After Cicero was beheaded, Fulvia caused his head to be brought to her, spit upon it, drawing out the tongue, which she pierced several times with her bodkin, addressing to the lifeless Cicero, all the time, the most opprobrious language. What a contrast to the character of Octavia, the last wife of Marc Antony!

G.

GLAPHYRA,

A PRIESTESS of Bellona's temple in Cappadocia, and a daughter of Archelaus, the high-priest of Bellona, is celebrated for her beauty and intrigue. Although she was married and had two sons, Sisinna and Archelaus, yet she fell in love with Marc Antony, and he gave her the kingdom of Cappadocia for her children. This infidelity of Antony so displeased his wife Fulvia, that she resolved to revenge herself by taking the same course.

Glaphyra had a granddaughter of the same name, who was a daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and married Alexander, son of Herod and Mariamne, by whom she had two sons. After the death of Alexander she married her brother-in-law Archelaus.

H.

HAGAR,

AN Egyptian woman, the handmaid of Sarai, whom she gave to her husband Abram as a concubine or left-handed wife. Such arrangements were not uncommon in those old times. When the honoured wife was childless, she would give her favourite slave or maid-servant to her husband, and the children born of this connection were considered as belonging to the real wife.

It had been promised Abram that his seed should become a great nation; but his wife Sarai had borne him no children. She was nearly eighty years of age; her husband ten years older. Despairing of becoming herself the mother of the promised seed, she would not stand in the way of God's blessing to her husband — so she gave him Hagar. It was, like all plans of human device that controvert the laws of God, very unfortunate for the happiness of the parties. Hagar was soon uplifted by this preference; and believing herself the mother of the promised heir, she despised her mistress; was rebuked, and fled into the wilderness. There the angel of the Lord met her, and commanded her to return to Sarai, and be submissive. Hagar seems to have obeyed the divine command at once; and all was, for a time, well. Ishmael was born, and for twelve years was the only child, the presumptive heir of one of the richest princes of the East. But at the birth of Isaac, the true heir, all Hagar's glory vanished. The bondwoman and her son were finally sent forth from the tents of the patriarch, with "bread and a bottle of water." Hagar carried these on her shoulder, a poor, outcast mother, the victim of circumstances and events she could not change or control. But God hears the cry of affliction, and all who turn to Him in their hearts will be comforted. Thus was Hagar relieved; God "opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water," when Ishmael was dying of thirst. "She went and filled the bottle with water, and gave the lad drink." Mother-like, she never thought of herself, of her own sorrows and wants. She devoted herself to her son, who became the "father of twelve princes," the progenitor of the Arabs, who, to this day, keep possession of the wilderness where Hagar wandered with her son Ishmael. Poetry and painting have made this scene of her life memorable. It happened B. C 1898.

HANNAH,

WAS wife of Elkanah, a Levite, and an inhabitant of Ramah. Her history, as given in scripture, is very brief, but full of interest and instruction. Elkanah had another wife, as was not uncommon among the Israelites, a practice their law tolerated though it never approved. Hannah was the beloved wife, but she had no children; and her rival, who had, taunted her with this sterility. The picture of this family gives a vivid idea of the domestic discord caused by polygamy.

Hannah was fervent in faith towards God, and when she went up to the temple to worship, prayed earnestly for a son, and "wept sore." Eli the priest thought she was drunken; but on her explanation, blessed her, and she believed. The prayer of Hannah was granted; she bore a son, and named him Samuel—that is, "asked of God." She had vowed, if a son were given her to "lend him unto the Lord," or dedicate him to the service of the temple. Her tenderness as a mother is only exceeded by her faith towards God. She nursed her son most carefully, but he is nursed for God. Her zeal and piety appear to have been transfused into his nature; from his birth he was "in favour with the Lord, and also with men." No wonder he was chosen to be among the most illustrious of God's people. The last of her judges; the first of a long line of prophets; eminent as well for wisdom in the cabinet as for valour in the field; uncorrupted and incorruptible in the midst of temptations; Samuel's name stands distinguished not only in the annals of Israel, but in the history of all our race. Grotius has compared him to Aristides, others to Alcibiades, and all have celebrated his lofty and patriotic character. And these great qualities, these wonderful powers, directed to good purposes, were but the appropriate sequel to his mother's fervent prayers and faithful training; and God's blessing, which will follow those who earnestly seek it.

HECUBA,

SECOND wife of Priam, king of Troy, and mother of Hector and Paris, was, according to Homer, the daughter of Dymas; but according to Virgil, of Cisseis, king of Thrace, and sister of Theais, priestess of Apollo at Troy during the war. After the capture of Troy, B. C. 1184, she attempted to revenge the death of her son Polydorus, and was stoned to death by the Greeks. Some say that she became a slave to Ulysses, and that he left her in the hands of her enemies, who caused her to be stoned. It is probable, however, that Ulysses himself was the cause of her death; as it is recorded, that upon his arrival in Sicily, he was so tormented with dreams, that in order to appease the gods, he built a temple to Hecate, who presided over dreams, and a chapel to Hecuba. Euripides, in his tragedy of "Hecuba," has immortalized this unfortunate mother and queen.

HELEN,

THE most beautiful woman of her age, was the daughter of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, and Leda, his wife. When very young she was carried off by Theseus, king of Athens, a celebrated hero of antiquity, by whom she had a daughter. Notwithstanding this her hand was eagerly sought, and she numbered among her suitors all the most illustrious and distinguished princes of Greece. The number of her admirers alarmed Tyndarus, who feared for the safety of his kingdom; but the wise Ulysses, withdrawing his pretensions to Helen, in favour of Penelope, niece of Tyndarus, advised him to bind by a solemn oath all the suitors, to approve of the uninfluenced choice which Helen should make, and to unite to defend her, if she should be forced from her husband. This advice was followed, and Helen chose Menelaus, king of Sparta. For three years they lived very happily, and had one daughter, Hermione. Paris, son of Priam, king of Troy, visiting Menelaus, saw Helen, and persuaded her, during her husband's absence at Crete, to fly with him to Troy.

All the former suitors of Helen, bound by their oath, took up arms to assist Menelaus in recovering her. They succeeded in taking Troy, B. C. 1184, when Helen regained the favour of her husband and returned with him to Sparta. After the death of Menelaus, Helen fled to Rhodes. Polyxo, queen of Rhodes, detained her; and to punish her for being the cause of a war in which Polyxo's husband had perished, had her hung on a tree. Euripides has made Helen the subject of a tragedy.

HERO,

A PRIESTESS of Venus at Sestos, on the coast of Thrace. She saw Leander, a youth of Abydos, at a festival in honour of Venus and Adonis at Sestos, and they became in love with each other. The sacred office of Hero, and the opposition of her relatives, prevented their marriage; but every night Leander swam across the Hellespont, guided by a torch placed by Hero in her tower. At length he perished one night in the attempt, and Hero, while waiting for him, saw his lifeless body thrown by the waves at the foot of her tower. In her desperation, she sprang from the tower on the corpse of Leander, and was killed by the fall.

HERSILIA,

WIFE of Romulus, the founder of Rome, B. C. 753, was deified after her death, and worshipped under the names of Horta or Orta.

HIPPARCHIA,

A CELEBRATED lady at Maronea, in Thrace, who lived about B. C. 328. She was at one time mistress to Alexander the Great; but her attachment to learning and philosophy was so great, that having attended the lectures of Crates, the cynic, she fell in love with him, and resolved to marry him, though he was old, ugly, and deformed; and though she was addressed by many handsome young men, distinguished by their rank and riches. Crates himself was prevailed upon by her friends to try to dissuade her from her singular choice, which he did, by displaying to her his poverty, his cloak of sheep's skins, and his crooked back; but all in vain. At last, he told her that she could not be his wife, unless she resolved to live as he did. This she cheerfully agreed to, assumed the habit of taç order, and accompanied him everywhere to public entertainments and other places, which was not customary with the Grecian women. She wrote several tragedies, philosophical hypotheses, and reasonings and questions proposed to Theodorus, the atheist; but none of her writings are extant. She had two daughters by Crates.

HIPPODAMIA

Was the daughter of Cœnomaus, king of Pisa, in Elis. An oracle had predicted to the king that he would be murdered by his son-in-law; and therefore he declared that all the suitors of his daughter should contend with him in a chariot-race, and that if he defeated them, he should be allowed to put them to death. In this way he slew thirteen or seventeen suitors, when Pelops, by bribing the driver of the king's chariot, had him overturned in the middle of the course, and he lost his life. Hippodamia married Pelops, and became the mother of Atreus and Thyestes. She killed herself from grief, at being accused of having caused these sons to commit fratricide.

HORTENSIA,

A ROMAN lady, daughter of Hortensius, the orator, was born B. C. 85. She inherited her father's eloquence, as a speech preserved by Apian demonstrates; which, for elegance of language, and justness of thought, would do honour to Cicero or Demosthenes.

The triumvirs of Rome, in want of a large sum of money for carrying on a war, drew up a list of fourteen hundred of the wealthiest women, intending to tax them. The women, after having in vain tried every means to evade so great an innovation, at last chose Hortensia for a speaker, and went with her to the market-place, where she addressed the triumvirs, while they were administering justice, in the following words:

"The unhappy women you see here, imploring your justice and bounty, would never have presumed to appear in this place, had they not first made use of all other means their natural modesty could suggest. Though our appearing here may seem contrary to the rules prescribed to our sex, which we have hitherto strictly observed, yet the loss of our fathers, children, brothers, and husbands, may sufficiently excuse us, especially when their unhappy deaths are made a pretence for our further misfortunes. You plead that they had offended and provoked you; but what injury have we women done, that we must be impoverished? If we are blameable as the men, why not proscribe us also? Have we declared you enemies to your country? Have we suborned your soldiers, raised troops against you, or opposed you in pursuit of those honours and offices which you claim? We pretend not to govern the republic, nor is it our ambition which has drawn our present misfortune on our heads; empires, dignities and honours, are not for us; why should we, then, contribute to a war in which we have no manner of interest? It is true, indeed, that in the Carthaginian war our mothers assisted the republic, which was at that time reduced to the utmost distress; but neither their houses, their lands, nor their moveables, were sold for this service; some rings, and a few jewels, furnished the supply. Nor was it constraint or violence that forced those from them; what they contributed, was the voluntary offering of generosity. What danger at present threatens Rome? If the Gauls or Parthians were encamped on the banks of the Tiber or the Arno, you should find us not less zealous in the defence of our country, than our mothers were before us; but it becomes not us, and we are resolved that we will not be in any way concerned in a civil war. Neither Marius, nor Cæsar, nor Pompey, ever thought of obliging us to take part in the domestic troubles which their ambition had raised; nay, nor did ever Sylla himself, who first set up tyranny in Rome; and yet you assume the glorious title of reformers of the state, a title which will turn to your eternal infamy, if, without the least regard to the laws of equity, you persist in your wicked resolution of plundering those of their lives and fortunes, who have given you no just cause of offence."

Struck with the justness of her speech, yet offended at its boldness, the triumvirs ordered the women to be driven away; but the populace growing tumultuous in their favour, they were afraid of an insurrection, and reduced the list of those who should be taxed to four hundred.

HULDAH,

A JEWISH prophetess, in the time of king Josiah. Her husband was Shallum, keeper of the royal wardrobe, an office of high honour. We have but a glimpse of Huldah, just sufficient to show, that when the Jewish nation was given up to idolatry and ignorance of the Good, still the lamp of divine truth was kept burning in the heart of a woman.

When Josiah, who was one of the few good kings who ruled over Judah, came to the throne, he found the Holy Temple partly given up to idolatrous rites, partly falling into ruins. In repairing the temple, the copy of the Book of the Law was found among the rubbish, and carried to Josiah. The king and his counsellors seem to have been ignorant of this book; and the king was struck with consternation, when he heard the law read, and felt how it had been violated. He immediately sent three of his chief officers, one of whom was Hilkiah, the high priest, to "enquire of the Lord concerning the words of the book." The officers went to "Huldah, the prophetess, (now she dwelt in Jerusalem, in the college,) and communed with her."

Would the high priest have gone to consult a woman, had not her repute for wisdom and piety been well known; and considered superior to what was possessed by any man in Jerusalem? Her place of residence was in "the college," among the most learned of the land; and, as a prophetess or priestess, her response shows her to have been worthy of the high office she held. How bold was her rebuke of sin,—how clear her prophetic insight,—how true her predictions! The language and the style of her reply to the king of Judah, make it as grand and impressive as any of the prophecies from the lips of inspired men. The history may be found in II. Kings, chapter xxii. Huldah lived about B. C. 624.

I.

IPHIGENIA

WAS daughter of Agamemnon, leader of the Greek forces against Troy, and of Clytemnestra, his wife. When the Greeks, going to the Trojan war, were detained at Aulis by adverse winds, they were told, by an oracle, that Iphigenia must be sacrificed to appease Diana, who was incensed against Agamemnon for killing one of her stags. The father was horror-struck, and commanded his herald to disband the forces. The other generals interfered, and Agamemnon at last consented to the sacrifice. As Iphigenia was tenderly loved by her mother, the Greeks sent for her on pretence of giving her in marriage to Achilles. When Iphigenia came to Aulis, and saw the preparations for the sacrifice, she implored the protection of her father, but in vain. Calchas, the Grecian priest, took the knife, and was about to strike the fatal blow, when Diana relented, caught away Iphigenia, who suddenly disappeared, and a goat of uncommon size and beauty was found in her place. This supernatural change animated the Greeks; the wind suddenly became favourable, and the combined fleet set sail from Aulis. Calchas, the Grecian priest, seems to have acted with the same humane policy in this affair that the bishop of Beauvois did in the case of Joan of Arc. This story of Iphigenia has furnished materials for several tragedies; those of Euripides are world-renowned.

J.

JAEI, or JAHEL,

WIFE of Heber the Kenite, killed Sisera, general of the Canaanitish army, who had fled to her tent, and while sleeping there, Jael drove a large nail through his temple. Her story is related in the fourth chapter of Judges, B. C. 1285.

JEMIMA, KEZIA, KERENHAPPUCH:

THESE three were the daughters of Job, born to him after he was restored to the favour of God and man.

We give their names, not for any thing they did, but for the sentiment taught in this sacred history concerning family relations and female claims. We are instructed, by the particularity with which these daughters are named, that they were considered the crowning blessing God bestowed on his servant Job. And Job showed his integrity as a man, and his wisdom as a father, in providing justly for these his fair daughters. He “gave them inheritance among their brethren;” that is, secured to them an equal share of his property, and left them free to enjoy it as they chose.

JEZEBEL,

DAUGHTER of Ethbaal, king of Tyre and Sidon, was the wife of Ahab, king of Israel. She seduced him into the worship of Baal, and persecuted the prophets of the Lord. Enraged at the death of the prophets of Baal, slain by the command of Elisha, she resolved on his destruction; but he escaped her vengeance. Ahab, being very desirous of obtaining a vineyard belonging to Naboth the Jezreelite, which was close by the palace of the king, offered the owner a better one in its stead; but Naboth refused to give up the inheritance which had descended to him from his fathers. In consequence of this disappointment, Ahab came into his house sad and dispirited; Jezebel, discovering the reason of his depression, procured the death of Naboth, and Ahab took possession of the vineyard. In consequence of this act of wickedness, Elijah foretold the sudden and violent death both of Ahab and Jezebel, which occurred three years after. The story of this “wicked woman” shows the power of female influence, and how pernicious it may be when exerted for evil over the mind of man. Happily for the world, there have been few Jezebels, and therefore the wickedness of this one appears so awful that it has made her name to be forever abhorred. She died B. C. 884.

JOCASTA,

DAUGHTER of Creon, king of Thebes, and wife of Laius, was mother to Œdipus, whom she afterwards ignorantly married, and had by him Polyneices and Eteocles, who having killed one another in a battle for the succession, Jocasta destroyed herself in grief. She flourished about B. C. 1266. Her son Œdipus had been given by Laius, his father, to a shepherd to destroy, as an oracle had foretold that he should be killed by his own son. But the shepherd, not liking to kill the child, left him to perish by hunger; and he was found by Phorbis, shepherd to Polybus, king of Corinth, who brought him up, and Œdipus unwittingly fulfilled the oracle. Sophocles has written a tragedy founded on this story.

JOCEBED,

WIFE of Amram, and mother of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses, has stamped her memory indelibly on the heart of Jew and Christian. She was granddaughter of Levi; her husband was also of the same family or tribe; their exact relationship is not decided, though the probability is that they were cousins-german.

As Amram is only mentioned incidentally, we have no authority for concluding he took any part in the great crisis of Jochebed's life; but as their children were all distinguished for talents and piety, it is reasonable to conclude that this married pair were congenial in mind and heart. Still, though both were pious believers in the promises made by God to their forefathers, it was only the wife who had the opportunity of manifesting by her deeds her superior wisdom and faith.

Nearly three hundred years had gone by since Jacob and his sons went down into Egypt. Their posterity was now a numerous people, but held in the most abject bondage. Pharaoh, a king "who knew not Joseph," endeavouring to extirpate the hated race, had given strict commands to destroy every male child born of a Hebrew mother.

Jochebed had borne two children before this bloody edict was promulgated; Miriam, a daughter of thirteen, and Aaron, a little son of three years old. These were safe; but now God gives her another son, "a goodly child;" and the mother's heart must have nearly fainted with grief and terror, as she looked on her helpless babe, and knew he was doomed by the cruel Pharaoh to be cast forth to the monsters of the Nile. No ray of hope from the help of man was visible. The Hebrew men had been bowed beneath the lash of their oppressors, till their souls had become abject as their toils. Jochebed could have no aid from her husband's superior physical strength and worldly knowledge. The man was overborne; the superior spiritual insight of the woman was now to lead; her mother's soul had been gifted with a strength the power of Pharaoh could not subdue; her moral sense had a sagacity that the reason of man could never have reached. Thus, in the history of the human race, woman has ever led the forlorn hope of the world's moral progress. Jochebed was then such a leader. She must have had faith in God's promise of deliverance for her people; every man-child brought a new ray of hope, as the chosen deliverer. She had a "goodly son"—he should not die. So "she hid him three months." Language can never express the agony which must have wrung the mother's heart during those months, when each dawning day might bring the death-doom of her nursling son. At length, she can hide him no longer. Another resource must be tried. She must trust him to God's providence; God could move the compassion even of the Egyptian heart. But the mother has her work to perform; all that she can do, she must do. So she gathers her materials, and as she sits weaving an "ark of bulrushes, and daubing it with slime," her slight fingers trembling with the unwonted task, who that saw her could have dreamed she was building a structure of more importance to mankind than all the pyramids of Egypt? That in this mother's heart there was a divine strength with which all the power of Pharaoh would strive in vain to cope? That on the events depending upon her work rested the memory of this very Pharaoh, and not on the monuments he was rearing at Raameses?

She finished her "ark of bulrushes," and in the frail structure laid down her infant son. Then concealing the basket among the flags on the banks of the Nile, she placed her daughter Miriam to watch what should become of the babe, while she, no doubt, retired to weep and pray. The whole plan was in perfect accordance with the peculiar nature of woman—and women only were the actors in this drama of life and life's holiest hopes. That the preservation of Moses, and his preparation for his great mission as the Deliverer of Israel, and the Lawgiver for all men who worship Jehovah, were effected by the agency of woman, displays her spiritual gifts in such a clear light as must make them strikingly apparent; and that their importance in the progress of mankind, will be frankly acknowledged by all Christian men, seems certain—whenever they will, laying aside their masculine prejudices, carefully study the word of God. These events occurred B. C. 1535. See Exodus, chap. I. and II.

JUDITH,

OF the tribe of Reuben, daughter of Meravi, and widow of Manasseh, lived in Bethulia, when it was besieged by Holofernes. She was beautiful and wealthy, and lived very much secluded. Being informed that the chief of Bethulia had promised to deliver it in five days, she sent for the elders and remonstrated with them, and declared her intention of leaving the city for a short time. Judith then prayed, dressed herself in her best attire, and pretending to have fled from the city, went, with her maid, to the camp of Holofernes. He was immediately captivated by her, and promised her his protection. Judith continued with Holofernes, going out of his camp every night; but the fourth night Holofernes sent for her to stay with him. She went gorgeously apparelled; eating and drinking not with Holofernes, but only what her maid prepared for her. Holofernes, transported with joy at sight of her, drank immoderately, and fell into a sound sleep. Evening being come, the servants departed, leaving Judith and her maid alone with him. Judith ordered the maid to stand without and watch, and putting up a prayer to God, she took Holofernes' sabre, and seized him by his hair, saying, "Strengthen me this day, O Lord!" Then she struck him twice on the neck, and cut off his head, which she told her maid to put in a bag—then wrapping the body in the curtains of the bed, they went, as usual, out of the camp, and returned to Bethulia, where the head of Holofernes being displayed on the gates of the city, struck his army with dismay, and they were entirely defeated. The high-priest Joachim came from Jerusalem to Bethulia to compliment Judith. Everything that had belonged to Holofernes was given to her, and she consecrated his arms and the curtains of his bed to the Lord. Judith set her maid free, and died in Bethulia at the age of one hundred and five, was buried with her husband, and all the people lamented her seven days.

The "Song of Judith," as recorded in the Apocrypha, is a poem of much power and beauty.

JULIA,

DAUGHTER of Julius Cæsar and Cornelia, was one of the most attractive and most virtuous of the Roman ladies. She was first married to Cornelius Cæpion, but divorced from him to become the wife of Pompey. Pompey was so fond of her as to neglect, on her account, politics and arms. She died B. C. 53. Had she lived, there would not have been war between Cæsar and Pompey.

JULIA,

DAUGHTER of Augustus and Scribonia, was the wife successively of Metellus, Agrippa, and Tiberius. She was banished for her debaucheries by her father, and died of want in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 15. Her daughter, Julia, was equally licentious.

L.

LAIS,

A CELEBRATED courtesan, was supposed to be the daughter of the courtesan Timandra and Alcibiades. She was born at Hyrcania, in Sicily, and being carried into Greece by Nicias, the Athenian general, began her conquests by music. Almost all the celebrated courtesans of antiquity were originally musicians; and that art was considered almost a necessary female accomplishment.

Lais spent most of her life at Corinth, and from that is often called the Corinthian. Diogenes the cynic was one of her admirers, and also Aristippus, another celebrated philosopher. This woman sometimes ridiculed the fidelity of the philosophers she had captivated. "I do not understand what is meant by the austerity of philosophers," she said, "for with this fine name, they are as much in my power as the rest of the Athenians."

After having corrupted nearly all the youth of Corinth and Athens, she went into Thessaly, to see a lover of hers; where she is said to have been stoned by the women, jealous of her power over their husbands, B. C. 340, in the temple of Venus.

LAMIA,

THE most celebrated female flute-player of antiquity, was regarded as a prodigy—from her beauty, wit, and skill in her profession. The honours she received, which are recorded by several authors, particularly by Plutarch and Athenæus, are sufficient testimonies of her great power over the passions of her hearers. Her claim to admiration from her personal charms, does not entirely depend upon the fidelity of historians, since an exquisite engraving of her head, upon amethyst, is preserved in a collection at Paris, which authenticates the account of her beauty.

As she was a great traveller, her reputation soon became very extensive. Her first journey from Athens, the place of her birth, was into Egypt, whither she was drawn by the fame of a flute-player of that country. Her genius and beauty procured for her the notice of Ptolemy, and she became his mistress; but in the conflict between Ptolemy and Demetrius Poliorcetes, for the island of Cyprus, about B. C. 332, Ptolemy being defeated, his wives, domestics, and military stores fell into the hands of Demetrius.

The celebrated Lamia was among the captives on this occasion, and Demetrius, who was said to have conquered as many hearts as cities, conceived so ardent a passion for her, that from a sovereign he was transformed into a slave—though her beauty was in the decline, and Demetrius, the handsomest prince of his time, was much younger than herself.

At her instigation, he conferred such extraordinary benefits on the Athenians, that they rendered him divine honours; and, as an acknowledgment of the influence Lamia had exercised in their favour, they dedicated a temple to her, under the name of "Venus Damia."

LAODICE,

DAUGHTER of Priam, king of Troy, and of his wife Hecuba, who fell in love with Acamas, son of Theseus, who came to Troy to demand the restoration of Helen to Menelaus. She had a son, called Munitus, by him. She afterwards married Helicaon, son of Antenor and Telephus, king of Mysia. She is said to have thrown herself from the top of a tower, when Troy was taken by the Greeks.

LAODICE,

A SISTER of Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, flourished about B. C. 120. She first married Ariarthes VII., king of Cappadocia; but he being assassinated by order of Mithridates, she next married Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who had taken possession of Cappadocia. She was put to death by Mithridates, for plotting his assassination. Laodice was also the name of a queen of Cappadocia, who was put to death by the people for poisoning five of her children.

LAODICE,

A SISTER of Antiochus II., king of Syria, who also became his wife, and had two sons by him. She murdered Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy of Egypt, another wife of Antiochus, after having poisoned the king. She then suborned Artemon, who resembled Antiochus, to represent him. Artemon, accordingly, pretended to be indisposed, and, as king, called all the ministers, and recommended to them Seleucus, surnamed Callamachus, son of Laodice, as his successor. It was then reported that the king had died suddenly, and Laodice placed her son on the throne, B. C. 246. She was put to death by command of Ptolemy Euergetes of Egypt. The city of Laodicea received its name in honour of this queen. There are several other women of that name mentioned in ancient history.

One of these, the wife of a king of Pontus, was renowned for her beauty, and the magnificence of her court. But losing her only child, a daughter, by death, Laodice retired to her inner apartments, shut herself up, and was never seen afterwards, except by her nearest friends.

LEAH,

ELDEST daughter of Laban, the Syrian, who deceived Jacob into an intercourse, then termed marriage, with this unsought, unloved woman. She became mother of six sons, named as heads of six of the tribes of Israel. Among these was Levi, whose posterity inherited the priesthood, and Judah, the law-giver, from whom descended

"Shiloh," or the Messiah. These were great privileges; yet dearly did Leah pay the penalty of her high estate, obtained by selfish artifice, in which modesty, truth, and sisterly affection, were all violated. Jacob, her husband, "hated her," and she knew it; knew, too, his heart was wholly given to his other wife, her beautiful, virtuous sister; what earthly punishment could have been so intensely grievous to Leah? As her name implies, "tender-eyed," she was probably affectionate, but unprincipled and of a weak mind, or she would never have taken the place of her sister, whom she knew Jacob had served seven years to gain. Leah loved her husband devotedly; but though she was submissive and tender, and bore him many sons, a great claim on his favour, yet he never appeared to have felt for her either esteem or affection.

Jacob had sought to unite himself with Rachel in the holy union of one man with one woman, which only is true marriage; but the artifice of Laban, and the passion of Leah, desecrated this union, and by introducing polygamy into the family of the chosen Founder of the house of Israel, opened the way for the worst of evils to that nation, the voluptuousness and idolatry which finally destroyed it. A treacherous sister, a forward woman, an unloved wife, Leah has left a name unhonoured and unsung. She was married about B. C. 1753.

LEÆNA,

A COURTEZAN of Athens, took an active part in the conspiracy of Harmodius and Aristogiton, against Hipparchus, son of Pisistratus. She was arrested, and put to the torture by Hippias, the brother of Hipparchus, but she refused to betray her accomplices. However, fearful that her resolution would not endure against the torments she was suffering, she bit through her tongue, and spat it in the face of her tormentor. When the Athenians recovered their liberty, they erected to her honour the statue of a lion without a tongue. She lived about B. C. 505.

LEONTIUM,

AN Athenian courtesan, who lived about B. C. 350, became a convert to the philosophy of Epicurus. She married Metrodorus, one of the principal disciples of Epicurus, and had a son by him, whom Epicurus commended to the notice and regard of his executors. She wrote in defence of the Epicurean philosophy, against Theophrastus, one of the principal of the peripatetic sect. The book is said by Cicero to have been written in a polite and elegant style. From her love of letters, she was drawn by Theodorus, the painter, in a posture of meditation.

LIVIA,

DAUGHTER of Livius Drusus Calidianus, married Tiberius Claudius Nero, by whom she had two sons, Drusus and the emperor Tiberius. Her husband was attached to the cause of Antony; and as he fled from the danger with which he was threatened by Octavianus, afterwards the emperor Augustus, Livia was seen by Octavianus, who immediately resolved to marry her. He divorced his wife Scribonia, and, with the approbation of the augurs, married Livia. She enjoyed, from this moment, the entire confidence of Augustus, and gained a complete ascendancy over his mind by an implicit obedience to his will — by never expressing a desire to learn his secrets — and by seeming ignorant of his infidelities. Her children by Drusus she persuaded Augustus to adopt as his own; and after the death of Drusus the eldest son, Augustus appointed Tiberius his successor. The respect and love of Augustus for Livia ended only with his life. As he lay dying, he turned his gaze on her, drew her in the grasp of death towards him, and said — "Livia, be happy, and remember how we have loved."

Livia has been accused of having involved in one common ruin the heirs and nearest relations of Augustus, and also of poisoning her husband that her son might receive the kingdom sooner; but these accusations seem to be unfounded. By her husband's will she was instituted co-heiress with Tiberius, adopted as his daughter, and directed to assume the name of Livia Augusta. On the deification of Augustus, she became the priestess of the new god.

Tiberius, her son, and the successor to Augustus, treated her with great neglect and ingratitude, and allowed her no share in the government. She died A. D. 29; and Tiberius would not allow any public or private honours to be paid to her memory. Tacitus speaks of her as being strictly moral, but says she was "an imperious mother, a compliant wife, a match for her husband in art, and her son in dissimulation." But if she was "strictly moral," she must have been far worthier than her son or her husband.

LOCUSTA,

A NOTORIOUS woman at Rome, a favourite of Nero, the emperor. She poisoned Claudius and Britannicus, and at last attempted to destroy Nero himself, for which she was executed.

LUCRETIA.

THIS celebrated female was the daughter of Lucretius, and the wife of Collatinus, an officer of rank; who, at the siege of Ardes, in the course of conversation, unfortunately boasted of the virtues she possessed. Several other young men likewise expressed an entire confidence in the chastity and virtue of their wives. A wager was the consequence of this conversation; and it was agreed that Sextus, the son of Tarquin, should go to Rome, for the purpose of seeing how the different females were employed. Upon his arrival at the capital, he found all the other ladies occupied in paying visits, or receiving different guests; but, when he went to the house of Collatinus, Lucretia was bewailing the absence of her husband, and directing her household affairs. As Sextus was distantly related to Collatinus, and son of the monarch who reigned upon the throne, Lucretia entertained him with that elegance and hospitality due to a man of such elevated rank. If the person of this charming woman excited brutal passions in his bosom, her conversation delighted and captivated his mind; and a short time after he had retired to the apartment prepared for him, the terrified Lucretia beheld him enter her room. In vain this detestable man pleaded the violence of his passion for this breach of hospitality, and this deviation from what was right; for the alarmed Lucretia preserved her purity until the monster presented a dagger to her breast, and swore by all the gods that he was determined to gratify his inclinations; and that he would then kill her and one of Collatinus's slaves, and afterwards place him by the side of the injured Lucretia, and inform her husband that he had murdered both, in consequence of having discovered them in the act of committing the crime. The dread of having her memory tarnished by so vile an aspersion at length induced the terrified Lucretia to consent to his desires; but the next morning she despatched a messenger to her father and her husband, requesting them immediately to repair to Rome. They obeyed the summons with pleasure and alacrity, at the same time they were anxious to know the cause of this singular request; but, when they beheld the object of their solicitude, a thousand apprehensions took possession of their breasts. Instead of being welcomed with smiles of pleasure, the countenance of Lucretia was bathed in tears, her hair was dishevelled, her garments of the deepest sable, and her whole figure displayed the image of despair. After describing, in the most eloquent terms, the outrage that had been committed upon her person, she implored them to avenge the insult she had received; and, at the same time drawing forth a dagger, which she had concealed for the purpose, declared her resolution of not surviving her shame; and, before they were able to prevent the horrid purpose, buried the weapon in her heart.

The horror and despair of these dear connections were indescribable. Brutus, one of her relations, drew the reeking weapon from her bosom, and, with all the energy of true feeling, swore he would avenge her fate. "I swear by this blood, once so pure," said he, "and which nothing but the villany of a Tarquin could have polluted, that I will pursue Lucius Tarquinius the Proud, his wicked wife and their children, with fire and sword; nor will I ever suffer any of that family, or any other, henceforward to reign in Rome! And I now call all the gods to witness, that I will most sacredly fulfil my oath."

If the most poignant grief had taken possession of the minds of those who witnessed the dreadful catastrophe which had recently happened, astonishment for a moment banished the impression, at the firmness and energy of the noble Roman's words; who, until that moment, had assumed the appearance of idiotism, to avoid the suspicions of Tarquin the Proud. Roused into action by the affecting scene before him, the hatred which he had long nourished burst into a flame, and he executed the vengeance he had threatened. The Tarquins were expelled from Rome, the kingly government was overthrown, and the Republic founded, in consequence of the outrage on the chaste Lucretia and her heroic death.

An inscription is said to have been seen at Rome, in the diocese of Viterbo, composed by Collatinus, in honour of Lucretia, to the following purport:—"Collatinus Tarquinius, to his most dear and incomparable wife, honour of chastity, glory of women. She who was most dear to me, lived two-and-twenty years, three months, and six days."

~~~~~

M.

MÆROE,

A WOMAN famed by the ancients for her extraordinary learning, and particularly remembered for her hymn to Neptune. She was a native of Greece; but her birthplace is not known.

MAKEDA,

OR, as she is called by the Arabians, BALKIS, queen of Sheba, famous for her visit to Solomon, was probably queen of Abyssinia, or of that part of Arabia Felix which was inhabited by the Sabeans, where women were admitted to govern. Josephus says that she reigned over Egypt and Ethiopia. According to the Abyssinian historians, Balkis was a pagan when she undertook the journey; but struck by the grandeur and wisdom of Solomon, she became a convert to the true religion. They also state that she had a son by Solomon, named David by his father, but called Menilek, that is, another self, by his mother. This son was sent to the court of Solomon to be educated, and returned to his own country accompanied by many doctors of the law, who introduced the Jewish religion into Abyssinia, where it continued till the introduction of Christianity.

The compilers of the Universal History are of opinion, and so is Mr. Bruce, that the queen of Sheba was really sovereign of Ethiopia. They say that Ethiopia is more to the south of Judea, than the territory of the kingdom of Saba in Arabia Felix; consequently had a better claim than that country to be the dominions of the princess whom our Saviour calls: "the Queen of the South." One thing is certain—a queen came from a far country to "hear the wisdom of Solomon;" while there is no record that any king sought to be instructed in the truths of his philosophy, or to be enlightened by his wisdom. Why was this, unless the mind of the woman was more in harmony with this wisdom than were the minds of ordinary men? So it should be, if our theory of the intuitive faculty of woman's soul be true; for Solomon's wisdom was thus intuitive; the gift of God, not the result of patient reflection and logical reasoning. The mind of the queen was undoubtedly gifted with that refined sensibility for the high subjects discussed which stood to her in place of the learning of the schools. And as she came to prove Solomon with "hard questions," she might have been, also, a scholar. She has left proof of her genius and delicate tact in her beautiful address before presenting her offering to the wise king. See I. Kings, chap. x.

MANDANE,

DAUGHTER of Astyages and wife of Cambyses, receives her highest honour from being the mother of Cyrus the Great. Herodotus asserts that the birthright and glory of Cyrus came from his mother, and that his father was a man of obscure birth. This is partly confirmed by history, which records that Astyages, who was king of Media, dreamed that from the womb of his daughter Mandarne, then married to Cambyses, king of Persia, there sprung up a vine which spread over all Asia. Cyrus was such a son as must have gladdened his mother's heart; and we must believe his mother was worthy of him. She lived B. C. 599.

MANIA,

WIFE of Zenis, who governed Ætolia, as deputy under Pharnabazus, a satrap of Persia, about B. C. 409. Having lost her husband, she waited on the satrap, and entreated to be entrusted with the power which had been enjoyed by Zenis, which she promised to wield with the same zeal and fidelity. Her desire being granted, she effectually fulfilled her engagements, and acted on all occasions with consummate courage and prudence. She not only defended the places committed to her charge, but conquered others; and, besides paying punctually the customary tribute to Pharnabazus, sent him magnificent presents. She commanded her troops in person, and preserved the strictest discipline in her army. Pharnabazus held her in the highest esteem.

At length, her son-in-law, Midias, mortified by the reproach of having suffered a woman to reign in his place, gained admittance privately to her apartments, and murdered both her and her son.

MARIAMNE,

DAUGHTER of Alexander and wife of Herod the Great, tetrarch or king of Judea, and mother of Alexander and Aristobulus, and of two daughters, was a woman of great beauty, intelligence, and powers of conversation. Her husband was so much in love with her that he never opposed her or denied her any thing, but on two occasions. When he left her on dangerous errands, he gave orders with persons high in his confidence, that she should not be allowed to survive him. Mariamne was informed of these orders, and conceived such a dislike to her husband, that on his return she could not avoid his perceiving it; nor would her pride allow her to conceal her feelings, but she openly reproached Herod with his barbarous commands. His mother and his sister Salome used every means to irritate him against his wife, and suborned the king's cup-bearer to accuse Mariamne of an attempt to poison her husband; she was also accused of infidelity to him. Herod, furious at these charges, had her tried for the attempt to poison him, and she was condemned and executed. Mariamne met death with the greatest firmness, without even changing colour; but after her execution, which took place about B. C. 28, Herod's remorse and grief were so great, that he became for a time insane.

Lord Byron in his poem "Herod's Lament," &c., has given expression to this agony of the royal murderer's mind:

"O Mariamne! now for thee
The heart for which thou bleed'st is bleeding:
Revenge is lost in agony,
And wild remorse to rage succeeding.
Oh, Mariamne! where art thou?
Thou canst not hear my bitter pleading:
Ah, couldst thou—thou wouldst pardon now,
Though heaven were to my prayer unheeding."

MEDEA,

DAUGHTER of Æetes, king of Colchis, assisted Jason in carrying off the Golden Fleece from her father. When Medea ran away with Jason, Æetes pursued her, but, to retard his progress, she tore Absyrtus, her brother, to pieces, and strewed his limbs in the way. Jason afterwards divorced Medea, and married Glauce, daughter of the king of Corinth. She lived about B. C. 1228.

Euripides has written a fine tragedy on this story, in which Medea ascribes the crimes and misfortunes of her sex to laws, which obliged women to purchase husbands with large fortunes, only to become their slaves and victims.

MEGALOSTRATA,

A GRECIAN poetess, a friend of Alcman, a Spartan lyric poet, flourished in the twenty-seventh Olympiad, about B. C. 668. None of her poems remain, but there are satires written against her, which prove her talents were known and envied.

MERAB,

ELDEST daughter of king Saul, and promised by him to David in reward for his victory over Goliath; but Saul gave her to Adriel instead, by whom she had six sons, whom David gave up to the Gibeonites to be put to death, in expiation of some cruelties Saul had inflicted on them.

MICHAL,

DAUGHTER of king Saul, fell in love with David, which Saul took advantage of to require proofs of valour from David, hoping he would fall by the hands of the Philistines. But David doubled what Saul required, and obtained Michal. Saul afterwards sent messengers to seize David at night, but Michal let him down out of the window, and placed a figure in David's bed to deceive the people. Michal excused herself to her father by saying that David threatened to kill her if she did not assist him in his escape. Saul afterwards gave Michal to Phalti or Phaltiel, son of Laish; but when David came to the crown, he caused Michal to be restored to him. Some time after, Michal, seeing David from a window, dancing before the ark, when it was brought from Shiloh to Jerusalem, upbraided him on his return, for dancing and playing among his servants, acting rather like a buffoon than a king. David vindicated himself and reproved her. Michal bore David no children, which the Scripture seems to impute to these reproaches. This was B. C. about 1042.

MIRIAM,

SISTER of Aaron and Moses, was daughter of Amram and Jochebad. Her name—Miriam, “the star of the sea,” (according to St. Jerome, “she who brightens or enlightens”)—may have been given from a precocious exhibition of the great qualities which afterwards distinguished her. That it was rightly given, her history proves. Our first view of her is when she is keeping watch over the frail basket, among the flags on the banks of the Nile, where Moses, her baby-brother, lay concealed. Miriam was then thirteen years old, but her intelligence and discretion seem mature. Then, when the time came for the redemption of Israel from the house of bondage, Moses was not alone; Aaron his brother and Miriam his sister were his coadjutors.

“It is certain,” says Dr. Clarke (a learned and pious expounder of the Old Testament) “that Miriam had received a portion of the prophetic spirit; and that she was a joint leader of the people with her two brothers, is proved by the words of the prophet Micah;—‘For I brought thee up out of the land of Egypt, and I sent before thee Moses, and Aaron, and Miriam;’—which would not have been said if she had not taken a prominent post in the emigration. Probably she was the leader of the women; as we find after the miraculous passage of the Red Sea, and the destruction of Pharaoh and his army, when Moses, to celebrate the great events, sung his glorious ‘Song,’ the earliest recorded poetry of the world, that his sister came forward and gave her beautiful and spirit-thrilling response.

“And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and dances.

“And Miriam answered them, ‘Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; and his rider hath he thrown into the sea.’”

It is sad that we must record the fall of Miriam from the high pinnacle which her faith, energy, and genius had won. What her crime was is not fully stated, only that she and Aaron “spake against Moses” because “he had married an Ethiopian woman.” Perhaps Miriam disliked her sister-in-law; though it appears she and Aaron disparaged the authority of Moses; it might be from envy of his favour with the Lord. Her sin, whatever passion prompted it, was soon exposed and punished. God smote her with leprosy; and only at the earnest intercession of Moses, healed her, after seven days. The camp moved not while she was shut out; thus the people testified their reverence and affection for her. She lived nineteen years after this, but her name is mentioned no more till the record of her death. She died a short time before her brother Aaron, in Kadesh, when the children of Israel were within sight of the promised land. Eusebius asserts that her monument stood near the city of Petreæ, and was considered a consecrated spot when he lived and wrote, in the fourth century. Her death occurred B. C. 1453, when she was about one hundred and thirty-one years old, so that her life was prolonged beyond the term of either of her brothers. She has left a beautiful example of sisterly tenderness, and warm womanly participation in a holy cause. In genius, she was superior to all the women who preceded her; and in the inspiration of her spirit (she was a “prophetess” or poet,) none of her contemporaries, male or female, except Moses, was her equal. That she was too ambitious is probable, and did not willingly yield to the authority with which the Lord had invested her younger brother, who had been her nursing charge. From this portion of her history, a warning is sounded against the pride and self-sufficiency which the consciousness of great genius and great usefulness is calculated to incite. Woman should never put off her humility. It is her guard as well as ornaments.

MONIMA,

WIFE of Mithridates the Great, was a native of Salonica. Her husband loved her devotedly, but when he was defeated by Lucullus, he caused her and all his other wives to be put to death, lest they should fall into the hands of the enemy. Some years after, Mithridates was killed at his own request, to avoid a similar fate, B. C. 64.

MYRTIS,

A GREEK woman, distinguished for her poetical talents. She lived about B. C. 500, and instructed the celebrated Corinna in the art of versification. Pindar also is said to have been one of her pupils.

N.

NAOMI,

AND her husband Elimelech, went to the land of Moab, because of a famine in Canaan. After about ten years, her husband and two sons died, leaving no children. Naomi then returned with Ruth, one of her daughters-in-law, to her own country, poor and humble. Yet it speaks well for the character and consistency of Naomi, that she so thoroughly won the love and respect of her daughters-in-law. And not only this, but she must have convinced them, by the sanctity of her daily life, that the Lord whom she worshipped was the true God. Her name, Naomi, signifies beauty; and we feel, when reading her story, that, in its highest sense, she deserves to be thus characterized.

After Ruth married Boaz, which event was brought about, humanely speaking, by Naomi's wise counsel, she appears to have lived with them; and she took their first-born son as her own, “laid him in her bosom, and became nurse to him.” This child was Obed, the grandfather of David. Well might the race be advanced which had such a nurse and instructress. These events occurred about 1312, B. C.

NITOCRIS,

MENTIONED by Herodotus, is supposed by some to have been the wife or at least the contemporary of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Assyria. She contributed much to the improvement of Babylon, and built a bridge to connect the two parts of the city divided by the Euphrates, and also extensive embankments along the river. She gave orders there should be an inscription on her tomb, signifying that her successors would find great treasures within, if they were in need of money; but that their labour would be ill repaid if they opened it without necessity. Cyrus opened it from curiosity, and found within it only these words: "If thy avarice had not been insatiable, thou never wouldst have violated the monuments of the dead!"

Other historians suppose her to have been the wife of Evil-Merodach, son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, who also governed during the lunacy of his father. She was a woman of extraordinary abilities, and did all that she could by human prudence to sustain a tottering empire. She lived in the sixth century before Christ.

O.

OCTAVIA,

DAUGHTER of Caius Octavius, and sister to Augustus Cæsar, was one of the most illustrious ladies of ancient Rome. She was first married to Claudius Marcellus, who was consul. She bore this husband three children. After his death she married Antony, and in this way brought about a reconciliation between Antony and her brother Octavianus, afterwards the emperor Augustus Cæsar. These nuptials were solemnized B. C. 41. Three years after, Antony went with his wife to spend the winter at Athens. Here, becoming again exasperated against Augustus by evil reports, he sailed for Italy; but Octavia a second time induced a reconciliation between them.

Antony went to the East soon afterwards, leaving Octavia in Italy; and though she discovered that he did not intend to return, she remained in his palace, continuing to take the same care of everything as though he had been the best of husbands; acting the part of a kind mother to the children of his first wife. She would not consent that Antony's treatment of her should cause a civil war. At length she was ordered to leave the house by Antony, who sent her at the same time a divorce. This treatment of Octavia exposed Antony to the hatred and contempt of the Romans, when they saw him prefer to her a woman of Cleopatra's abandoned character, who had no advantage of her rival either in youth or beauty. Indeed, Cleopatra dreaded Octavia's charms so much that she had recourse to the most studied artifices to persuade Antony to forbid Octavia to come to him; and she accompanied him wherever he went.

After Antony's death, fortune seemed to flatter Octavia with the prospect of the highest worldly felicity. The son she had by her first husband, Marcellus, was now about twelve, and was a boy of great genius, and of an unusually cheerful, dignified and noble disposition. Augustus married him to his own daughter, and declared him heir to the empire. But he died early, not without suspicion of being poisoned by Livia, wife of Augustus. His mother sank under this blow, and mourned bitterly for him till her death.

Virgil wrote in honour of this youth an eulogy in the conclusion of the sixth Æneid; and it is said that Octavia fainted on hearing him read it, but rewarded the poet afterwards with ten sesterces for each verse, of which there are twenty-six. Octavia died B. C. 11, leaving two daughters whom she had by Antony. Great honours were paid to her memory by her brother and the Senate.

So destitute was she of all petty jealousy, that after the death of Antony and Cleopatra, when their children were brought to Rome to grace her brother's triumph, she took them under her protection, and married the daughter to Juba, king of Mauritania.

OLYMPIAS,

DAUGHTER of the king of Epirus, married Philip, king of Macedonia, by whom she had Alexander the Great. Her haughtiness and suspected infidelity induced Philip to repudiate her, and marry Cleopatra, niece of Attalus. This incensed Olympias, and Alexander, her son, shared her indignation. Some have attributed the murder of Philip to the intrigues of Olympias, who paid the greatest honour to the dead body of her husband's murderer. Though the administration of Alexander was not altogether pleasing to Olympias, she did not hesitate to declare publicly, that he was not the son of Philip, but of Jupiter. On Alexander's death, B. C. 324, Olympias seized on the government, and cruelly put to death Aridæus, one of Philip's illegitimate sons, who had claimed the throne, and his wife Eurydice, as well as Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, with a hundred of the principal men of Macedonia. Cassander besieged her in Pydna, where she had retired, and after an obstinate defence she was obliged to surrender. Two hundred soldiers were sent to put her to death, but the splendour and majesty of the queen overawed them, and she was at last massacred by those whom she had injured by her tyranny. She died about 316, B. C.

ORPAH,

A MOABITISH damsel, who married Chillon, the youngest of the two sons of Elimelech and Naomi, Israelites from Bethlehem-judah. Her story is included in the Book of Ruth; and though but a glimpse is afforded, the character is strikingly defined. Orpah signifies, in the Hebrew, the open mouth, a name probably given her to denote her quick sensibility and lack of firmness. She was a creature of feeling, but there was wanting the strength of will to perform what she had purposed as duty. After the death of Elimelech and his two sons, Naomi, with her two young daughters-in-law, set out to return to her own land; Orpah seemingly more earnest than Ruth to accompany Naomi. But when the trials of the undertaking were set before them, Orpah "kissed" her mother-in-law, and went "back to her people and her gods."

P.

PANTHEA,

WIFE of Abradatas, king of the Lusians, was taken prisoner by Cyrus the Great. Though the most beautiful woman of her time, Cyrus treated her with a delicacy and forbearance very unusual in those times, and permitted her to send for her husband. Out of gratitude to Cyrus, Abradatas became his ally, and was slain while fighting for him against the Egyptians. Panthæa killed herself on the dead body of her husband, and was buried in the same grave.

PARYSATIS,

WIFE of Darius Nothus, who ascended the throne of Persia in the year 423 B. C., was the mother of Artaxerxes Mnemon and Cyrus. Her partiality for Cyrus led her to commit the greatest injustice and barbarities; and she poisoned Statira, the wife of Artaxerxes.

PENELOPE,

DAUGHTER of Icarus, married Ulysses, king of Ithaca, by whom she had Telemachus. During the absence of Ulysses, who went to the siege of Troy, and was absent twenty years, several princes, charmed with Penelope's beauty, told her that Ulysses was dead, and urged her to marry one of them. She promised compliance on condition that they would allow her to finish a piece of tapestry she was weaving; but she undid at night what she had woven in the day, and thus eluded their importunity till the return of Ulysses.

Her beauty and conjugal fidelity have won for her the praises of poets, and a warm place in the heart of every pure-minded woman. Her character and example appear most lovely when contrasted with her celebrated contemporary Helen. The character of Telemachus, as drawn by Fenelon, is such as we should imagine would be displayed by the son of Penelope,—her wise influence would be his Mentor.

PENTHESILEA,

QUEEN of the Amazons, succeeded Osythia. She fought bravely at the siege of Troy, and was killed by Achilles, B. C. 1187. Pliny says she invented the battle-axe. She must have been a real amazon.

PERILLA,

A DAUGHTER of the poet Ovid, and of his third wife, was very fond of poetry and literature, and very devoted to her father. She accompanied him in his banishment, and is supposed to have survived him. She lived in the first century after Christ. It is the best example left by Ovid, that he encouraged his daughter in her literary tastes; and well did she repay his care, in the cultivation of her mind, by her devoted attachment to him in his misfortunes.

PHÆDYMA,

DAUGHTER of Olanes, one of the seven Persian lords who conspired against Smerdis the Magian. Being married to Smerdis, who pretended to be the son of Cyrus the Great, she discovered his imposture to her father, by his want of ears, which Cambyes had cut off. She lived B. C. 521.

PHANTASIA,

DAUGHTER of Nicanchus of Memphis, in Egypt. Chiron, a celebrated personage of antiquity, asserted that Phantasia wrote a poem on the Trojan war, and another on the return of Ulysses to Ithaca, from which Homer copied the greater part of the Iliad and Odyssey, when he visited Memphis, where these poems were deposited. She lived in the 12th century before Christ.

PHERETIMA,

WIFE of Battus, king of Cyrene, and the mother of Arcesilaus, who was driven from his kingdom in a sedition, and assassinated. After her son's death, she recovered the kingdom by the aid of Amasis king of Egypt; and to avenge the murder of Arcesilaus, she caused all his assassins to be crucified round the walls of Cyrene, and she cut off the breasts of their wives, and hung them near their husbands. It is said she was devoured by worms; which probably had reference to the remorse she must have felt for her cruelties. She lived about 624 B. C.

PHILISTES,

AN ancient queen, whose coin is still extant, but of whose life, reign, country, and government, nothing can be ascertained. Herodotus speaks of her coin, so she must have flourished before he lived, that is before B. C. 487; but says nothing else of her. Some persons think that she was queen of Sicily, others of Malta or Cossara.

PHILOTIS,

A SERVANT-MAID at Rome, saved her countrymen from destruction. After the siege of Rome by the Gauls, about 381 B. C., the Fidenates marched with an army against the capital, demanding all the wives and daughters in the city, as the only conditions of peace. Philotis advised the senators to send the female slaves, disguised in matrons' clothes; she offered to march herself at their head. The advice was followed, and when the Fidenates, having feasted late, had fallen asleep intoxicated, Philotis lighted a torch, as a signal for her countrymen to attack the enemy. The Fidenates were conquered; and the senate, to reward the fidelity of the slaves, allowed them to appear in the dress of the Roman matrons.

PHILLA

WAS daughter of Antipater, governor of Macedonia, during the absence of Alexander, B. C. 334. She was a woman of remarkable powers of mind, being consulted when quite young, by her father, one of the wisest politicians of the time, on affairs of the greatest moment. By skilful management she prevented an army, full of factions and turbulent spirits, from making an insurrection; she married poor maidens at her own expense, and opposed the oppressors of innocence with so much vigour, that she preserved the lives of many guiltless persons. Philla first married Craterus, one of Alexander's captains, and the favourite of the Macedonians; and after his death Demetrius I., son of Antigonus, king of Asia. He was a voluptuous man, and though she was the chief of his wives, she had little share in his affections. Philla poisoned herself on hearing that Demetrius had lost his possessions in Asia, in a battle at Ipsus, B. C. 301, with three of Alexander's former generals. She had by Demetrius a son and a daughter, the famous Stratonice, who was the wife of Seleucus, and yielded to him by his son Antiochus. Diodorus Siculus gave a history of this excellent princess, but unfortunate woman, in which he extolled her character and talents.

PHRYNE,

A GRECIAN courtesan, flourished at Athens, about B. C. 328. Society alone can discover the charms of the understanding, and the virtuous women of ancient Greece were excluded from society. The houses of the courtezans, on the contrary, were frequented by the poets, statesmen, philosophers, and artists of Athens, and became schools of eloquence. Phryne was one of the most distinguished of that class of women. She served as a model for Praxiteles, and a subject for Apelles, and was represented by both as Venus. Her statue in gold was placed between those of two kings at Delphi. She offered to rebuild at her own expense the walls of Thebes, if she might be allowed to inscribe on them, "Alexander destroyed Thebes, Phryne rebuilt it." She was born in Thespie in Bœotia. She was accused of disbelief in the gods, but Hyperides obtained her acquittal by exposing her charms to the venerable judges of the Helica.

But though all these honours and favours were bestowed on Phryne, she was not allowed to rebuild the walls of Thebes; and this shows there still remained in the hearts of those old Greeks, corrupted as they were, the sentiment of respect for female virtue; and also a fear of degradation if they permitted such a woman to immortalize her name.

PLANCINA

WAS the wife of Piso, consul in the reign of Augustus, and accused with him of having murdered Germanicus in the reign of Tiberius. She was acquitted, either through the partiality of the empress Livia, or of Tiberius. Though devoted to her husband during their confinement, she was no sooner set free than she left him to his fate. At the instigation of Livia, she committed the greatest crimes to injure Agrippina. Being accused of them, and knowing she could not elude justice, she committed suicide, A. D. 33.

POLYXENA,

ONE of the daughters of Priam, king of Troy, and Hecuba. Achilles, the celebrated hero of the Greeks, loved her; and by means of his passion for her his death was effected, for he was mortally wounded in the heel by her brother Paris, while treating about the marriage. It is said by some that she was sacrificed to his manes; by others, that she killed herself on his tomb. She is supposed to have died about B. C. 1183.

POLYXO,

A NATIVE of Argos, who married Tleoptolemus. She followed him to Rhodes, and when he went to the Trojan war, B. C. 1184, Polyxo became sole mistress of the kingdom. After the death of Menelaus, Helen fled from Peloponnesus to Rhodes; and Polyxo, to punish her for being the cause of a war in which Tleoptolemus had perished, ordered her to be hanged on a tree by her female servants, disguised as furies.

PORTIA,

DAUGHTER of the celebrated Cato of Utica, was married first to Bibulus, by whom she had two children. Becoming a widow, she married her cousin Marcus Brutus. When Brutus was engaged in the conspiracy against Cæsar, he attempted, but in vain, to conceal the agitation of his mind from his wife, who did not venture to urge him to let her share in the secret, till she had given decisive proof of her strength of mind. She accordingly gave herself a deep wound in the thigh, and then, when pain and loss of blood had confined her to her bed, she represented to Brutus, that the daughter of Cato, and his wife, might hope to be considered as something more than a mere female companion. She then showed him her wound, and Brutus, after imploring the gods that he might live to prove himself worthy a wife like Portia, informed her of the conspiracy.

When the important day arrived, March 15, B. C. 44, she sent messenger after messenger to bring her word what Brutus was doing, and at length fainted away, so that a report reached her husband that she was dead.

Brutus perceiving that he had not accomplished his object by the assassination of Cæsar, left Rome for Athens. Portia accompanied him to the shore and then left him, as he thought it necessary that she should return to Rome. On parting with him she melted into tears, and some one present repeated from Homer the address of Andromache to her husband—

“Be careful, Hector, for with thee my all,
My father, mother, brother, husband, fall.”

Brutus replied, smiling, “I must not answer Portia in the words of Hector, Mind you your wheel, and to your maids give law;”

for, if the weakness of her frame seconds not her mind, in courage, in activity, in concern for the cause of freedom, and for the welfare of her country, she is not inferior to any of us.”

After the death of Brutus, Portia resolved not to survive him, and being closely watched by her friends, snatched burning coals from the fire, and thrusting them in her mouth, held them there till she was suffocated, B. C. 42.

The character of Portia appears to have been much nearer the common standard of high-bred women, than that of the accomplished and commanding Cornelia, whose grandeur and supremacy of spirit seems to have swayed both the minds and hearts of all around her. Portia, on the other hand, was more strictly feminine. She gushed out with warm affection to her husband. She felt the dignity of her Patrician descent from the family of Cato. She was full of anxiety for her own friends, and she entered into the spirit and enterprises of the times. If the anecdote about the painting and quotations of Brutus be true, and we have no reason to doubt them, it gives us some insight into the spirit of Roman education. Both Brutus and Portia must have been familiar with Homer. This shows how much the Roman literature and education were founded upon that of the Greeks. Many distinguished men, and probably Brutus himself, visited Athens to finish their education. Brutus was familiar with the Greek philosophy, and as Portia was his cousin and the daughter of Cato, she must have had a highly finished education. It is more than probable that the Roman women of the higher ranks had a better education in proportion to the men, than the women of our own era. They were educated more in the solid, than in the merely ornamental knowledge of life. They were not estranged altogether from the politics and the higher philosophy of their country. They read, in common with fathers and husbands, the stern and yet brilliant literature of the ancient Greeks. Barbarous and heathen as it was, it had the advantage of being exempted from the effeminacy and corrupting influences of oriental manners.

P Y R R H A,

THE daughter of Epimetheus and Pandora, was wife of Deucalion, king of Thessaly, in whose reign a flood happened. She was the mother of Amphictyon, Helen, and Protogenia.

The flood that occurred in the time of Deucalion, about B. C. 1500, is supposed to have been only an inundation of that country, occasioned by heavy rains, and an earthquake, that stopped the course of the river Peneus, where it usually discharged itself into the sea. Deucalion governed his people with equity; but the rest of mankind being very wicked, were destroyed by a flood, while Deucalion and Pyrrha saved themselves by ascending Mount Parnassus. When the waters had subsided, they consulted the oracle of Themis on the means by which the earth was to be re-peopled; when they were ordered to veil their faces, unloose their girdles, and throw behind them the bones of their great mother. At this advice, Pyrrha was seized with horror; but Deucalion explained the mystery, by observing, that their great mother meant the earth, and her bones the stones; when, following the directions of the oracle, those thrown by Deucalion became men, and those by Pyrrha, women.

Some have supposed that Deucalion was the same with the patriarch Noah; and that his flood in Thessaly, was the same as that recorded in the Scriptures; tradition thus corroborating the authority of the Bible.

R.

R A C H E L,

THE youngest daughter of Laban, the Syrian, the beloved wife of Jacob, the patriarch, mother of Joseph and Benjamin;—how many beautiful traits of character, how many touching incidents of her husband's life, are connected with her name! Rachel was the true wife of Jacob, the wife of his choice, his first and only love. For her, “he served Laban seven years, and they seemed to him but a few days, for the love he bore her.” At the close of this term, the crafty father, who wished to retain Jacob in his service, practised the gross deception of giving Leah instead of Rachel, and then permitting Jacob to have the beloved one as another wife, provided he would serve another seven years! Thus Rachel really cost her husband fourteen years' servitude.

She was “beautiful and well-favoured,” Moses tells us; yet surely it was not her personal charms which gained such entire ascendancy over the wise son of Isaac. Jacob must have been nearly sixty years old at the time of his marriage; and if Rachel had been deficient in those noble qualities of mind and soul, which could understand and harmonize with his lofty aspirations to fulfil the great duties God had imposed on him, as the chosen Founder of the house of Israel, she never would have been his confidant, counsellor, friend, as well as his lovely, and loving wife. That she was this all in all to her husband, seems certain by the grief, the utter desolation of spirit, which overwhelmed him for her loss. He cherished her memory in his heart, loved her in the passionate love he lavished on her children till his dying day. Her two sons were, in moral character, far superior to the other sons of Jacob; and this is true testimony of her great and good qualities. She died in giving birth to Benjamin, while Jacob, with all his family, was on his way from Syria to his own land. She was buried near Bethlehem, in Judea, and Jacob erected a monument over her grave. Her precious dust was thus left, as though to keep possession of the land sure, to hers and her husband's posterity, during the long centuries of absence and bondage. And, as if to mark that this ground was hallowed, the Messiah was born near the place of Rachel's grave. She died B. C. 1732.

R A H A B,

A WOMAN of Jericho. When Joshua, the leader of the Israelitish host, sent out two spies, saying, "Go view the land, even Jericho," it is recorded "that they went, and came into an harlot's house, named Rahab, and lodged there." The king of Jericho hearing of their visit, sent to Rahab, requiring her to bring the men forth; but instead of complying, she deceived the king, by telling him that they went out of the city about the time of the shutting of the gate, and whither they went, she knew not, but doubtless if the king pursued after them they would be overtaken. In the mean time, while the messengers thus put upon the false track pursued after them to the fords of Jordan, Rahab took the two men up to the roof of the house, which, after the custom of eastern cities, was flat, and hid them under the stalks of flax which she had spread out there to dry.

This strange conduct, in defence of two strangers, she explained to the spies, by telling them, after they reached the roof, that "she knew that the Lord had given the children of Israel the land, for they had heard of their doings from the time that they came out of Egypt, so that all the inhabitants of the land faint because of you."

In return for her care, she made them swear unto her that they would save alive herself and all her family,—father, mother, brothers, sisters, and all that they had. Having thus secured herself from threatened destruction, she let them down by a cord through a window, for her house was upon the town wall, and they escaped to the mountains, whence, after three days, they returned to the camp of Joshua.

For the important service rendered to these spies, herself and kindred were saved from the general massacre which followed the capture of Jericho, her house being designated by a scarlet cord let down from the window out of which the spies escaped.

Several commentators, anxious to relieve the character of a woman so renowned from the imputation cast upon her by the opprobrious epithet usually affixed to her name, would translate the Hebrew word Zonah, which our version renders harlot, by the term hostess or innkeeper. But the same Hebrew word in every other place means what the old English version says, and we see no reason to make its use here an exception; besides, there were no inns in those days and countries; and when, subsequently, something answerable to our ideas of them were introduced, in the shape of caravanseri, they were never kept by women.

It is a remarkable feature of the Bible, that it glosses over no characters, but freely mentions failings and defects, as well as goodness and virtue; and hence, when errors of life are spoken of as connected with any individual, it is not incumbent on us to defend all the life of that individual, if the character is good from the time that it professes to be good; the evil living which went before, may freely be named without compromising or reflecting upon subsequent goodness.

Her remarks to the spies evince her belief in the God of the Hebrews, and her marriage, at a later period, with Salmon, one of the princes of Israel, proves her conversion to Judaism.

The Jewish writers abound in praises of Rahab, and even those who do not deny that she was a harlot, admit that she eventually became the wife of a prince of Israel, and that many great persons of their nation sprang from this union.

According to the Bible, Rahab was a woman of fidelity, discretion, and a believer in the God of Israel; and the only individual, among all the nations which Joshua was commissioned to destroy, who aided the Israelites, and who was received and dwelt among the people of God as one with them. St. Paul quotes her as one of his examples of eminent faith. These events occurred B. C. 1451.

R E B E K A H,

DAUGHTER of Bethuel, and wife of Isaac the patriarch, is one of the most interesting female characters the Bible exhibits for the example and instruction of her sex. Her betrothal and marriage are graphic pictures of the simple customs of her maiden life, and her own heart-devotion to the will of God. No wonder her beauty, modesty and piety, won the love and confidence of Isaac at once. She was his only wife, and thus highly favoured above those who were obliged to share the heart of a husband with hand-maidens and concubines. The plague-spot of polygamy which has polluted even the homes of the chosen of God did not fasten its curse on her bridal tent. So distinguished was this example, that ever since, the young married pair have been admonished to be, as "Isaac and Rebecca, faithful."

The first portion of her history, contained in Genesis, chap. xxiv. (any synopsis would mar its beauty) has won for her unqualified approbation; while commentators and divines are almost as unanimous in censuring her later conduct. But is this censure deserved? Let us examine carefully before we venture to condemn what the Bible does not.

This pious couple, who inherited the promises of God, and in whom centred the hopes of the world, were childless for twenty years; when Rebekah's twin sons were born. Before their birth, it had, in some mysterious manner, been revealed to the mother that these sons would be the progenitors of two nations, different from each other, and that the elder should serve the younger. From their birth the boys were as unlike as though they were of different races. Esau is represented as red, rough, reckless, rebellious; Jacob was fair, gentle, home-loving and obedient; such a son as must have gladdened his mother's heart. But there was a higher and holier motive for her devoted love to this, her youngest son,—she knew he was the chosen of God.

"Isaac loved Esau, because he did eat of his venison; but Rebekah loved Jacob;"—that is, she loved him with the holy, disinterested affection which her faith that he was born for a high destiny would inspire. She kept him with her and instructed him in this faith, making him thus aware of the value of the birthright; while Esau, like a young heathen, was passing his life in the hunting-field, caring nothing for the promises made to Abraham; probably scoffing at the mention of such superstitions, he "despised his birthright," and sold it for a mess of pottage.

Next occurs a scene reflecting great honour on the character of Rebekah, as it shows she had the heart-purity which is ever under the holy guardianship of heaven;—we allude to what passed at Gerar. Isaac was there guilty of a cowardly falsehood, and seems to have been forgiven, and great privileges allowed him solely on account of the reverence and admiration felt for his wife. Thus the patriarch prospered exceedingly in consequence of Rebekah's beauty, virtue, and piety; while Esau's perverse disposition manifested itself more and more. And yet, though he grieved the hearts of his parents by uniting himself with idolaters, (marrying two Hittite wives,) still the father's heart clung to this unworthy son—because he furnished him savoury food!

Isaac had grown older in constitution than in years; "his eyes were dim so that he could not see;" fearing he might die suddenly, he called Esau, and said to him—"Take, I pray thee, thy weapons, thy quiver and thy bow, and go out to the field, and take me venison; and make me savoury food, such as I love, and bring it to me, that I may eat; that my soul may bless thee before I die." It is worthy of note that Isaac did not allude to any blessing the Lord had promised to his eldest son, nor to any motive, save indulging his own appetite. If Isaac knew that Jacob the younger son had been by God preferred before the elder, did he not purpose committing a great sin, in thus attempting to give the blessing to Esau? And if Isaac did not know the promise made to Rebekah concerning the destiny of her sons, then we must allow the spiritual insight conferred on her devolved also the duty of preventing, if possible, the sin her husband would bring on his own soul by attempting to bless him whom the Lord had not blessed. It is manifest that Rebekah felt the time had come for her to act. If she had entreated her husband to bless the youngest born, he had not listened to her counsel, as Abraham was directed to do when Sarah advised him. We may say Rebekah should have had faith that God would bring to pass what he had ordained; but we cannot know her convictions of the duty devolving on herself. She certainly did not wait the event; but overhearing the directions of Isaac, she immediately took such measures as deceived him, and obtained his blessing for Jacob.

Rebekah must have been either perfectly assured she was working under the righteous inspiration of God, or she was willing to bear the punishment of deceiving her husband rather than allow him to sin by attempting to give the blessing where God had withheld it. That the result was right is certain, because Isaac acknowledged it when, after the deception was made manifest, he said of Jacob—"Yea, and he shall be blessed."

When, to avoid the murderous hatred of Esau, Jacob fled from his home, the Lord met him in a wondrous vision, where the promise made to Abraham and to Isaac was expressly confirmed to this cherished son of Rebekah; thus sealing the truth of her belief and the importance of her perseverance; and not a word of reproof appears on the holy page which records her history. She did not live to see her son's triumphant return, nor is the date of her decease given; but she was buried in the family sepulchre at Macpelah; and as Isaac had no second wife, she was doubtless mourned. It has been urged that because her death was not recorded, therefore she had sinned in regard to her son. No mention is made of the death of Deborah, or Ruth, or Esther,—had they sinned?

There are no perfect examples among mankind; but in the comparison of Isaac and Rebekah, the wife is, morally, superior to her husband; and appears to have been specially entrusted by God with the agency of changing the succession of her sons, and thus building up the house of Israel. See Genesis, chapters xxvi. xxvii. xxviii.

R HODOPE,

A CELEBRATED Grecian courtesan, who was fellow-servant with Æsop at the court of the king of Samos. She was carried to Egypt by Xanthus, and purchased by Charaxes of Mytelene, the brother of Sappho, who married her. She gained so much money by her charms that she built one of the pyramids. Ælian says that one day, as she was bathing, an eagle carried away one of her sandals, and dropt it near king Psammētichus, at Memphis, who sought out the owner and married her. She lived about B. C. 610.

R IZPAH

Was daughter of Aiah, concubine to king Saul. Saul having put to death many of the Gibeonites, God, to punish this massacre, sent a famine which lasted three years. To expiate this, David, who was then king, gave to the Gibeonites two sons of Saul by Rizpah, and five sons of Michal, the daughter of Saul, whom the Gibeonites hanged on the mountain near Gibeah. Rizpah spread a sackcloth on the rock, and watched night and day to prevent ravenous beasts and birds from devouring the dead bodies; till David, pitying her, had their bones brought and interred in the tomb of Kish. Abner, Saul's general, married Rizpah after Saul's death, which was so much resented by Ishbosheth, son of Saul, that Abner vowed and procured his ruin.

Her sad story has been the theme of poets; and the picture of the childless mother, watching beside the bleaching bones of her murdered sons, is an illustration of the truth and tenderness of woman's love, which every human heart must feel. This tragedy occurred B. C. about 1021.

ROXANA,

A PERSIAN princess of great beauty, daughter of Darius, king of Persia, whom Alexander the Great took for his wife. Their son Alexander, born after his father's death, was murdered by Cassander, one of Alexander's generals, 323 B. C., and she shared his fate. She had cruelly put to death, after Alexander's decease, her sister Statira, whom the conqueror had also married.

RUTH,

A MOABITNESS, widow of Mahlon, an Israelite, and one of the ancestors of our Saviour, lived, probably, in the days of Gideon. Being left a widow, she accompanied her mother-in-law, Naomi, to Judea, where she married Boaz, a wealthy Hebrew and a near relative of her late husband—and became the ancestress of David and of our Saviour. Her name signifies "full, or satisfied."

Her story, told at length in the eighth book of the Old Testament, is one of the most interesting in the Bible. Poetry and painting have exhausted their arts to illustrate her beautiful character; yet to the truthful simplicity of the inspired historian, the name of Ruth still owes its sweetest associations. Her example shows what woman can do, if she is true to the best impulses of her nature, and faithfully works in her mission, and waits the appointed time.

RUTILIA,

A ROMAN lady, sister of that Pub. Rutilius who suffered his unjust banishment with so much fortitude, was the wife of Marcus Aurelius Cotta; and had a son, who was a man of great merit, whom she tenderly loved, but whose death she bore with resignation.

Seneca, during his exile, wrote to his mother and exhorted her to imitate Rutilia, who, he says, followed her son Cotta into banishment; nor did she return to her country till her son came with her. Yet she bore his death, after his return, with equal courage, for she followed him to his burial without shedding a tear. She lived about B. C. 120

S.

SAPPHO,

A CELEBRATED Greek poetess, was a native of Mitylene, in the isle of Lesbos, and flourished about B. C. 610. She married Cercala, a rich inhabitant of Andros, by whom she had a daughter, named Cleis; and it was not, probably, till after she became a widow that she rendered herself distinguished by her poetry. Her verses were chiefly of the lyric kind, and love was the general subject, which she treated with so much warmth, and with such beauty of poetical expression, as to have acquired the title of the "Tenth Muse." Her compositions were held in the highest esteem by her contemporaries, Roman as well as Greek, and no female name has risen higher in the catalogue of poets. Her morals have been as much depreciated, as her genius has been extolled. She is represented by Ovid as far from handsome; and as she was probably no longer young when she fell in love with the beautiful Phaon, his neglect is not surprising. Unable to bear her disappointment, she went to the famous precipice of Leucate, since popularly called the Lover's Leap, and throwing herself into the sea, terminated at once her life and her love. To this catastrophe Ausonius alludes:

"And the masculine Sappho about to perish with her Lesbian arrows, Threatens a leap from the snow-crowned Leucade."

Longinus quotes this celebrated ode written by Sappho, of which we give the translation, as an example of sublimity:

"Blest as th' immortal gods is he,
The youth who fondly sits by thee,
And hears and sees thee all the while,
Softly speak and sweetly smile.

'Twas thus deprived my soul of rest,
And raised such tumults in my breast
For, while I gazed in transport tost,
My breath was gone, my voice was lost;

My bosom glowed; the subtle flame
 Ran quick through all my vital frame:
 O'er my dim eye a darkness hung,
 My ears with hollow murmurs rung;

In dewy damps my limbs were chilled
 My blood with gentle horrors thrilled;
 My feeble pulse forgot to play;
 I fainted, sunk, and died away."

No less beautiful is the Hymn to Venus, of which the following is an extract:

"O Venus, beauty of the skies,
 To whom a thousand temples rise,
 Gaily false in gentle smiles,
 Full of love perplexing wiles;
 Oh, goddess! from my heart remove
 The wasting cares and pains of love.

If ever thou hast kindly heard
 A song in soft distress preferred,
 Propitious to my tuneful vow,
 Oh, gentle goddess! hear me now;
 Descend, thou bright, immortal guest,
 In all thy radiant charms confest.

Thou once didst leave almighty Jove,
 And all the golden roofs above,
 The car thy wanton sparrows drew,
 Hovering in air they lightly flew;
 As to my bower they winged their way,
 I saw their quivering pinions play.

The birds dismiss, while you remain,
 Bore back their empty car again;
 Then you with looks divinely mild,
 In every heavenly feature smiled,
 And asked what new complaints I made,
 And why I called you to my aid."

Sappho formed an academy of females who excelled in music; and it was doubtless this academy which drew on her the hatred of the women of Mitylene. She is said to have been short in stature, and swarthy in her complexion. Ovid confirms this description in his Heroides, in the celebrated epistle from Sappho to Phaon:

"To me what nature has in charms denied,
 Is well by wit's more lasting flames supplied.
 Though short my stature, yet my name extends
 To heaven itself, and earth's remotest ends;
 Brown as I am, an Ethiopian dame
 Inspired young Perseus with a generous flame."

Translated by Pope.

The Mitylenes esteemed her so highly, and were so sensible of the glory they received from her having been born among them, that they paid her sovereign honours after her death, and stamped their money with her image. The Romans also erected a noble monument to her memory. "It must be granted," says Rapin, "from what is left us of Sappho, that Longinus had great reason to extol the admirable genius of this woman; for there is in what remains of her something delicate, harmonious, and impassioned to the last degree. Catullus endeavoured to imitate Sappho, but fell infinitely short of her; and so have all others who have written upon love."

Besides the structure of verse called Sapphic, she invented the Æolic measure, composed elegies, epigrams, and nine books of lyric poetry, of which all that remain are, an ode to Venus, and an ode to one of her lovers, quoted above, and some small fragments.

SARAH, or SARAI,

WIFE of Abraham, was born in Uz of the Chaldees, (the region of fire, or where the people were fire-worshippers,) from which she came out with her husband. She was ten years younger than Abraham, and in some way connected with him by relationship, which permitted them to be called brother and sister. Some commentators suppose she was the daughter of Haran, Abraham's brother by a different mother, and consequently, the sister of Lot. But Abraham said of her to Abimilech, "She is indeed my sister; she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother; and she became my wife." Such intermarriages had not, in that age of the world, been prohibited by God or man. Her story is told at length in Genesis, chap. xii., xviii., xx., xxxiii. None of the women of the Bible are so prominently placed or so distinctly described as Sarah, whose name was changed by God so that its meaning (her title) might be "mother of nations." Her first name, Sarai, signifies "princess"—and her personal loveliness, and the excellences of her character, justify the appellation. But as the Bible is the word of divine truth, it describes no perfect men or women. Sarah's love and devotion to her husband are themes of the apostle's praise; and her maternal faithfulness is proven by the influence of her character on Isaac, and the sorrow with which he mourned her death. Yet Sarah has been accused of harshness towards the handmaid Hagar, and cruelty in causing her and her son Ishmael to be sent away. But the sacred narrative warrants no such inference. It should be borne in mind that in the first promise, when God said to Abram, "I will make of thee a great nation," &c., no mention is made of the mother of this favoured race. Abram undoubtedly told his beloved Sarai of God's promise; but when ten years passed, and she had no children, she might fear she was not included in the divine prediction. Regardless of self, where the glory and happiness of her adored husband were concerned, with a disinterestedness more than heroic, of which the most noble-minded woman only could have been capable, she voluntarily relinquished her hope of the honour of being the mother of the blessed race; and, moreover, withdrew her claim to his sole love, (a harder trial,) and gave him her favourite slave Hagar. It was Sarai who proposed this to Abram, and as there was then no law prohibiting such relations, it was not considered sin. But it was sin, as the event showed. God, from the first, ordained that the union of the sexes, to be blessed, cannot subsist but in a marriage made holy by uniting, indissolubly and faithfully, one man with one woman. This holy union between Abraham and Sarah, which had withstood all temptations and endured all trials, was now embittered to the wife by the in solence and ingratitude of the concubine.

That the subsequent conduct of Sarah was right, under the circumstances, the angel of the Lord bore witness, when he found Hagar in the wilderness, and said, "Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hands."

So too, when Hagar and her son Ishmael were sent away—God distinctly testified to Abraham that it should be thus; that Sarah was right. There are but two blemishes on the bright perfection of Sarah's character—her impatience for the promised blessing, and her hasty falsehood, told from fear, when she denied she had laughed. From the first fault came the troubles of her life through the connection of her husband with Hagar. She died at the great age of one hundred and twenty-seven years, and "Abraham came to mourn for Sarah and to weep for her;" true testimonials of her worth and his love. He purchased for her a sepulchre, at a great price, "the field of Macpelah, before Mamre," which became afterwards the site of Hebron, an important city. Sarah's death occurred B. C. 1860.

SCRIBONIA,

THE daughter of Scribonius, was the second wife of Augustus, after he had divorced Claudia. As divorces were then, at Rome, common as marriages, almost, Augustus, in a few years, divorced Scribonia, to marry the only woman he ever probably loved—the beautiful and magnificent Livia. Scribonia had been twice married prior to her union with Augustus, by whom she had a daughter, the infamous Julia, an offspring who seemed to inherit the vices of both her parents.

SELENA

WAS the wife of Antiochus X., king of Syria, who was put to death by Tigranes, king of Armenia. She was the daughter of Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt, and according to the custom of her country, married first her brother Lathyrus, and afterwards her other brother, Gryphus. At the death of Gryphus, she married Antiochus, by whom she had two sons. According to Appian, she first married the father, Antiochus Cyzenicus, and after his death the son, Eusebes. She lived in the century immediately preceding Christ.

SEMIRAMIS,

A CELEBRATED queen of Assyria, was the wife of Menones, governor of Nineveh, and accompanied him to the siege of Bactria, where by her advice and bravery she hastened the king's operations, and took the city. Her wisdom and beauty attracted the attention of Ninus, king of Assyria, who asked her of her husband, offering him his daughter Sozana in her stead; but Menones refused his consent; and when Ninus added threats to entreaties, he hung himself. Semiramis then married Ninus, about B. C. 2200, and became the mother of Ninyas. She acquired so great an influence over the king, that she is said to have persuaded him to resign the crown for one day, and command that she should be proclaimed queen and sole empress of Assyria for that time; when one of her first orders was that Ninus should be put to death, in order that she might retain possession of the sovereign authority.

She made Babylon the most magnificent city in the world; she visited every part of her dominions, and left everywhere monuments of her greatness. She levelled mountains, filled up valleys, and had water conveyed by immense aqueducts to barren deserts and unfruitful plains. She was not less distinguished as a warrior. She conquered many of the neighbouring nations, Ethiopia among the rest; and she defeated the king of India, at the river Indus; but pursuing him into his own country, he drew her into an ambush, and put her to flight, with the loss of a great number of her troops. To prevent him from pursuing her still farther, she destroyed the bridge over the Indus, as soon as her troops had crossed it. After exchanging prisoners at Bactria, she returned home with hardly a third of her army, which, if we believe Ctesias, consisted of 300,000 foot-soldiers and 5000 horse, besides camels and armed chariots. At her return, finding her son engaged in a conspiracy against her, she resigned the government to him. Ninyas is said, notwithstanding, to have killed his mother himself, in the sixty-second year of her age, and the twenty-fifth of her reign.

SERVILIA,

A SISTER of the celebrated Cato, who was enamoured of Julius Cæsar, though he was one of her brother's most inveterate enemies. One day, she sent him a very affectionate letter, which was given to Cæsar in the senate-house, while the senate were debating about punishing Catiline's associates. Cato, supposing that the letter was from one of the conspirators, insisted on its being publicly read. Cæsar then gave it to Cato, who having read it, returned it, saying, "Take it, drunkard!" She flourished about B. C. 66.

SHELOMITH,

DAUGHTER of Dibri, of the tribe of Dan, was mother of that blasphemer who was stoned to death. The Scripture tells us that Shelomith had this blasphemer by an Egyptian; and the rabbins say that she was a handsome and virtuous woman, with whom this Egyptian, an overseer of the Hebrews, became enamoured; and that during her husband's unexpected absence, he stole by night into the house and bed of Shelomith. When the woman discovered the injury, she complained of it to her husband, and proving with child, he put her away, and assailed the Egyptian with blows, who retaliated. Moses passing by, took the part of the Israelite, and killed the Egyptian. The brothers of Shelomith called her husband to account for putting her away; and coming to blows, Moses again interfered; but the husband asking him whether he would kill him, as yesterday he had killed the Egyptian, Moses fled to the land of Midian. B. C. 1570.

SHIPRAH and PUAH,

Two midwives of Goshen, in Egypt, celebrated in sacred history, and rewarded by the Almighty himself, for their humanity in disobeying the mandate of the tyrant of Egypt to murder the Hebrew boys at their birth. They were undoubtedly Hebrew women. It is worthy of remembrance, that when the Hebrew nation was crushed by the power of Pharaoh, the men lost all courage, and yielded to their oppressor, however cruel might be his edicts; it was the Hebrew women who devised means of eluding those laws.

SIBYL, or SYBIL,

Is the name by which several prophetic women were designated, who all belonged to the mythical ages of ancient history. It was believed that the Sibyls were maidens who, by direct inspirations, possessed a knowledge of the future, and of the manner in which evils might be averted, and the gods appeased. Their number seems to have been very great. There were Egyptian, Persian, Greek, Hebrew, Babylonian, and Italian Sibyls.

The most ancient Sibyl was Herophile, probably the one called Sibylla Lybica by Varro. The Erythræan Sibyl was supposed by some to be a native of Babylon, and by others, of Erythræ. She lived before the Trojan war, the cause and issue of which she is said to have predicted.

In the time of Pausanias, a hymn on Apollo, attributed to this Sibyl, was well known in Delos, in which she calls herself a daughter of one of the Idæan nymphs, and a mortal. The Samian Sibyl was supposed to have been a priestess in the temple of Apollo Smytheus. She spent most of her life at Samos; but, like the other Sibyls, is described as travelling about, and communicating to men her inspired wisdom. Thus, we find her at Claros, Delos, and Delphi. She is said to have died at Troas, where a monument was erected to her in a grove, sacred to Apollo Smytheus.

Cumæ, in Ionia, was also celebrated for its Sibyl; but the Sibyl of Cumæ, in Campania, called Demo, has acquired more celebrity than any other. In the reign either of Tarquinius Priscus or Tarquinius Superbus, there appeared before the king a woman, either a Sibyl or sent by a Sibyl, who offered him nine books for sale, which he refused to purchase. The woman went away, and burning three of the books, returned and asked the same price for the remaining six as she had for the nine. The king again refused; and the woman burnt three more, and again returning, offered the three books at the same price as before. The king's curiosity was excited; he purchased the books, and the woman vanished. These three were the Sibylline books which play such a prominent part in the history of Rome. They were written on palm-leaves, and in verse or symbolical hieroglyphics. The Romans were in the constant habit of consulting them, and abiding by their decisions. This Sibyl is supposed by some to have been the Erythræan Sibyl; by others, the Sibyl from Cumæ, in Ionia; and by others, that she was from the Italian Cumæ. A book of Sibylline verses is extant, but scholars deem it spurious and useless.

SISIGAMBIS, or SISYGAMBIS,

Was mother of Darius, the last king of Persia. She was taken prisoner by Alexander the Great, at the battle of Ipsus, with the rest of the royal family. The conqueror treated her with the greatest deference, saluted her as his own mother, and often granted to her what he had denied to the petitions of his other favourites and ministers. When the queen heard of Alexander's death, she committed suicide, B. C. 324, unwilling to survive the loss of her son and of his kingdom. She had before lost in one day, her husband and eighty of his brothers, whom Ochus had assassinated.

SOPHONISBA,

DAUGHTER of Asdrubal, the celebrated Carthaginian general, a lady of uncommon beauty and accomplishments, married Syphax, a Numidian prince, who was totally defeated by the combined forces of his rival, Massinissa, and the Romans. On this occasion, Sophonisba fell into the hands of Massinissa, who, captivated by her beauty, married her, on the death of Syphax, which occurred soon after at Rome. But this act displeased the Romans, because Sophonisba was a Carthaginian princess; and Massinissa had not asked their consent. The elder Scipio Africanus ordered the timid Numidian monarch to dismiss Sophonisba; and the cowardly king, instead of resenting the insult, and joining the Carthaginians against the Romans, sent his wife a cup of poison, advising her to die like the daughter of Asdrubal. She drank the poison with calmness and serenity, about B. C. 203.

STATIRA,

DAUGHTER of Darius, king of Persia, and wife of Alexander the Great. The conqueror had formerly refused her; but when she fell into his hands at the battle of Ipsus, the nuptials were celebrated with uncommon splendour. Nine thousand persons were present, to each of whom Alexander gave a golden cup to be offered to the gods. Statira had no children. She was put to death by Roxana, another daughter of Darius, and also the wife of Alexander, after the conqueror's death.

STRATONICE,

THE beautiful daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes and his wife Phylla, married Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria. His son and heir, Antiochus Soter, fell ill, and was at the point of death, when Erasistratus, the physician, observing his pulse to beat high whenever his young step-mother entered the room, guessed the cause of his illness to be love for Stratonice, which Antiochus then confessed. Seleucus, to save his son, yielded up his wife, and they were married. Stratonice became the ancestress of that impious race of princes who so cruelly persecuted the Jews. Antiochus died B. C. 291.

TAMAR, or THAMAR,

WAS daughter-in-law to the patriarch Judah, wife of Er and Onan. After Onan's death, Tamar lived with her father-in-law, expecting to marry his son Shelah, as had been promised her, and was the custom of the time. But the marriage not having taken place, some years after, when Judah went to a sheep-shearing feast, Tamar disguised herself as a harlot and sat in a place where Judah would pass—and this old man yielded at once to the temptation. When it was told Judah that his daughter-in-law had been guilty, he immediately condemned her to be brought forth and burned alive; never remembering his own sin. But when he found that he was the father of the child she would soon bear, his conscience was awakened, and he made that remarkable admission that “she was more just than he had been.”

This history displays the gross manners of those old times, and how false are all representations of the purity of pastoral life. Tamar had twins, sons—and from one of these, Pharez, the line of Judah is descended. These events occurred about B. C. 1727.

TAMARIS

WAS a princess of Tarraco, the modern Tarragon, a province in Spain: she lived about the year 220 B. C. After her husband's death, she became anxious to free the province from the Roman yoke, and, in order to succeed in her wishes, she favoured secretly Hannibal, to whom she furnished men and provisions. When her treachery was discovered, she lost both her property and her life. After her death, the Romans made the city of Tarraco the chief depôt for their arms in Spain.

TAMYRIS, or TOMYRIS,

QUEEN of the Scythians, was a contemporary of Cyrus, who made war against her. After Cyrus had advanced very rapidly, he pretended to fly, and left his camp with provisions and wine behind him. The Scythians, led by Spargopises, the son of Tamyris, pursued until they reached the camp, where they stopped to regale themselves. Cyrus, who was watching for this opportunity, rushed upon them unawares, and slew the greater part of the army with its young commander.

Tamyris, filled with rage and grief for the loss of her son and the defeat of her troops, now took the field herself, and succeeded, by her wily manoeuvres, in drawing the army of Cyrus into an ambush, and then she fell upon them with such fury, that, though he had 200 000 men of battle, scarce one escaped. She afterwards built the city of Tamyris not far from the Doran. Brave she was, and living in the era of bloody battles, her character was the reflex of her age; yet we think her agency in founding the city was more to her credit than gaining the victory in war.

TANAQUIL, or CARA CECILIA,

WIFE of Tarquin the Elder, the fifth king of Rome, was a native of Tarquinia, in Etruria. Her husband was originally a citizen of the same place, and called Lucomon Damaratus. But Tanaquil, who was skilled in augury, and foresaw the future eminence of her husband, persuaded him to go to Rome, where he changed his name to Lucius Tarquinius. Here he was chosen king, B. C. 616. He was assassinated B. C. 577; but Tanaquil, by keeping the event secret, adopted measures for securing the succession of her son-in-law, Servius Tullius. She was a woman of such liberality and powers of mind, that the Romans preserved her girdle with great veneration.

TARPEIA,

A VESTAL virgin, daughter of Tarpeius, governor of Rome under Romulus. When the Sabines made war on the Romans, in consequence of the rape of the Sabine women by the latter, Tarpeia betrayed the citadel of Rome to the enemy, for which service she requested the ornaments the soldiers wore on their left arm, meaning their gold bracelets. Pretending to misunderstand her, they threw their shields at her as they passed, and she was crushed beneath their weight. From her the hill was called the Tarpeian rock, from whence traitors were precipitated by the Romans.

TARQUINIA,

A DAUGHTER of Tarquinius Priscus, who married Servius Tullius. When her husband was murdered by his son-in-law, Tarquinius Superbus, she privately buried his body. This so preyed upon her mind that she died the following night. Some attribute her death, however, to Tullia, wife of young Tarquin.

TECHMESSA,

DAUGHTER of Teuthras, king of Phrygia, was taken captive by Ajax, the celebrated Greek hero, by whom she had a son, Erysaces. She prevented Ajax from killing himself.

TELESILLA,

A NOBLE poetess of Argos, who being advised by the oracle, which she had consulted respecting her health, to the study of the muses, soon attained such excellence, as to animate by her poetry the Argive women to repel, under her command, Cleomenes, the Spartan king, and afterwards king Demaratus, from the siege of Pamphiliacum, with great loss.

TERENTIA,

WIFE of Cicero. She became the mother of M. Cicero, and of Tullia. Cicero repudiated her, on account of her temper, he said, to marry his young, beautiful, and wealthy ward, Publilia. But the circumstance that Cicero was then deeply in debt, and wanted the fortune of his ward, explains his motives. He was in his sixty-first year, when he committed this great wrong, and as he had been married thirty years to Terentia, if her temper had been so very troublesome, he would, probably, have parted with her before. The transaction left a stain upon his private character which no apologist has been able to efface.

Terentia, after her divorce, married Sallust, Cicero's enemy, and he dying, she then married Messala Corvinus. She lived to her one hundred and third, or, according to Pliny, one hundred and seventeenth year. She seems to have been a woman of spirit and intelligence.

THAIS,

A CELEBRATED courtesan of Corinth, mistress of Alexander the Great, who persuaded him to set Persepolis on fire, in revenge for the injuries Xerxes had inflicted on her native city; and who incited the conqueror, when intoxicated, to throw the first torch himself. She afterwards became the mistress and finally the wife of Ptolemy, king of Egypt. Menander celebrated her charms, on which account she is called Menandrea.

THALESTRIS,

A QUEEN of the Amazons, who, accompanied by three hundred women, came thirty-five days' journey to meet Alexander in his Asiatic conquests, to raise children by a man whose fame was so great, and courage so uncommon. The story is, doubtless, as fabulous as that a nation of Amazons ever lived.

THEANO,

A PRIESTESS at Athens, living in the time of Socrates, when Alcibiades was, for political motives, charged with irreligion, and a sacerdotal council was holden, in which he was condemned on false charges. Theano, one of the council, was the only member who refused to vote against him, saying—"The gods could not be honored by lies."

There were three other women of the same name; Theano Locrencis, a native of Locri, surnamed Melica, from the melody of her songs and lyric poems; the second was a poetess of Crete, said by some to have been the wife of Pythagoras: the third was wife of Metapontus, king of Icaria.

THESSALONICE,

DAUGHTER of Philip II., king of Macedon, and sister of Alexander the Great; married Cassander, one of Alexander's generals, and bore him three sons, Philip IV., Antipater, and Alexander V. She was murdered by her son Antipater, because she favoured his brother Alexander's claim to the throne, although she entreated him by the memory of her maternal care of him to spare her, but in vain.

THISBE,

A BEAUTIFUL Babylonian maiden, whose unhappy love for Pyramus has rendered her immortal. The parents of the lovers opposing their union, they were able to converse only through a hole in the wall which separated their parents' houses. They made an appointment to meet at the tomb of Ninus without the city. Thisbe came first, and frightened by the appearance of a lioness, she fled to a neighbouring thicket, dropping her mantle in her flight, which was torn to pieces by the animal. Pyramus coming just in time to see the torn mantle and the lioness in the distance, concluded that Thisbe had been devoured by the wild beast. In his despair he killed himself with his sword. When Thisbe emerged from her hiding-place, and found Pyramus lying dead, she stabbed herself with the same weapon. They were buried together.

THYMELE,

A MUSICAL composer and poetess, mentioned by Martial, and reported to have been the first who introduced into the scene a kind of dance, called by the Greeks, from this circumstance, Themelinos. From Thymele also, an altar, used in the ancient theatres, is supposed to have taken its name.

TIMOCLEA,

A THEBAN lady, sister to Theagenes, who was killed at Cheronæa, B. C. 374. One of Alexander's soldiers offered her violence, after which she led him to a well, and pretending to show him immense treasures concealed there, she pushed him into it. Alexander commended her, and forbade his soldiers to hurt the Theban women.

TIMŒA,

WIFE of Agis, king of Sparta, was seduced by Alcibiades. Her son Leotychides was consequently refused the throne, though Agis, on his death-bed, declared him legitimate.

TROSINE,

WIFE of Tigranes, king of Armenia, who, upon her husband's being conquered by Pompey, was compelled to grace his entrance into Rome, B. C. about 70.

TULLIA,

A DAUGHTER of Servius Tullius, king of Rome, married Tarquinius Superbus, after she had murdered her first husband, Arunx; and consented to see Tullius assassinated, that she might be raised to the throne. She is said to have ordered her chariot to be driven over the dead body of her father, which had been thrown all bloody into one of the streets. She was afterwards banished from Rome, with her husband. Tarquinius Superbus had been before married to Tullia's sister, whom he murdered, in order to marry Tullia.

TULLIA, or TULLIOLA,

A DAUGHTER of Cicero, and Terentia, his wife. She married Caius Piso, and afterwards Furius Crassippus, and lastly P. Corn. Dolabella. Dolabella was turbulent, and the cause of much grief to Tullia, and her father, by whom she was tenderly beloved. Tullia died in childbed, about B. C. 44, soon after her divorce from Dolabella. She was about thirty-two years old at the time of her death, and appears to have been an admirable woman. She was most affectionately devoted to her father; and to the usual graces of her sex having added the more solid accomplishments of knowledge and literature, was qualified to be the companion as well as the delight of his age; and she was justly esteemed not only one of the best, but the most learned of the Roman women. Cicero's affliction at her death was so great, though philosophers came from all parts of the world to comfort him, that he withdrew for some time from all society, and devoted himself entirely to writing and reading, especially all the works he could meet with on the necessity of moderating grief.

TYMICHIA,

A LACEDÆMONIAN lady, consort of Myllias, a native of Crotona. Jamblichus, in his life of Pythagoras, places her at the head of his list, as the most celebrated female philosopher of the Pythagorean school. When Tymichia and her husband were carried as prisoners before Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, B. C. 330, he made them both very advantageous offers, if they would reveal the mysteries of Pythagorean science; but they rejected them all with scorn and detestation. The tyrant not succeeding with the husband, took the wife apart, not doubting, from her situation at the time, that the threat of torture would make her divulge the secret; but she instantly bit off her tongue, and spat it in the tyrant's face, to show him that no pain could make her violate her pledge of secrecy.

V.

VASHTI,

THE beautiful wife of Ahasuerus, (or Artaxerxes,) king of Persia, gained her celebrity by disobeying her husband. Ahasuerus, who was then the most powerful monarch of the world, reigning over a kingdom stretching from "India to Ethiopia," gave a great feast to the governors of his provinces, his courtiers, and the people who were at his palace of Shushan. This feast lasted seven days, and every man drank wine "according to his pleasure," which means they were very gay, at least. Queen Vashti also gave a feast, at the same time, to the women of her household. On the seventh day, "when the king's heart was merry with wine," he commanded Vashti to be brought before him with the crown-royal on her head, "to show the people and the princes her beauty."

She refused to come. The sacred historian does not inform us why she refused; the presumption is, that the thing was unprecedented, and she considered it, as it was, an outrage of her modesty to show her face to these drunken men. Her courage must have been great as her beauty, thus to have braved the displeasure of her royal and drunken husband.

In his wrath the king instantly referred the matter to his "wise men," who "knew law and judgment;" for since the days of Cyrus the Great, the kingdom of Persia had been, ostensibly, governed by established laws. But it appears there was no law which reached Vashti's case; so the king was advised to repudiate his wife by a royal decree, unjust because retrospective, and issued expressly for her conjugal disobedience. The speech of Memucan, who delivered the opinion of the council, is curious, as showing the reasons which have, usually, (in all countries more or less,) influenced men in making laws for the government of women, namely—what man requires of the sex for his own pleasure and convenience, not that which would be just towards woman, and righteous in the sight of God. See chap. i. of the Book of Esther. What became of Vashti after she was repudiated is not known. These events occurred B. C. 519.

VIPSANIA,

DAUGHTER of Marcus Agrippa, a celebrated Roman general, and mother of Drusus. She was the only one of Agrippa's daughters who died a natural death. She married Tiberius, emperor of Rome, when he was a private man. He repudiated her, and she then married Asinius Gallus.

VIRGINIA,

DAUGHTER of Virginius, a citizen of Rome, and betrothed to Icilius, was seen by Appius Claudius, a Roman decemvir, as she was going to and returning from school. Captivated by her beauty, he resolved to obtain possession of her. In order to carry out this determination, he suborned an abandoned favourite to claim her as the daughter of one of his slaves, who had been placed for a temporary period under the care of Virginius. Though evidence was brought that this story was a fabrication, yet Appius Claudius, who himself filled the office of judge upon this occasion, decreed the young Virginia to be the property of his tool. Virginius, under pretence of wishing to take a last farewell of his child, drew her aside from the wretches who surrounded her, and plunged a knife into her bosom, while she was clinging around his neck.

The soldiers and people, incensed against the cause of this sanguinary catastrophe, instantly dragged Claudius from the seat of justice, and an end was put to the decemviral power, B. C. 450.

The popular tragedy of "Virginius," written by J. Sheridan Knowles, is a vivid portraiture of these events.

VOLUMNIA,

A ROMAN matron, and mother of Coriolanus. When her son, incensed at his banishment from Rome, was marching against it with the Volsci, she went out to meet him, accompanied by his wife Virgilia, and many other Roman matrons, and by her entreaties and persuasions induced him to withdraw his army, though that step was fatal to his own life. To show their respect for the patriotism of Volumnia, the Romans dedicated a temple to Female Fortune. She lived B. C. 488.

In Shakspeare's tragedy of Coriolanus the character of Volumnia is exquisitely portrayed, and appears to have been of a far higher order of moral developement than that of her distinguished son. She was forgiving, self-sacrificing, patriotic: he, proud, selfish, revengeful. Her noble mind subdued his stubborn will because, with womanly fortitude and fidelity, she firmly but lovingly upheld the right, and thus prevented the wrong he would have done. His physical strength was shown to be weakness when contrasted with the power of truth which sustained her gentle spirit. Thus will moral suasion and the faith of love finally triumph over physical strength and mental power.

XANTIPPE,

WIFE of Socrates, the Athenian philosopher, was remarkable for the moroseness and violence of her temper. It is said that Socrates was aware of her character, and married her to exercise his patience. She, however, loved her husband, and mourned his death, which took place about 398 B. C., with the deepest grief. If we take into the account this true love she felt for her husband, and consider what she must have suffered while he was passing his evenings in the society of the beautiful and fascinating Aspasia, we shall hardly wonder at her discontent. If his wife loved him, it must have been for his mind, as he was not endowed with attractions that win the eye and fancy of a woman; and thus loving him, she must have keenly felt the discord between the wisdom of his teachings and the foolishness of his conduct. That he acknowledged her influence over him was good, is a sufficient proof of her true devotion to him; had he been as true to her, he would have been a wiser and a better man; and she, no doubt, a much milder as well as a happier woman.

REMARKS ON THE SECOND ERA.

IN this Era we include the fifteen hundred years following the birth of Jesus Christ. Had an angel been gifted with power to look over the whole inhabited globe on the opening of the eventful year 4004 of the old era, what would have appeared? Everywhere the spectacle of demoralization, despair, and death. Rome, representing the Gentile world, had trodden down with iron heel alike the civilized Greek and barbarian Goth, into a passive state called peace! The temple of Janus was shut; but the flood-gates of sin were opened wide as those of death; and from the corrupt hearts of wicked men such foul streams were poured forth as threatened to overwhelm the race. The moral power of woman was nearly lost; the last struggle of her spirit to retain its love of the Good,—that inner wisdom with which she had been gifted for the special purpose of moulding the souls of the young to her standard,—seemed fast approaching. Patriotism, the holiest emotion of the pagan mind, the proudest virtue of the Roman people, which had given such wonderful power to the men and women of that regal nation—patriotism had hardly a votary in the Eternal City.

The Jews, the chosen people of God, had also touched the lowest point of national degradation—subjection to a foreign power. Their religion had lost its life-giving faith, and become a matter of dead forms or vain pretences, used by the priests for their own profit, and to foster their own pride. Everywhere sins and crimes filled the world. There was no faith in God; no hope in man; no trust in woman. The selfish passions were predominant; the evil, animal nature, triumphed; love had become lust; and the true idea of marriage, the hallowed union of one man with one woman, faithful to each other through life, was treated as an idle jest, a mockery of words never intended to be made true. That this degradation of woman, through the practice of polygamy or by the licentiousness an easy mode of divorce had made common, was the real source of the universal corruptions of society, there can be no doubt. The last of God's inspired messengers, the fervent Malachi, thus reproves the Jewish men, and denounces their sin; adding this emphatic declaration:—

“Therefore take heed to your spirit, and let none deal treacherously with the wife of his youth. For the Lord, the God of Israel, saith that he hateth putting away.”

Yet not only in Rome and throughout the Gentile world was this licentiousness become the rule and fashion of society, but even in Jerusalem, the holy city, king Herod lived openly with his brother's wife, and the people were not troubled by the shame or the sin.

If the angel, whom we have imagined as regarding the awful condition of humanity, had looked around for some barrier to stay this torrent of iniquity, would he have found it in the nature of man? No—there was none who had faith for the office; not even Zacharias, when Gabriel appeared to him and announced the birth of John, would believe the heavenly messenger.

Man's power to sustain the Good and the True being wholly overborne, woman was called to the ministry of salvation. That her nature was of a purer essence, and more in harmony with the things of heaven than man's was, we have shown, conclusively as we think, in the General Preface and in the Biographies of the women of the Old Testament; but the fact that the Saviour of the world, the Son of God, inherited his human nature entirely from his mother, can hardly be too often pressed on the attention of Christians. The Virgin Mary was the human agent, through whose motherly ministry the divine Saviour was nurtured and instructed in his human relations and duties. Women were the first believers in Christ; the first to whom he revealed his spiritual mission; the first to hail his resurrection from the tomb. It is worthy of note, that none of the apostles saw the angels at the sepulchre; to the women only these heavenly messengers revealed themselves; as though the veil of a more earthly nature darkened the vision even of those men chosen by the Saviour to be his especial friends and disciples. But why, if women were thus good, and gifted, and faithful, why was not the public ministry of the gospel committed to them?

We have, in the general preface, shown the reasons why the government of the world and the administration of the ritual laws were confided to men rather than to women. The same reasons apply to the apostleship and to the preaching of the gospel. Where both sexes were to be instructed and reformed, it was necessary each should have its distinct sphere of duty; men were sent forth to preach the word and organize the church; women were to keep their homes sacred as the house of God, and instruct their children in the true faith. The distinctive characteristics of each sex were thus made to contribute their best energies to the advancement of the truth. Yet throughout the whole life of the blessed Redeemer—from his manger-cradle to his blood-stained cross, we trace the predominant sympathy of his nature with that of woman. We trace this in his example and precepts, which were in unison with her character; in his tender love of children; in the sternness with which he rebuked the licentious spirit of man in regard to the law of divorce. When the Pharisees told him what Moses had permitted—

“Jesus answered and said unto them, For the hardness of your hearts he wrote you this precept.

“But from the beginning of the creation God made them male and female.

“For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother and cleave to his wife.

“And they twain shall be one flesh: so then they are no more twain but one flesh.

“What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.”

Thus was the true idea of marriage restored; and it is now, as it was in the beginning, and will be till the end of the world, the keystone in the temple of social improvement, and true civilization. Wherever the Gospel is preached and believed, polygamy is annihilated. What no law or power of man could have done, the law of God, re-affirmed by Jesus Christ, and baptized by the Holy Ghost into the hearts of regenerated men, effected. Then the Christian wife took the Eden seat beside her husband; his soul's companion, his best earthly friend. And soon she was recognised and acknowledged as “the glory of the man.” How beautiful are the glimpses we gain of the feminine character as developed under the first influences of the preached Gospel! Besides the host of women friends whom St. Paul names with warm affection and approval, there was the “honourable women” who waited on his ministry; and Priscilla who was always an helper; and the “elect lady and her children,” to whom the gentle, pure-minded St. John wrote his epistle of love and faith.

Thanks be to God that this blessed Gospel, which seems to have been revealed purposely for the help of woman, was not like the Jewish dispensation, to be confined to one people! No: it was to be preached throughout the world, and to every creature. Wherever this Gospel was made known, women were found ready to receive it. Queens became the nursing mothers of the true Church, and lovely maidens martyrs for its truth. The empress Helena has been widely celebrated for her agency in introducing Christianity into the Roman empire. It may not be as well known that many queens and princesses have the glory of converting their husbands to the true faith, and thus securing the success of the Gospel in France, England, Hungary, Spain, Poland, and Russia. In truth, it was the influence of women that changed the worship of the greater part of Europe from Paganism to Christianity. No wonder these honourable ladies were zealous in the cause of the religion which gave their sex protection in this life and the promise of eternal happiness in the life to come. The zeal with which women—one-half of the human race—sustained the faith and labours of the apostles and first missionaries, was one of the greatest human elements of their success. Could this simple teaching and believing have gone on unhindered, the whole world would long ago have received the Gospel. But truth was perverted by selfish men; monachism established; and the woman's soul, again consigned to ignorance, was bowed to the servile office of ministering to the passions and lusts of men.

Then came the deification of the Virgin Mary; a worship, though false to the word of God, yet of salutary influence over the robbers and tyrants who then ruled the world. Next, chivalry was instituted, partly from the religious sentiment towards woman the worship of the Virgin had awakened, and partly from the necessities of worldly men. But religious sentiment, as a barrier against vice, has never been sufficiently strong to control, though it may for a time check, the corruptions of sin. At the beginning of the fifteenth century, every light of hope was fading or extinguished. The Christian world—so called—was one wide theatre of wars, rapine, and superstition. France, beautiful France, was the focus of anarchy and misery such as the world had not witnessed since the Roman empire was overthrown. The British, brave but brutal soldiers, seemed about to trample the sacred oriflamme of St. Louis in the dust. Charles VII. was a king without a country—all he possessed was a few provinces in the south of France; and even these seemed likely to be soon wrested from him. At this juncture, when the strength of the warriors was overborne, the arm of a simple country maiden interposed, and was the cause of beating back the haughty foe to the limits of his own island home, there to learn that colonization, not conquest, was to make his glory. The Maid of Orleans is the most marvellous person, of either sex, who lived from the time of the apostles to the end of the Era on which we are now entering.

SECOND ERA.

FROM THE BIRTH OF JESUS CHRIST TO THE YEAR 1500

A.

ABASSA,

A SISTER of Haroun al Raschid, caliph of the Saracens, A. D. 786, was so beautiful and accomplished, that the caliph often lamented he was her brother, thinking no other husband could be found worthy of her. To sanction, however, a wish he had of conversing at the same time with the two most enlightened people he knew, he married her to his vizier Giafar, the Barmecide, on condition that Giafar should not regard her as his wife. Giafar, not obeying this injunction, was put to death by order of the enraged caliph, and Abassa was dismissed from his court. She wandered about, sometimes reduced to the extreme of wretchedness, reciting her own story in song, and there are still extant some Arabic verses composed by her, which celebrate her misfortunes. In the divan entitled Juba, Abassa's genius for poetry is mentioned; and a specimen of her composition, in six Arabic lines, addressed to Giafar, her husband, whose society she was restricted by her brother from enjoying, is to be found in a book written by Ben Abon Haydah. She left two children, twins, whom Giafar, before his death, had sent privately to Mecca to be educated.

ABELLA,

A FEMALE writer born at Salerno, in Italy, in the reign of Charles VI. of France, in 1380. She wrote several works on medicine; and, among others, a treatise De atra bili, which was very highly esteemed.

ADELAIDE,

DAUGHTER of Rodolphus, king of Burgundy, married Lotharius II., king of Italy, and after his death, Otho I., emperor of Germany. Her character was exemplary, and she always exerted her influence for the good of her subjects. She died in 999, aged sixty-nine.

ADELAIDE,

WIFE of Louis II. of France, was mother of Charles III., surnamed the Simple, who was king in 598.

ADELAIDE

OF Savoy, daughter of Humbert, count of Maurienne, was queen to Louis VI. of France, and mother of seven sons and a daughter. After the king's death, she married Matthew of Montmorenci, and died 1154.

ADELAIDE,

WIFE of Frederic, prince of Saxony, conspired with Lewis, marquis of Thuringia, against her husband's life, and married the murderer in 1055.

ADELICIA,

OF Louvain, surnamed "The fair Maid of Brabant," was the second wife of Henry I. of England. She was descended from the imperial Carovingian line, and was remarkable for her proficiency in all feminine acquirements. She was very beautiful, and wise in conforming to the tastes of the king, and in affording all possible encouragement to literature and the polite arts. Henry's death happened in 1135, and three years afterwards Adelia contracted a second marriage with William de Albini, who seems to have been "the husband of her choice," by whom she had several children. She died about 1151. Anne Boleyn and Catherine Howard, the victim queens of Henry VIII., were her lineal descendants.

A F R A,

A MARTYR in Crete, during the Dioclesian persecution, which commenced A. D. 303. She was a pagan and a courtesan, but she no sooner heard the Gospel preached than she confessed her sins and was baptized. Her former lovers, enraged at this change, denounced her as a Christian. She was examined, avowed her faith with firmness, and was burnt. Her mother and three servants, who had shared her crimes and repentance, were arrested, as they watched by her tomb, and suffered the same fate.

AGATHA,

A SICILIAN lady, was remarkable for her beauty and talents. Quintius, governor of Sicily, fell in love with her, and made many vain attempts on her virtue When he found Agatha inflexible, his desire changed into resentment, and discovering that she was a Christian, he determined to gratify his revenge. He ordered her to be scourged, burnt with red-hot irons, and torn with sharp hooks. Having borne these torments with admirable fortitude, she was laid naked on live coals mingled with glass, and being carried back to prison, she expired there, in 251.

AGNES, St.

A CHRISTIAN martyr at Rome in the Dioclesian persecution, whose bloody edicts appeared in March, A. D. 303, was only thirteen at the time of her glorious death. Her riches and beauty excited many of the young noblemen of Rome to seek her in marriage; but Agnes answered them all, that she had consecrated herself to a heavenly spouse. Her suitors accused her to the governor as a Christian, not doubting that threats and torments would overcome her resolution. The judge at first employed the mildest persuasions and most inviting promises, to which Agnes paid no attention; he then displayed before her the instruments of torture, with threats of immediate execution, and dragged her before idols, to which she was commanded to sacrifice; but Agnes moved her hand only to make the sign of the cross. The governor, highly exasperated, ordered her to be immediately beheaded; and Agnes went cheerfully to the place of execution. Her body was buried at a small distance from Rome, near the Nonietan road. A church was built on the spot in the time of Constantine the Great.

AGNES,

WIFE of Andrew III., king of Hungary, was the daughter of Albert, emperor of Germany. She distinguished herself by her address and political abilities; but appears to have had more Machiavellian policy than true greatness of mind. After the death of her father, she resided in Switzerland, where her finesse was of great service to her brother, Albert II., with whom the Swiss were at war. She died in 1364.

AGNES DE MERANIA,

DAUGHTER of the duke de Merania, married Philip Augustus, king of France, after he was divorced by his bishops from his wife Ingeborge, sister of the king of Denmark. The Pope declared this second marriage null, and placed France under an interdict till Philip should take back Ingeborge. Philip was at length obliged to do this, and Agnes died of grief the same year, 1201, at Poissy. Her two children were declared legitimate by the Pope.

AGNES

OF France, the only child that Louis VII., of France, had by his third wife, Alix de Champagne, was sent before she was ten years old to marry Cesar Alexis, the young son of Emmanuel Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople. The marriage was celebrated with great pomp, 1179, and the next year Alexis, though then only thirteen, succeeded his father in the government But in 1183 a prince of the same family, Andronicus, deposed and murdered Alexis, forced Agnes to marry him, and ascended the throne. In 1185 Andronicus was deposed and killed. Being thus left a second time a widow, before she was sixteen, Agnes sought for a protector among the Greek nobility, and her choice fell on Theodore Branas, who defended her cause so well, that when the crusaders took Constantinople, they gave him the city of Napoli, and that of Adrianople, his country, and of Didymoticos. He soon after married Agnes, and the rest of her life, so stormy in its commencement, was passed very tranquilly.

AGNES SOREL,

A NATIVE of Fromenteau, in Lorraine, was maid of honour to Isabella of Lorraine, sister-in-law of the queen of Charles VII. of France. The king became enamoured of her, and at last abandoned the cares of government for her society. But Agnes roused him from enervating repose to deeds of glory, and induced him to attack the English, who were ravaging France. She maintained her influence over him till her death, 1450, at the age of thirty-nine. Some have falsely reported that she was poisoned by the orders of the dauphin, Louis XI. From her beauty, she was called the fairest of the fair, and she possessed great mental powers. She bore three daughters to Charles VII., who were openly acknowledged by him.

She herself relates, that an astrologer, whom she had previously instructed, being admitted to her presence, said before Charles, that unless the stars were deceivers, she had inspired a lasting passion in a great monarch. Turning to the king, Agnes said, "Sire, suffer me to fulfil my destiny, to retire from your court to that of the king of England; Henry, who is about to add to his own the crown you relinquish, is doubtless the object of this prediction." The severity of this reproof effectually roused Charles from his indolence and supineness.

The tomb of Agnes was strewed with flowers by the poets of France. Even Louis, when he came to the throne, was far from treating her memory with disrespect. The canons of Loches, from a servile desire to gratify the reigning monarch, had, notwithstanding her liberalities to their church, proposed to destroy her mausoleum. Louis reproached them with their ingratitude, ordered them to fulfil all her injunctions, and added six thousand livres to the charitable donations which she had originally made.

Francis I. honoured and cherished her memory. The four lines made on her by that prince, are well known :

Gentille Agnes ! plus d'honneur tu merite,
La cause étant de France recouvrer,
Que ce que pent dans un cloître ouvrir
C'laue Nonain, ou bien devote hermite."

AISHA,

A POETESS of Spain, during the time that the Moors had possession of that kingdom. She was a daughter of the duke of Ahmedi, and her poems and orations were frequently read with applause in the royal academy of Corduba. She was a virtuous character, lived unmarried, and left behind her many monuments of her genius, and a large and well-selected library. She lived in the twelfth century.

ALDRUDE,

COUNTESS de Bertinoro, in Italy, of the illustrious house of Frangipani, is celebrated, by the writers of her time, for her beauty, magnificence, courtesy, and generosity. She was left a widow in the bloom of youth, and her court became the resort of all the Italian chivalry. When Ancona was besieged by the imperial troops, in 1172, and was reduced to extremity, the Anconians appealed for assistance to William degli Adelardi, a noble and powerful citizen of Ferrara, and to the countess de Bertinoro, who immediately hastened to their relief.

The combined forces reached Ancona at the close of day, and encamped on a height which overlooked the tents of the besiegers. William then assembled the forces, and having harangued them, Aldrude rose, and addressed the soldiers as follows :

"Fortified and encouraged by the favour of Heaven, I have, contrary to the customs of my sex, determined to address you. A plain exhortation, destitute of precision or ornament, should it fail to flatter the ear, may yet serve to rouse the mind. I solemnly swear to you, that, on the present occasion, no views of interest, no dreams of ambition, have impelled me to succour the besieged. Since the death of my husband, I have found myself, though plunged in sorrow, unresisted mistress of his domains. The preservation of my numerous possessions, to which my wishes are limited, affords an occupation sufficiently arduous for my sex and capacity. But the perils which encompass the wretched Anconians, the prayers and tears of their women, justly dreading to fall into the hands of an enemy, who, governed by brutal rapacity, spare neither sex nor age, have animated me to hasten to their aid.

"To relieve a people, consumed by famine, exhausted by resistance, and exposed to calamities, I have left my dominions, and come hither with my son, who, though still a child, recalls to my remembrance the great soul of his father, by whom the same zeal, the same courage, was ever displayed for the protection of the oppressed. And you, warriors of Lombardy and Romagne, not less illustrious for fidelity to your engagements than renowned for valour in the field ; you, whom the same cause has brought here, to obey the orders and emulate the example of William Adelardi, who, listening only to his generosity and love of freedom, has scrupled not to engage his possessions, his friends, and his vassals, for the deliverance of Ancona. A conduct so generous, so worthy of praise, requires no comment ; beneath our sense of its magnanimity, language fails. It is by those only who are truly great, that virtue is esteemed more than riches or honours, or that virtuous actions can be duly appreciated. An enterprise, so full of glory, has already nearly succeeded ; already have you passed through the defiles occupied by the enemy, and pitched your tents in the hostile country. It is now time that the seed which was scattered, should bring forth its fruit ; it is time to make trial of your strength, and of that valour for which you are distinguished. Courage is relaxed by delay. Let the dawn of day find you under arms, that the sun may illumine the victory promised by the Most High to your pity for the unfortunate."

The exhortation of the countess was received by the soldiery with unbounded applause, mingled with the sound of trumpets and the clashing of arms. The enemy, alarmed at the approach of so large a force, retreated during the night, so that the assailants had no opportunity of proving their bravery.

After this bloodless victory, the combined troops remained encamped near Ancona, till it was no longer endangered by the vicinity of its enemies, and till an abundant supply of provisions was brought into the city. The Anconians came out to thank their gallant deliverers, to whom they offered magnificent presents.

Aldrude, with her army, on her return to her dominions, encountered parties of the retreating enemy, whom they engaged in skirmishes, in all of which they came off victorious. The time of her death is not recorded.

ALICE,

QUEEN of France, wife of Louis VII., was the third daughter of Thibaut the Great, count of Champagne. The princess received a careful education in the magnificent court of her father ; and being beautiful, amiable, intelligent, and imaginative, Louis VII., on the death of his second wife, in 1160, fell in love with her, and demanded her of her father. To cement the union more strongly, two daughters of the king by his first wife, Eleanor of Guienne, were married to the two eldest sons of the count. In 1165, she had a son, to the great joy of Louis, afterwards the celebrated Philip Augustus. Beloved by her husband, whose ill-health rendered him unequal to the duties of his station, Alice not only assisted him in conducting the affairs of the nation, but superintended the education of her son.

Louis died in 1180, having appointed Alice to the regency; but Philip Augustus being married to Isabella of Hainault, niece to the earl of Flanders, this nobleman disputed the authority of Alice. Philip, at last, sided with the earl; and his mother, with her brothers, was obliged to leave the court. She appealed to Henry II. of England, who was delighted to assist the mother against the son, as Philip was constantly inciting his sons to acts of rebellion against him. Philip marched against them; but Henry, unwilling to give him battle, commenced negotiations with him, and succeeded in reconciling the king to his mother and uncles. Philip also agreed to pay her a sum equal to five shillings and ten pence English per day, for her maintenance, and to give up her dowry, with the exception of the fortified places.

Alice again began to take an active part in the government; and her son was so well satisfied with her conduct, that, in 1190, on going to the Holy Land, he confided, by the advice of his barons, the education of his son, and the regency of the kingdom, to Alice and her brother, the cardinal archbishop of Rheims. During the absence of the king, some ecclesiastical disturbances happened, which were carried before the pope. The prerogative of Philip, and the letters of Alice to Rome concerning it, were full of force and grandeur. She remonstrated upon the enormity of taking advantage of an absence caused by such a motive; and demanded that things should at least be left in the same situation, till the return of her son. By this firmness she obtained her point. Philip returned in 1192, and history takes no other notice of Alice afterwards, than to mention some religious houses which she founded. She died at Paris, in 1205.

ALICE

OF France, second daughter of Louis VII. of France, and of Alice of Champagne, was betrothed, at the age of fourteen, to Richard Cœur de Lion, second son of Henry II. of England. She was taken to that country to learn the language, where her beauty made such an impression that Henry II., though then an old man, became one of her admirers. He placed her in the castle of Woodstock, where his mistress, the celebrated Rosamond Clifford, had been murdered, as was then reported, by his jealous wife, Eleanor of Guienne. Alice is said to have taken the place of Rosamond; at any rate, Henry's conduct to her so irritated Richard, that, incited by his mother, he took up arms against his father. Henry's death, in 1189, put an end to this unhappy position of affairs; but when Richard was urged by Philip Augustus of France to fulfil his engagement to his sister Alice, Richard refused, alleging that she had had a daughter by his father. The subsequent marriage of Richard with Berengaria of Navarre, so enraged Philip Augustus, that from that time he became the relentless enemy of the English king.

Alice returned to France, and in 1195 she married William III., count of Ponthieu. She was the victim of the licentious passions of the English monarch. Had she been as happily married as her mother, she would, probably, have showed as amiable a disposition, and a mind of like excellence.

ALOARA,

AN Italian princess, daughter of a count named Peter. She was married to Pandulph, surnamed Ironhead, who styled himself prince, duke, and marquis. He was, by inheritance, prince of Capua and Benevento, and the most potent nobleman in Italy. He died at Capua, in 981, leaving five sons by Aloara, all of whom were unfortunate, and three of them died violent deaths. Aloara began to reign conjointly with one of her sons in 982, and governed with wisdom and courage. She died in 992.

It is asserted that Aloara put to death her nephew, lest he should wrest the principality from her son; and, that St. Nil then predicted the failure of her posterity.

ALPAIDE

WAS the beautiful wife of Pepin D'Heristal of France, after his divorce from his first wife, Plectrude. This union was censured by Lambert, bishop of Liege; and Alpaide induced her brother Dodan to murder the bold ecclesiastic. After her husband's death she retired to a convent near Namur, where she died. She was the mother of Charles Martel, who was born in 686.

ALPHAIZULI,

MARIA, a poetess of Seville, who lived in the eighth century. She was called the Arabian Sappho, being of Moorish extraction. Excellent works of hers are in the library of the Escorial. Many Spanish women of that time cultivated the muses with success, particularly the Andalusians.

AMALASONTHA,

DAUGHTER of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, was mother of Athalaric, by Eutharic. She inherited her father's possessions, as guardian of her son; but by endeavouring to educate him in the manners and learning of the more polished Romans, she offended her nobles, who conspired against her, and obtained the government of the young prince. Athalaric was injured, by them, to debauchery, and he sunk under his excesses, at the early age of seventeen, in the year 534. The afflicted mother knew not how to support herself against her rebellious subjects, but by taking as her husband and partner on the throne, her cousin Theodatus, who, to his everlasting infamy, caused her to be strangled in a bath, 534. For learning or humanity she had few equals. She received and conversed with ambassadors from various nations without the aid of an interpreter.

The emperor of Constantinople sent an army against the murderer, under the celebrated general Belisarius, who defeated and dethroned him.

AMBOISE,

FRANCES D', daughter of Louis d'Amboise, is celebrated for the improvement she introduced in the manners and sentiments of the Bretons. She was wife of Peter II., duke of Brittany, whose great inhumanity to her she bore with Christian resignation, and which she opposed with a gentleness and moderation that gradually gained his affections and confidence.

She rendered moderation and temperance fashionable, not only at court, but throughout the city of Rennes, where she resided; and when the duke, desirous of profiting by this economy, proposed laying a new impost upon the people, the duchess persuaded him against it. She used all her influence over her husband for the good of the public, and the advancement of religion.

When Peter was seized with his last illness, his disorder, not being understood by the physicians, was ascribed to magic, and it was proposed to seek a necromancer to counteract the spell under which he suffered; but the good sense of the duchess led her to reject this expedient. Her husband died October, 1457. His successor treated her with indignity, and her father wished her to marry the prince of Savoy, in order to obtain a protector. But the duchess determined to devote herself to the memory of her husband, and when M. d'Amboise attempted to force her to yield to his wishes, she took refuge in the convent des Trois Maries, near Vannes, where she assumed the Carmelite habit. She died October 4th, 1485.

ANACOANA,

QUEEN of Xiragua in the island of St. Domingo, was cruelly put to death by Ovando, who owed her, agreeably to the promises of Bartholomew Columbus, both friendship and protection.

ANASTASIA,

A CHRISTIAN martyr at Rome, in the Dioclesian persecution. Her father, Prebextal, was a pagan, and her mother, Flausta, a Christian, who instructed her in the principles of her own religion. After the death of her mother, she was married to Publius Patricius, a Roman knight, who obtained a rich patrimony with her; but he no sooner discovered her to be a Christian, than he treated her harshly, confined her, and kept her almost in want of necessaries, while he spent her wealth in all kinds of extravagance. He died in the course of a few years, and Anastasia devoted herself to the study of the Scriptures and to works of charity, spending her whole fortune in the relief of the poor, and the Christians, by whom the prisons were then filled.

But she, and three of her female servants, sisters, were soon arrested as Christians, and commanded to sacrifice to idols. Refusing to do this, the three sisters were put to death on the spot, and Anastasia conducted to prison. She was then exiled to the island of Palmaria; but soon afterwards brought back to Rome and burned alive. Her remains were buried in a garden by Apollonia, a Christian woman, and a church afterwards built on the spot. Anastasia suffered about A. D. 303.

ANASTASIA,

SAINT. Several eminently pious women are known by that name. The earliest and most famous among them lived at Corinth, about the time when St. Paul preached the gospel in that city. She heard the apostle, and was seized with a firm conviction that the doctrines inculcated by that eminent disciple of Christ were true. She joined the Christian church without the knowledge of her parents and relations. Although betrothed to a Corinthian whose interests made him hostile to the introduction of the new religion, she nevertheless suffered neither persuasion nor threats to shake her in her enthusiasm for the new faith. She prevailed even so far upon her lover as to make him resolve to become a Christian. Finally she was compelled, on account of persecution, to conceal herself in a vault. But her lover, to whom she had declared her intention of living the life of a virgin devoted to God, betrayed her retreat. Every attempt to make her recant proved fruitless. She suffered the death of a martyr; and her lover died soon afterwards, a victim to remorse and grief. Petrarch mentions her several times in his poems.

ANGELBERGA, or INGELBERGA,

EMPRESS of the West, wife of Louis II., emperor and king of Italy, is supposed to have been of illustrious birth, though that is uncertain. She was a woman of courage and ability; but proud, unfeeling, and vengeful. The war in which her husband was involved with the king of Germany was rendered unfortunate by the pride and rapacity of Angelberga. In 874, Angelberga built, at Plaisance, a monastery which afterwards became one of the most famous in Italy. Louis II. died at Brescia in 875. After his death, Angelberga remained at the convent of St. Julia in Brescia, where her treasures were deposited. In 881, Charles the Fat, of France, caused Angelberga to be taken and carried prisoner into Germany; lest she should assist her daughter Hermengard, who had married Boron king of Provence, a connection of Charles, by her wealth and political knowledge: but the pope obtained her release. It is not known when she died. She had two daughters, Hermengard, who survived her, and Gisela, abbess of St. Julia, who died before her parents.

ANNA,

A JEWISH prophetess, the daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher. She had been early married, and had lived seven years with her husband. After his death, she devoted herself to the service of God, and while thus employed, finding the virgin Mary with her son in the temple, she joined with the venerable Simeon in thanking God for him, and bearing testimony to him as the promised Messiah. It is worth remarking, that these two early testifiers of our Saviour's mission being both far advanced in life, could not be liable to the most distant suspicion of collusion with Joseph and Mary in palming a false Messiah on their countrymen, as they had not the smallest probable chance of living to see him grow up to maturity, and fulfil their prophecies, and therefore could have no interest in declaring a falsehood. Thus we find the advent of our Lord was made known, spiritually, to woman as well as to man. The good old Simeon had no clearer revelation than the aged devout Anna. Both were inspired servants of the Most High; but here the characteristic piety of the woman is shown to excel. Simeon dwelt "in Jerusalem," probably engaged in secular pursuits; Anna "departed not from the temple, but served God with fasting and prayers night and day." See St. Luke, chap. ii.

ANNE

Or Bohemia, daughter of the emperor Charles IV., was born about 1367, and was married to Richard II. of England, when she was fifteen years of age. This was just after the insurrection of Wat Tyler; and the executions of the poor, oppressed people who had taken part with him, had been bloody and barbarous beyond all precedent, even in that bloody age. At the young queen's earnest request, a general pardon was granted by the king; this mediation obtained for Richard's bride the title of "the good queen Anne." Never did she forfeit the appellation, or lose the love of her subjects.

She was the first in that illustrious band of princesses who were "the nursing mothers of the Reformation;" and by her influence the life of Wickliffe was saved, when in great danger at the council at Lambeth, in 1382. Anne died 1394; she left no children; and from the time of her decease all good angels seem to have abandoned her always affectionate, but weak and unfortunate husband.

ANNE BOLEYN,

OR, more properly, BULLEN, was the daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen, the representative of an ancient and noble family in Norfolk. Anne was born in 1507, and in 1514 was carried to France by Mary, the sister of Henry VIII. of England, when she went to marry Louis XII. After the death of Louis, Mary returned to England, but Anne remained in France, in the service of Claude, wife of Francis I.; and, after her death, with the duchess of Alençon. The beauty and accomplishments of Anne, even at that early age, attracted great admiration in the French court.

She returned to England, and, about 1526, became maid of honour to Katharine of Arragon, wife of Henry VIII. Here she was receiving the addresses of Lord Percy, eldest son of the duke of Northumberland, when Henry fell violently in love with her. But Anne resolutely resisted his passion, either from principle or policy; and at length the king's impatience induced him to set on foot the divorce of Katharine, which was executed with great solemnity. The pope, however, would not consent to this proceeding; so Henry disowned his authority and threw off his yoke.

He married Anne privately, on the 14th of November, 1532. The marriage was made public on Easter-eve, 1533, and Anne was crowned the 1st of June. Her daughter Elizabeth, afterwards queen, was born on the 7th of the following September. Anne continued to be much beloved by the king, till 1536, when the disappointment caused by the birth of a still-born son, and the charms of one of her maids of honour, Jane Seymour, alienated his affections, and turned his love to hatred.

He caused her, on very slight grounds, to be indicted for high treason, in allowing her brother, the viscount of Rochford, and four other persons, to invade the king's conjugal rights, and she was taken to the Tower, from which she addressed the following touching letter to the king:

"SIR,

"Your grace's displeasure, and my imprisonment, are things so strange unto me, as what to write, or what to excuse, I am altogether ignorant. Whereas you send unto me, willing me to confess a truth, and so obtain your favour, by such an one whom I know to be mine ancient professed enemy, I no sooner received this message by him, than I rightly conceived your meaning; and if, as you say, confessing a truth indeed may procure my safety, I shall with all willingness and duty perform your command.

"But let not your grace ever imagine, that your poor wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault, when not so much as a thought thereof preceded. And, to speak a truth, never prince had wife more loyal in all duty, and in all true affection, than you have ever found in Anne Boleyn; with which name and place I could willingly have contented myself, if God and your grace's pleasure had been so pleased. Neither did I at any time so far forget myself in my exaltation or received queenship, but that I always looked for such an alteration as I now find; for the ground of my preferment being on no surer foundation than your grace's fancy, the least alteration I knew was fit and sufficient to draw that fancy to some other object. You have chosen me from a low estate to be your queen and companion, far beyond my desert or desire. If then you found me worthy of such honour, good your grace let not any light fancy, or bad counsel of mine enemies, withdraw your princely favour from me; neither let that stain, that unworthy stain, of a disloyal heart towards your good grace, ever cast so foul a blot on your most dutiful wife, and the infant princess your daughter. Try me, good king, but let me have a lawful trial, and let not my sworn enemies sit as my accusers and judges; yea, let me receive an open trial, for my truth shall fear no open shame; then shall you see either mine innocence cleared, your suspicions and conscience satisfied, the ignominy and slander of the world stopped, or my guilt openly declared. So that whatsoever God or you may determine of me, your grace may be freed from an open censure; and mine offence being so lawfully proved, your grace is at liberty both before God and man, not only to execute worthy punishment on me as an unlawful wife, but to follow your affection already settled on that party for whose sake I am now as I am, whose name I could some good while since have pointed unto, your grace not being ignorant of my suspicions therein.

"But, if you have already determined of me, and that not only my death, but an infamous slander, must bring you the enjoying of your desired happiness, then I desire of God that he will pardon your great sin therein, and likewise mine enemies, the instruments thereof, and that he will not call you to a strict account for your unprincely and cruel usage of me, at his general judgment-seat, where both you and myself must shortly appear, and in whose judgment I doubt not, whatsoever the world may think of me, mine innocence shall be openly known and sufficiently cleared. My last and only request shall be, that myself may only bear the burden of your grace's displeasure, and that it may not touch the innocent souls of those poor gentlemen who, as I understand, are likewise in strait imprisonment for my sake. If ever I have found favour in your sight, if ever the name of Anne Boleyn hath been pleasing in your ears, then let me obtain this request, and I will so leave to trouble your grace any farther, with mine earnest prayers to the Trinity to have your grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions. From my doleful prison in the Tower, this sixth of May.

"Your most loyal and ever faithful wife,

"ANNE BOLEYN."

This pathetic and eloquent address failed to touch the heart of the tyrant, whom licentious and selfish gratification had steeled against her.

Norris, Weston, Brereton, and Smeton, the four gentlemen who were accused with her, were brought to trial; but no legal evidence could be produced against them, nor were they confronted by the queen. Smeton, by a vain hope of life, was induced to confess his guilt; but even her enemies despaired of gaining any advantage from this confession, and he was immediately executed, together with Weston and Brereton. Norris, a favourite of the king, was offered his life if he would criminate Anne, but he replied, that rather than calumniate an innocent person, he would die a thousand deaths.

Anne and her brother were tried by a jury of peers, of which their uncle, the duke of Norfolk, one of Anne's most inveterate enemies, was president. The sittings of this commission were secret, and all records of its proceedings were immediately destroyed; none of the ladies of the queen's household were examined; and the queen was unassisted by legal advisers, but, notwithstanding the indecent impatience of the president, she defended herself with so much clearness and presence of mind, that she was unanimously believed guiltless. Judgment was however passed against her and her brother, and she was sentenced to be burned or beheaded, according to the king's pleasure. Not satisfied with annulling the marriage, Henry had her daughter Elizabeth declared illegitimate.

The queen, hopeless of redress, prepared to submit without repining. In her last message to the king, she acknowledged obligation to him, for having advanced her from a private gentlewoman, first to the dignity of a marchioness, and afterwards to the throne; and now, since he could raise her no higher in this world, he was sending her to be a saint in heaven. She earnestly recommended her daughter to his care, and renewed her protestations of innocence and fidelity. She made the same declarations to all who approached her, and behaved not only with serenity, but with her usual cheerfulness. "The executioner," said she to the lieutenant of the Tower, "is, I hear, very expert; and my neck (grasping it with her hand, and laughing heartily,) is very slender."

When brought to the scaffold, she assumed a more humble tone, recollecting the obstinacy of her predecessor, and its effects upon her daughter Mary; maternal love triumphed over the just indignation of the sufferer. She said she came to die, as she was sentenced by the law; that she would accuse no one, nor advert to the ground upon which she was judged. She prayed fervently for the king, calling him a most merciful and gentle prince, and acknowledging that he had been to her a good and gracious sovereign. She added, that if any one should think proper to canvass her cause, she desired him to judge the best. She was beheaded by the executioner of Calais, who was brought over for the purpose, as being particularly expert. Her body was thrown into a common elm chest, made to hold arrows, and buried in the Tower.

The innocence of Anne Boleyn can hardly be questioned. The tyrant himself knew not whom to accuse as her lover; and no proof was brought against any of the persons named. An occasional levity and condescension, unbecoming the rank to which she was elevated, is all that can be charged against her. Henry's marriage to Jane Seymour, the very day after Anne's execution, shows clearly his object in obtaining her death.

It was through the influence of Anne Boleyn that the translation of the Scriptures was sanctioned by Henry VIII. Her own private copy of Tindal's translation is still in existence. She was a woman of a highly cultivated mind, and there are still extant some verses composed by her, shortly before her execution, which are touching, from the grief and desolation they express. The following is an extract from them:

"O Dethel! rocke me on sleepe,
 Bringe me on quiet rest;
 Let pass my very guiltlesse goste
 Out of my carefull breste.
 Toll on the passinge bell,
 Ringe out the doleful knell,
 Let the sounde my dethe tell,
 For I must dye,
 There is no remedy,
 For now I dye.
 * * * * *
 "Farewell my pleasures past,
 Welcum my present payne!
 I fele my tormentes so increse
 That lyfe cannot remayne.
 Cease now the passinge bell,
 Rong is my doleful knell,
 For the sounde my dethe doth tell;
 Dethel doth draw nye,
 Sounde my end dolefully;
 For now I dye."

ANNE

OF Beaujeau, eldest daughter of Louis XI. of France, born in 1462, was early distinguished for genius, sagacity, and penetration, added to an aspiring temper. Louis, in the jealous policy which characterized him, married her to Pierre de Bourbon, sire de Beaujeu, a prince of slender fortune, moderate capacity, and a quiet, unambitious nature. The friends of Anne observed on these nuptials, that it was the union of a living with a dead body. Pierre, either through indolence, or from a discovery of the superior endowments of his wife, left her uncontrolled mistress of his household, passing, himself, the greatest part of his time in retirement, in the Beaujolais.

On the death-bed of Louis, his jealousy of his daughter, then only twenty-six, gave place to confidence in her talents: having constituted her husband lieutenant-general of the kingdom, he bequeathed the reins of empire, with the title of governess, to the lady of Beaujeu, during the minority of her brother, Charles VIII., a youth of fourteen. Anne fully justified, by her capacity, the choice of her father.

Two competitors disputed the will of the late monarch, and the pretensions of Anne; her husband's brother, John, duke de Bourbon, and Louis, duke of Orleans, presumptive heir to the crown; but Anne conducted herself with such admirable firmness and prudence, that she obtained the nomination of the states-general in her favour. By acts of popular justice, she conciliated the confidence of the nation; and she appeased the duke de Bourbon by bestowing on him the sword of the constable of France, which he had long been ambitious to obtain. But the duke of Orleans was not so easily satisfied. He, too, was her brother-in-law, having been married, against his own wishes, by Louis XI. to his younger daughter, Jeanne, who was somewhat deformed. Having offended Anne by some passionate expressions, she ordered him to be arrested; but he fled to his castle on the Loire, where, being besieged by Anne, he was compelled to surrender, and seek shelter in Brittany, under the protection of Francis II.

The union of Brittany with the crown of France, had long been a favourite project of the lady of Beaujeu, and she at first attempted to obtain possession of it by force of arms. The duke of Orleans commanded the Bretons against the forces of Anne, but was taken prisoner and detained for more than two years. Philip de Comines, the celebrated historian, also suffered an imprisonment of three years, for carrying on a treasonable correspondence with the duke of Orleans. Peace with Brittany was at length concluded, and the province was annexed to the crown of France, by the marriage of the young duchess, Anne of Brittany, who had succeeded to her father's domain, to Charles VIII. of France.

The lustre thrown over the regency of Anne, by the acquisition of Brittany, received some diminution by the restoration of the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne to the king of Spain. Anne became duchess of Bourbon in 1488, by the death of John, her husband's elder brother; and though, before this, Charles VIII. had assumed the government, she always retained a rank in the council of state. Charles VIII. dying without issue in 1498, was succeeded by the duke of Orleans: and Anne dreaded, and with reason, lest he should revenge himself for the severity she had exercised towards him; but, saying "That it became not a king of France to revenge the quarrels of the duke of Orleans," he continued to allow her a place in the council.

The duke de Bourbon died in 1503; and Anne survived him till November 14th, 1522. They left one child, Susanne, heiress to the vast possessions of the family of Bourbon, who married her cousin, the celebrated and unfortunate Charles de Montpensier, constable of Bourbon.

ANNE,

OF Bretagne, or Brittany, only daughter and heiress of Francis II., duke of Bretagne, was born at Nantz, Jan. 26th, 1476. She was carefully educated, and gave early indications of great beauty and intelligence. When only five years old, she was betrothed to Edward, prince of Wales, son of Edward IV., of England. But his tragical death, two years after, dissolved the contract. She was next demanded in marriage by Louis, duke of Orleans, presumptive heir to the throne of France, who had taken refuge in Bretagne, to avoid the displeasure of Anne of Beaujeu, governess of France; and Anne of Bretagne, though but fourteen, was supposed to favour his pretensions.

The death of her father, in 1490, which left her an unprotected orphan, and heiress of a spacious domain, at the time when the duke of Orleans was detained a prisoner by Anne of Beaujeu, forced her to seek some other protector; and she was married by proxy to Maximilian, emperor of Austria. But Anne of Beaujeu, determined to obtain possession of Bretagne, and despairing of conquering it by her arms, resolved to accomplish her purpose by effecting a marriage between her young brother, Charles VIII., of France, and Anne of Bretagne. Charles VIII. had been affianced to Margaret, daughter of Maximilian, by a former marriage; the princess had been educated in France, and had assumed the title of queen, although, on account of her youth, the marriage had been delayed. But the lady of Beaujeu scrupled not to violate her engagements, and, sending back Margaret to her father, she surrounded Bretagne with the armies of France.

Anne of Bretagne resisted for a time this rough courtship; but, vanquished by the persuasion of the duke of Orleans, who had been released from captivity on condition of pleading the suit of Charles, she yielded a reluctant consent, and the marriage was celebrated, Dec. 16th, 1491.

Anne soon became attached to her husband, who was an amiable though a weak prince, and on his death, in 1498, she abandoned herself to the deepest grief. She retired to her hereditary domains, where she affected the rights of an independent sovereign.

Louis, duke of Orleans, succeeded Charles VIII. under the title of Louis XII., and soon renewed his former suit to Anne, who had never entirely lost the preference she had once felt for him. The first use Louis made of his regal power was to procure a divorce from the unfortunate Jeanne, daughter to Louis XI., who was personally deformed, and whom he had been forced to marry. Jeanne, with the sweetness and resignation that marked her whole life, submitted to the sentence, and retired to a convent. Soon after, Louis married Anne at Nantes.

Anne retained great influence over her husband throughout her whole life, by her beauty, amiability, and the purity of her manners. She was a liberal rewarder of merit, and patroness of learning and literary men. Her piety was fervent and sincere, though rather superstitious; but she was proud, her determination sometimes amounted to obstinacy, and, when she thought herself justly offended, she knew not how to forgive. She retained her attachment to Bretagne while queen of France, and sometimes exercised her influence over the king in a manner detrimental to the interests of her adopted country. Louis XII. was sensible that he frequently yielded too much to her, but her many noble and lovely qualities endeared her to him.

Anne died, January 9th, 1514, at the age of thirty-seven, and Louis mourned her loss with the most sincere sorrow.

ANNE,

Of Cleves, daughter of John III., duke of Cleves, was the fourth wife of Henry VIII., of England. He had fallen in love with her from her portrait painted by Holbein, but as the painter had flattered her, Henry soon became disgusted with her, and obtained a divorce from her. Anne yielded without a struggle, or without apparent concern. She passed nearly all the rest of her life in England as a private personage, and died 1557.

ANNE,

Of Cyprus, married, in 1431, Louis, duke of Savoy, and showed herself able, active, and discriminating, at the head of public affairs. She died in 1462.

ANNE,

Of Hungary, daughter of Ladislaus VI., married Ferdinand of Austria, and placed him on the throne of Bohemia. She died in 1547.

ANNE,

Of Russia, daughter of Jaraslaus, married Henry I., of France, in 1044; after his death, she married Raoul, who was allied to her first husband; in consequence of which she was excommunicated, and at last repudiated, when she returned to Russia.

ANNE,

Duchess of the Viennois, after the death of her brother, John I., defended her rights with great courage and success against the claims of Robert, duke of Burgundy. She died in 1296.

ANNE,

Of Warwick, was born at Warwick Castle, in 1454. She was almost entirely educated at Calais, though she was often brought to England with her older sister, Isabel, and seems to have been a favourite companion, from her childhood, of the duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III., who was two years older than herself. In August, 1470, Anne was married, at Angers, France, to Edward of Lancaster, son of Henry VI., and Margaret of Anjou, and rightful heir of the English throne. She was very much attached to him, and, when he was barbarously murdered after the fatal battle of Tewksbury, in 1471, she mourned him bitterly. She disguised herself as a cook-maid, in a mean house in London, to elude the search of Gloucester, who was much attached to her. She was, however, discovered by him, and, after a resolute resistance, forced to marry him in 1473. There are strong proofs that Anne never consented to this marriage. Her son Edward was born at Middleham Castle, 1474. By a series of crimes, Richard obtained the throne of England, and was crowned, with his consort, July 5th, 1483. In 1484, Anne's only son died, and from this time her health declined. There were rumours that the king intended to divorce her, but her death, in 1485, spared him that sin. She had suffered all her life from the crimes of others, and yet her sorrows and calamities seem to have been borne with great meekness, and till the death of her son, with fortitude.

ANTONINA,

The infamous wife of Belisarius, the general of the emperor Justinian's army, and one of the greatest commanders of his age. She repeatedly dishonoured her husband by her infidelities, and persecuted Photius, her own son, with the utmost virulence, because he discovered her intrigues, and revealed them to his step-father. In the language of Gibbon, "She was, in the various situations of fortune, the companion, the enemy, the servant, and the favourite, of the empress Theodora, a woman as wicked and worthless as herself." She lived in the sixth century.

APOLLONIA, ST.,

A MARTYR at Alexandria, A. D. 248. In her old age, she was threatened with death if she did not join with her persecutors in pronouncing certain profane words. After beating her, and knocking out her teeth, they brought her to the fire, which they had lighted without the city. Begging a short respite, she was set free, and immediately threw herself into the fire, and was consumed

ARC, JOAN OF,

GENERALLY called the Maid of Orleans, was born in 1410, at the little village of Domremy, in Lorraine. Her father was named Jacques d'Arc, and his wife, Isabella Romee; Isabella had already four children, two boys and two girls, when Joan was born, and baptized Sibylla Jeanne. She was piously brought up by her mother, and was often accustomed to nurse the sick, assist the poor, receive travellers, and take care of her father's flock of sheep; but she was generally employed in sewing or spinning. She also spent a great deal of time in a chestnut grove, near her father's cottage. She was noted, even when a child, for the sweetness of her temper, her prudence, her industry, and her devotion.

During that period of anarchy in France, when the supreme power, which had fallen from the hands of a monarch deprived of his reason, was disputed for by the rival houses of Orleans and Burgundy, the contending parties carried on war more by murder and massacre than by regular battles. When an army was wanted, both had recourse to the English, and these conquering strangers made the unfortunate French feel still deeper the horrors and ravages of war. At first, the popular feeling was undecided; but when, on the death of Charles VI., the crown fell to a young prince who adopted the Armagnac side, whilst the house of Burgundy had sworn allegiance to a foreigner (Henry V.) as king of France, then, indeed, the wishes and interests of all the French were in favour of the Armagnacs, or the truly patriotic party. Remote as was the village of Domremy, it was still interested in the issue of the struggle. It was decidedly Armagnac, and was strengthened in this sentiment by the rivalry of a neighbouring village which adopted Burgundian colours.

Political and party interests were thus forced upon the enthusiastic mind of Joan, and mingled with the pious legends which she had caught from the traditions of the Virgin. A prophecy was current, that a virgin should rid France of its enemies; and this prediction seems to have been realized by its effect upon the mind of Joan. The girl, by her own account, was about thirteen when a supernatural vision first appeared to her. She describes it as a great light, accompanied by a voice telling her to be devout and good, and promising her the protection of heaven. Joan responded by a vow of eternal chastity. In this there appears nothing beyond the effect of imagination. From that time, the voice or voices continued to haunt Joan, and to echo the enthusiastic and restless wishes of her own heart. We shall not lay much stress on her declarations made before those who were appointed by the king to inquire into the credibility of her mission. Her own simple and early account was, that 'voices' were her visitors and advisers; and that they prompted her to quit her native place, take up arms, drive the foe before her, and procure for the young king his coronation at Rheims. These voices, however, had not influence enough to induce her to set out upon the hazardous mission, until a band of Burgundians, traversing and plundering the country, had compelled Joan, together with her parents, to take refuge in a neighbouring town; when they returned to their village, after the departure of the marauders, they found the church of Domremy in ashes. Such incidents were well calculated to arouse the indignation and excite the enthusiasm of Joan. Her voices returned, and incessantly directed her to set out for France; but to commence by making application to De Baudricourt, commander at Vaucouleurs. Her parents, who were acquainted with Joan's martial propensities, attempted to force her into a marriage; but she contrived to avoid this by paying a visit to an uncle, in whose company she made her appearance before the governor of Vaucouleurs, in May, 1428. De Baudricourt at first refused to see her, and, upon granting an interview, treated her pretensions with contempt. She then returned to her uncle's abode, where she continued to announce her project, and to insist that the prophecy, that 'France, lost by a woman (Isabel of Bavaria), should be saved by a virgin from the frontiers of Lorraine,' alluded to her. She it was, she asserted, who could save France, and not 'either kings, or dukes, nor yet the king of Scotland's daughter'—an expression which proves how well-informed she was as to the political events and rumours of the day.

The fortunes of the dauphin Charles at this time had sunk to the lowest ebb; Orleans, almost his last bulwark, was besieged and closely pressed, and the loss of the 'battle of Herrings' seemed to take away all hope of saving the city from the English. In this crisis, when all human support seemed unavailing, Baudricourt no longer despised the supernatural aid promised by the damsel of Domremy, and gave permission to John of Metz and Bertram of Poulengy, two gentlemen who had become converts to the truth of her divine mission, to conduct Joan of Arc to the dauphin. They purchased a horse for her, and, at her own desire, furnished her with male habits, and other necessary equipments. Thus provided, and accompanied by a respectable escort, Joan set out from Vaucouleurs on the 13th of February, 1429. Her progress, through regions attached to the Burgundian interest, was perilous, but she safely arrived at Fierbois, a place within five or six leagues of Chinon, where the dauphin then held his court. At Fierbois was a celebrated church dedicated to St. Catherine, and here she spent her time in devotion, whilst a messenger was despatched to the dauphin to announce her approach. She was commanded to proceed, and reached Chinon on the eleventh day after her departure from Vaucouleurs.

Charles, though he desired, still feared to accept the proffered aid, because he knew that the instant cry of his enemies would be, that he had put his faith in sorcery, and had leagued himself with the infernal powers. In consequence of this, Joan encountered every species of distrust. She was not even admitted to the dauphin's presence without difficulty, and was required to recognize Charles amidst all his court; this Joan happily was able to do, as well as to gain the good opinion of the young monarch by the simplicity of her demeanour. Nevertheless, the prince proceeded to take every precaution before he openly trusted her. He first handed her over to a commission of ecclesiastics, to be examined; then sent her for the same purpose to Poitiers, a great law-school, that the doctors of both faculties might solemnly decide whether Joan's mission was from heaven or from the devil; for none believed it to be merely human. The greatest guarantee against sorcery was considered to be the chastity of the young girl, it being an axiom, that the devil would not or could not take part with a virgin; and no pains were spared to ascertain her true character in this respect. In short, the utmost incredulity could not have laboured harder to find out imposture, than did the credulity of that day to establish its grounds of belief. Joan was frequently asked to do miracles, but her only reply was, 'Bring me to Orleans, and you shall see. The siege shall be raised, and the dauphin crowned king at Rheims.'

They at length granted her request, and she received the rank of a military commander. A suit of armour was made for her, and she sent to Fierbois for a sword, which she said would be found buried in a certain spot within the church. It was found there, and conveyed to her. The circumstance became afterwards one of the alleged proofs of her sorcery or imposture. Her having passed some time at Fierbois amongst the ecclesiastics of the place must have led, in some way or other, to her knowledge of the deposit. Strong in the conviction of her mission, it was Joan's desire to enter Orleans from the north, and through all the fortifications of the English. Dunois, however, and the other leaders, at length overruled her, and induced her to abandon the little company of pious companions which she had raised, and to enter the beleaguered city by water, as the least perilous path. She succeeded in carrying with her a convoy of provisions to the besieged. The entry of Joan of Arc into Orleans, at the end of April, was itself a triumph. The hearts of the besieged were raised from despair to a fanatical confidence of success; and the English, who in every encounter had defeated the French, felt their courage paralyzed by the coming of this simple girl. Joan announced her arrival to the foe by a herald, bearing a summons to the English generals to be gone from the land, or she, the Pucelle, would slay them. The indignation of the English was increased by their terror; they detained the herald, and threatened to burn him, as a specimen of the treatment which they reserved for his mistress. But in the mean time the English, either from being under the influence of terror, or through some unaccountable want of precaution, allowed the armed force raised and left behind by Joan, to reach Orleans unmolested, traversing their entrenchments. Such being the state of feeling on both sides, Joan's ardour impelled her to take advantage of it. Under her banner, and cheered by her presence, the besieged marched to the attack of the English forts one after another. The first carried was that of St. Loup, to the east of Orleans. It was valiantly defended by the English, who, when attacked, fought desperately; but the soldiers of the Pucelle were invincible. On the following day, the 6th of May, Joan, after another summons to the English, signed "Jhesus Maria and Jehanne la Pucelle," renewed the attack upon the other forts. The French being compelled to make a momentary retreat, the English took courage, and pursued their enemies: whereupon Joan, throwing herself into a boat, crossed the river, and her appearance was sufficient to frighten the English from the open field. Behind their ramparts they were still, however, formidable; and the attack led by Joan against the works to the south of the city is the most memorable achievement of the siege. After cheering on her people for some time, she had seized a scaling-ladder, when an English arrow struck her between the breast and shoulder, and threw her into the fosse. When her followers took her aside, she showed at first some feminine weakness, and wept; but seeing that her standard was in danger, she forgot her wound, and ran back to seize it. The French at the same time pressed hard upon the enemy, whose strong hold was carried by assault. The English commander, Gladesdall, or Glacidas, as Joan called him, perished with his bravest soldiers in the Loire. The English now determined to raise the siege, and Sunday being the day of their departure, Joan forbade her soldiers to molest their retreat. Thus in one week from her arrival at Orleans was the beleaguered city relieved of its dreadful foe, and the Pucelle, henceforth called the Maid of Orleans, had redeemed the most incredible and important of her promises.

No sooner was Orleans freed from the enemy, than Joan returned to the court, to entreat Charles to place forces at her disposal, that she might reduce the towns between the Loire and Rheims, where she proposed to have him speedily crowned. Her projects were opposed by the ministers and warriors of the court, who considered it more politic to drive the English from Normandy than to harass the Burgundians, or to make sacrifices for the idle ceremony of a coronation; but her earnest solicitations prevailed, and early in June she attacked the English at Jargeau. They made a desperate resistance, and drove the French before them, till the appearance of Joan chilled the stout hearts of the English soldiers. One of the Poles was killed, and another, with Suffolk the commander of the town, was taken prisoner. This success was followed by a victory at Patay, in which the English were beaten by a charge of Joan, and the gallant Talbot himself taken prisoner. No force seemed able to withstand the Maid of Orleans. The strong town of Troyes, which might have repulsed the weak and starving army of the French, was terrified into surrender by the sight of her banner; and Rheims itself followed the example. In the middle of July, only three months after Joan had come to the relief of the sinking party of Charles, this prince was crowned in the cathedral consecrated to this ceremony, in the midst of the dominions of his enemies. Well might an age even more advanced than the fifteenth century believe, that superhuman interference manifested itself in the deeds of Joan.

Some historians relate that, immediately after the coronation, the Maid of Orleans expressed to the king her wish to retire to her family at Domremy; but there is little proof of such a resolution on her part. In September of the same year, we find her holding a command in the royal army, which had taken possession of St. Denis, where she hung up her arms in the cathedral. Soon after, the French generals compelled her to join in an attack upon Paris, in which they were repulsed with great loss, and Joan herself was pierced through the thigh with an arrow. It was the first time that a force in which she served had suffered defeat. Charles immediately retired once more to the Loire, and there are few records of Joan's exploits during the winter. About this time a royal edict was issued, ennobling her family, and the district of Domremy was declared free from all tax or tribute. In the ensuing spring, the English and Burgundians formed the siege of Compiègne; and Joan threw herself into the town to preserve it, as she had before saved Orleans, from their assaults. She had not been many hours in it when she headed a sally against the Burgundian quarters, in which she was taken by some officers, who gave her up to the Burgundian commander, John of Luxemburg. Her capture appears, from the records of the Parisian parliament, to have taken place on the 23d of May, 1430.

As soon as Joan was conveyed to John of Luxemburg's fortress at Beaufort, near Cambray, cries of vengeance were heard among the Anglican partisans in France. The English themselves were not foremost in this unworthy zeal. Joan, after having made a vain attempt to escape by leaping from the top of the donjon at Beaufort, was at length handed over to the English partisans, and conducted to Rouen. The University of Paris called loudly for the trial of Joan, and several letters are extant, in which that body reproaches the bishop of Beauvais and the English with their tardiness in delivering up the Pucelle to justice.

The zeal of the University was at length satisfied by letters patent from the king of England and France, authorizing the trial of the Pucelle, but stating in plain terms that it was at the demand of public opinion, and at the especial request of the bishop of Beauvais and of the University of Paris,—expressions which, taken in connection with the delay in issuing the letters, sufficiently prove the reluctance of the English council to sanction the extreme measure of vengeance. After several months' interrogatories, the judges who conducted the trial drew from her confessions the articles of accusation: these asserted that Joan pretended to have had visions from the time when she was thirteen years old: to have been visited by the archangels Gabriel and Michael, the saints Catharine and Margaret, and to have been accompanied by these celestial beings to the presence of the Dauphin Charles; that she pretended to know St. Michael from St. Gabriel, and St. Catharine from St. Margaret; that she pretended to reveal the future; and had assumed male attire by the order of God. Upon these charges her accusers wished to convict her of sorcery. Moreover, they drew from her answers, that she declined to submit to the ordinances of the church whenever her voices told her the contrary. This was declared to be heresy and schism, and to merit the punishment of fire.

These articles were dispatched to the University of Paris, and all the faculties agreed in condemning such acts and opinions, as impious, diabolical, and heretical. This judgment came back to Rouen, but it appears that many of the assessors were unwilling that Joan should be condemned; and even the English in authority seemed to think imprisonment a sufficient punishment. The truth is, that Joan was threatened with the stake unless she submitted to the church, as the phrase then was, that is, acknowledged her visions to be false, forswore male habits and arms, and owned herself to have been wrong. Every means were used to induce her to submit, but in vain. At length she was brought forth on a public scaffold at Rouen, and the bishop of Beauvais proceeded to read the sentence of condemnation, which was to be followed by burning at the stake. Whilst it was reading, every exhortation was used, and Joan's courage for once failing, she gave utterance to words of contrition, and expressed her willingness to submit, and save herself from the flames. A written form of confession was instantly produced, and read to her, and Joan, not knowing how to write, signed it with a cross. Her sentence was commuted to perpetual imprisonment, 'to the bread of grief and the water of anguish.' She was borne back from the scaffold to prison; whilst those who had come to see the sight displayed the usual disappointment of unfeeling crowds, and even threw stones in their anger.

When brought back to her prison, Joan submitted to all that had been required of her, and assumed her female dress; but when two days had elapsed, and when, in the solitude of her prison, the young heroine recalled this last scene of weakness, forming such a contrast with the glorious feats of her life, remorse and shame took possession of her, and her religious enthusiasm returned in all its ancient force. She heard her voices reproaching her, and under this impulse she seized the male attire, which had been perfidiously left within her reach, put it on, and avowed her altered mind, her resumed belief, her late visions, and her resolve no longer to belie the powerful impulses under which she had acted. 'What I resolved,' said she, 'I resolved against truth. Let me suffer my sentence at once, rather than endure what I suffer in prison.'

The bishop of Beauvais knew that if Joan were once out of the power of the court that tried her, the chapter of Rouen, who were somewhat favourably disposed, would not again give her up to punishment; and fears were entertained that she might ultimately be released, and gain new converts. It was resolved, therefore, to make away with her at once, and the crime of relapse was considered sufficient. A pile of wood was prepared in the old market at Rouen, and scaffolds placed round it for the judges and ecclesiastics: Joan was brought out on the last day of May, 1431; she wept piteously, and showed the same weakness as when she first beheld the stake. But now no mercy was shown. They placed on her head the cap used to mark the victims of the Inquisition, and the fire soon consumed the unfortunate Joan of Arc. When the pile had burned out, all the ashes were gathered and thrown into the Seine.

It is difficult to say to what party most disgrace attaches on account of this barbarous murder: whether to the Burgundians, who sold the Maid of Orleans; the English, who permitted her execution; the French, of that party who brought it about and perpetrated it; or the French, of the opposite side, who made so few efforts to rescue her to whom they owed their liberation and their national existence. The story of the Maid of Orleans is, throughout, disgraceful to every one, friend and foe; it forms one of the greatest blots and one of the most curious enigmas in historic record. It has sometimes been suggested that she was merely a tool in the hands of the priests; but this supposition will hardly satisfy those who read with attention the history of Joan of Arc.

No scrutiny has ever detected imposture or artifice in her. Enthusiasm possessed her, yet it was the lofty sentiment of patriotic zeal; not a particle of selfish ambition shadowed her bright path of victory and fame. She seemed totally devoid of vanity, and showed in all her actions as much good sense, prudence, firmness, and resolution, as exalted religious zeal and knowledge of the art of war. Her purity of life and manners was never doubted. During all the time she was with the army, she retired, as soon as night came, to the part of the camp allotted to females. She confessed and communed often, and would never allow a profane word to be uttered in her presence. She always tried to avoid the great deference paid to her; and when, at one time, a crowd of women pressed around her, offering her different objects to touch and bless, she said laughingly to them, "Touch them yourselves; it will do just as well." And yet she would never allow the slightest familiarity from any one. Not the least remarkable part of her character was the influence she invariably acquired over all with whom she was brought into contact. Her personal attractions were very great.

The works on the subject of Joan of Arc are very numerous. M. Chaussard enumerates upwards of four hundred, either expressly devoted to her life or including her history. Her adventures form the subject of Voltaire's poem of La Pucelle, and of a tragedy by Schiller; but perhaps the best production of the kind is Mr. Southey's poem bearing her name.

ARCHIDAMIA,

THE daughter of king Eleonymas of Sparta, was famed for her patriotism and her courage. When Pyrrhus marched against Lacedemon, it was resolved by the Senate that all the women should be sent out of the city; but Sparta's women would not listen to this proposition. Sword in hand, they entered with this leader Archidamia, the senate chamber, and administered to the city fathers a severe reproof for their want of confidence in woman's patriotism, and declared that they would not leave the city, nor survive its fall, if that should take place.

ARIADNE,

DAUGHTER of Leo I., married to Zeno, who succeeded as emperor of the East, 474. She was so disgusted with the intemperance of her husband, and so much in love with Anastasius, a man of obscure origin, that she shut Zeno, when intoxicated, into a sepulchre, where he was left to die; and Anastasius was placed on the throne. She died in 515.

ARIOSTA LIPPA,

CONCUBINE of Opizzon, Marquis of Este and Ferrara, confirmed in such a manner by her faithfulness and political skill, the impressions that her beauty had made upon the heart of this Marquis, that at last he made her his lawful wife, in 1352. He died in the same year, and left to her the administration of his dominions, in which she acquitted herself very well, during the minority of her eleven children. From her came all the house of Este, which still subsists in the branch of the Dukes of Modena and of Rhégio. The author from whom I borrow this, observes, that Lippa Ariosta did more honour to her family, which is one of the noblest in Ferrara, than she had taken from it.

ARLOTTA,

A BEAUTIFUL woman of Falaise, daughter of a tanner. She was seen, standing at her door, by Robert duke of Normandy, as he passed through the street; and he made her his mistress. She had by him William the Conqueror, who was born 1041. After Robert's death, she married Herluin, a Norman gentleman, by whom she had three children, for whom William honourably provided.

ARRIA,

WIFE of Cæcinnæ Pætus, a consul under Claudius, emperor of Rome in 41, is immortalized for her heroism and conjugal affection. Her son and husband were both dangerously ill at the same time; the former died; and she, thinking that in his weak state, Pætus could not survive a knowledge of the fatal event, fulfilled every mournful duty to her child in secret; but when she entered the chamber of her husband, concealed so effectually her anguish, that till his recovery Pætus had no suspicion of his loss.

Soon after, Pætus joined with Scribonius in exciting a revolt against Claudius in Illyria. They were unsuccessful, and Pætus was carried a prisoner to Rome, by sea. Arria, not being allowed to accompany him, hired a small bark, and followed him. On her arrival at Rome, she was met by the widow of Scribonius, who wished to speak to her.

"I speak to thee!" replied Arria, indignantly; "to thee, who hast been witness of thy husband's death, and yet survivest!"

She had herself determined that, if all her endeavours to save Pætus failed, she would die with him. Thræseus, her son-in-law, in vain combated her resolution. "Were I," said he, "in the situation of Pætus, would you have your daughter die with me?"

"Certainly," answered she, "had she lived with you as long and as happily as I with Pætus."

Her husband was at length condemned to die, whether by his own hands or not is uncertain; if it were not so, he wished to avoid the punishment allotted to him, by a voluntary death; but at the moment wanted courage. Seeing his hesitation, Arria seized the dagger, plunged it first into her own breast, and then presenting it to her husband, said, with a smile, "It is not painful, Pætus."

The wife of Thræseus, and her daughter, who married Heloidius Priscus, inherited the sentiments and the fate of Arria.

Martial wrote a beautiful epigram on the subject of Arria's death, of which this is the translation:

"When to her husband Arria gave the steel,
Which from her chaste, her bleeding breast she drew;
She said—My Pætus, this I do not feel,
But, oh! the wound that must be given by you!"

ATTENDULI,

MARGARET DE, a sister of the great Sforza, founder of the house of Sforza, dukes of Milan, was born about 1375, at Catignola, a small town in Italy. Her father was a day labourer; but after her brother James, under the name of Sforza, had made himself distinguished by his valour and skill, he sent for her to share his honours. She had married Michael de Catignola.

She seems to have shared her brother's heroic spirit; when James, count de la Marche, came to espouse Joanna II., queen of Naples, Sforza, then grand constable of Naples, was sent to meet him; but that prince threw him, his relations, and all his suite, into prison, thinking by this means to attain, more easily, the tyrannic power he afterwards assumed. When the news of Sforza's arrest arrived, Margaret, with her husband, and other relations who had served with honour in his troops, were at Tricarico. They assembled an army, of which Margaret took the command. The ill treatment Joanna experienced from her new husband, soon made the revolt general, and James was at length besieged in a castle, where the conditions proposed to him were, to be contented with the title of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and give Sforza his liberty. Knowing the value of his hostage, James sent deputies to Margaret, menacing her brother with instant death, if Tricarico were not given up to him. Anxious for her brother, but indignant at the proposition, she immediately imprisoned the deputies, whose families, alarmed for their safety, ceased not to intercede, until the count consented to set Sforza and his friends at liberty, and to reinstate him in his former situation.

AYESHA,

THE second, and most beloved of all Mahomet's wives, was the daughter of Abubeker, the first caliph, and the successor of Mahomet. She was the only one of all his wives who had never been married to any other man; but she was only nine when she was espoused by him. She had no children; but his affection for her continued till death; and he expired in her arms. After his death, she was regarded with great veneration by the Mussulmen, as being filled with an extraordinary portion of Mahomet's spirit. They gave her the title of "Mother of the Faithful," and consulted her on important occasions. Ayesha entertained a strong aversion for the caliph Othman; and she had actually formed a plot to dethrone him, with the intention of placing in his stead her favourite Telha, when Othman was assassinated, by another enemy, in a sedition.

The succession of Ali was also strongly opposed by Ayesha. Joined by Telha and Zobier, at Mecca, she raised a revolt, under pretence of avenging the murder of Othman; an army was levied, which marched towards Bassora, while Ayesha, at its head, was borne in a litter on a camel of great strength. On arriving at a village called Jowab, she was saluted with the loud barking of the dogs of the place, which, reminding her of a prediction of the prophet, in which the dogs of Jowab were mentioned, so intimidated her, that she declared her resolution not to advance a step; and it was not till a number of persons had been suborned to swear that the village had been wrongly named to her, and till the artifice had been employed of terrifying her with a report of Ali's being in the rear, that she was prevailed on to proceed.

When the revolvers reached Bassora, they were met by a party of the inhabitants, whom they defeated. A number of people then came from the city, to know their intentions, on which Ayesha made a long speech, in a voice, so loud and shrill from passion, that she could not be understood. One of the Arabs replied to her, saying, "O, mother of the faithful, the murdering of Othman was a thing of less moment than thy leaving home on this cursed camel. God has bestowed on thee a veil and a protection; but thou hast rent the veil, and set the protection at naught."

She was refused admittance into the city. In the end, however, her troops gained possession. Ali assembled an army, and marched against her. Ayesha violently opposed all pacific counsels, and resolved to proceed to the utmost extremity. A fierce battle ensued, in which Telha and Zobier were slain. The combat raged about Ayesha's camel, and an Arabian writer says, that the hands of seventy men, who successively held its bridle, were cut off, and that her litter was stuck so full of darts, as to resemble a porcupine. The camel, from which this day's fight takes its name, was at length hamstrung, and Ayesha became a captive. Ali treated her with great respect, and sent her to Medina, on condition that she should live peaceably at home, and not intermeddle with state affairs.

Her resentment afterwards appeared in her refusal to suffer Hassan, the unfortunate son of Ali, to be buried near the tomb of the prophet, which was her property. She seems to have regained her influence in the reign of the caliph Moawiyah. She died in the fifty-eighth year of the Hegira, A. D. 677, aged sixty-seven; having constantly experienced a high degree of respect from the followers of Mahomet, except at the time of her imprudent expedition against Ali.

B.

BARBARA,

WIFE of the emperor Sigismund, was the daughter of Herman, Count of Cilia, in Hungary. Sigismund had been taken by the Hungarians, and placed under the guard of two young gentlemen, whose father he had put to death. While they had him in custody, he persuaded their mother to let him escape. This favour was not granted without a great many excuses for the death of her husband, and a great many promises. He promised, among other things, to marry the daughter of the Count of Cilia, a near relation of that widow; which promise he performed. He had the most extraordinary wife of her that ever was seen. She had no manner of shame for her abandoned life. This is not the thing in which her great singularity consisted; for there are but too many princesses who are above being concerned at any imputations on account of their lewdness. What was extraordinary in her was Atheism, a thing which there is scarce any instance of amongst women.

The Bohemians, notwithstanding, gave her a magnificent funeral at Prague, and buried her in the tomb of their kings, as we are assured by Bonfinius in the VII. Book of the III. Decade. Prateolus has not omitted her in his alphabetical catalogue of heretics.

BARBE DE VERRUE,

A FRENCH improvisatrice, was an illegitimate child born of obscure parents. The count de Verrue adopted her after she became famous and gave her his name. She was called a troubadouresse, or female troubadour; and she travelled through towns and cities singing her own verses, by means of which she acquired a considerable fortune. She sung the stories of Griselidis; of William with the Falcon; of Ancassin and Nicolette; and a poem entitled, The Gallic Orpheus or Angeline and Cyndorix, which related to the civilization of the Gauls. Barbe lived to a very advanced age, travelled a great deal, and, although not beautiful, had many admirers. She lived in the thirteenth century.

BASINE, or BASIN,

WAS the wife of Basin, king of Thuringia. Childeric, king of France, driven from his dominions by his people, sought an asylum with the king of Thuringia; and during his residence at that court, Basine conceived a strong attachment for him. Childeric was at length restored to his kingdom; and a short time after, he beheld with surprise the queen of Thuringia present herself before him. "Had I known a more valiant hero than yourself," said she to Childeric, "I should have fled over the seas to his arms." Childeric received her gladly, and married her. She became the mother, in 467, of the great Clovis, the first Christian king of France.

BEATRICE,

DAUGHTER of the count of Burgundy, married the emperor Frederick in 1156. It is asserted by some historians that she was insulted by the Milanese, and that the emperor revenged her wrongs by the destruction of Milan, and the ignominious punishment of the inhabitants.

BEATRICE,

OF Provence, daughter of Raymond Berenger, count of Provence, married, in 1245, Charles, son of Louis VIII. of France, who was afterwards crowned king of Naples and Sicily. She died at Nocisa.

BEATRICE PORTINARI

Is celebrated as the beloved of Dante, the Italian poet. She was born at Florence, and was very beautiful. The death of her noble father, Folco Portinari, in 1289, is said to have hastened her own. The history of Beatrice may be considered as an affection of Dante—in that lies its sole interest. All that can be authenticated of her is that she was a beautiful and virtuous woman. She died in 1290, aged twenty-four. And yet she still lives in Dante's immortal poem, of which her memory was the inspiration. He says, in the conclusion of his Rime, (his miscellaneous poems on the subject of his early love)—“I beheld a marvellous vision, which has caused me to cease from writing in praise of my blessed Beatrice, until I can celebrate her more worthily; which that I may do, I devote my whole soul to study, as she knoweth well; in so much, that if it please the Great Disposer of all events to prolong my life for a few years upon this earth, I hope hereafter to sing of my Beatrice what never yet was said or sung of any woman.”

It was in this transport of enthusiasm that Dante conceived the idea of the “Divina Commedia,” his great poem, of which his Beatrice was destined to be the heroine. Thus to the inspiration of a young, lovely, and noble-minded woman, we owe one of the grandest efforts of human genius.

BEAUFORT,

JOAN, queen of Scotland, was the eldest daughter of John Beaufort, earl of Somerset, (son of John of Gaunt,) and of Margaret, daughter of the earl of Kent.

She was seen by James, sometimes called the Royal Poet, son of Robert III., king of Scotland, while he was detained a prisoner in the Tower of London, and he fell passionately in love with her. On his release, in 1423, after nineteen years' captivity, he married Joan, and went with her to Edinburgh, where they were crowned, May 22d, 1424. In 1430, Joan became the mother of James, afterwards James II. of Scotland.

She possessed a great deal of influence, which she always exercised on the side of mercy and gentleness. In 1437, the queen received information of a conspiracy formed against the life of her husband, and hastened to Roxburgh, where he then was, to warn him of his danger. The king immediately took refuge with his wife in the Dominican abbey near Perth; but the conspirators, having bribed a domestic, found their way into the room. The queen threw herself between them and her husband, but in vain; after receiving two wounds, she was torn from the arms of James I., who was murdered, Feb. 21st, 1437.

Joan married a second time, James Stewart, called the Black Knight, son to the lord of Lorne, to whom she bore a son, afterwards earl of Athol. She died in 1446, and was buried at Perth, near the body of the king, her first husband.

BEAUFORT,

MARGARET, countess of Richmond and Derby, was the only daughter and heiress of John Beaufort, duke of Somerset (grandson to John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster), by Margaret Beuchamp, his wife. She was born at Bletshoe in Bedfordshire, in 1441. While very young she was married to Edmund Tudor, earl of Richmond, by whom she had a son named Henry, who was afterwards king of England, by the title of Henry VII. On the 3d of November, 1456, the earl of Richmond died, leaving Margaret a very young widow, and his son, and heir, Henry, not above fifteen weeks old. Her second husband was Sir Henry Stafford, knight, second son to the duke of Buckingham, by whom she had no issue. And soon after the death of Sir Henry Stafford, which happened about 1482, she married Thomas, lord Stanley, afterwards earl of Derby, who died in 1504. After spending a life in successive acts of beneficence, she paid the great debt of nature on the 29th of June, 1509, in the first year of the reign of her grandson Henry VIII. She was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a monument was erected to her memory. It is of black marble, with her effigy in gilt copper; and the head is encircled with a coronet. She founded and endowed the colleges of Christ and St. John's, at Cambridge.

BELLEVILLE,

JANE DE, wife of Oliver III., lord of Clisson. Philip de Valois, king of France, having caused her husband to be beheaded, in 1343, on unauthenticated suspicion of correspondence with England, Jane sent her son, a boy of twelve, secretly to London, for safety, sold her jewels, armed three vessels, and attacked all the French she met. She made descents in Normandy, took their castles, and the most beautiful woman in Europe might be seen, with a sword in one hand, and a flambeau in the other, enforcing and commanding acts of the greatest cruelty.

BERENGARIA

OF Navarre, was daughter of Sancho the Wise, king of Naples, and married Richard Cœur de Lion soon after he ascended the throne of England. Richard had been betrothed, when only seven years of age, to Alice, daughter of Louis VII., who was three years old. Alice was sent to the English court, when a girl of thirteen, for her education. The father of Richard Cœur de Lion, Henry II., fell in love with this betrothed of his son; and had prevented the marriage from being solemnized. But Richard, after he ascended the throne, was still trammelled by this engagement to Alice, while he was deeply in love with Berengaria. At length these obstacles were overcome. "It was in the joyous month of May, 1191," to quote an old writer, "in the flourishing and spacious isle of Cyprus, celebrated as the very abode of the goddess of love, did king Richard solemnly take to wife his beloved lady Berengaria."

This fair queen accompanied her husband on his warlike expedition to the Holy Land. In the autumn of the same year Richard concluded his peace with Saladin, and set out on his return to England. But he sent Berengaria by sea, while he, disguised as a Templar, intended to go by land. He was taken prisoner, and kept in durance, by Leopold of Austria, nearly five years. Richard's profligate companions seem to have estranged his thoughts from his gentle, loving wife, and for nearly two years after his return from captivity, he gave himself up to the indulgence of his baser passions; but finally his conscience was awakened, he sought his ever-faithful wife, and she, woman-like, forgave him. From that time they were never parted, till his death, which occurred in 1199. She survived him many years, founded an abbey at Espan, and devoted herself to works of piety and mercy. "From her early youth to her grave, Berengaria manifested devoted love to Richard: uncomplainingly when deserted by him, forgiving when he returned, and faithful to his memory unto death," says her accomplished biographer, Miss Strickland.

BERENICE,

DAUGHTER of Herod Agrippa I., King of Judea, grandson of Herod the Great, was the sister of Herod Agrippa II., before whom Paul preached, and married her uncle, Herod, king of Chalcis. After her husband's death, she was accused of incest with her brother Agrippa; an accusation which seems to have determined her to engage in a second marriage. She signified to Polemon, king of Cilicia, her willingness to become his wife, if he would embrace Judaism. Polemon, induced by her wealth, consented; but Berenice soon deserted him, and he returned to his former faith.

Scrupulous in all religious observances, she made a journey to Jerusalem, where she spent thirty days in fasting and prayer. While thus engaged, she suffered a thousand indignities from the Roman soldiers. She also went barefoot to the Roman governor to intercede for her people, but he treated her with open neglect.

Berenice then resolved to apply to Vespasian, emperor of Rome, or his son Titus, to avoid being involved in the ruin of her nation. She accordingly went, with her brother, to Rome, and soon gained Vespasian by her liberality, and Titus by her beauty. Titus even wished to marry her; but the murmurs of the Roman people prevented him; he was even obliged to banish her, with a promise of recalling her when the tumult should be appeased. Some historians assert that Berenice returned and was again banished.

She is mentioned in the 25th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, as coming with her brother Agrippa to Cesarea, to salute Festus.

BERNERS, or BARNES,

JULIANA, a sister of Richard, lord Berners, is supposed to have been born about 1388, and was a native of Essex. She was prioress of Sopewell nunnery, and wrote "The Boke of Hawkyng and Huntynge," which was one of the first works that issued from the English press. She is represented as having been beautiful, high-spirited, and fond of all active exercises. She lived to an advanced age, and was highly respected and admired. The indelicacies that are found in her book, must be imputed to the barbarism of the times.

BERSALA,

ANN, daughter and principal heiress of Wolfard de Borselle, and of Charlotte de Bourbon-Montpensier, who were married June the 17th, 1468, was wife of Philip of Burgundy, son of Anthony of Burgundy, lord of Beves, one of the illegitimate sons of the duke of Burgundy, Philip the Good. She brought to him, for her dowry, the lordship of Vere, that of Flushing, and some others, and had by him one son and two daughters.

Erasmus had a particular esteem for her. He thus writes to a friend:—"We came to Anne, princess of Vere. Why should I say any thing to you of this lady's complaisance, benignity, or liberality? I know the embellishments of rhetoricians are suspected, especially by those who are not unskilled in those arts. But, believe me, I am so far here from enlarging, that it is above the reach of our art. Never did nature produce any thing more modest, more wise, or more obliging. She was so generous to me—she loaded me with so many benefits, without my seeking them! It has happened to me, my Battus, with regard to her, as it often used to happen with regard to you, that I begin to love and admire most when I am absent. Good God, what candour, what complaisance in the largest fortune, what evenness of mind in the greatest injuries, what cheerfulness in such great cares, what constancy of mind, what innocence of life, what encouragement of learned men, what affability to all!"

BERTHA,

DAUGHTER of Cherebert, king of Paris. She married Ethelbert, king of Kent, who succeeded to the throne about the year 560. Ethelbert was a pagan, but Bertha was a Christian, and in the marriage treaty had stipulated for the free exercise of her religion, and taken with her a French bishop. By her influence Christianity was introduced into England; for so exemplary in every respect were her life and conduct, that she inspired the king and his court with a high respect for her person, and the religion by which she was influenced. The Pope taking advantage of this, sent forty monks, among whom was St. Augustine, to preach the gospel. Under the protection of the queen they soon found means of communication with the king, who finally submitted to public baptism. Christianity proved the means of promoting knowledge and civilization in England; and this convert king enacted a body of laws which was the first written code promulgated by the northern conquerors. Thus was the influence of this pious queen Bertha the means of redeeming England from paganism; and moreover to her belongs the glory of planting the first Christian Church in Canterbury.

BERTHA, or BERTRADE,

WIFE of Pepin and mother of Charlemagne, emperor of France, was a woman of great natural excellencies, both of mind and heart. Charlemagne always showed her most profound respect and veneration, and there was never the slightest difficulty between them, excepting when he divorced the daughter of Didier, king of the Lombards, whom he had married by her advice, to espouse Emergarde. Bertha died in 783.

BERTHA,

WIDOW of Eudes, count de Blois, married Robert the Pious, king of France. She was a relation of his, and he had been godfather to one of her children. These obstacles, then very powerful, did not prevent the king from marrying her. A council assembled at Rome in 998, and ordered Robert to repudiate Bertha, which he refusing to do, the terrible sentence of excommunication was pronounced against him, and he was at length obliged to yield. Bertha retired to an abbey and devoted herself to pious works. Her title of queen was always given to her, and the king continued to show her constant proofs of affection and respect.

BERTRADE,

DAUGHTER of the count of Montfort, married the count of Anjou, from whom she was divorced to unite herself to Philip I., king of France, 1092. This union was opposed by the clergy, but the love of the monarch triumphed over his respect for religion. Bertrade was ambitious, and not always faithful to her husband. After the king's death, she pretended sanctity, and was buried in a convent which she herself founded.

BIGNE,

GRACE DE LA, a French poetess of Bayeux, accompanied king John to England, after the battle of Poitiers, and died in 1374.

BLANCHE

OF Castile, queen of France, was the daughter of Alphonso IX., king of Castile, and of Eleanor, daughter of Henry I. of England. In 1200, she was married to Louis VIII. of France; and became the mother of nine sons and two daughters, whom she educated with great care, and in such sentiments of piety, that two of them, Louis IX. and Elizabeth, have been beatified by the church of Rome.

On the death of her husband, in 1266, he showed his esteem for her by leaving her sole regent during the minority of his son, Louis IX., then only twelve years old; and Blanche justified by her conduct in the trying circumstances in which she was placed, the confidence of her husband. The princes and nobles, pretending that the regency was unjustly granted to a woman, confederated against her; but by her prudence and courage, opposing some in arms, and gaining over others with presents and condescension, Blanche finally triumphed. She made use of the romantic passion of the young count of Champagne to obtain information of the projects of the malcontents; but her reputation was endangered by the favour she showed him, as well as by the familiar intercourse to which she admitted the gallant cardinal Romani.

In educating Louis, she was charged with putting him too much in the hands of the clergy; but she proved an excellent guardian of his virtue, and inspired him with a lasting respect for herself. In 1234, she married him to Margaret, daughter of the count de Provence; and in 1235, Louis having reached the age of twenty-one, Blanche surrendered to him the sovereign authority. But even after this she retained great ascendancy over the young king, of which she sometimes made an improper use. Becoming jealous of Margaret, wife of Louis, she endeavoured to sow dissensions between them, and, failing in this, to separate them; and these disturbances caused Louis great uneasiness.

When, in 1248, Louis undertook a crusade to the Holy Land, he determined to take his queen with him, and leave his mother regent; and in this second regency she showed the same vigour and prudence as in the first. The kingdom was suffering so much from the domination of the priesthood, that vigorous measures had become necessary; and notwithstanding her strong religious feelings, she exerted her utmost power against the tyranny of the priests and in favour of the people; and as usual, Blanche was successful.

The unfortunate defeat and imprisonment of her son in the East, so affected her spirits, that she died, in 1252, to his great grief, and the regret of the whole kingdom. She was buried in the abbey of Maubisson. She was one of the most illustrious characters of her time, being equally distinguished for her personal and mental endowments.

We may observe here that among the sovereigns of France, those most beloved by the people, and who thought most of the good of their subjects — Louis IX., Louis XII., and Henry IV. — were educated by their mothers. Blanche had attended in so careful a manner to the infancy and childhood of her son, that she performed for him many of the offices usually entrusted to inferiors. His attachment to her was ardent, and all her precepts were laws. She said to him one day, as she was tenderly caressing him, “My son, you know how very fondly I love you; and yet I would rather see you dead than sullied by the commission of a crime.” Such a woman was worthy of Shakspeare’s panegyric, which he has so warmly bestowed on Blanche in his “King John.”

BLANCHE,

A NATIVE of Padua, was celebrated for her resolution. On the death of her husband, at the siege of Bassano, Acciolin, the general of the enemy, offered violence to her person, when she threw herself into her husband’s tomb, and was crushed by the falling of the stone that covered the entrance, 1253

BLANCHE DE BOURBON,

SECOND daughter of Pierre de Bourbon, a nobleman of France, married Pedro, king of Castile, in 1352. She was cruelly treated by her husband, who was attached to Maria Padilla, and was at last imprisoned and murdered, in 1361, aged eighteen. Her misfortunes were avenged by Du Guesclin at the head of a French army. Her beauty and virtues made her a great favourite, not only with the mother of Pedro, but the whole Spanish nation.

BOADICEA,

A BRITISH queen in the time of Nero, wife to Prasutagas, king of the Iceni, that is, Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdonshire. Prasutagas, in order to secure the friendship and protection of Nero to his wife and family, left the emperor and his daughters co-heirs. The Roman officers, availing themselves of a privilege so replete with mischief, seized upon all his effects in their master’s name. Boadicea strongly remonstrated against these unjust proceedings, and being a woman of high spirit, she resented her ill usage in such terms, that the officers, in revenge, caused her to be publicly scourged, and violated her daughters. Boadicea assembled the Britons, and standing on a rising ground, her loose robes and long fair hair floating in the wind, a spear in her hand, her majestic features animated with a desire for vengeance, she reminded her people, in a strain of pathetic eloquence, of the wrongs they had endured from the invaders, and exhorted them to instant revolt. While speaking, she permitted a hare, which she had kept concealed about her person, to escape among the crowd. The Britons, exulting, hailed the omen, and the public indignation was such, that all the island, excepting London, agreed to rise in rebellion.

Boadicea put herself at the head of the popular army, and earnestly exhorted them to take advantage of the absence of the Roman general, Paulinus, then in the Isle of Man, by putting their foreign oppressors to the sword. The Britons readily embraced the proposal, and so violent was the rage of the exasperated people, that not a single Roman of any age or either sex, within their reach, escaped; no less than seventy thousand perished.

Paulinus, suddenly returning, marched against the revolted Britons, who had an army of one hundred thousand, or, according to Dion Cassius, two hundred and thirty thousand strong, under the conduct of Boadicea and her general, Vennutius. The noble person of Boadicea, large, fair, and dignified, with her undaunted courage, had gained for her the entire confidence of the people, and they were impatient for the engagement with Paulinus, whose army consisted of only ten thousand men. The Roman general was in doubt whether he should march with this small force against his numerous enemies, or shut himself up in the town and wait for them. At first he chose the latter, and stayed in London, but soon altered his resolution, and determined to meet the Britons in the open field. The place he pitched upon for the decisive battle was a narrow tract of ground, facing a large plain, supposed to be Salisbury plain, and his rear was secured by a forest. The Britons, exulting in their numbers, and secure of victory, had brought their wives and children in wagons, and placed them around their entrenchments. Boadicea in her chariot, accompanied by her two daughters, rode among the several squadrons of her army, addressing them to the following effect: “It will not be the first time, Britons, that you have been victorious under the conduct of your queen. For my part, I come not here as one descended of royal blood, not to fight for empire or riches, but as one of the common people, to avenge the loss of their liberty, the wrongs of myself and children. The wickedness of the Romans is at its height, and the gods have already begun to punish them, so that instead of being able to withstand the attack of a victorious army, the very shouts of so many thousands will put them to flight. And, if you, Britons, would but consider the number of our forces, or the motives of the war, you will resolve to conquer or to die. Is it not much better to fall honourably in defence of liberty, than be again exposed to the outrages of the Romans? Such, at least, is my resolution; as for you men, you may, if you please, live and be slaves!”

Paulinus was no less assiduous in preparing his troops for the encounter. The Britons expected his soldiers to be daunted at their number; but when they saw them advance, sword in hand, without showing the least fear, they fell into disorder, and precipitately fled: the baggage and wagons in which their families were placed, obstructing their flight, a total defeat and dreadful carnage ensued. Eighty thousand Britons were left on the field. Boadicea escaped falling into the hands of the enemy, but, unable to survive this terrible disappointment, she fell a victim either to despair or poison. The battle was fought in the year 61.

BORGIA,

LUCREZIA, sister of Cesare Borgia, and daughter of Rodriguez Borgia, afterwards Pope Alexander V., was married in 1493, to Giovanni Sforza, lord of Pessaro, with whom she lived four years, when her father being pope, dissolved the marriage, and gave her to Alfonso, duke of Bisceglia, natural son of Alfonso II., duke of Naples. On this occasion she was created duchess of Spoleto and of Sermoneta. She had one son by Alfonso, who died young. In June, 1500, Alfonso was stabbed by assassins, supposed to have been employed by the infamous Cesare Borgia, so that he died two months after at the pontifical palace, to which he had been carried at the time. Lucrezia has never been accused of any participation in this murder, or in any of her brother's atrocious deeds. She then retired to Nepi, but was recalled to Rome by her father. Towards the end of 1501, she married Alfonso d'Este, son of Ercole, duke of Ferrara, and made her entrance into Ferrara with great pomp, on the second of February, 1502.

She had three sons by Alfonso, who intrusted her with the government when he was absent in the field, in which capacity she gained general approbation. She was also the patroness of literature, and her behaviour after she became duchess of Ferrara affords no grounds for censure. Her conduct while living at Rome with her father has been the subject of much obloquy, which seems to rest chiefly on her living in a flagitious court among profligate scenes. No individual charge can be substantiated against her. On the contrary, she is mentioned by cotemporary poets and historians in the highest terms; and so many different writers would not have lavished such high praise on a person profligate and base as she has been represented. Many of the reports about her were circulated by the Neapolitans, the natural enemies of her family. She died at Ferrara, in 1523. In the Ambrosian Library there is a collection of letters written by her, and a poetical effusion. A curiosity which might be viewed with equal interest, is to be found there—a tress of her beautiful hair, folded in a piece of parchment.

BORE, or BORA,

CATHARINE VON, daughter of a gentleman of fortune, was a nun in the convent of Nimptschen, in Germany, two leagues from Wittemberg. She left the convent, with eight others, at the commencement of the reformation by Luther. Leonard Koppe, senator of Torgau, is said to have first animated them to this resolution, which they put in practice on a Good Friday. Luther undertook the defence of these nuns and Leonard Koppe, and published a justification of their conduct.

Luther, who admired Catharine on account of her heroism, in addition to her excellent qualities of mind and heart, gained her consent and married her. Catharine was then twenty-six, and added to the charms of youth, much sprightliness of mind. The reformer, many years older than his wife, was as affectionately beloved by her as if he had been in the flower of his youth. She brought him a son; and he writes on this occasion, "that he would not change his condition for that of Croesus." The character of his wife was excellently adapted to make him happy. Modest and gentle, decent in her attire, and economical in the house, she had the hospitality of the German noblesse without their pride. On the 15th February, 1546, she became a widow, and although several fair offers were made to her, she lived for many years in great poverty, and sometimes in actual distress; Martin Luther left little or no property, and she was compelled to keep a boarding-house for students, in order to support herself and children. She died on the 20th of December, 1552, in consequence of a cold she had contracted from a fall in the water, while moving from Wittemberg to Torgau.

She left three sons, Paul, Martin, and John, and two daughters.

BRAGELONGNE,

AGNES DE, a French poetess, lived in the 12th century, in the reign of Philip Augustus. She was the daughter of the count de Tonnerre, and was married when very young to the count de Plancy, and after his death, to Henri de Craon, whom she had long loved, and to whom much of her poetry is addressed. The poem of "Gabrielle de Vergy," which is only a romance versified, is attributed to this writer.

BRIDGET, or BRIGIT,

AND by contraction, ST. BRIDE, a saint of the Romish church, and the patroness of Ireland, lived in the end of the fifth century. She was born at Fochard, in Ulster, soon after Ireland was converted, and she took the veil in her youth from the hands of St. Mel, a nephew and disciple of St. Patrick. She built herself a cell under a large oak, thence called Kill-dare, or the cell of the oak, and being joined by several women, they formed themselves into a religious community, which branched out into several other nunneries throughout Ireland, all of which acknowledged her as their foundress. She is commemorated in the Roman martyrology on the first of February.

BRUNEHAUT,

YOUNGER daughter of Athanagilde, king of the Visigoths of Spain, married, in 565, Siegbert, the Frankish king of Metz or Austrasia. Siegbert had resolved to have but one wife, and to choose her from a royal family; his choice fell on Brunehaut, who fully justified his preference. She was beautiful, elegant in her deportment, modest and dignified in her conduct, and conversed not only agreeably, but with a great deal of wisdom. Her husband soon became exceedingly attached to her.

Her elder sister, Galsuinda, had married Chilperic, Siegbert's brother, and king of Normandy. Galsuinda was murdered, through the instigation of Fredegonde, Chilperic's mistress, who then induced Chilperic to marry her. Brunehaut, to avenge her sister's death, persuaded Siegbert to make war upon his brother; and he had succeeded in wresting Chilperic's territories from him, and besieging him in Tournai, when two assassins, hired by Fredegonde, murdered Siegbert in his camp, in 575.

As soon as Brunehaut heard of this misfortune, she hastened to save her son, the little Childebert, heir to the kingdom of Austrasia. She hid him in a basket, which was let down out of a window of the palace she occupied in Paris, and confided him to a servant of the Austrasian duke Gondebald, who carried him behind him on horseback to Metz, where he was proclaimed king, on Christmas day, 575. When Chilperic and Fredegonde arrived at Paris, they found only Brunehaut, with her two daughters and the royal treasure. Her property was taken from her, her daughters were exiled to Meaux, and she was sent to Rouen.

But during the few days that Brunehaut, then a beautiful widow of twenty-eight, had remained at Paris, she had inspired Meroveus, Chilperic's second son by his first wife Andowere, with a violent passion, so that soon after she had reached Rouen, he abandoned the troops his father had placed under his charge, and hastened to join her. They were married by the bishop of Rouen, although it was contrary to the canons of the church to unite a nephew and aunt. Chilperic, furious at this step, came with great haste to separate them; but they took refuge in a little church, and the king, not daring to violate this asylum, was at last obliged to promise, with an oath, that he would leave them together. "Since God allows them to be united," said he, "I swear never to separate them."

Reassured by this solemn promise, Meroveus and Brunehaut left their asylum, and gave themselves up to Chilperic. At first he treated them kindly; but in a few days he returned to Soissons, taking his son with him as a prisoner, and leaving Brunehaut under a strong guard at Rouen. Meroveus, after having dragged out a miserable existence as a prisoner, for thirteen months; and having in vain attempted to escape to join Brunehaut, who does not seem to have made any great effort to come to his assistance, was killed by one of his servants, some say by his own request, and others, by order of Fredegonde.

Meanwhile, Childebert had demanded and obtained from the king of Normandy his mother's release; and Brunehaut returned to her son's court, where she commenced that struggle, which afterwards proved fatal to her, against the nobles of Austrasia. At one time, her own party, and that of the nobles, were drawn up in battle array against each other, when she, seeing that the combat would be a bloody one, and that her own side was the weakest, boldly rushed between them, calling to them to desist. "Woman, retire!" exclaimed one of the dukes, "You have reigned long enough under the name of your husband; let that suffice you. Your son is now our king; Austrasia is under our guardianship, not yours. Retire, directly, or our horses' feet shall trample you to the earth."

But the intrepid Brunehaut, unmoved by this savage address, persisted, and at last succeeded in preventing the combat. Although obliged to yield to her turbulent subjects for a short time, Brunehaut soon regained her authority, which she used with great cruelty. In her anger, she spared no one, but put to death or exiled all persons of rank who fell in her power. She also raised an army, which she sent against Clotaire, the young son of Fredegonde; but she was defeated, and Fredegonde took advantage of the intestine commotion in Austrasia, to regain all that her husband had lost.

Childebert died in 596, and the kingdom was divided between Theodebert and Theodoric. Brunehaut remained with Theodebert, to whom Austrasia had fallen; and on the death of Fredegonde, in 597, she bent all her energies towards the recovery of those dominions that her rival had obtained from her, and she partially succeeded. She treated with the utmost cruelty all the relations of Fredegonde who fell in her power, and every one who resisted her authority.

But the day of retribution came at last; a murder, committed in 599, upon Wintrion, duke of Champagne, roused against her all the powerful men of her nation. They seized her, and, carrying her across the frontiers, abandoned her alone in the midst of an uncultivated part of the country. A beggar, whom she met, conducted her to Theodoric, her other grandson, king of Burgundy, by whom she was but too well received.

Here she attempted, by surrounding him with infamous women of all classes, to prevent him from taking a wife, who might interfere with her authority; and she drove away, with insults, St. Colomban, abbé of Luxeuil, and St. Didier, bishop of Vienna, who had addressed remonstrances both to her and Theodoric on their mode of life. St. Didier, after an exile of three years, returned to his church, and, displaying the same zeal in the performance of his duty, she had him stoned.

To raise her favourite, Protadius, to the dignity of mayor of the palace, she procured the death of Bertoald, who held that position, by sending him with a handful of men against a large army, where he was killed after making a brave resistance. In 612, she armed her grandsons against each other. Theodebert was pursued by Theodoric to Cologne, and there assassinated. His children, one of whom was an infant, were slain by order of Brunehaut. Theodoric died in 618, and Brunehaut, betrayed by her subjects, and abandoned by her nobles, fell into the hands of Clotaire, son of Fredegonde. He loaded her with insults, accused her of having caused the death of ten kings, or sons of kings, and gave her up to the vengeance of his infuriated soldiery. This queen, then eighty years old, was carried naked on a litter for three days, and then bound by one arm and one leg to the tail of an unbroken colt, who dragged her over rocks and stones till she was nothing but a shapeless mass. Her remains were then burnt.

BRUNORO,

BONA LOMBARDI, was born in 1417, in Sacco, a little village in Vattellina. Her parents were obscure peasants, of whom we have but little information. The father, Gabriel Lombardi, a private soldier, died while she was an infant; and her mother not surviving him long, the little girl was left to the charge of an aunt, a hard-working countrywoman, and an uncle, a humble curate.

Bona, in her simple peasant station, exhibited intelligence, decision of character, and personal beauty, which raised her to a certain consideration in the estimation of her companions; and the neighbourhood boasted of the beauty of Bona, when an incident occurred which was to raise her to a most unexpected rank. In the war between the duke of Milan and the Venetians, the latter had been routed and driven from Vattellina. Piccinino, the Milanese general, upon departing to follow up his advantages, left Captain Brunoro, a Parmesan gentleman, to maintain a camp in Morbegno, as a central position to maintain the conquered country. One day, after a hunting party, he stopped to repose himself, in a grove where many of the peasants were assembled for some rustic festival; he was greatly struck with the loveliness of a girl of about fifteen. Upon entering into conversation with her, he was surprised at the ingenuity and spirited tone of her replies. Speaking of the adventure on his return home, every body told him that Bona Lombardi had acknowledged claims to admiration. Brunoro, remaining through the summer in that district, found many opportunities of seeing the fair peasant; becoming acquainted with her worth and character, he at last determined to make her the companion of his life; their marriage was not declared at first, but, to prevent a separation, however temporary, Bona was induced to put on the dress of an officer. Her husband delighted in teaching her horsemanship, together with all military exercises. She accompanied him in battle, fought by his side, and, regardless of her own safety, seemed to be merely an added arm to shield and assist Brunoro. As was usual in those times, among the condottieri, Brunoro adopted different lords, and fought sometimes in parties to which, at others, he was opposed. In these vicissitudes, he incurred the anger of the king of Naples, who, seizing him by means of an ambuscade, plunged him into a dungeon, where he would probably have finished his days, but for the untiring and well-planned efforts of his wife. To effect his release, she spared no means; supplications, threats, money, all were employed, and, at last, with good success. She had the happiness of recovering her husband.

Bona was not only gifted with the feminine qualities of domestic affection and a well-balanced intellect; in the hottest battles, her bravery and power of managing her troops were quite remarkable; of these feats there are many instances recorded. We will mention but one. In the course of the Milanese war, the Venetians had been, on one occasion, signally discomfited in an attack upon the castle of Povoze, in Brescia. Brunoro himself was taken prisoner, and carried into the castle. Bona arrived with a little band of fresh soldiers; she rallied the routed forces, inspired them with new courage, led them on herself, took the castle, and liberated her husband, with the other prisoners. She was, however, destined to lose her husband without possibility of recovering him; he died in 1468. When this intrepid heroine, victor in battles, and, rising above all adversity, was bowed by a sorrow resulting from affection, she declared she could not survive Brunoro. She caused a tomb to be made, in which their remains could be united; and, after seeing the work completed, she gradually sank into a languid state, which terminated in her death.

BUCHAN,

COUNTESS of, sister of the earl of Fife, crowned Robert Bruce, king of Scotland, at Scone, March 29th, 1306, in place of her brother, whose duty it was, but whose fears prevented him from performing it. She was taken prisoner by Edward I. of England, and, for six years, confined in a wooden cage, in one of the towers of Berwick castle.

CALPHURNIA,

WIFE of the celebrated philosopher Pliny the Younger, who was killed, in 79, in consequence of approaching too near to Mount Vesuvius, when it was in a state of eruption, must have been a woman of superior character, by the manner in which her husband spoke of her, and the strong affection he seems to have borne her; in a letter to her aunt Hispulla, he says:

"As you are an example of every virtue, and as you tenderly loved your excellent brother, whose daughter (to whom you supplied the place of both parents) you considered as your own, I doubt not but you will rejoice to learn, that she proves worthy of her father, worthy of you, and worthy of her grandfather. She has great talents; she is an admirable economist; and she loves me with an entire affection: a sure sign of her chastity. To these qualities, she unites a taste for literature, inspired by her tenderness for me. She has collected my works, which she reads perpetually, and even learns to repeat. When I am to speak in public, she places herself as near to me as possible, under the cover of her veil, and listens with delight to the praises bestowed upon me. She sings my verses, and, untaught, adapts them to her lute: love is her only instructor."

In a letter to Calphurnia, Pliny writes: "My eager desire to see you is incredible. Love is its first spring; the next, that we have been so seldom separated. I pass the greater part of the night in thinking of you. In the day also, at those hours in which I have been accustomed to see you, my feet carry me spontaneously to your apartment, whence I constantly return out of humour and dejected, as if you had refused to admit me. There is one part of the day only that affords relief to my disquiet; the time dedicated to pleading the causes of my friends. Judge what a life mine must be, when labour is my rest, and when cares and perplexities are my only comforts. Adieu."

CAPILLANA,

A PERUVIAN princess, who, having become a widow very young, retired from court to the country, about the time that Pizarro appeared on the coast. Capillana received kindly the persons he had sent to reconnoitre, and expressed a desire to see the general. Pizarro came, and an attachment soon sprang up between them. He endeavoured to convert Capillana to the Christian faith, but for some time without success; however, while studying the Spanish language, she became a Christian. On the death of Pizarro, in 1541, she retired again to her residence in the country. In the library of the Dominicans of Peru, a manuscript of hers is preserved, in which are painted, by her, ancient Peruvian monuments, with a short historical explanation in Castilian. There is also a representation of many of their plants, with curious dissertations on their properties.

CARTISMANDUA,

QUEEN of the Brigantes, in Britain, is known in history for treacherously betraying Caractacus, who had taken refuge in her dominions, to the Romans, and for discarding her husband Vennius to marry his armour-bearer Velocatus. When her subjects revolted against her, she solicited aid from the Romans, who thus obtained possession of the whole country. But she at last met with the reward of her perfidies; being taken prisoner by Corbred I., king of Scots, and buried alive, about the year 57.

CASTRO,

INEZ DE, who was descended from the royal line of Castile, became first the mistress of Pedro, son of Alphonso IV., king of Portugal, and after the death of his wife Constance, in 1344, he married her. As Pedro rejected all proposals for a new marriage, his secret was suspected, and the king was persuaded, by those who dreaded the influence of Inez and her family, that this marriage would be injurious to the interests of Pedro's eldest son. He was induced to order Inez to be put to death; and, while Pedro was absent on a hunting expedition, Alphonso went to Coimbra, where Inez was living in the convent of St. Clara, with her children. Inez, alarmed, threw herself with her little ones at the king's feet, and sued for mercy. Alphonso was so touched by her prayers that he went away, but he was again persuaded to order her assassination. She was killed in 1355, and buried in the convent. Pedro took up arms against his father, but was at length reconciled to him. After Alphonso's death, Pedro, then king of Portugal, executed summary vengeance on two of the murderers of Inez; and two years after, in 1362, he declared before an assembly of the chief men of the kingdom, that the pope had consented to his union with Inez, and that he had been married to her. The papal document was exhibited in public. The body of Inez was disinterred, placed on a throne, with a diadem on her head and the royal robes wrapt around her, and the nobility were required to approach and kiss the hem of her garment. The body was then carried in great pomp from Coimbra to Alcobaça, where a monument of white marble was erected, on which was placed her statue, with a royal crown on her head.

Mrs. Hemans has described this scene with great pathos and touching beauty. Her poem ends thus:

There is music on the midnight—
A requiem sad and slow,
As the mourners through the sounding aisle
In dark procession go;
And the ring of state, and the starry crown,
And all the rich array,
Are borne to the house of silence down,
With her, that queen of clay!
And tearlessly and firmly
King Pedro led the train,—
But his face was wrapt in his folding robe,
When they lower'd the dust again.
'Tis hush'd at last the tomb above,
Hymns die, and steps depart:
Who call'd thee strong as Death, O Love?
Mightier thou wast and art.

CATHARINE OF ARRAGON,

QUEEN of England, was the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, king and queen of Spain. She was born in 1483, and, in November, 1501, was married to Arthur, prince of Wales, son to Henry VII., of England. He died April 2d, 1502, and his widow was then betrothed to his brother Henry, then only eleven years old, as Henry VII. was unwilling to return the dowry of Catharine. In his fifteenth year the prince publicly protested against the marriage; but, overpowered by the solicitations of his council, he at length agreed to ratify it, and gave his hand to Catharine, June 8d, 1505, immediately after his accession to the throne; having first obtained a dispensation from the pope, to enable him to marry his brother's widow.

The queen, by her sweetness of manners, good sense, and superior endowments, contrived to retain the affections of this fickle and capricious monarch for nearly twenty years. She was devoted to literature, and was the patroness of literary men. She bore several children, but all, excepting a daughter, afterwards queen Mary, died in their infancy. Scruples, real or pretended, at length arose in the mind of Henry concerning the legality of their union, and they were powerfully enforced by his passion for Anne Boleyn. In 1527, he resolved to obtain a divorce from Catharine on the grounds of the nullity of their marriage, as contrary to the Divine Laws. Pope Clement VII. seemed at first disposed to listen to his application, but overawed by Charles V., emperor of Germany and nephew to Catharine, he caused the negotiation to be so protracted, that Henry became very impatient. Catharine conducted herself with gentleness, yet firmness, in this trying emergency, and could not be induced to consent to an act which would stain her with the imputation of incest, and render her daughter illegitimate.

Being cited before the papal legates, Wolsey and Campeggio, who had opened their court at London, in May 1529, to try the validity of the king's marriage, she rose, and kneeling before her husband, reminded him, in a pathetic yet resolute speech, of her lonely and unprotected state, and of her constant devotion to him, in proof of which she appealed to his own heart; then protesting against the proceedings of the court, she rose and withdrew, nor could she ever be induced to appear again. She was declared contumacious, although she appealed to Rome. The pope's subterfuges and delays induced Henry to take the matter in his own hands: he threw off his submission to the court of Rome, declared himself head of the Church of England, had his marriage formally annulled by archbishop Cranmer, and in 1532 married Anne Boleyn.

Catharine took up her abode at Ampthill in Bedfordshire, and afterwards at Kimbolton-castle in Huntingdonshire. She persisted in retaining the title of queen, and in demanding the honours of royalty from her attendants; but in other respects employing herself chiefly in her religious duties, and bearing her lot with resignation. She died in January, 1536. The following letter, which she wrote to the king on her death-bed, drew tears from her husband, who always spoke in the highest terms of his injured consort.

"My King and Dearest Spouse,—

"Insomuch as already the hour of my death approacheth, the love and affection I bear you causeth me to conjure you to have a care of the eternal salvation of your soul, which you ought to prefer before mortal things, or all worldly blessings. It is for this immortal spirit you must neglect the care of your body, for the love of which you have thrown me headlong into many calamities, and your own self into infinite disturbances. But I forgive you with all my heart, humbly beseeching Almighty God he will in heaven confirm the pardon I on earth give you. I recommend unto you our most dear Mary, your daughter and mine, praying you to be a better father to her than you have been a husband to me. Remember also the three poor maids, companions of my retirement, as likewise all the rest of my servants, giving them a whole year's wages besides what is their due, that so they may be a little recompensed for the good service they have done me; protesting unto you, in the conclusion of this my letter and life, that my eyes love you, and desire to see you more than any thing mortal."

By her will she appointed her body to be privately interred in a convent of observant friars who had suffered in her cause; five hundred masses were to be performed for her soul; and a pilgrimage undertaken, to our lady of Walsingham, by a person who, on his way, was to distribute twenty nobles to the poor. She bequeathed considerable legacies to her servants, and requested that her robes might be converted into ornaments for the church, in which her remains were to be deposited. The king religiously performed her injunctions, excepting that which respected the disposal of her body, resenting, probably, the opposition which the convent had given to his divorce. The corpse was interred in the abbey church at Peterburgh, with the honours due to the birth of Catharine.

It is recorded by lord Herbert, in his history of Henry VIII., that, from respect to the memory of Catharine, Henry not only spared this church at the general dissolution of religious houses, but advanced it to be a cathedral.

CATHARINE SFORZA,

NATURAL daughter of Galeas Sforza, duke of Milan, in 1466 acquired celebrity for her courage and presence of mind. She married Jerome Riario, prince of Forli, who was some time after assassinated by Francis Del Orsa, who had revolted against him. Catharine, with her children, fell into the hands of Orsa, but contrived to escape to Rimini, which still continued faithful to her, which she defended with such determined bravery against her enemies, who threatened to put her children to death if she did not surrender, that at last she restored herself to sovereign power. She then married John de Medicis, a man of noble family, but not particularly distinguished for talents or courage. Catharine still had to sustain herself; and, in 1500, ably defended Forli against Caesar Borgia, duke Valentino, the illegitimate son of pope Alexander VI. Being obliged to surrender, she was confined in the castle of San Angelo, but soon set at liberty, though never restored to her dominions. She died soon after. She is praised by a French historian for her talents, courage, military powers, and her beauty.

SFORZA, ISABELLA, of the same family as the preceding, was distinguished in the sixteenth century for her learning. Her letters possessed great merit. One of them is a letter of consolation, written to Bonna Sforza, widow of the king of Poland; and one was in vindication of poetry.

CATHARINE,

DAUGHTER of Charles VI. of France, and Isabella of Bavaria, married Henry V. of England, and after his death, Owen Tudor, a Welshman, by whom she had Edmund, the father of Henry VII. She died in 1438. She was celebrated for her beauty.

CATHARINE, ST.,

WAS born at Sienna, in 1347. The monks relate of this saint, that she became a nun of St. Dominic at the age of seven, that she saw numberless visions, and wrought many miracles while quite young, and that she conversed face to face with Christ, and was actually married to him. Her influence was so great that she reconciled pope Gregory XI. to the people of Avignon, in 1376, after he had excommunicated them; and in 1377, she prevailed on him to re-establish the pontifical seat at Rome, seventy years after Clement V. had removed it to France. She died April 30th, 1380, aged thirty-three, and was canonized by Pius II., in 1461. Her works consist of letters, poems, and devotional pieces.

CATHARINE, ST.,

WAS a noble virgin of Alexandria. Having been instructed in literature and the sciences, she was afterwards converted to Christianity, and by order of the emperor Maximinian she disputed with fifty heathen philosophers, who, being reduced to silence by her arguments and her eloquence, were all to a man converted, and suffered martyrdom in consequence. From this circumstance, and her great learning, she is considered in the Romish church as the patron saint of philosophy, literature, and schools. She was afterwards condemned to suffer death, and the emperor ordered her to be crushed between wheels of iron, armed with sharp blades; the wheels, however, were marvelously broken asunder, as the monks declare, and, all other means of death being rendered abortive, she was beheaded in the year 310, at the age of eighteen. Her body being afterwards discovered on Mount Sinai, gave rise to the order of the Knights of St. Catharine.

CATHARINE OF VALOIS,

SURNAMED the Fair, was the youngest child of Charles VI. and Isabeau of Bavaria. She was born October 27th, 1401, at the Hotel de St. Paul, Paris, during her father's interval of insanity. She was entirely neglected by her mother, who joined with the king's brother, the duke of Orleans, in pilfering the revenues of the household. On the recovery of Charles, Isabeau fled with the duke of Orleans to Milan, followed by her children, who were pursued and brought back by the duke of Burgundy. Catharine was educated in the convent at Poissy, where her sister Marie was consecrated, and was married to Henry V. of England, June 3, 1420. Henry V. had previously conquered nearly the whole of France, and received with his bride the promise of the regency of France, as the king was again insane, and on the death of Charles VI. the sovereignty of that country, to the exclusion of Catharine's brother and three older sisters. Catharine was crowned in 1421, and her son, afterwards Henry VI., was born at Windsor in the same year, during the absence of Henry V. in France. The queen joined her husband at Paris in 1422, leaving her infant son in England, and was with him, when he died, at the Castle of Vincennes, in August 1422. Some years afterwards Catharine married Owen Tudor, an officer of Welsh extraction, who was clerk of the queen's wardrobe. This marriage was kept concealed several years, and Catharine, who was a devoted mother, seems to have lived very happily with her husband. The guardians of her son the young Henry VI., at length suspected it, and exhibited such violent resentment, that Catharine either took refuge, during the summer of 1436, in the abbey of Bermondsey, or was sent there under some restraint. Her children (she had four by Owen Tudor) were torn from her, which cruelty probably hastened the death of the poor queen. She was ill during the summer and autumn, and died January, 1437. The nuns, who piously attended her, declared she was a sincere penitent. She had disregarded the injunctions of her royal husband, Henry V., in choosing Windsor as the birth-place of the heir of England; and she had never believed the prediction, that "Henry of Windsor shall lose all that Henry of Monmouth had gained." But during her illness she became fearful of the result, and sorely repented her disobedience of her husband.

CATHARINE, ST.,

A SAINT of the Romish church canonized by pope Clement VII. She was born at Bologna in 1413, and admitted a nun at Ferrara, in 1432. She was afterwards abbess of a convent at Bologna, where she died in 1463. She wrote a book of "Revelations," and several pieces in Latin and Italian.

CERETA,

LAURA, an Italian lady, born at Brescia, eminent for her knowledge of philosophy and the learned languages. She became a widow early in life, and then devoted herself entirely to literary labours. Her Latin letters appeared at Padua in 1680. She died in 1498, aged twenty-nine. Her husband's name was Pedro Serini.

CHRODIELDE,

A NUN of the convent founded by Radegonde at Poitiers, was the cause of the temporary dispersion of this powerful community. Soon after Radegonde's death, which occurred in 590, Chrodield, who pretended that she was the daughter of the late king Cheribert, induced many of the nuns to take an oath, that as soon as she succeeded in forcing the abbess Leubovère to leave the convent, by accusing her of several crimes, they would place her at their head. She then, with more than forty nuns, among whom was Basine, daughter of Chilperic, went to Tours, where she wished to place her companions under the care of Gregory, bishop of Tours, while she went to lay her complaint before Gentran, king of Burgundy. Gregory advised her to return, but in vain; and Chrodield went to make her petition to the king, who promised to examine into the cause of her dissatisfaction. Chrodield would not return to the cloister, but went with her companions into the cathedral of St. Hilary, while the bishops, whom the king had sent, were investigating the affair. Here she collected around her for her defence, thieves, murderers, and criminals of all kinds, who drove away with violence the bishops who came to disperse them. Childebert, king of France, sent orders that these disturbances should be repressed by force if necessary; but Chrodield, at the head of her banditti, made such a valiant resistance, that it was with difficulty the king's orders were executed. The abbess of St. Radegonde was tried by the tribunal of bishops, on the charges of severity, ill-treatment, and sacrilege, which Chrodield had preferred against her, and found entirely innocent of everything but too great indulgence. Chrodield and her followers were excommunicated on account of their violent conduct, and their attack on the convent, and on the abbess Leubovère, and the nuns, whom they had maltreated and wounded, even in their oratories. Leubovère they had drawn through the streets by the hair, and afterwards imprisoned.

LARA,

A NATIVE of Assisi, in Italy, of respectable parentage, early devoted herself to a religious and recluse life. Her example was followed by her sister Agnes, and other female friends. She obtained from St. Francis d'Assisi the church of Damain, and became abbess of a new order of nuns, which she there established. She died in 1193, aged one hundred, and was canonized by Alexander IV.

CLELIA,

A YOUNG Roman girl, whose courage and patriotism entitle her to a place among the distinguished of her sex. She was one of ten virgins who were sent as hostages by the Roman senate to Porsena. The young Clelia hated the enemies of her people, and resolved not to live among them. One day while walking near the Tiber with her companions, she persuaded them to throw themselves with her in the river, swim to the opposite shore, and then return to Rome. Her eloquence prevailed upon them, and they all reached their home in safety, although they had to accomplish the feat amidst a shower of arrows that were poured upon them by the enemy. But the consul, Publicola, did not approve of the bold deed, and sent the poor maidens back to king Porsena's camp. Porsena was moved by the courage of the girls and the generosity of the Romans, and gave them their liberty; and to Clelia in addition, as a mark of his particular esteem, a noble charger splendidly caparisoned. Rome then erected, in the Via Sacra, an equestrian statue in honour of the fair heroine, which Plutarch mentions in his writings.

CLOTILDE,

WIFE of Clovis, king of France, was the daughter of Chilperic, third son of Gandive, king of Burgundy. Gandive dying in 470, left his kingdom to his four sons, who were for three years engaged in a constant contest to obtain the entire control of the country. At length the two elder princes succeeded. Chilperic and Godemar were murdered, Chilperic's wife was drowned, his two sons killed, his eldest daughter placed in a convent, and Clotilde, still very young, confined in a castle. Clovis, hearing of her beauty, virtues.

and misfortunes, and besides wishing to have an excuse for extending his dominions, sent to demand her in marriage of her uncle, who was afraid to refuse the alliance, though he foresaw the disasters it might bring on his country. Clotilde was married to Clovis in 493, at Soissons. She then devoted her whole life to the fulfilment of two great designs; one was to convert her husband, still a pagan, to the Christian faith; and the other to revenge on her uncle Gondebaud, the deaths of her father, mother, and brothers. She at length succeeded in the first object, and Clovis was baptized in 496, together with his sister Albofede and three thousand warriors, on the occasion of a victory he obtained through the intercession of the god of Clotilde, as he thought. Clovis next turned his arms against Gondebaud, and conquered him, but left him in possession of his kingdom. Clovis died in 511, and Clotilde retired to Tours, but used all her influence to induce her three sons to revenge her injuries still more effectually; and in a battle with the Burgundians her eldest and best-beloved son Chlodomir was slain. He left three young sons, of whom Clotilde took charge, intending to educate them, and put them in possession of their father's inheritance. She brought them with her to Paris, when her two remaining sons obtained possession of them, and sent to her to know whether they should place them in a monastery or put them to death. Overcome by distress, Clotilde exclaimed, "Let them perish by the sword rather than live ignominiously in a cloister." The two elder children were killed, but the younger one was saved, and died a priest. After this catastrophe, Clotilde again retired to Tours, where she passed her time in acts of devotion. She died in 545. She was buried at Paris, by the side of her husband and St. Genevieve, and was canonized after her death.

CLOTILDE,

THE unfortunate queen of the Goths, was daughter of Clovis and Clotilde of France. She married Amalaric, who was an Arian, while she was a pious Catholic. She was so persecuted by her subjects for her faith, that her life was in danger, while her bigoted husband united with her foes in abusing her. She at last applied to her three brothers, who then governed the divided kingdom of the Franks, sending to Chilperic, king of Paris, her eldest brother, a handkerchief saturated with the blood drawn from her by the blows of her barbarous husband. Her brothers took up arms to revenge her cause, and in this bloody war the cruel Amalaric was slain. Clotilde returned to her native France, and died soon after, about 535. She was a pious and amiable woman.

COLONNA,

VITTORIA, daughter of Fabricio, duke of Paliano, was born at Marino in 1490, and married in 1507, Francesco, Marquis of Pescara. Her poems have often been published, and are highly and deservedly admired. Her husband died in 1525, and she determined to spend the remainder of her life in religious seclusion, although various proposals of marriage were made to her. Her beauty, talents, and virtue, were extolled by her contemporaries, among others by Michael Angelo and Ariosto. She died in 1547, at Rome. She was affianced to the Marquis of Pescara in childhood, and as they grew up a very tender affection increased with their years. Congenial in tastes, of the same age, their union was the model of a happy marriage. Circumstances showed whose mind was of the firmer texture and higher tone. Francesco having exhibited extraordinary valour and generalship at the battle of Pavia, was thought of importance enough to be bribed; a negotiation was set on foot to offer him the crown of Naples, if he would betray the sovereign to whom he had sworn fealty. The lure was powerful, and Francesco lent a willing ear to these propositions, when Vittoria came to the aid of his yielding virtue. She sent him that remarkable letter, where, among other things, she says, "Your virtue may raise you above the glory of being king. The sort of honour that goes down to our children with real lustre is derived from our deeds and qualities, not from power or titles. For myself, I do not wish to be the wife of a king, but of a general who can make himself superior to the greatest king, not only by courage, but by magnanimity, and superiority to any less elevated motive than duty."

COMNENUS,

ANNA, daughter to the Greek emperor Alexius Comnenus, flourished about 1118, and wrote fifteen books on the life and actions of her father, which she called "The Alexiad." Eight of these books were published by Hæschelius in 1610, and the whole of them with a Latin version in 1651; to another edition of which, in 1670, the learned Charles du Fresne added historical and philological notes.

The authors of the "Journal des Savans," for 1675, have spoken as follows of this learned and accomplished lady. "The elegance with which Anna Comnenus has described the life and actions of her father, and the strong and eloquent manner with which she has set them off, are so much above the ordinary understanding of women, that one is almost ready to doubt whether she was indeed the author of those books. It is certain that we cannot read her descriptions of countries, towns, rivers, mountains, battles, sieges, her reflections upon particular events, the judgments she passes on human actions, and the digressions she makes on many occasions, without perceiving that she must have been very well skilled in grammar, rhetoric, philosophy, mathematics, physics and divinity; all of which is very uncommon in any of that sex."

CONSTANCE,

DAUGHTER of Conan, duke of Brittany, wife of Geoffrey Plantagenet, son of Henry II., king of England. She was contracted to him while they were both in the cradle, and, by her right, Geoffrey became duke of Brittany. By him she had two children, Eleanor, called the Maid of Brittany, and Arthur, who was born after the death of his father. She afterwards married Ralph Blundeville, earl of Chester, who suspected her of an intrigue with John of England, his most bitter enemy. He obtained a divorce, and Constance married Guy, brother of the viscount de Thouars. She had by him a daughter, Alix, whom the Bretons, on the refusal of John to set free her elder sister, elected for their sovereign. The king of France, and Richard Cœur de Lion, king of England, both claimed Brittany as a fief. Constance, to keep it in her own name, fomented divisions between the sovereigns. On the death of Richard, it was found that he had left the kingdom to his brother John, instead of his nephew Arthur, to whom it rightfully belonged. Constance resented this injustice, and being a woman of judgment and courage, might have reinstated her son in his rights, if she had not died before she had an opportunity of asserting his claims. She died in 1202. Her eldest daughter was kept all her life in prison.

CONTARINI,

GABRIELLO CATTERINA, of Agolfio. No exact date of her birth is to be procured; that she lived towards the end of the fifteenth century is indubitable. She possessed a very fertile vein of poetic fancy. Her poetry manifests natural facility in composing, as well as considerable erudition. She was distinguished for her pleasing manners and solid virtues. Her works are, "Life of St. Francesco," a poem; "Life of St. Waldo," a poem; five odes, seven canzonets, and some occasional poems.

COPPOLI,

ELENA or CECILIA, of Perugia, born 1425, died 1500. This learned woman was the daughter of Francesco Coppoli. In the twenty-seventh year of her age she entered the religious house of Santa Lucia, and became a member of the sisterhood. She was an intimate friend of the famous Porcellio, who addressed many Latin poems to her. She was not only mistress of the Greek and Latin, but well acquainted with elegant literature. She has left some Latin poems, "Ascetic Letters," a manuscript life of a certain sister Eustachia of Messina, and a "History of the Monastery of St. Lucia."

CORDAUD,

ISABELLA DE, a beautiful, rich, and accomplished lady, mistress of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, took her degree in theology, with the title of doctor.

CORNARO,

CATERINA, queen of Cyprus. At the court of James IV., king of Cyprus, resided a Venetian gentleman, exiled for some youthful indiscretions. He found especial favour with his adopted monarch, and rose to an intimate intercourse with him. One day, happening to stoop, he let fall a miniature, which represented so beautiful a face that the king eagerly inquired about the original. After stimulating his curiosity by affecting a discreet reserve, he acknowledged it to be the likeness of his niece. In subsequent conversations he artfully praised this young lady, and so wrought upon the sovereign that he resolved to take her for his wife. This honourable proposal being transmitted to Venice, she was adopted by the state, and sent as a daughter of the republic—a mode often adopted by that oligarchy for forming alliances with foreign powers. The fine climate and rich soil of Cyprus—an island so favoured by nature, that the ancients dedicated it to the queen of beauty and love—had made it always a coveted spot of earth. After the dominion of the Ptolemies, it was governed successively by the Arabs, the Comneni, and the Templars. In 1192, it fell into the possession of Guy de Lusignan. Fourteen kings of that house kept the dominion for 240 years, until the accession of John III., a weak man, who resigned all power to his wife Elena, a woman of haughty disposition, and an object of public dislike. This king had two children, a daughter, Carlotta, married to John of Portugal, and residing in the island, and a son who was illegitimate, James. Elena, that there might be no danger of his rivalling her daughter in the succession, had obliged him to take monastic vows; and he was subsequently made archbishop of the kingdom; but he entertaining ambitious views, obtained a dispensation, resigned his ecclesiastical dignity, and upon the death of his father openly offered himself as heir and claimant to the throne. Carlotta had lost her husband. She maintained an opposition to her natural brother with various success, but the people had imbibed so thorough a disgust of her mother's domination, that she met with obstacles everywhere, and James obtained triumphant success. He had been for some years peaceably possessed of the crown, when he married the beautiful Venetian. His wedded felicity was of short duration; he died, leaving the queen in a state of pregnancy. Venice stepped in to support her claims to a regency, which she obtained without much difficulty. She gave birth to a son, who lived but two years. Here Carlotta appears again on the scene; she raised troops and began a war, but the Venetian republic had determined upon the fate of Cyprus. Her power easily defeated the pretender Carlotta, and when Catherine was proclaimed queen, as easily procured her abdication in favour of the state of Venice. After various forms, and overpowering some opposition, Cyprus was annexed to the republic of Venice, in 1489, the 20th of June. Catherine returned to her country and family, where she passed so obscure a life that no historian has taken the pains to note the period of her death.

Her name remains in the archives of Venice, because through her means a kingdom was acquired. Her features enjoy immortality, for she was painted by Titian.

CUNEGONDE,

DAUGHTER of Ligefroi, count of Luxembourg, married the emperor Henry II. of Germany, by whom she had no children. She has been accused by some historians of incontinence, while others regard her as ill-treated by her husband, after whose death, in 1024, she retired to a monastery.

D.

D'ANDALO, or BRANCALEONE GALEANA.

NOTHING is known of the early youth of this lady, but that she belonged to the noble house of Saviolo of Bologna. She lived in the thirteenth century, a melancholy epoch for Italy, divided, and torn to pieces by factions and princely demagogues. In 1251 her husband, Brancalione D'Andalo, was selected by the upper council of Bologna to go to Rome, where the imbecile administration wished to confer on him the dignity of Senator, and to obtain the advantage of his services in appeasing their dissensions. He declined going until they sent hostages to Bologna. Galeana remained at Bologna to receive these noble Romans, and upon their arrival wrote to her husband a very elegant Latin letter, describing them and their reception. She then proceeded to Rome, where she found D'Andalo precipitated from his honours—the caprice of popular favour had turned—he was in a dungeon and his life menaced. Struck with horror, she sunk not under this blow, but courageously presented herself to the council, and with a manly eloquence did this Bolognese matron appeal to the public faith; and solemnly one by one call upon the weak and perfidious individuals who had invited her husband to this snare. The good cause triumphed; Galeana had the felicity of returning home with D'Andalo, endeared to him by her virtuous exertions. She died in 1274.

DANTI,

THEODORA, an Italian artist, was born at Perugia, in 1498, and died there in 1573. She painted small pictures in the manner of Pietro Perugino, in an excellent style. She also excelled in mathematics, in which science she instructed one of her nephews, who, with his aunt, acquired great reputation for learning.

DESMOND,

CATHARINE FITZGERALD, countess of, who attained the age of one hundred and forty-five years, was daughter of the house of Drumana, in the county of Waterford, Ireland, and second wife of James, twelfth earl of Desmond, to whom she was married in the reign of Edward IV. (1461), and being on that occasion presented at court, she danced with the duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III. The beauty and vivacity of lady Desmond rendered her an object of attraction to a very advanced age, and she had passed her hundredth year before she could refrain from dancing, or mingling in gay assemblies. She resided at Inchiquin, in Munster, and held her jointure as dowager from many successive earls of Desmond, till the family being by an attainder deprived of the estate, she was reduced to poverty. Although then one hundred and forty, she went to London, laid her case before James I., and obtained relief. Sir Walter Raleigh was well acquainted with this lady, and mentions her as a prodigy. Lord Bacon informs us that she had three new sets of natural teeth. It is uncertain in what year she died; but she was not living in 1617, when Sir Walter Raleigh published his history.

DERVORGILLE,

LADY, was widow of John de Baliol, of Barnard's castle, in the county of Durham, a man of opulence and power in the thirteenth century, on whom devolved the duty of carrying on her husband's design of founding the college called Baliol College, in Oxford. Her husband left no written deed for the purpose; but his widow in the most honourable and liberal manner fulfilled his desire.

DODANE,

DUCHESS DE SEPTIMANIE, was the wife of Bernard, duke de Septimanie, son of William of Aquitaine, whom she married, in the palace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in June, 824. She became the mother of two sons, William and Bernard, for whom she wrote, in 841, a book in Latin, called, The Advice of a Mother to her Sons. Some fragments of this work still remain, and do honour to the good sense and religious feeling of the writer. Dodane died in 842.

DOETE DE TROYES,

Was born in that city in 1220, and died in 1265. She accompanied her brother Sherry, surnamed the Valiant, to the coronation of Conrad, emperor of Germany, at Mayence, where she was much admired for her wit and beauty. She attracted the notice of the emperor, but he found her virtue invincible. She wrote poetry with ease and grace.

DORCAS, or TABITHA,

(THE first was her name in Greek, the second in Syriac) signifies a roe, or gazelle, and was the name, probably, given to indicate some peculiar characteristic of this amiable woman. Dorcas lived in Joppa, now called Jaffa, a sea-port upon the eastern coast of the Mediterranean sea, about forty-five miles north-west of Jerusalem. Dorcas had early become a convert to the Christian religion, and must have been a most zealous disciple, as she "was full of good works and alms-deeds, which she did." She was not satisfied with advocating the right way, or giving in charity; she worked with her own hands in the good cause—she made garments for the poor; she relieved the sick, and she comforted those who mourned. We feel sure she must have done all these deeds of love, because, when she died, the "widows" were "weeping, and showing the coats and garments Dorcas had made." Peter, the apostle, was journeying in the country near Joppa when Dorcas died. The disciples sent for him to come and comfort them in this great affliction; he went, and prayed, and raised the dead Dorcas to life.

This was the first miracle of raising the dead to life performed by the apostles. A woman was thus distinguished for her "good works." And her name has since been, and will ever continue to be, synonymous with the holiest deeds of woman's charity, till time shall be no more. Every "Dorcas Society" is a monument to the sweet and happy memory of this pious woman, who did her humble alms-deeds more than 1800 years ago. See Acts, chap. ix., ver. 36 to 43.

DOUVRE,

ISABELLA DE, of Bayeux, in France, was mistress to Robert the Bastard, son of Henry I. of England, by whom she had Richard, bishop of Bayeux. She died at Bayeux, at an advanced age, in 1166.

DRAHOMIRA,

WIFE of duke Wratislaw of Bohemia. She was a pagan when, in 907, the duke chose her for his wife, but with the condition that she should become a Christian. She complied, yet adhered in secret to her idolatrous practices. She had two sons, Winzeslaus and Boleslaus—the former became a devoted Christian, and the latter adhered to the idolatry of his mother. When the duke died, she seized upon the reins of government, and endeavoured to re-establish idolatry, by persecuting her Christian subjects, and by favouring the pretensions of her son Boleslaus, at the expense of his elder brother, Winzeslaus. She caused the assassination of her pious mother-in-law, Ludmilen. The Christians became at last tired of her wicked conduct, and rose in rebellion against her. Her adherents were defeated, and Winzeslaus was proclaimed duke. But she induced Boleslaus to assassinate him at a feast given by her. Shortly after this horrible act, she was killed by her horses, which ran away, and dragged her body, so that she died with excruciating suffering.

DRUSILLA LIVIA,

DAUGHTER of Germanicus and Agrippina, was notorious for her licentiousness. She openly married her brother Caligula, who was so tenderly attached to her, that in a dangerous illness he made her heiress of all his possessions, and commanded that she should succeed him in the Roman empire. She died in 38, in the twenty-third year of her life, and was deified by her brother, who built temples to her honour. She was very beautiful.

DRUSILLA,

THE third daughter of Herod Agrippa, the governor of Abilene, was married to Azisus, king of the Emessenians, whom she abandoned that she might marry Claudius Felix, governor of Judea, in 53, by whom she had a son named Agrippa. She was one of the most beautiful women of her age. One day Felix and Drusilla, who was a Jewess, sent for Paul, and desired him to explain the Christian religion. The apostle, with his usual boldness, spoke on justice, chastity, and the last judgment.

DUYN,

MARGUERITE DE, abbess of the convent of La Chartreuse de Poletin, on the confines of Dauphiny and Savoy, lived at the close of the thirteenth century. During her life she was considered a saint, and she wrote several meditations in Latin, remarkable only for the correctness and propriety of the language. She also wrote her own language with ease, and her works show a cultivation of mind uncommon in those days.

E.

EANFLED,

DAUGHTER of Edwin, king of Northumbria and Ethelburga, was the first individual who received the sacrament of baptism in that kingdom. She afterwards married Osmy, king of Mercia.

EBBA,

ABBESS of the monastery of Coldingham in Ireland, is celebrated for her resolution and courage. The Danes having ravaged the country with fire and sword, were approaching Coldingham, when Ebba persuaded her nuns to disfigure themselves by cutting off their noses and upper lips, that they might be preserved from the brutality of the soldiery. Her example was followed by all the sisterhood. The barbarians, enraged at finding them in this state, set fire to the monastery, and consumed the inmates in the flames.

EDESIA

OF Alexandria, wife of the philosopher Hermias. She lived in the beginning of the fifth century. Though at an early period of her life a convert to Christianity, she escaped persecution on account of her faith, in consequence of the high respect she commanded for her virtuous and exemplary life. After the death of her husband, she removed to Athens to her relations.

The Fathers of the church mention her in their writings as having been instrumental, by her exemplary conduct, in doing away many prejudices entertained against the followers of Christ, and in causing numbers to join the church.

EDITHA,

DAUGHTER of Earl Godwin, and wife of Edward the Confessor, was an amiable and very learned lady. Ingulphus, the Saxon historian, affirms that the queen frequently interrupted him and his school-fellows in her walks, and questioned them, with much closeness, on their progress in Latin. Ingulphus was then a scholar at Westminster monastery, near Edith's palace. She was also skilful in needle-work, and kind to the poor. Her character is very interesting, and her heart-trials must have been severe.

ELEANOR

OF Aquitaine, succeeded her father, William X., in 1137, at the age of fifteen, in the fine duchy which at that time comprised Gascony, Saintonge, and the Comte de Poitou. She married the same year Louis VII., king of France, and went with him to the Holy Land. She soon gave him cause for jealousy, from her intimacy with her uncle, Raymond count of Poitiers, and with Saladin; and after many bitter quarrels, they were divorced under pretence of consanguinity, in 1152.

G

Six weeks afterwards, Eleanor married Henry II., duke of Normandy, afterwards king of England, to whom she brought in dowry Poitou and Guienne. Thence arose those wars that ravaged France for three hundred years, in which more than three millions of Frenchmen lost their lives.

Eleanor had four sons and a daughter by her second husband. In 1162, she gave Guienne to her second son, Richard Cœur de Lion, who did homage for it to the king of France. She died in 1204. She was very jealous of her second husband, and showed the greatest animosity to all whom she regarded as rivals. She is accused of having compelled one of his mistresses, Rosamond Clifford, generally called the Fair Rosamond, to drink poison; but the story has been shown to be untrue by later researches. She incited her sons to rebel against their father, and was in consequence thrown into prison, where she was kept for sixteen years. She was in her youth remarkably beautiful; and, in the later years of her varied life, showed evidences of a naturally noble disposition. As soon as she was liberated from her prison, which was done by order of her son Richard on his accession to the throne, he placed her at the head of the government. No doubt she bitterly felt the utter neglect she had suffered during her imprisonment; yet she did not, when she had obtained power, use it to punish her enemies, but rather devoted herself to deeds of mercy and piety, going from city to city, setting free all persons confined for violating the game-laws, which, in the latter part of king Henry's life, were cruelly enforced; and when she released these prisoners, it was on condition that they prayed for the soul of her late husband. Miss Strickland thus closes her interesting biography of this beautiful but unfortunate queen of England:—"Eleanor of Aquitaine is among the very few women who have atoned for an ill-spent youth by a wise and benevolent old age. As a sovereign she ranks among the greatest of female rulers."

ELEANOR

OF England, surnamed the Saint, was the daughter of Berenger, the fifth count of Provence. In the year 1236, she became the wife of king Henry III. of England, and afterward the mother of Edward I. After the death of her husband she entered the nunnery at Ambresbury, and lived there in the odour of sanctity. Her prayers were reputed to have the power of producing miracles

ELGIVA,

A BEAUTIFUL English princess, who married Edwy, king of England, soon after he ascended the throne, in 955. She was within the degree of kindred prohibited by the canon law; and the savage Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, excited a disaffection against the king in consequence. This party seized the queen, and by the order of archbishop Odo, branded her in the face with a red-hot iron, hoping to destroy her beauty, and carried her into Ireland to remain there in exile; while Edwy consented to a divorce. Elgiva, having completely recovered from her wounds, was hastening to the arms of her husband, when she fell into the hands of her enemies, and was barbarously murdered.

ELISABETH,

WIFE of Zacharias, and the mother of John the Baptist. St. Luke says that she was of the daughters of Aaron, of the race of priests. Her ready faith, and rejoicing acknowledgment of the "Lord," show the warm soul of a pious woman. "Elisabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost;" that is, inspired to understand that her young cousin, Mary the virgin, would become the mother of the Messiah. Thus was the Saviour foretold, welcomed and adored by a woman, before he had taken the form of humanity. This tender sensibility to divine truth, when mysteriously manifested, has never been thus fully understood, and fondly cherished, by any man. Do not these examples show, conclusively, that the nature of woman is most in harmony with heavenly things? See St. Luke, chap. i.

ELISABETH

OF York, daughter of Edward IV. of England and Elisabeth Woodville, was born February 11th, 1466. When about ten years old, she was betrothed to Charles, eldest son of Louis XI. of France; but when the time for the marriage approached, the contract was broken by Louis XI. demanding the heiress of Burgundy in marriage for the dauphin. This so enraged her father, that the agitation is said to have caused his death. After the decease of Edward, Elisabeth shared her mother's trials, and her grief and resentment at the murder of her two young brothers by Richard III. She remained with her mother for some time in sanctuary, to escape the cruelty of the king, her uncle; and while there, was betrothed to Henry of Richmond. But in March, 1483, they were obliged to surrender themselves; Elisabeth was separated from her mother, and forced to acknowledge herself the illegitimate child of Edward IV. On the death of Anne, the queen of Richard III., it was rumoured that he intended to marry his niece, Elisabeth, which caused so much excitement in the public mind, that Richard was obliged to disavow the report. Elisabeth herself showed such an aversion to her uncle, that she was confined in the castle of Sheriff Hatton, in Yorkshire. After the battle of Bosworth, August 22, 1485, in which Richard III. was slain, Henry of Richmond was declared king, under the title of Henry VII. of England; and on January 18, 1486, he was married to the princess Elisabeth,—thus uniting the houses of York and Lancaster. Elisabeth was the mother of several children; the eldest of whom, Arthur, prince of Wales, married, in 1501, Katharine of Arragon, afterwards the wife of his younger brother, Henry VIII., Arthur dying five months after his marriage. Elisabeth died, February 11, 1503, a few days after the birth of a daughter. She was a gentle, pious, and well-beloved princess, and deeply lamented by her husband, although his natural reserve led him often to be accused of coldness towards her. She was very beautiful.

ELPIS,

A LADY of one of the most considerable families of Messina, was the first wife of the celebrated Boethius, and was born in the latter part of the fifth century. Like her husband, she was devoted to science, and shared his literary labours with him. She united all the accomplishments of the head and the heart. Her two sons, Patritius and Hypatius, were raised to the consular dignity, which Boethius had also several times enjoyed. Elpis died before the misfortunes of her husband fell upon him.

EMMA,

WIFE of Lothaire, king of France, was the daughter of Jtho, emperor of Germany, and of his wife Adelaide. In 984, Lothaire having taken Verdun, left his wife there to guard it, who, the next year, was attacked by a large army. She repulsed them at first, and gave her husband time to come to her aid. Lothaire died in 986. Some writers have accused Emma and the bishop Aldeberon of having poisoned him, that they might continue their guilty intercourse; but the charge has never been proved.

EMMA,

DAUGHTER of Richard II., duke of Normandy, married Ethelred, king of England, with whom she fled, on the invasion of the Danes. She afterwards married Canute; and when her son Edward, called the Confessor, ascended the throne, she reigned conjointly with him. Her enemy, the earl of Kent, opposed her; and when she appealed for assistance to her relation, the bishop of Winchester, she was accused of criminal intercourse with that prelate; a charge from which she extricated herself by walking barefoot and unhurt over nine red-hot ploughshares, after the manner of the times. She passed the night previous to her trial in prayer, before the tomb of St. Swithin; and the next day, she appeared plainly dressed, her feet and legs bare to the knee, and underwent the ordeal, in the presence of the king, her son, Edward the Confessor, the nobility, clergy, and people, in the cathedral church at Winchester. Her innocence proved so miraculous a preservation that, walking with her eyes raised to heaven, she did not even perceive the least reflection from the heated irons, (if the old chronicle be true,) but inquired, after having passed over them, when they designed to bring her to the test.

The king, struck with the miracle, fell on his knees before his mother, and implored her pardon; while, to expiate the injury done to her and her relation, the reverend prelate, he devoutly laid bare his shoulders before the bishop, whom he ordered to inflict on him the discipline of the scourge.

Emma, however, stripped by Edward of the immense treasures she had amassed, spent the last ten years of her life in misery, in a kind of prison or convent at Winchester, where she died in 1502.

ERMENGARDE, or HERMENGARDE.

THE life of this queen is but a relation of her misfortunes. She is not the only woman to whom misery has been a monument—to whom the tranquillity of private life would have been oblivion—and to whom the gifts of fortune have brought sorrow and celebrity. The precise date of her birth is not known. She was the daughter of Desiderio or Didier, as he is generally named by English writers, king of the Lombards, and his queen Ansa. Desiderio was born at Brescia of noble race, and had succeeded to the throne of Lombardy by the testament of Astolfo, the last monarch of the dynasty of Alboinus. Desiderio was a renowned general, and also a zealous defender of the Christian church, which at that time was not so firmly established as to need no support from the temporal powers.

Charlemagne ascended the throne of France in 768; two years after, his mother Bertrade, making a journey into Italy, was struck by the flourishing state of Desiderio's kingdom, as well as by the beauty and attractive charms of his daughter Ermengarde. She then formed the plan of a double marriage with this family, allotting Ermengarde to Charlemagne, and her own Ciola to Adelchi son of Desiderio. This scheme was opposed by the existing Pope, Stephen III., who used many arguments to dissuade France from the connection. The influence of Bertrade, however, prevailed, and she had the satisfaction of taking home with her the young princess, for whom she cherished so warm an affection.

At first everything was done to bring pleasure and happiness to the young queen; the particular friendship subsisting between her and her mother-in-law has been commemorated by Manzoni in beautiful and touching poetry. A terrible reverse, however, awaited her. Charlemagne, from causes impossible now to ascertain, repudiated her, and sent her ignominiously back to her family. His mother and his nearest kinsmen remonstrated, and entreated him to revoke this cruel mandate; but in vain. After a year of deceptive happiness, Hermengarde returned to the court of Lombardy.

Her father and brother received her with the utmost tenderness. Unfortunately their just indignation at the unmerited disgrace of the young princess, induced them to attempt a fruitless vengeance against one too decidedly superior in power for any petty sovereign to cope with. A plan was set on foot to bring forward another claimant to the throne of France, to the succession of which, in modern days of direct inheritance, Charlemagne would not be considered wholly eligible. For this purpose armies were raised and secret alliances courted.

In the mean time Ermengarde received intelligence that her faithless husband had just united himself to the young and lovely Ildegarde. This was to her a death-blow. She retired to a monastery founded by her parents, and of which her sister Anoperge was abbess. Here her existence was soon terminated. She died in 773. The chroniclers of that day recount that Adelard, a cousin of Charlemagne, was so disgusted with the unlawful marriage of his sovereign that he became a monk, by way of expiation, and carried to such a degree his devotion and austere piety that he obtained the honours of canonization. Desiderio, and his son Adelchi, after much ineffectual valour, were obliged to succumb to the genius and armies of Charlemagne, who, taking possession of their states, obliged them to retire into a monastery for the rest of their lives.

EPONINA,

WIFE of Julius Sabinus, a Roman general native of Langres, has been called the heroine of conjugal affection. During the struggles of Otho, Vitellius, and Vespasian, for the sovereignty of Rome, Sabinus, who pretended to trace his lineage to Julius Cæsar by casting an imputation on the chastity of his grandmother, put in his claim to the throne. Being defeated, and an immense reward offered for his head, he assembled his few faithful friends, and acknowledging his gratitude towards them, he expressed his resolution of not surviving his misfortunes, but of setting his house on fire and perishing in the flames. They remonstrated in vain, and at length were obliged to leave him, in order to preserve their own lives. To a freedman of the name of Martial, he alone imparted his real intention, which was to conceal himself in a subterranean cavern, which had communication with his house. The superb mansion of Sabinus was then set on fire, and the report of his death, with the attendant circumstances, was sent immediately to Vespasian, and soon reached Eponina's ears. Frantic with grief, she resolved to put an end to her life also. For three days she refused every kind of nourishment, when Martial, hearing of her violent sorrow, contrived to disclose to her the truth, but advised her to continue the semblance of grief lest suspicions should arise; but at night he conducted her to the cavern, which she left before daybreak.

Frequent were the excuses which Eponina made to her friends for her absences from Rome; and after a time, she not only visited her husband in the evening, but passed whole days with him in the cavern. At length her apprehensions were excited by her situation; but by rubbing a poisonous ointment upon herself, she produced a swelling in her legs and arms, so that her complaint was thought to be a dropsy; she then retired to the cave, and without any medical assistance, she gave birth to a boy. For nearly nine years she continued to visit her husband in his solitude, and during that period twice became a mother. At length her frequent absences were noticed, she was watched, and her secret discovered.

Loaded with chains, Sabinus was brought before Vespasian, and condemned to die. Eponina threw herself at the feet of the emperor, and implored him to spare her husband; and, at the same time, she presented her two children to him, who joined in the solicitation, with tears and entreaties. Vespasian, however, remained inflexible, and Eponina, rising with an air of dignity, said, "Be assured that I know how to condemn life; with Sabinus I have existed nine years in the bowels of the earth, and with him I am resolved to die." She perished with her husband about seventy-eight years after the Christian era.

ESTHER,

A JEWESS, mistress to Casimir III., king of Poland in the fourteenth century, from whom she obtained great privileges for her nation.

ETHELBURGA,

DAUGHTER of Ethelbert, king of Kent, married Edwin, king of Northumbria. He was a very brave and warlike prince, but a pagan when she married him. However, she won him to the Christian faith, as her mother Bertha had won her father Ethelbert. Thus was Christianity planted in England by the faith and influence of woman.

ETHELDREDA, ST.,

Was a daughter of Auna, king of the East Angles, and Hereswitha his queen, and was born about 630, at Ixming, a small village in Suffolk. In 673, she founded the church and convent of Ely. Of this monastery she was constituted abbess. The convent, with its inhabitants, was destroyed by the Danes in 870.

ETHELFLEDA, or ELFLEDA,

ELDEST daughter of Alfred the Great, and sister of Edward I., king of the West-Saxons, was wife to Etheldred, earl of Mercia. After the birth of her first child, having suffered severely in childbirth, she made a vow of chastity, and devoted herself to arms. She retained a cordial friendship for her husband, with whom she united in acts of munificence and valour. They assisted Alfred in his wars against the Danes, whom they prevented the Welsh from succouring. Not less pious than valiant, they restored cities, founded abbeys, and protected the bones of departed saints.

After the death of her husband, in 912, Ethelfleda assumed the government of Mercia; and, emulating her father and brother, commanded armies, fortified towns, and prevented the Danes from re-settling in Mercia. Then carrying her victorious arms into Wales, she compelled the Welsh, after several victories, to become her tributaries. In 918, she took Derby from the Danes; and in 920, Leicester, York, &c. Having become famed for her spirit and courage, the titles of lady and queen were judged inadequate to her merit; to these she received, in addition, those of lord and king.

Her courage and activity were employed in the service of her country till her death, in 922, at Tamworth, in Staffordshire, where she was carrying on a war with the Danes. She left one daughter, Elswina.

Ethelfleda was deeply regretted by the whole kingdom, especially by her brother Edward, to whom she proved equally serviceable in the cabinet and the field. Ingulphus, the historian, speaks of the courage and masculine virtues of this princess.

EUDOCIA,

WHOSE name was originally Athenais, was the daughter of Leontius, an Athenian sophist and philosopher. She was born about 393, and very carefully educated by her father. Her progress in every branch of learning was uncommon and rapid. Her father, proud of her great beauty and attainments, persuaded himself that the merit of Athenais would be a sufficient dowry. With this conviction, he divided, on his death-bed, his estate between his two sons, bequeathing his daughter only one hundred pieces of gold.

Less sanguine in the power of her charms, Athenais appealed at first to the equity and affection of her brothers; finding this in vain, she took refuge with an aunt of hers, and commenced a legal process against her brothers. In the progress of the suit, Athenais was carried, by her aunts, to Constantinople. Theodosius II. at this time divided with his sister Pulcheria the care of the empire; and to Pulcheria the aunts of Athenais appealed for justice. The beauty and intellect of the young Greek interested Pulcheria, who contrived that her brother should see her and hear her converse, without being himself seen. Her slender and graceful figure, the regularity of her features, her fair complexion, golden hair, large blue eyes, and musical voice, completely enraptured the young king. He had her instructed in the principles of the Greek church, which she embraced, and was baptized, in 421, by the name of Eudocia. She was then married to the emperor amid the acclamations of the capital, and after the birth of a daughter, received the surname of Augusta.

Amidst the luxuries of a court, the empress continued to preserve her studious habits. She composed a poetical paraphrase of the first eight books of the New Testament; also of the prophecies of Daniel and Zachariah; to these she added a canto of the verses of Homer, applied to the life and miracles of Christ; the legend of St. Cyprian; and a panegyric on the Persian victories of Theodosius.

"Her writings," says Gibbon, "which were applauded by a servile and superstitious age, have not been disdained by the candour of impartial criticism."

After the birth of her daughter, Eudocia requested permission to discharge her grateful vows, by a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. In her progress through the East, she pronounced, from a throne of gold and gems, an eloquent oration to the Senate of Antioch, to whom she declared her intention of enlarging the walls of the city, and assisting in the restoration of the public baths. For this purpose she allotted two hundred pounds of gold. Her alms and munificence in the Holy Land exceeded that of the great Helena. She returned to Constantinople, covered with honours and laden with pious relics.

Ambition now awoke in the heart of Eudocia; aspiring to the government of the empire, she contended for power with the princess, her benefactress, whom she sought to supplant in the confidence of the emperor. But, in 445, an unlucky accident exposed her to the emperor's jealousy. He had given her an apple of extraordinary size, which she sent to Paulinus, whom she esteemed on account of his learning. Paulinus, not knowing whence it came, presented it to the emperor, who soon after asked the empress what she had done with it. She, fearing his anger, told him she had eaten it. This made the emperor suspect that there was too great an intimacy between her and Paulinus, and, producing the apple, he convicted her of falsehood.

The influence of Pulcheria triumphed over that of the empress, who found herself unable to protect her most faithful adherents: she witnessed the disgrace of Cyrus, the prætorian prefect, which was followed by the execution of Paulinus, whose great personal beauty and intimacy with the empress, had excited the jealousy of Theodosius.

Perceiving that her husband's affections were irretrievably alienated, Eudocia requested permission to retire to Jerusalem, and consecrate the rest of her life to solitude and religion; but the vengeance of Pulcheria, or the jealousy of Theodosius, pursued her even in her retreat. Stripped of the honours due to her rank, the empress was disgraced in the eyes of the surrounding nations. This treatment irritated and exasperated her, and led her to commit acts unworthy her profession as a Christian or a philosopher. But the death of the emperor, the misfortunes of her daughter, and the approach of age, gradually calmed her passions, and she passed the latter part of her life in building churches, and relieving the poor.

Some writers assert that she was reconciled to Theodosius, and returned to Constantinople during his life; others, that she was not recalled till after his death. However this may be, she died at Jerusalem, about 460, at the age of sixty-six, solemnly protesting her innocence with her dying breath. In her last moments, she displayed great composure and piety.

During her power, magnanimously forgetting the barbarity of her brothers, she promoted them to the rank of consuls and prefects: observing their confusion on being summoned to the imperial presence, she said, "Had you not compelled me to visit Constantinople, I should never have had it in my power to bestow on you these marks of sisterly affection."

EUDOCIA, or EUDOXIA,

SURNAMED Macrembolitissa, widow of Constantine Ducas, caused herself to be proclaimed empress with her three sons, on the death of her husband, in 1067. Romanus Diogenes, one of the greatest generals of the empire, attempted to deprive her of the crown; and Eudoxia had him condemned to death, but happening to see him, she was so charmed by his beauty, that she pardoned him, and made him commander of the troops of the East. He there effaced by his valour his former delinquency, and she resolved to marry him. But it was necessary to obtain a deed, then in the hands of the Patriarch Xiphilinus, by which she had promised Constantine Ducas never to marry again. She did this by pretending that she wished to espouse a brother of the Patriarch, and gave her hand to Romanus in 1068. Three years after, her son Michael caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, and shut her up in a convent.

She had displayed the qualities of a great sovereign on the throne; in a convent, she manifested the devotion of a recluse. She cultivated literature successfully. There was a manuscript in her writing in the French king's library, on the genealogies of the gods, and of the heroes and heroines of antiquity, showing a vast extent of reading.

EUPHEMIA,

FLAVIA ÆLIA MARCIA, was married to the emperor Justin I. in 518. She was originally a slave, of what country is not known; but she was mistress to Justin before he married her. She died before the emperor, about the year 523, without children. She owed her elevation to her fidelity, and the sweetness of her disposition.

EUSEBIA,

AURELIA, the wife of Constantius, emperor of the East, was a woman of genius and erudition, but strongly addicted to the Arian heresy; in support of which she exerted her influence over her husband, which was considerable. Few of the empresses had been so beautiful or so chaste. She prevailed on Constantius to give his sister Helena to Julian, and to name him Cæsar. Many virtues are allowed her by historians; among others, those of compassion and humanity. She left no children, and died in 360, much regretted by her husband.

EUSEBIA,

ABBESS of St. Cyr, or St. Saviour, at Marseilles, is said by French writers to have cut off her nose, like the abbess of Coldingham in England, to secure herself from ravishers, and her nuns are said to have followed her example. This took place in 731, when the Saracens invaded Provence. The catastrophe of the tale in both countries is, that the ladies were murdered by the disappointed savages. These tales may not be wholly true, yet that they were considered probable, shows the awful condition of society in those dark ages.

EUSTACHIUM,

DAUGHTER of Paula, a Roman lady of ancient family, was learned in Greek and Hebrew, as well as in the Latin language, so that she could read Hebrew psalms fluently, and comment ably upon them. She was many years a disciple of St. Jerome, and followed him in his journeys to different places. He speaks of her in high terms in his epistles, and in the life of St. Paula. She lived in a monastery at Bethlehem, till she was forced from it by a kind of persecution said to have been excited by the Pelagians. She died about 419.

F.

FALCONBERG,

MARX, countess of, the third daughter of Oliver Cromwell, was a lady of great beauty, and greater spirit; she was the second wife of Thomas, lord viscount Falconberg. Bishop Burnet, who calls her a wise and worthy woman, says, that "she was more likely to have maintained the post of protector than either of her brothers." There was a common saying about her, "that those who wore breeches deserved petticoats better; but if those in petticoats had been in breeches, they would have held faster." After her brother, Richard Cromwell, was deposed, who, as she well knew, was never formed to reign, she exerted herself in behalf of Charles II., and is said to have had a great and successful hand in his restoration. It is certain that her husband was sent to the Tower by the commission of safety a little while before that event took place, and that he stood very high in the king's favour. She died March 14th, 1712, much respected for her munificence and charity.

FALCONIA,

PROBA, a Roman poetess, flourished in the reign of Theodosius; she was a native of Horta, or Hortanum, in Etruria. There is still extant by her, a cento from Virgil, giving the sacred history from the creation to the deluge; and "The History of Christ," in verses selected from that poet, introduced by a few lines of her own. She has sometimes been confounded with Anicia Falconia Proba, the mother of three consuls, and with Valeria Proba, wife of Adelsius, the proconsul. She lived about 438.

FANNIA,

DAUGHTER of Pætus Thræsea, and grand-daughter of Arria, was the wife of Helvidius, who was twice banished by Domitian, emperor of Rome, in 81, and who was accompanied each time into exile by his devoted wife. Fannia being accused of having furnished Senecio with materials for writing the life of Helvidius, boldly avowed the fact, but used the greatest precaution to prevent her mother from being involved in the transaction.

She was as gentle as magnanimous, and fell a victim to the unremitting tenderness with which she watched over a young vestal, Junia, who had been entrusted to her care, when ill, by the high priest

FATIMEH,

THE only daughter of Mahomet, and mother of all Mahommedan dynasties, was born at Mecca. In the year 623, she married her cousin Ali, who afterwards became Caliph. Turkish writers assert that the archangels Michael and Gabriel acted as guardians to the bride, and that 70,000 angels joined the procession. One of her descendants founded the dynasty known by the name of the Fathemir Caliphs who reigned in Africa and Syria. Fatimeh died a few months after her father.

FAUSTINA,

ANNIA GALERIA, called the elder Faustina, was the daughter of Annius Verus, prefect of Rome, and wife of the emperor Titus Antoninus Pius. Her beauty and wit were of the highest order, but her conduct has been represented as dissolute in the extreme. Still the emperor built temples and struck coins to her honour; yet it is reported even when he discovered her debaucheries he favoured without resenting them. Such a course of conduct in a man represented as the wisest of sovereigns, and a model of private and domestic virtues, is hardly credible. That he loved her with constancy and confidence during her life, and raised temples to her virtues, and altars to her divinity after her death, are matters of history. There is a beautiful medal of his reign still extant, representing Antoninus Pius on one side, and on the reverse Faustina ascending to heaven, with a lighted torch, under the figure of Diana. Surely Antoninus must himself have had faith in the virtues of his wife. But she was beautiful and witty: such women will be envied and slandered, as well as loved and praised. She died in 141, at the age of about thirty-seven.

FAUSTINA, ANNIA,

DAUGHTER of the former, and wife of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, surpassed her mother in the dissoluteness of her manners. Without being as regularly handsome, she was attractive, lively, and witty; daughter of a prince, who, though he deeply regretted crimes, was very unwilling to punish them, and wife to a philosopher who held it a duty to pardon all offences, she met with no restraints to her inclinations: yet even she had her temples and her priests. Marcus, in his Meditations, thanks the gods for a wife so tractable, so loving, and so unaffected. She attended him into Asia, where he went to suppress the revolt of Cassius, and there died, near mount Laurus, in 175. There was a third Faustina, grand-daughter of this one, who was the third wife of Heliogabalus, but was soon neglected by him. She was very unlike her female ancestors, except in beauty.

FAUSTINA,

FLAVIA MAXIMIANA, was the second wife of Constantine the Great. She was the daughter of Maximian Hercules, and sister to Maxentius. Her father having received the title of Augustus in 306, took her into Gaul, where he gave her in marriage to the emperor Constantine. She was for a long time a most exemplary wife and mother, and a strenuous advocate with the emperor for all acts of indulgence and liberality to the people. She even sacrificed her father's life to her husband, by discovering to Constantine a plot for his destruction. She has been accused of staining the last years of her life by the commission of many crimes; among others, that of causing the death of Crispus, the son of Constantine by a former wife, by false accusations; and, it is said, that the emperor revenged his honour, and his son's death, by causing her to be suffocated in a warm bath, in 327. The truth of these latter circumstances has been much doubted.

FELICITAS,

AN illustrious Roman lady, who lived in 162, during the persecution carried on against the Christians by the emperor Marcus Aurelius, was a devout Christian. She had also brought up her seven sons in the same faith. They were seized, and Felicitas was threatened with her own death and that of all her family, if she did not give up her religion; but she was inflexible, and the sons also remaining steadfast, they all suffered cruel deaths, the mother being executed last.

FIDELIS, CASSANDRA,

A VENETIAN lady, died in 1558, aged 100. Descended from ancestors who had changed their residence from Milan to Venice, and had uniformly added to the respectability of their rank by their uncommon learning, she began at an early age to prosecute her studies with great diligence, and acquired such a knowledge of the learned languages, that she may with justice be enumerated among the first scholars of the age. The letters which occasionally passed between Cassandra and Politian, demonstrate their mutual esteem, if indeed such an expression be sufficient to characterize the feelings of Politian, who expresses, in language unusually florid, his high admiration of her extraordinary acquirements, and his expectation of the benefits which the cause of letters would derive from her labours and example. In the year 1491, the Florentine scholar made a visit to Venice, when the favourable opinion he had formed of her writings was confirmed by a personal interview.

"Yesterday," says he, writing to his great patron, Lorenzo de Medicis, "I paid a visit to the celebrated Cassandra, to whom I presented your respects. She is, indeed, Lorenzo, a surprising woman, as well from her acquirements in her own language, as in the Latin; and, in my opinion, she may be called handsome. I left her, astonished at her talents. She is much devoted to your interests, and speaks of you with great esteem. She even avows her intention of visiting you at Florence, so that you may prepare yourself to give her a proper reception."

From a letter written by this lady, many years afterwards, to Leo X., we learn that an epistolary correspondence had subsisted between her and Lorenzo de Medicis; and it is with concern we find, that the remembrance of this intercourse was revived, in order to induce the pontiff to bestow upon her some pecuniary assistance, she being then a widow, with a numerous train of dependants. She lived, however, to a more advanced period, and her literary acquirements, and the reputation of her early associates, threw a lustre upon her declining years; and, as her memory remained unimpaired to the last, she was resorted to from all parts of Italy as a living monument of those happier days, to which the Italians never reverted without regret. The letters and orations of this lady were published at Pavia, in 1636, with some account of her life. She wrote a volume of Latin poems also, on various subjects.

She is thus spoken of by M. Thomas, in his "Essay on Women." "One of the learned women in Italy, who wrote equally well in the three languages of Homer, Virgil, and Dante, in verse and in prose, who possessed all the philosophy of her own and the preceding ages, who, by her graces, embellished even theology; sustained theses with eclat, and many times gave public lessons at Padua; who joined to her various knowledge, agreeable talents, particularly music, and exalted her talents by her virtue. She received homage from sovereign pontiffs and kings; and, that everything relating to her might be singular, lived more than a century."

FLORE DE ROSE,

WAS a French poetess of the 13th century. Very few of her writings are now extant.

FLORINE,

DAUGHTER of the duke of Burgundy, was betrothed to Suenon, king of Denmark, and accompanied this prince to the first crusade, in 1097. She was to have married him immediately after the conquest of Jerusalem. But they were both killed in a battle, with all their companions. Not one was left to bury the slain.

FREDEGONDE,

A WOMAN of low birth, but of great beauty, in the service of the queen Andowere, wife of Chilperic, king of Normandy, resolved to make herself a favourite of the king. To effect this, she induced Andowere, who had just given birth, in the absence of Chilperic, to her fourth child, a daughter, to have it baptized before its father's return, and to officiate herself as godmother. The queen did so, not aware that by placing herself in that relation to her child, she, by the laws of the Roman Catholic church, contracted a spiritual relationship with the child's father that was incompatible with marriage; and the bishop, probably bribed by Fredegonde, did not make the least objection. On Chilperic's return, Fredegonde apprised him of this inconsiderate act of his wife, and the king, struck by her beauty, willingly consented to place Andowere in a convent, giving her an estate near Mans, and took Fredegonde for a mistress.

Chilperic, not long after, married Galswintha, eldest sister of Brunehaut, queen of Austrasia, and Fredegonde was dismissed. But the gentle Galswintha soon died, strangled, it is said, in her bed, by order of the king, who was instigated by Fredegonde. Fredegonde then persuaded Chilperic to marry her, and from that time her ascendancy over him ceased only with his life.

Brunehaut urged her husband, Siegbert, who was the brother of Chilperic, to avenge her sister's murder, and a war ensued, closed by a treaty, by which Chilperic gave up five important cities, in order to preserve his kingdom. This treaty wounded the pride of Fredegonde, and at her instigation, Chilperic again took up arms, but was unsuccessful; and the Normans, alarmed by the threats of Siegbert, who was approaching Paris, offered to renounce their allegiance to Chilperic, and recognise him as their king. This announcement plunged Chilperic into a stupor, from which nothing could arouse him; but Fredegonde, whom danger only stimulated to greater activity, sent two emissaries, devoted to her service, to Siegbert's camp, armed with poisoned daggers, with orders to approach him, and while saluting him as king, to kill him. She promised them great wealth and honours, if they escaped, and if they died, to obtain their everlasting salvation. They succeeded in killing Siegbert, while, carried on a buckler, he was receiving the homage of the people as king of Normandy; but in the struggle that ensued, they were slain.

The murder of Siegbert, and the dispersion of his army, restored the kingdom to Chilperic and Fredegonde. No sooner was the queen firmly seated on her throne, than she resumed her plans which had been interrupted by these disturbances. These were to accomplish the destruction of the two remaining sons of Andowere and Chilperic, Merovæus and Clovis; and she had Merovæus, who had married Brunehaut, assassinated. But these projects were interrupted for a short time by a plague, which ravaged France in 580, of which one of the three sons of Chilperic died, and which attacked the other two. In great terror, Fredegonde induced Chilperic to relieve the people from the heavy taxation to which he had subjected them, hoping to avert the wrath of God; but her two sons died, and Fredegonde became more ferocious than ever. Clovis, Andowere's youngest son, was still living; and the idea that it was for him, and not for her own children, that she had struggled, caused her transports of rage. She exposed him to the plague; but he recovered, and denounced Fredegonde with so much bitterness, that, alarmed, she had him assassinated, under pretext that he had caused the death of his brothers. She implicated Andowere in the same crime, and made her suffer a cruel death; and the only daughter of the unhappy queen was shut up in a convent.

In 584, another child of Fredegonde died, and Chilperic was assassinated on his return from hunting. This act was said to have been committed by orders of Fredegonde, because the king had discovered an intrigue she was carrying on with Landerick, one of the most powerful noblemen in Normandy. She then took refuge in Paris, with an infant son, Clotaire, the only one of five children that remained to her, and placed herself under the protection of Gonthramn, king of Burgundy, who sent her to Rueil, a royal domain near Rouen, retaining her son under his protection.

Furious at this exile, and the loss of her power, which she attributed to Brunehaut, she sent an emissary to Austrasia to assassinate her; but his design was discovered, and Brunehaut sent him back with contempt. Fredegonde was so exasperated at his failure, that she had his hands and feet cut off. She also sent two men to assassinate Brunehaut's son, Childebart, who had succeeded his father, Siegbert, in the kingdom, and another one to murder Gonthramn; but both attempts were discovered and frustrated.

Gonthramn died in 595, and Fredegonde, freed from a yoke which she had long worn with impatience, raised an army in the south of Normandy, and invaded the Soissonnais, assisted by Landerick. She put to flight the young Theobert, son of Childebart, whom his father had made king of Soissons, and the ancient capital of the kingdom of Chilperic was restored to his son. An army of Austrasians, Burgundians, and Franks, came to dispossess her; but the queen, hearing of their approach, raised an army, and at their head, with her son Clotaire in her arms, she rode all night, and arriving at daybreak at the enemy's camp, she awoke the Austrasians with her trumpets, and attacking them so suddenly, put them to flight. They rallied, however, and a bloody battle ensued, in which the Normans were victorious; but so many on both sides were slain, that the people compelled Brunehaut and Fredegonde to make peace.

Childebart died in 596, and Fredegonde, with her usual activity, seized the favourable moment to recover Paris from Brunehaut, left regent on her son's death. This caused another battle between the rival queens, in which Fredegonde was again victorious; but while she was preparing to profit by her victory, she died suddenly in 597, leaving her son Clotaire, then only thirteen, under the care of Landerick, mayor of the palace. She was buried in the monastery of St. Vincent, since St. Germain-des-Pres. Half of the cruelties committed by this woman, whose ambition and intellect seem to have been equalled only by her crimes, have not been related. She tortured and murdered without the slightest remorse all who opposed her will. The only womanly affection she exhibited was her love for her children; but this, corrupted by her wicked heart, was the cause of many of her crimes.

FRITIGILA,

QUEEN of the Marcomans, lived in 396. Being instructed in Christianity by the writings of Ambrose, she embraced it herself, and induced her husband and the whole nation to do the same. By her persuasion, they entered into a durable alliance with the Romans; so that, in the various irruptions of the barbarians on the empire, the Marcomans are never mentioned by historians, though only separated by the Danube.

G.

GABRIELLE DE BOURBON,

DAUGHTER of count de Montpensier, married, in 1485, Louis de la Tremouille, a man who filled with honour the highest offices of the state. He was killed at the battle of Pavia in 1525. Her son Charles, count of Talmond, was also killed at the battle of Marignan in 1515; and she died in 1516. Her virtues were very great; and some published treatises remain as proofs of her devoted piety. She passed her time chiefly in solitude; for she had formed a resolution to withdraw from the court, whenever her husband's duties, as an officer in the king's army, compelled him to be absent. Charitable, as well as magnificent in her tastes, no person in want ever left her unsatisfied. She employed an hour or two daily with her needle; the rest of her time was spent in reading, writing, in her devotional duties, or in instructing the young girls by whom she liked to surround herself. She also took great care of the education of her son, who amply repaid all her trouble. She died of grief at his loss. Her works are a "Contemplation of the Nativity and Passion of Jesus Christ;" "The Instruction of Young Girls;" and two other religious works.

GALERIA,

WIFE of Vitellius, emperor of Rome in 69, distinguished herself in a vicious age, by exemplary wisdom and modesty. After the tragical death of her husband, she passed her days in retirement.

GAMBARA,

VERONICA, an Italian lady, born at Brescia. She married the lord of Correggio, and after his death devoted herself to literature and the education of her two sons. She died in 1550, aged sixty-five. The best edition of her poems and her letters is that of Brescia, in 1759. She was born in 1485; her father, count Gian Francesco Gambara, was of one of the most distinguished Italian families. Very early she manifested a particular love for poetry, and her parents took pleasure in cultivating her literary taste. Her marriage with the lord Correggio was one of strong mutual attachment. Her husband, who was devoted to her, delighted in the homage everywhere paid to her talents and charms. In 1515, she accompanied him to Bologna, where a court was held by the pope, Leo X., to do honour to Francis I., of France. That gallant monarch was frequently heard to repeat that he had never known a lady so every way accomplished as Veronica. Her domestic happiness was of short duration; death snatched away Correggio from the enjoyment of all that this world could afford. The grief of Veronica was excessive. She had her whole house hung with black; and though very young at the time of her widowhood, never wore anything but black during the remainder of her life. On the door of her palace she caused to be inscribed the following lines from Virgil:—

*Ille meos primus qui me sibi junxit amores
Abstulit: ille habeat secum, servet que sepulchro.*

All this has an air of ostentation which seldom accompanies real sensibility; but the subsequent conduct of the lady was entirely consistent with her first demonstrations. She turned a deaf ear to many suitors who sought her hand, and devoted herself to the education of her two sons, and the administration of their property. Her labours were crowned with remarkable success; the one becoming a distinguished general, highly valued by his sovereign; the other a cardinal, eminent for piety and learning. Her leisure, in the meantime, was employed in the study, not only of elegant literature, but of theology and philosophy. Her brother Uberto, being made governor of Bologna, in 1528, by Clement VII., she removed her residence to that city, where she frequently entertained at her house the eminent literati of the day; among whom may be mentioned Bembo.

Capello, Mauri, and Molza. She enjoyed the highest esteem among her contemporaries; and appears to have been as remarkable for her virtues as for her knowledge.

Her works consist of a collection of elegant letters, and many poems, some of which are on religious subjects.

GENEVIEVE, ST.,

THE patroness of the city of Paris, was born in 423, at Manterre, and died January 3, 501. Five years after her death, Clovis erected the church of St. Genevieve, where her relics were preserved with great care.

St. Germain, bishop of Auxerre, observing her disposition to sanctity, when she was quite young, advised her to take the vow of perpetual virginity, which she did. After the death of her parents, Genevieve went to Paris; and when the city was about to be deserted, in consequence of the approach of the Huns under Attila, she assured the inhabitants of entire safety if they would seek it by prayers. Attila went to Orleans and returned without touching Paris; and this event established Genevieve's reputation. In a time of famine, she went along the Seine, and returned with twelve large vessels loaded with grain, which she distributed gratuitously among the sufferers. This increased her authority, so that Merovæus and Chilperic, kings of France, paid her the highest respect. From her fifteenth to her fiftieth year, she ate nothing but barley-bread, excepting now and then a few beans; after her fiftieth year, she allowed herself milk and fish.

GENEVIEVE,

DUCHESS of Brabant, was born in the year 700. She was married to Siegfried, and shortly after her marriage (732) her husband was called to the field by his sovereign, Charles Martel, whom he joined with his soldiers. He left his wife in the care of Golo, the captain in his castle. When Golo, who loved Genevieve, saw that she repulsed him, he wrote to the duke that Genevieve had been unfaithful, and would shortly become the mother of an illegitimate child. Siegfried, who put full confidence in Golo, ordered him to have the mother and child killed. But the servants to whose hands the wicked man confided that deed had compassion upon the poor innocent woman, and left her in the woods, where a doe supplied her with milk for the child. The animal accompanied her for five years, till one day, on the 6th of January, 757, pursued by Siegfried, she fled to the cave, where the husband found both his wife and child. An explanation took place, and she became again the cherished wife of his bosom.

GERBERGE,

WIFE of Louis IV., of France, was the daughter of Henry, who became king of Germany in 918. She married first Gislebert, duke of Lorraine, who was drowned in the Rhine. In 940, Gerberge married Louis IV. Five years after, her husband was taken prisoner by the Normans. Hugh the Great, duke of the Franks, wished to obtain possession of him; but the duke of Normandy consented to give him up only on condition that Louis' two sons should become hostages for their father. Hugh sent to demand them of Gerberge, but she refused, well knowing that the race of Charlemagne would be entirely destroyed, if the father and children were all prisoners. She only sent the youngest son with a bishop; so Louis not being set free, Gerberge sent to demand aid from her brother Otho, king of Germany. Louis was at length liberated by Otho's assistance, and he confided to Gerberge the defence of the town of Rheims, in which she shut herself up with her troops. In 954, Louis died, and Gerberge exerted herself effectually to have her eldest son, Lothaire, although hardly twelve, placed on his father's throne. She, together with her brother, Bruno, duke of Lorraine, were appointed regents. She marched, with her young son, at the head of an army, and besieged Poitiers; and, in 960, she retook the city and fortress of Dijon, which had been treacherously given up to Robert of Treves, and had the traitor beheaded in the presence of the whole army.

GISELLE,

SISTER of Charlemagne, emperor of France, sympathized with that great monarch and his eldest daughter, Rotrude, in the protection and encouragement they afforded to learned and scientific men. She induced the celebrated Alcuin to compose several works; Alcuin dedicated to Giselle and Rotrude his Commentary on St. John. Giselle died about the year 810. She was abbess of Chelles at her death.

GODIVA,

THE name of a beautiful lady, sister of Therald de Burgenhall, sheriff of Lincolnshire, and wife of Leofric, earl of Leicester, who was the eldest son of Algar, the great earl of Mercia. This lady, having an extraordinary affection for Coventry, solicited her husband to release the inhabitants of that city from a grievous tax laid on them. He consented, on condition that she would ride naked through the streets of Coventry in noon-day. This she did, first enjoining every one to keep within their houses, the doors and windows of which were to be closely shut. She then partially veiled herself with her flowing hair, mounted her palfrey, and made the circuit of the city. Leofric kept his promise, and the city of Coventry was relieved from the oppression. This adventure was painted in one of the windows of Trinity-church, in Coventry, with these lines,

"I, Luric, for the love of thee,
Do make Coventry toll-free."

GONZAGA,

BARBA VON, duchess of Wurtemberg, was the daughter of Louis III., duke of Mantua. She married the duke of Wurtemberg, Eberhard with the beard, in the year 1474. A devoted student herself, she became the patroness of learning and literary men in her husband's domain. Through her influence was the university of Zuliengen es-established. She died, 1505, mourned by her subjects, and by the whole literary world.

G O N Z A G A ,

CECILIA DE, an Italian lady of high birth, gave proofs, even when a child, of a remarkable fondness for learning. Her father, John Francis Gonzaga, lord of Mantua, procured the best masters to instruct her, and at the age of eight she is said to have known Greek. She was religious and charitable as well as learned, gave marriage portions to poor young women, and repaired and beautified convents and churches; in order to do this, she was obliged to use the greatest self-denial in her personal expenses. Her father, for a long time, resisted her desire of taking the veil, but he at length yielded to her entreaties, and she passed all the latter part of her life in the cloister. She was born about 1422.

G O N Z A G A ,

ELEONORA, daughter of Francis II., marquis of Mantua, was united, when very young, to the duke of Urbino. She was celebrated for her devotion to her husband, who was deposed by pope Leo X., in favour of Lorenzo de Medicis. The duke would have sunk under this misfortune, but for the strength of mind and tenderness of his wife. On the death of Lorenzo, in 1492, the dukedom was restored to its rightful owner. Two sons and three daughters were the fruit of this union. Eleonora, by the chastity and severity of her manners, reformed the morals of her court

G O N Z A G A ,

ISABELLA DE, wife to Guido Ubaldo de Montefeltro, duke d'Urbino, was aunt to Eleonora Gonzaga, who married the successor of her husband. This lady is celebrated for her conjugal fidelity and attachment. Her husband, who was sick and infirm, was driven from his dominions by Cæsar Borgia. In his distress, he implored the assistance of Louis XII., of France; but he dared not comply with this request, lest he should draw on himself the resentment of the house of Borgia. The duke then intimated to the king of France, that, in consequence of his infirm health, he was willing to enter into holy orders, and divorce Isabella, whom a ceremony only made his wife. The duchess was powerfully solicited, in consequence of this declaration of her husband, to make another choice, but she resolutely refused. She devoted herself to the duke in his adversity with the tenderest affection. After his death, she abandoned herself to an excessive and unfeigned sorrow. She had been married twenty years, and devoted the rest of her life to the memory of her husband.

G O Z Z A D I N I ,

BETISIA, born in Bologna, in 1209, of a noble family. She manifested from infancy a love for study, and a disinclination for ordinary girlish occupations; feeling the futility of the instruction given to young ladies, she prevailed upon her parents to allow her to devote herself to the acquirement of learning and science. In order to enjoy the advantage of the university, she put on man's apparel, and followed every course; as a student, she soon took the highest standing in her college, and at the gaining of her degree, received the laurel crown. She afterwards studied law, and obtained the title of Dr., and the privilege of wearing the professional robe. Her eloquence was very much esteemed as well as her learning and piety. She lost her life from an inundation caused by an overflow of the waters of the Idio, which overwhelmed a villa on its banks, where she was visiting. This accident happened in 1261.

G U E R C H E V I L L E ,

ANTOINETTE DE PONS, marchioness of, is remarkable for her spirited answer to Henry IV. of France. "If," said she, "I am not noble enough to be your wife, I am too much so to be your mistress." When Henry IV. married Mary de Medicis, he made this lady dame d'honneur to that princess. "Since," said he, "you are really dame d'honneur, be so to the queen, my wife."

On one occasion, having hunted purposely near her château, Henry sent word to Madam de Guerchevillle that he would sup and lodge at her house; she replied that all possible attention should be paid to his accommodation. Henry, delighted at this answer, hastened to the château, where he was received by his hostess, elegantly attired, and surrounded by all her household. Having lighted the king herself to his room, she bowed and retired. When supper was served up, Henry sent for the lady, but was told that she had just driven from the house, leaving this message for him:—"A king, wherever he is, should always be master. As to myself, I also choose to be free."

G U I L L E L M A ,

A WOMAN of Bohemia, who, in the thirteenth century, founded, in Italy, a sect which united enthusiasm with lewdness. After being respected during her life as a saint, her body was, when dead, taken from her grave, and burnt.

GUILLET,

PERNETTE DU, a poetess of Lyons, and a contemporary of Louise Labbé, was illustrious for her virtue, grace, beauty, and learning. She sang and played exquisitely, understood several languages, and wrote in Latin with facility.

In Pernette du Guillet, it is said, "all that is lovely in woman was united."

H.

HACHETTE, JEANNE,

OR JEANNE FOUCQUET, a heroine of Beauvais, in Picardy, France, who successfully headed a body of women in an assault upon the Burgundians, who besieged her native place in 1470. When the Burgundians ascended their ladders to plant their standards on the walls, Jeanne, with a battle-axe, drove several of them back, seized their flag, which she deposited in a church, after the battle. Louis XI. of France recompensed her for her bravery; she afterwards married Collin Pillon, and she and her descendants were exempted from taxation. In commemoration of her intrepid conduct, there is an annual procession at Beauvais, on the tenth of July, in which the women march at the head of the men.

HELENA,

THE empress, mother of Constantine, and one of the saints of the Roman Catholic communion, owed her elevation to her beauty. She was of obscure origin, born at the little village of Drepanum, in Bithynia, where we hear of her first as a hostess of an inn. Constantius Chlorus saw her, fell in love with her, and married her; but, on being associated with Dioclesian in the empire, divorced her to marry Theodora, daughter of Maximilian Hercules. The accession of her son to the empire drew her again from obscurity; she obtained the title of Augusta, and was received at court with all the honours due the mother of an emperor. Her many virtues riveted the affection of her son to her, yet she did not hesitate to admonish him when she disapproved his conduct.

When Constantine embraced Christianity, she also was converted; and when nearly eighty, went on a journey to the Holy Land, where she is said to have assisted at the discovery of the true cross of Christ, reported by zealous devotees to have been accompanied by many miracles. She died soon after, in the year 328, at the age of eighty. Helena left proofs, wherever she went, of a truly Christian liberality; she relieved the poor, orphans, and widows; built churches, and showed herself, in all respects, worthy the confidence of her son, who gave her unlimited permission to draw on his treasures. At her death, he paid her the highest honours, had her body sent to Rome to be deposited in the tomb of the emperors, and raised her native village to the rank of a city, with the name of Helenopolis. She showed her prudence and political wisdom by the influence she always retained over her son, and by the care she took to prevent all interference of the half-brothers of Constantine, sons of Constantius Chlorus and Theodora, who, being brought into notice, after her death, by the injudicious liberality of the emperor, were massacred by their nephews as soon as they succeeded their father in the empire.

HELENA,

DAUGHTER of Constantine the Great and of Fausta, was given in marriage, by her brother Constantius, to her cousin Julian, when he made him Cæsar at Milan, in 355. She followed her husband to his government of Gaul, and died in 359, at Vienna.

HELENA,

WIFE and sister of Monobasus, king of Adiabena, and mother of Irates, the successor of Monobasus, flourished about the year 50. Though Irates was one of the younger sons of the king, yet, being his favourite, he left the crown to him at his death. In order to secure the throne to him, the principal officers of the state proposed to put those of his brothers to death who were inimical to him; but Helen would not consent to this. Helen and Irates were both converts to the Jewish faith. When Helen saw that her son was in peaceable possession of the throne, she went to Jerusalem to worship and sacrifice there. When she arrived in that city, there was a great famine prevailing there, which she immediately exerted herself effectually to relieve, by sending to different places for provisions, and distributing them among the poor. After the death of Irates, Helen returned to Adiabena, where she found that her son Monobasus had succeeded to the throne; but she did not long survive her favourite son Irates.

HELOISE,

RENDERED famous by her unfortunate passion for Abelard, was born about 1101 or 1102. Her parents are unknown, but she lived with her uncle, Fulbert, a canon of the cathedral of Paris. Her childhood was passed in the convent of Argenteuil, but as soon as she was old enough, she returned to her uncle, who taught her to speak and write in Latin, then the language used in literary and polite society. She is also said to have understood Greek and Hebrew. To this education, very uncommon at that time, Heloise added great beauty, and refinement and dignity of manner; so that her fame soon spread beyond the walls of the cloister, throughout the whole kingdom.

Just at this time, Pierre Abelard, who had already made himself very celebrated as a rhetorician, came to found a new school in that art at Paris, where the originality of his principles, his eloquence, and his great physical strength and beauty, made a deep sensation. Here he saw Heloise, and commenced an acquaintance with her by letter; but, impatient to know her more intimately, he proposed to Fulbert that he should receive him into his house, which was near Abelard's school. Fulbert was avaricious, and also desirous of having his niece more thoroughly instructed, and these two motives induced him to consent to Abelard's proposal, and to request him to give lessons in his art to Heloise. He even gave Abelard permission to use physical punishment towards his niece, if she should prove rebellious.

"I cannot," says Abelard, "cease to be astonished at the simplicity of Fulbert; I was as much surprised as if he had placed a lamb in the power of a hungry wolf. Heloise and I, under pretext of study, gave ourselves up wholly to love; and the solitude that love seeks, our studies procured for us. Books were open before us; but we spoke oftener of love than philosophy, and kisses came more readily from our lips than words."

The canon was the last to perceive this intimacy, although he was often told of it, and heard daily the songs that Abelard composed for Heloise sung through the streets. When he did discover the truth, he was deeply incensed, and sent Abelard from the house. But he contrived to return, and carry off Heloise to Palais, in Brittany, his native country. Here she gave birth to a son, surnamed Astrolabe from his beauty, who passed his life in the obscurity of a monastery.

The flight of Heloise enraged Fulbert to the highest degree; but he was afraid to act openly against Abelard, lest his niece, whom he still loved, might be made to suffer in retaliation. At length Abelard, taking compassion on his grief, sent to him, implored his forgiveness, and offered to marry Heloise, if the union might be kept secret, so that his reputation as a religious man should not suffer. Fulbert consented to this, and Abelard went to Heloise for that purpose; but Heloise, unwilling to diminish the future fame of Abelard, by a marriage, which must be a restraint upon him, refused at first to listen to him. She quoted the precepts and the example of all learned men, sacred and profane, to prove to him that he ought to remain free and untrammelled. She also warned him that her uncle's reconciliation was too easily obtained, and that it was but a feint to entrap him more surely. But Abelard was resolute, and Heloise returned to Paris, where they were soon after married.

Fulbert did not keep his promise of secrecy, but spoke openly of the marriage, which when Heloise heard she indignantly denied, protesting that it had never taken place. This made her uncle treat her so cruelly, that Abelard, either to protect her from his violence, or to prove that the announcement of the marriage was false, took her himself to the convent of Argenteuil, where she did not immediately take the veil, but put on the dress of a novice. Not long after he ordered her to take the veil, which she did, although the nuns, touched by her youth and beauty, endeavoured to prevent her from making the sacrifice.

Twelve years passed without Heloise ever hearing mentioned the name of the one she so devotedly loved. She had become prioress of Argenteuil, and lived a life of complete retirement. But her too great kindness and indulgence to the nuns under her control, gave rise to some disorders, which, although she was perfectly blameless, yet caused her to be forced by Ligur, abbot of St. Denis, to leave her retreat, with her companions. Abelard, hearing of her homeless situation, left Brittany, where he was living in charge of the monastery of St. Gildas-de-Ruys, and went to place Heloise and her followers in the little oratory of the Paraclete, which had been founded by him. Here Heloise exerted herself to the utmost to build up a convent; though the life of the nuns at first was painful, yet, by the end of a year their wealth was so much increased by the munificence of pious persons about them, that they became very comfortable.

Heloise had the rare charm of attaching every one who approached her to herself. Bishops called her daughter, priests, sister, and laymen, mother. Every one revered her for her piety, her wisdom, her patience, and her incomparable sweetness. She rarely appeared in public, but devoted herself almost wholly to prayer and meditation.

She happened, one day, to see a letter that Abelard had written, giving an account of his life. She read it many times with tears, and at length wrote to her lover that well-known, eloquent, and passionate letter. His reply was severe but kind:

and these two letters were followed by several others.

In April, 1142, Heloise having heard a report of Abelard's death, wrote to demand his body, that it might be buried at the Paraclete, according to a wish that he had himself expressed in writing. He was buried in a chapel built by his order, and for more than twenty years, Heloise went every night to weep over his tomb. She died May 17th, 1164, aged sixty-three, and was placed in the same tomb.

In 1497, from religious motives, the tomb was opened, and the bones of Abelard and Heloise were removed. In 1800, by order of Lucien Bonaparte, these hallowed remains were carried to the Museum of French Monuments. And in 1815, when this Museum was destroyed, the tomb was taken to Père-le-Chaise, where it still remains.

In reviewing this melancholy story, where genius was dethroned by passion, we cannot but consider the noble-hearted, though erring Heloise, a victim to the vanity of the selfish Abelard. He does not pretend to have loved her passionately; he formed the plan of a cold-blooded seduction, merely for a passing amusement. Perhaps he considered the affair a study of mental philosophy, and watched to analyze the manifestations of the tender passion in the young, warm heart of the innocent, beautiful, gifted pupil confided to his instruction. He had no tenderness or truth of love in his soul. Heloise, on the contrary, was affected with the most devoted, the most unselfish affection. It needs only to compare their letters to see this — those of Abelard, cold, hard, calculating. The ill-regulated, but ardent and sincere effusions of Heloise, have been too frequently quoted to need a repetition here. The very arrangement of their correspondence marks the difference. He divides and subdivides his letters; he answers methodically, and by chapters; he addresses them "To the Spouse of Christ" — "Heloisæ dilectissima sorori suæ in Christo — Abailardus;" "To his dear sister in Christ—Abelard." The tone of Heloise is thus:

"Domino suo—imò patri; conjugi suo, imò frateri; Ancilla sua imò filia; ipsius uxor, imò soror."

Heloisæ, Epist. 4.

And after their separation, the better-tempered soul of Heloise rises wonderfully above that of her master. He abandoned his intellectual weapons, and sank into a mere monk; his admirers, who could not comprehend the metamorphosis, clustered around him; they forced some sparks of former animation to appear. Arnold of Brescia persuaded him to encounter St. Bernard in a logical duel. Time and place were chosen. The king, the counts of Champagne and Nerus, bishops, ecclesiastics of highest rank, a concourse of celebrities, crowded to the arena. St. Bernard came with repugnance; he dreaded the powerful eloquence that had so often disarmed him; he was saved by the pusillanimity of his rival. Abelard was mute. After this signal defeat, there is nothing more to relate of him; he died, in inglorious repose, in the abbey of Clury.

In the mean time, Heloise had taken the veil, not from a vocation, but to gratify the caprice of her husband, in a very different career. As Abelard subsided into a sluggish monk, she rose into something superior to a mere formalized recluse. She sought means of improving the minds and morals of all within her influence. She founded a great college of theology, Greek and Hebrew. She delivered lectures on these subjects with such success, as to arouse a spirit of study and investigation through an extended sphere; crowds flocked to hear her; and similar institutions, for the advancement of learning, grew up around her. Heloise was declared by the pope, head of her order.

HERODIAS,

DAUGHTER of Aristobulus and Berenice, sister to king Agrippa, and grand-daughter to Herod the Great, married first her uncle, Herod Philip, by whom she had Salome. She left Herod Philip to marry his brother, Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, and it was for censuring this incestuous marriage that Antipas ordered John the Baptist to be imprisoned. Some time after, Herodias suggested to her daughter Salome to ask, as a reward for her dancing, the head of John the Baptist, who was accordingly beheaded. Herodias, mortified to see her husband tetrarch only, while her brother Agrippa was king, persuaded Antipas to visit Rome, and endeavour to obtain the royal title. But Agrippa sent word to the emperor, that Antipas had arms for seventy thousand men in his arsenals; and Antipas, unable to deny the charge, was banished to Lyons. Caligula was willing to pardon Herodias, as the sister of Agrippa; but she chose rather to accompany her husband, than to owe anything to her brother's fortune. The time or the manner of her death is not known; but she has left the ineffaceable memory of her sin and Herod's crime as a warning to the world, to beware of placing a man in office who sets at defiance the laws of God, or who is united to a wicked woman.

HILDA, S. T.,

PRINCESS of Scotland, was learned in Scripture, and composed many religious works. She opposed strenuously the tonsure of the priests, probably supposing it a heathenish custom. She built the convent of St. Fare, of which she became abbess, and died there in 685.

HILDEGARDIS,

A FAMOUS abbess of the order of St. Benedict, at Spanheim, in Germany, whose prophecies are supposed to relate to the reformation, and the destruction of the Roman see; they had great influence at the time of the reformation. She lived in 1146. The books in which these prophecies are contained, appear to have been written by a zealous, godly, and understanding woman, shocked at the crimes which she saw prevailing around her. She also wrote a poem on medicine, and a book of Latin poems. Her good works and her piety were long remembered.

HILTRUDIS,

DAUGHTER of Charles Martel, was born in the year 728. After the death of her father, when she saw that her brothers, Pepin and Carlman, treated the rest of the family with great cruelty, she fled to her aunt, the duchess of Bavaria. Her cousin Odillo, enchanted with her courage and beauty, married her, and made her duchess of Bavaria.

Five years afterwards, Odillo declared war against the Franks, but fell, badly wounded, a prisoner into the hands of his enemies. Hiltrudis disguised herself as a knight, and followed her husband to the court of her brothers, where she arrived just in time to assist at the baptism of Charlemagne, whom she presented with costly jewels. She was recognised by her brothers, and, reconciled to them, obtained the liberty of her husband. She died in the year 759, and was buried in Osterhofer, by the side of Odillo.

HROSWITHA,

(HELENA V. ROSSEN,) a nun of the Benedictine order, was born in Saxony, and died at Gandersheim, in 984. She is known as a religious poetess through her "Comædia Sacra VI.," edited by Schurzfleisch. These plays were written by her to suppress the reading of Terence, then a very popular author among the literary clergy of the age. She also composed a poetic narrative of the deeds performed by Otho the Great, to whom she was related, and a number of elegies. She wrote in Latin altogether. Her works were printed in Nuremberg, in 1501.

HYPATIA,

A most beautiful, learned, and virtuous lady of antiquity, was the daughter of Theon, who governed the Platonic school at Alexandria, in Egypt, where she was born and educated in the latter part of the fourth century. Theon was famous for his extensive knowledge and learning, but principally for being the father of Hypatia, whom, on account of her extraordinary genius, he educated not only in all the qualifications belonging to her sex, but likewise in the most abstruse sciences. She made astonishing progress in every branch of learning. Socrates, the ecclesiastical historian, a witness of undoubted veracity; at least when he speaks in favour of a heathen philosopher, tells us that Hypatia "arrived at such a pitch of learning, as very far to exceed all the philosophers of her time;" to which Nicephorus adds, "Or those of other times." Philostorgius, a third historian of the same stamp, affirms that she surpassed her father in astronomy; and Suidas, who mentions two books of her writing, one "On the Astronomical Canon of Diophantus," and another "On the Conics of Apollonius," avers that she understood all other parts of philosophy.

She succeeded her father in the government of the Alexandrian school, teaching out of the chair where Ammonius, Hierocles, and many other celebrated philosophers had taught; and this at a time when men of immense learning abounded at Alexandria, and in other parts of the Roman empire. Her fame was so extensive, and her worth so universally acknowledged, that she had a crowded auditory. One cannot represent to himself without pleasure the flower of all the youth in Europe, Asia, and Africa, sitting at the feet of a very beautiful woman, for such we are assured Hypatia was, all eagerly imbibing instruction from her mouth, and many doubtless love from her eyes; yet Suidas, who speaks of her marriage to Isidorus, relates at the same time that she died a maid.

Her scholars were as eminent as they were numerous. One of them was the celebrated Synesius, afterwards bishop of Ptolemais. This ancient Christian Platonist everywhere bears the strongest testimony to the learning and virtue of his instructress; and never mentions her without the profoundest respect, and in terms of affection coming little short of adoration. In a letter to his brother Eupotius, he says, "Salute the most honoured and the most beloved of God, the PHILOSOPHER; and that happy society, which enjoys the blessing of her divine voice." In another, he mentions one Egyptius, who "sucked in the seeds of wisdom from Hypatia." In another he says, "I suppose these letters will be delivered by Peter, which he will receive from that sacred hand." The famous silver astrolabe, which he presented to Peonius, he owns to have been perfected by the directions of Hypatia. In a long epistle to her, he tells her his reasons for writing the two books he sends her; and asks her opinion of one, resolving not to publish it without her approbation.

Never was a woman more caressed by the public, and never had a woman a more unspotted character. She was considered an oracle of wisdom, and was consulted by the magistrates in all important cases. This frequently drew her among the greatest concourse of men, without causing the least censure of her manners.

"On account of the confidence and authority," says Socrates, "which she had acquired by her learning, she sometimes came to the judges with singular modesty. Nor was she anything abashed to appear thus among a crowd of men; for all persons, by reason of her extraordinary discretion, did at the same time both reverence and admire her." This is also confirmed by other writers, and Damascus and Suidas relate, that the governors and magistrates of Alexandria regularly visited and paid their court to her; and, when Nicephorus wished to pay the princess Eudocia the highest compliment, he called her "another Hypatia."

While Hypatia thus reigned the brightest ornament of Alexandria, Orestes was governor of the same place, under the emperor Theodosius, and Cyril bishop or patriarch. Orestes admired Hypatia, and as a wise governor, frequently consulted her. This created an intimacy between them highly displeasing to Cyril, who had a great aversion to Orestes, and who disapproved of Hypatia, as she was a heathen. The life of Orestes nearly fell a sacrifice to the fury of a Christian mob, supposed to have been incited by Cyril on account of this intimacy; and, afterwards, it being reported that Hypatia prevented a reconciliation between Cyril and Orestes, some men, headed by one Peter, a lecturer, entered into a conspiracy against her, waylaid her, and dragged her to the church called Cæsais, where, stripping her naked, they killed her with tiles, tore her to pieces, and carrying her limbs to a place called Cinaron, there burnt them to ashes.

This happened in March, about the year 415; in 'the tenth year of Honorius' and the sixth of Theodosius' consulship. The weak and trifling emperor was roused from his usual indifference by such an awful crime, and threatened the assassins of this incomparable woman with a merited punishment; but at the entreaties of his friends, whom Orestes had corrupted, was induced to suffer them to escape, by which means, it is added, he drew vengeance on himself and family. There are few recorded crimes of wicked men so utterly fiend-like as the unprovoked murder of the lovely, learned, and virtuous Hypatia.

I.

ICASIA,

SPOUSE of Theophilus, emperor of Constantinople, in 829. He having assembled the most beautiful young women of the empire, for the purpose of choosing a wife, fixed upon Icasia, and gave orders for her coronation; but on her answering some questions he proposed to her, in a manner at once learned and acute, he changed his mind. Icasia, therefore, retired to a monastery, where she composed many works. The emperor had the same taste, probably, for foolish, flippant women, as characterized Charles II., king of England.

INGEBORGE, or INGELBURGA,

WIFE of Philip Augustus, king of France, was born in 1175, and was the daughter of Waldemar, king of Denmark, and of his wife Sophia, a Russian princess. In 1193, she was selected, from motives of policy, by Philip Augustus, then a widower of twenty-eight, as his wife. She is represented as very beautiful and discreet, but the king, almost from the first interview, conceived a strong aversion to her, and on a frivolous pretext of Ingeborge's just discovered relationship to his first wife, he assembled the nobles of the kingdom at Compiègne, November 5th, 1193, who declared the marriage null and void. Ingeborge was present on this occasion, but having no counsellor, and not understanding the language, knew nothing of the business that the nobles were transacting, till she was informed of their decision by her interpreter, when she burst into tears, and appealed to Rome. She was taken to an abbey, where she was kept in confinement, and almost without the necessaries of life. The pope, urged by the king of Denmark as well as by Ingeborge, refused to sanction the divorce; but Philip Augustus imprisoned the legates, and married Agnes, daughter of Berthod, duke of Merania, a descendant of the emperor Charlemagne. Ingeborge appealed in vain to pope Celestine III.; but, on his death, he was succeeded by Innocent III., who immediately took very severe measures, and in 1199 Philip Augustus was excommunicated, and his kingdom declared under an interdict. All the churches were closed, no baptisms, marriages, or burials were allowed to be performed, the dying were refused the benefit of the priest's services, and all the religious duties were suspended. In those days of superstition, this terrible sentence fell with tenfold weight on the people; and moved by their distress, after having resisted the papal authority for eight months, Philip at length sent Agnes to the royal castle of St. Leger, and allowed Ingeborge to return to him. But she still complained, and justly, that she had only exchanged one prison for another and was treated with no respect. Meanwhile there was a solemn assembly held at Soissons to give a final judgment on the demand the king made for a legal separation. The king was surrounded by a crowd of lawyers, who vied with each other in urging the justice of his claim. Ingeborge was alone and defenceless; after waiting a few moments for her advocate, the judges were about to pronounce their decision, when a young and unknown lawyer came forward and argued her cause so eloquently, that the judges dared not utter the wished-for sentence. The king, leaving the assembly, went to the abbey where Ingeborge had taken refuge, and taking her behind him, on horseback, left the city without any of his usual train. When this was told to Agnes de Merania, it affected her so deeply that she died a few days after.

Philip Augustus, still more irritated against his queen, confined her in the tower of the castle of Etampes, where no one was allowed to converse with her without his permission; her food was insufficient and coarse, her clothes hung about her in rags, and the servants who attended her were so brutal, that they were accused of wishing to cause her death by their ill-treatment. Philip endeavoured to induce his wife to take the veil, but in vain; and in 1213, after a separation of twenty years, he allowed her to reside under the same roof with him, where the sweetness of her temper, the goodness and purity of her soul, at length conquered his aversion. After the death of Philip, in 1223, Ingeborge was treated with the greatest respect by his successor; while she devoted herself chiefly to her religious duties. She died in 1236.

INGONDE, or INGUNDIS,

DAUGHTER of Siegbert I., king of Austrasia, or Lorraine, and of his wife, the famous Brunehaut, was married about 570, to Brunechilde, or Ermenegild, second son of Leovigild, one of the Gothic kings of Spain. She was received with great pomp and tenderness by her husband and his grandmother Gosuinda. But the old queen had an aversion to Catholicism, and attempted, at first by persuasions and afterwards by threats to convert Ingonde to Arianism, and to have her re-baptized, but Ingonde resolutely refused to consent. Gosuinda, enraged at her firmness, seized her by the hair, threw her down, stamped upon her, and had her plunged by force into the baptistry. Ingonde, however, at length, by her patience and piety, converted her husband to her own faith, which, when his father heard of it, made him so furious, that he had his son taken prisoner and beheaded. Ingonde fled, but was captured and taken to Sicily, where she died, about 585. She was venerated as a martyr.

INGRIDA,

A NUN of the convent of St. Brigitta, in Wadstena, Sweden, who lived in 1498, wrote an epistle to her lover, which is considered the most elegant and correct specimen of the Swedish language of that period, and indeed superior to any that appeared for a long time after. This composition, full of eloquence and genuine passion, in which the sentiments of love and mystical devotion are intermingled, places Ingrida by the side of the more celebrated Heloise.

IRENE,

EMPRESS of Constantinople, was an Athenian orphan, distinguished only by her accomplishments, when, in 769, at the age of seventeen, she was married to Leo IV., emperor of Constantinople. She was banished by her husband on account of her attachment to image worship, of which the Greek church disapproved. On the death of Leo, in 780, she returned to Constantinople, and was associated in the government with her son, Constantine VI., then only ten years of age. Artful and cruel, Irene deposed her son, in 797, and caused his eyes to be put out, and then reigned alone. On this occasion, she entered Constantinople in state, with a splendid retinue. She made Charlemagne, then emperor of the West, a proposal of marriage, in order to preserve her Italian dominions from his grasp, and the marriage treaty was actually concluded, when Nicephorus, chancellor of the empire, conspired against her, seized her in her bed, and banished her to a nunnery in the island of Lesbos. She was here so reduced, as to be forced to earn a scanty subsistence by her distaff, and died the same year, 802. During her reign, she had submitted to be tributary to the Saracens. She governed under the direction of two ambitious eunuchs, who were perpetually plotting against each other.

IRGE,

A JAPANESE princess, born 858, whose writings are said still to be in great repute in Japan.

ISABELLA,

OF ARRAGON, daughter of Alphonso, duke of Calabria, married, in 1480, John Galeazzo Sforza, duke of Milan, who, yet in his minority, was under the protection of his uncle, Louis Sforza. When Isabella arrived at Milan, her beauty inspired the protector with a passion for her that proved fatal to her happiness. The lovers having been married only by proxy, Louis contrived to keep them apart, while he attempted to supplant the bridegroom. But Isabella repulsed him with disdain, and exhorted her husband to throw off the yoke of his uncle, and assert his rights.

The protector, artful and politic, attempted, by negotiation, to annul the marriage, in his own favour; but Alphonso threatened to arm Europe in his son-in-law's cause, and Louis was at length obliged to restore to his nephew his betrothed bride. His love for Isabella was now turned to hatred; and he endeavoured in every way to embitter her life. He married Alphonsina, daughter of the duke of Ferrara, a woman as haughty and ambitious as Isabella. Compelled to reside under the same roof with her rival, and to see her station and privileges usurped, Isabella found her position so insupportable, that she wrote to her father and grandfather, Ferdinand, king of Naples, protesting that if no means for her deliverance were devised, she would escape from her sufferings by relinquishing her life.

These princes, however, could not redress her grievances; and, in the mean time, her husband died of a slow poison, recommending his wife and children to his cousin, Charles VIII., of France, who was passing through Pavia. Hardly had Galeazzo expired, than the party of Louis, saluting him duke, ordered the bells to be set ringing. During this indecent and insulting display of joy, Isabella immured herself and her children, thus deprived at once of their father and their inheritance, in a dark chamber.

The French having taken Milan, Isabella fled to Naples; but that city was at length compelled to surrender to the invaders. Isabella's only son was carried captive to France, where it was intended to compel him to become a monk, and where he died by a fall from his horse. Louis Sforza was also taken prisoner and carried to France, where he died.

Isabella retired to a town in Naples, which had been assigned to her as a dower, and where she still maintained an air of state and grandeur. Her daughter, Bona Sforza, married Sigismund, king of Poland. Some time previous to her death, Isabella made a journey of devotion to Rome, where she walked to the Vatican, attended by a train of ladies, dressed in bridal ornaments. Her reputation in her youth was unblemished, but in her later years, she gave occasion for censure, by admitting the attentions of Prosper Colonna. She died Feb. 11th, 1524.

ISABELLA,

OF CASTILE, the celebrated queen of Spain, daughter of John II., was born in 1451, and married, in 1469, Ferdinand V., king of Arragon. After the death of her brother, Henry IV., in 1474, she ascended the throne of Castile, to the exclusion of her elder sister, Joanna, who had the rightful claim to the crown. During the lifetime of her brother, Isabella had gained the favour of the estates of the kingdom to such a degree that the majority, on his death, declared for her. From the others, the victorious arms of her husband extorted acquiescence, in the battle of Toro, in 1476. After the kingdoms of Arragon and Castile were thus united, Ferdinand and Isabella assumed the royal title of Spain.

With the graces and charms of her sex, Isabella united the courage of a hero, and the sagacity of a statesman and legislator. She was always present at the transaction of state affairs, and her name was placed beside that of her husband in public ordinances. The conquest of Granada, after which the Moors were entirely expelled from Spain, and the discovery of America, were, in a great degree, her work. In all her undertakings, the wise cardinal Ximenes was her assistant.

She has been accused of severity, pride, and unbounded ambition; but these faults sometimes promoted the welfare of the kingdom, as well as her virtues and talents. A spirit like hers was necessary to humble the haughtiness of the nobles without exciting their hostility, to conquer Granada without letting loose the hordes of Africa on Europe, and to restrain the vices of her subjects, who had become corrupt by reason of the bad administration of the laws. By the introduction of a strict ceremonial, which subsists till the present day at the Spanish court, she succeeded in checking the haughtiness of the numerous nobles about the person of the king, and in depriving them of their pernicious influence over him. Private warfare, which had formerly prevailed to the destruction of public tranquillity, she checked, and introduced a vigorous administration of justice. In 1492, pope Alexander VI. confirmed to the royal pair the title of Catholic king, already conferred on them by Innocent VIII. The zeal for the Roman Catholic religion, which procured them this title, gave rise to the Inquisition, which was introduced into Spain in 1480, at the suggestion of their confessor, Torquemada. Isabella died in 1504, having extorted from her husband (of whom she was very jealous) an oath that he would never marry again.

ISABELLA OF FRANCE,

YOUNGEST child of Louis VIII. and Blanche of Castile, was born in 1224. She was early celebrated for her beauty, learning, and piety. She refused every offer of marriage, even the son of the emperor Ferdinand, and declared her intention to devote herself wholly to religion. The pope, at her mother's request, wrote to dissuade her from doing this; but her answer to his letter was so full of humility, piety, and reason, that both he and Blanche were obliged to yield. She founded the monastery of Longchamp about 1260, though she never withdrew entirely from the world, or joined any religious order. Towards the end of her life she observed the most rigorous silence, to expiate for the idle words she had spoken in her youth. She died, February 12th, 1269, at the age of forty-five. For several ages, it was believed that miracles were performed at her tomb.

ISABELLA,

DAUGHTER of Philip the Fair, king of France, was born in 1295. She married, in 1308, Edward, afterwards Edward II. of England. She was very beautiful; but her licentiousness disgraced her, and embittered the last years of her husband's life. By her intrigues she induced his abdication and the accession of their son Edward III., then a boy. She sought to secure the sovereign power in her hands, and those of her infamous favourite, Roger Mortimer. She did not effect this till after the wicked murder of her husband, the deposed Edward II., which was attributed to her instigations. Soon afterwards her son, Edward III., joined with his indignant barons in an attack on Nottingham castle, where she and Mortimer had taken up their abode. The crafty queen was over- come; her paramour seized and executed; and she confined for the remainder of her life, twenty-eight years, at Castle Rising. She died in 1358, aged sixty-three years.

"Since the days of the fair and false Elfrida of Saxon celebrity, no queen of England has left so dark a stain on the annals of female royalty as the consort of Edward II., Isabella of France," says Miss Strickland.

ISABELLA OF VALOIS,

Was the daughter of Charles VI. of France, and Isabella of Bavaria. She was born in the Louvre palace at Paris, November 9th, 1387. In October, 1396, Isabella became the second wife of Richard II. of England, though she was then only eight years old. After Richard was dethroned and murdered by Henry of Bolingbroke, afterwards Henry IV., in 1400, and Isabella remained in England for two years, treated with great respect as queen-dowager, but steadily refusing the hand of Henry's eldest son, who had fallen very much in love with her. In 1402, Isabella returned to Paris, and at the age of eighteen married her cousin, the celebrated archduke of Orleans, who, though some years younger than herself, she dearly loved. She died at Blois, September 13th, 1410, leaving an infant daughter only a few hours old.

ISABELLA OF LORRAINE,

Eldest daughter of Charles II. of Lorraine, was married in 1420, at the age of thirteen, to René, duke d'Anjou, brother-in-law of Charles VI. of France, then about fourteen. She united to great beauty, intellect, generosity, and courage. When her husband was taken prisoner by the duke of Burgundy, in 1429, she assembled the nobles of Lorraine, placed her four children under their protection, and raised an army to rescue her husband. While he was still a prisoner, the kingdom of Sicily, by the death of Charles I., became his; and René sent Isabella to claim it. She went there, and by her wise and skilful government acquired great popularity. In 1437, René joined her; but in less than five years he was forced to return with his family to France, by his victorious rival, Alphonso of Arragon. In 1444, Isabella's youngest daughter, Margaret of Anjou, married Henry VI. of England; and the misfortunes of this beloved child so preyed upon the mother, that they are supposed to have caused her death. She died at the castle d'Angers, February 28th, 1452, at the age of forty-four. Her husband's grief at her loss nearly proved fatal to him; and though he married again, he never ceased to regret her.

Among the illustrious females of the fifteenth century, Isabella of Lorraine must ever hold a distinguished place. Her commanding talents, her personal endowments, her courage and conjugal tenderness, all unite to form a character of the most lovely and perfect type of womanhood. She was the contemporary of Joan of Arc; she was the patroness of Agnes Sorel, and seems to have possessed the true heart of the heroine and the cultivated intellect of the poetess. Her daughter, Margaret of Anjou, "inherited from this illustrious parent those energies which the sternest shocks of adversity were unable to subdue," says Miss Strickland; she also describes Isabella as the "tenderest and most courageous of conjugal heroines;" a title most appropriate to her deeds of daring, all done for the sake of her husband.

ISAURE,

CLEMENCE, or CLEMENZA, a lady of Toulouse in France, celebrated for her learning. She instituted the Jeux Floraux, or Floral Games, in that city, where prizes were bestowed on the successful poetical competitors. She was born in 1464, and was the daughter of Ludovico Isaure, who died when Clemence was only five years old.

Some years afterwards the romance of her life began. Near her garden dwelt Raoul, a young troubadour, who fell in love with her for her genius and beauty, and communicated his passion in songs in which her name and his were united. The maiden replied with flowers, whose meaning Raoul could easily interpret. He was the natural son of count Raymond of Toulouse, and followed his father to the war against the emperor Maximilian. In the battle of Guigenaste both were slain, and Clemence resolved to take the veil. Before doing so, however, she renewed the poetic festival which had been established by the gay company of the seven troubadours, but had been long forgotten, and assigned as prizes for the victors the five different flowers, wrought in gold and silver, with which she had replied to her lover's passion. She fixed on the first of May as the day for the distribution of the prizes; and she herself composed an ode on spring for the occasion, which acquired for her the surname of the Sappho of Toulouse. Her character was tinged with melancholy, which the loss of her lover probably heightened; and her poems partake of this plaintive style. Her works were printed at Toulouse in 1505. They remained a long time in oblivion, and perhaps never would have seen the light but for the fortunate discovery of M. Alexandre Dumenge. There are extant two copies of this precious volume, which is entitled "Dictats de Dona Clamenza Isaure;" it consists of cantos or odes; the principal and most finished is called "Plainte d'Amour." The two first strophes have been translated almost literally into modern French.

Au soin des bois la colombe amoureuse
Murmure en paix ses longs, et doux accens;
Sus nos coteaux, la Fauvette de meilleure
Va célébrer le retour du Printemps!

Helas! et moi, plaintive, solitaire
Moi qui n'ai su qu'aimes, et que souffrir,
Je dois, au monde, au bonheur, étrangère
Pleurer mes manx, les redire, et mourir.

The queen of poetry, as her contemporaries entitled her, died in the first year of the great reign of Frances I., and Leo X. Her mortal remains were deposited in the choir of the church of Notre Dame, at Toulouse. A bronze tablet, inscribed with a highly eulogistic tribute to her fame, still remains, at the foot of a statue of Clemence. After the lapse of three centuries, it required nothing less than the convulsions of the French Revolution of 1789 to suspend the floral games; they were reinstated under Napoleon, as a municipal institution, in 1806. The memory of Clemence Isaure lived "green with immortal bays;" for centuries the Toulousians had made her their boast—but "all that beauty, all that wit e'er gave," could find no grace with the patriots of 1793. That intelligent body of citizens voted Clemence Isaure an "aristocrat," and, as such, sentenced her bronze monument to be melted down, and used for vulgar purposes. Fortunately, the honest artisan to whom the work was consigned, had a feeling which saved this venerable relic. At the risk of his head, he substituted some other bronze, and concealed the tablet till a time of political safety arrived.

~~~~~

J.

JANE OF FLANDERS,

COUNTESS of Montfort, was one of the most extraordinary women of her age. Her husband, the count of Montfort, having been, in 1342, made prisoner and conducted to Paris, she assembled the inhabitants of Rennes, her place of residence, and by her eloquence, aided by the pity inspired by her infant son, moved the inhabitants of Rennes to take up arms in her behalf. The movement was participated in by all Brittany, and she soon found herself in a position to protect her rights. Having shut herself in the fortress of Hennebonne, Charles de Blois, her husband's enemy, besieged her there, after an obstinate defence, in which the countess showed many of the qualities of a commander. The repeated breaches made in the walls at length rendered it necessary for the besieged, who were diminished in numbers, and exhausted by fatigue, to treat for a capitulation. During a conference for that purpose, in which the bishop of Leon was engaged with Charles de Blois, the countess, who had mounted a high tower, which commanded a view of the sea, descried some sails at a distance, and immediately exclaimed, "Behold the succours! the English succours! no capitulation!"

This fleet, prepared by Edward III. for the relief of Hennebonne, having been detained by contrary winds, entered the harbour, under the command of Sir Walter Mauny. The garrison, by this reinforcement, animated with fresh spirits, immediately sallied forth, beat the besiegers from their posts, and obliged them to decamp. The flames of war still continued their devastations, when Charles de Blois, having invested the fortress of Roche de Rien, the Countess of Montfort, reinforced by some English troops, attacked him, during the night, in his entrenchments, dispersed his army, and took him prisoner. His wife, in whose right he had pretended to Brittany, compelled by the captivity of her husband, assumed, in her turn, the government of the party; and opposed herself, a formidable and worthy rival, both in the cabinet and field, to the countess of Montfort.

The mediation of France and England failed to put an end to the disputes in Brittany, till Charles de Blois was at length slain, at the battle of Auray. The young count de Montfort soon after obtained possession of the duchy, and, though a zealous partizan of England, had his title acknowledged by the French king, to whom he did homage for his dominions.

JEANNE DE BOURBON,

DAUGHTER of Pierre I., duke de Bourbon, was born at Vincennes, near Paris, February 3d, 1337. April 8th, 1350, when about thirteen, she married Charles, who was nearly the same age, afterwards Charles V. of France, eldest son of king John. She was a very beautiful woman, and her husband was much attached to her. He had a high opinion of her judgment, often consulted her on state affairs, and loved to see her surrounded by all the pomp and luxury suited to her station. On days of solemnity, Charles frequently brought his wife, whom he called "the sun of his kingdom," with him to the parliament, where she took her seat by his side. By his will, he left the regency to Jeanne, although he had three brothers of mature age. However, his queen died before him, at the Hotel de St. Paul, in Paris, February 11th, 1378. Her death proved a real misfortune to France. She is spoken of, by historians, as one of the most accomplished and virtuous princesses of her time.

JEANNE OF FRANCE AND NAVARRE,

WIFE of Philip IV., surnamed the Fair, of France, was the only child and heiress of Henry I., king of Navarre and count of Champagne. The count de Bar having attacked Champagne, she placed herself at the head of a small army, forced him to surrender, and kept him a long time in prison. But her most solid title to glory, is the having founded the famous college of Navarre.

Jeanne of Navarre died at Vincennes, in 1304, aged thirty-three. Her husband was devotedly attached to her, and she fully deserved his love. Philip never took the titles of king of Navarre, or of count of Champagne and of Brie; and to all his ordinances relative to the government of these principalities, he always added that he acted with the concurrence of his dear companion; and Jeanne added her seal to that of her husband. Jeanne was married at the age of thirteen, and, during her twenty years of wedded life, she bore her husband seven children. She was equally beautiful, eloquent, generous, and courageous.

JOANNA,

OR JANE OF NAVARRE, consort of Henry IV. of England, was the second daughter of Charles d'Albert, king of Navarre, surnamed the Bad. Her mother was Jane, daughter of John, king of France. Joanna was born about 1370, and in 1386, she married John de Montfort, duke of Bretagne, surnamed the Valiant, by whom she was tenderly beloved, and who left her regent and sole guardian of the young duke, their eldest son, on his death, in 1399. In 1402, Joanna married Henry of Lancaster, king of England, who died in 1413; after which event, Joanna still remained in England. In 1419, she was arrested on a charge of witchcraft against the king, Henry V., her step-son. She was condemned, deprived of all her property, and imprisoned till 1422, when she was set free, and her dower restored. She died at Havering Bower, in 1437. Joanna had nine children by the duke of Bretagne, some of whom died before her; but none by Henry IV. She was a beautiful and a very intelligent woman.

JOANNA,

COUNTESS of Hainault and Flanders. Baldwin, count of Flanders, born in 1171, was one of the heroes of the fourth crusade. He had taken the city of Constantinople, and borne for a short time the empty title of emperor. The fortunes of war rendered him prisoner during a tedious captivity of eighteen years. In parting for the crusade, Baldwin left two young daughters, Joan and Margaret — the former destined to be his heiress and successor. Their mother, Mary di Sciampagna, died at Acre, in making a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. During the absence of Baldwin, Flanders was governed by the guardian and cousin of the infants, Philip of Namur.

Joan, from early girlhood, manifested an imperious will and ardent desire for sway. Profiting by a rumour of the death of her father, which began to be spread abroad, she seized the reins of government, and caused herself, in 1209, to be declared countess of Hainault and Flanders. Two years after this she formed a marriage, which, judging from its result, must have arisen on her side from motives of policy, unmingled with affection. The husband she selected was Ferdinand, son of Sancho, king of Portugal. Uncertain in disposition, unskilful in conduct, and weak in design, Ferdinand attempted various expeditions, and performed all with ill-success. He began by forming an alliance with Philip Augustus; then owing to some frivolous pique we find him deserting to the English, just at the time of the famous battle of Bouvines. Covered with wounds, he fell into the hands of the French, and was conveyed a prisoner to Paris, where he remained fifteen years in captivity. Joan appears to have considered him well disposed of, as she maintained an amicable relation with Philip Augustus, and afterwards with Louis VIII. These kings were her friends, supporters, and trusty allies. No doubt they consulted her wishes in retaining the unhappy Ferdinand in the Louvre, while they granted her the honours and privileges of a sovereign per se, among which was the holding an unsheathed sword before them. She seems to have governed with vigour and judgment. Her political treaties were made with a sagacity rare at that period. She had none of the tenderness of an amiable woman, but was gifted with the shrewd sense and hardness of a statesman. Circumstances soon arose before which a less stout heart would have quailed, and a more sensitive conscience refused to act.

In 1225, a broken-down, grey-haired, feeble old man made his appearance in Lisle, and declared himself to be Baldwin, the father of the countess, returned to resume his sovereignty! Joan boldly asserted that he was an impostor, and denied him admission to the palace; but his piteous tale, his venerable appearance, and the natural bias of the populace to side with the oppressed, gained him numerous partizans. Joan's residence was surrounded by a tumultuous mob, and she hastily fled to Peronne, and put herself under the protection of her trusty friend king Louis, who summoned the soi-disant Baldwin to appear before his tribunal, when as suzerain he would pronounce between the contending parties. His decision would probably have been the same had the unfortunate pretender offered the strongest evidence — as it was, the old man was unable to answer questions propounded to him about early events and persons. He pleaded that age, and trouble, and present sickness and agitation, dulled his faculties and injured his memory; but Louis gave sentence that he was an impostor, and as such, ordered him out of the kingdom, though he respected the safe-conduct under which he had presented himself, and had him carried safely beyond the frontiers. The countess being reinstated in her domains, showed by her cruelty that she did not despise the claims of the wretched veteran. She sent persons to seize him, and when under her jurisdiction, after submitting his aged limbs to the torture, she caused him to be decapitated. Kneeling on the scaffold, with one hand on the crucifix, and his head on the block, he repeated that he was the true and real Baldwin, count of Flanders. At a neighbouring window appeared a pale visage, with closed teeth and contracted muscles — it was Joan — who took a fearful satisfaction in seeing with her own eyes the fulfilment of her dire will!

After this scene of blood, the countess governed Flanders peacefully and prosperously for sixteen years. The justice of St. Louis when he ascended the throne of France opened the prison-doors of Ferdinand; but the privations, and sufferings, and solitude of years, had weakened his moral and physical economy—he was prematurely old—and did not live to enjoy his freedom, so long wished for. The widow princess deemed it expedient to enter into new nuptials. She espoused Thomas of Savoy. The day after this marriage, mounted in a stately car with her husband, she went in procession through the city of Lisle; but when she arrived at the place where her father had been executed, a bloody phantom rose before her—the head but half attached to the bust—and uttered the most frightful menaces. Who shall pronounce whether this apparition was the effect of a guilty conscience, stimulated by the accusations of the populace, or a nervous disorder, the beginning of divine vengeance! At all events, from that day Joan led a life of agony and terror, always haunted by the fatal spectre. Consulting holy churchmen, she was advised to build a monastery on the very spot where the phantom rose. Joan not only did this, but also erected a hospital and two convents; and that her repentance might prove still more efficacious, assumed herself the habit of a nun, and died in the cloister in the year 1241. Her death-bed was surrounded by the holy sisterhood, who lavished every comfort of religion upon her; she grasped convulsively the crucifix, and her last words were, in accents of despair, “Will God forgive me?”

JOANNA,

OF Naples, daughter of Robert, king of Naples, of the Anjou dynasty, succeeded her father in 1343. She was then sixteen, handsome and accomplished. She had been for some time married to her cousin Andreas of Hungary; but this union was not a happy one. Andreas claimed to be king and to share his wife's authority, which, by her father's will, had been solely left to her. The conduct of Andreas, and his haughty manners, offended the Neapolitan nobility, and his Hungarian guards excited their jealousy. A conspiracy was formed by the nobles, and one night while the court was at Aversa, Andreas was strangled, and his body thrown out of a window of the castle.

Joanna went immediately to Naples, and thence issued orders for the apprehension of the murderers. Many persons were put to a cruel death as accessaries, but public opinion still implicated the queen in the murder. The same year Joanna married her cousin Louis, prince of Tarentum. Soon after Louis, king of Hungary, the brother of Andreas, came with an army to avenge his brother's death. He defeated the queen's troops, and entered Naples. Joanna then took refuge in her hereditary principality of Provence. She soon repaired to Avignon, and, before Pope Clement VI., protested her innocence and demanded a trial. She was tried and acquitted; and, out of gratitude, she gave up to the papal see the town and county of Avignon.

In the mean time, a pestilence had frightened away the Hungarians from Naples, and Joanna, returning to her kingdom, was solemnly crowned with her husband, in 1351. Joan reigned many years in peace. Having lost her husband in 1362, she married James of Arragon, a prince of Majorca, and on his death she married, in 1376, Otho, duke of Brunswick; but having no children, she gave her niece Margaret to Charles, duke of Durazzo, and appointed him her successor. On the breaking out of the schism between Urban VI. and Clement VII., Joanna took the part of the latter. Urban excommunicated her, and gave her kingdom to Charles Durazzo, who revolted against his sovereign and benefactress. With the aid of the pope he raised troops, defeated the queen, and took her prisoner. He then tried to induce Joanna to abdicate in his favour; but she firmly refused, and named Louis of Anjou, brother of Charles V., king of France, as her successor. Charles then transferred Joanna to the castle of Muro, in Basilicata, where he caused her to be murdered, in 1382. She was a woman of great accomplishments, and many good qualities.

JOANNA II.,

DAUGHTER of Charles Durazzo, and sister of Ladislaus, king of Naples, succeeded the latter in 1414. She was then forty-four, and was noted for her licentiousness and weakness. She married, from political motives, James, Count de la Marche, who was allied to the royal family of France. But the union proved a most unhappy one, and James fled to France, where it is said that he ended his days in a convent. Meantime unworthy favourites ruled in succession in the court of Joanna. One of them, Ser Gianni Caracciolo, of a noble family, saw his influence disputed by the famous Conzottiere Sforza Attendolo, who, together with many barons that were jealous of Caracciolo, took the part of Louis of Anjou, grandson of that Louis to whom Joanna I. had bequeathed the crown. The queen sought for support in Alfonso of Arragon, king of Sicily, whom she appointed her successor. Alfonso came to Naples; but the fickle Joan, having made her peace with Sforza, revoked her adoption of Alfonso, and appointed Louis of Anjou her successor. Alfonso was obliged to return to Sicily, and soon after Caracciolo was murdered in consequence of court jealousy. Louis of Anjou died also, and was followed to the grave by Joanna herself, who appointed René of Anjou her successor. She died in 1435, leaving her kingdom in great disorder, and with the prospect of disputed succession and civil war

JUDITH,

DAUGHTER of Welff, a count, by some writers called the duke of Bavaria, was selected, from her beauty, to be the second wife of Louis le Debonnaire, son of Charlemagne, emperor of France. She was well educated, and succeeded in obtaining such control over the king's affections, that she governed not only in the palace, but also exercised the greatest influence in the government. Her oldest son, who afterwards reigned under the name of Charles the Bald, was born in 823; but as the king had already divided his estates between the sons of his former marriage, there was nothing left for him. Judith immediately exerted herself to obtain a kingdom for her child; and having made her god-son, Bernard, duke of Aquitaine, prime minister, a national assembly was convoked at Worms, and by the consent of Lothaire, the eldest son of Louis, the country between the Jura, Alps, Rhine, and Maine, was given to Charles, who was placed under the care of Bernard.

Pepin, the second son of Louis, having convinced Lothaire of his folly in yielding up his possessions at the request of Judith, induced him to unite with him in a rebellion against Judith and Louis. In 829 they surrounded Aix, took Judith and her husband prisoners, and accusing Judith of too great intimacy with Bernard, forced her to take the veil, in the convent of St. Radegonde, at Poitiers. They, however, permitted Judith to have a private interview with her husband, on condition that she would urge on him the necessity of an immediate abdication. Judith promised to do so; but instead, advised Louis to yield to circumstances, and go to the monastery of St. Médard, at Soissons, but not to abdicate the crown. The king followed her advice; and, in 830, Lothaire, having quarrelled with his brother, restored the crown to Louis, who immediately recalled Judith. The pope released her from her conventual vows, and she cleared herself by an oath from the accusation of adultery that was brought against her. Bernard, who had fled to Aquitaine, also returned, and offered to prove his innocence of the crime by single combat, with any of his accusers. No one accepted the challenge, but the public feeling was so strong against him, that the empress was obliged to send him away.

In 833, the emperor was again betrayed and deposed by his children, although Judith had exerted herself in every way, even by cruelty, to retain for her weak husband the power he could not keep for himself. After a year of confinement, Louis was again placed on the throne; and by the new division of the empire, arranged in 839, Judith had the satisfaction of seeing her son placed in possession of a large share of those estates from which he had seemed forever excluded. Louis the Mild died in 840, and Judith only survived him three years. She died at Tours. Some historians, however, say that her death did not occur till 848, or even till 874. In her heart the mother's ambition was the predominating power

JULIA DOMNA

Was the daughter of a noble Phœnician, a high priest of the temple of the sun, at Emesa. Nature had blessed her with great intellectual and personal endowments; and the high gifts of beauty, wit, imagination, and discernment, were augmented by all the advantages of study and education. She is said to have been well acquainted with history, moral philosophy, geometry, and other sciences, which she cultivated through life; and her mental accomplishments won her the friendship of all the most distinguished among the learned in Rome, "where," (says one of her modern historians, in modern phrase,) "elle vint, dans l'intention de faire fortune, et y reussit."

From the time of her union with Severus

(twenty years before his elevation to the throne,) he almost always adopted her counsels, and mainly owed to them that high reputation with his army, which induced his troops in Illyria to proclaim him emperor. Although Julia Domna has been accused, by the scandal of ancient history, of gallantry in her early days, (the common accusation of the compilers of anecdotes, who pass for historians,) all writers acknowledge that the follies of her youth were effaced by the virtues and the genius which glorified her maturity; and that, when seated on the throne of the empire, she surrounded it by whatever the declining literature and science of the day still preserved of the wise, able, and eminent.

Her husband esteemed her genius, and consulted her upon all affairs; and she, in some measure, governed during the reign of her sons, though she had the misfortune of seeing one slain by his execrable brother, whose excesses she inwardly murmured at, when she dared not openly condemn.

To the last hour of her son's life, Julia Domna, who had accompanied him to the East, administered all that was moral or intellectual in the government of the empire; and the respectful civility of the usurper Macrinus to the widow of Severus, might have flattered her with the hope of an honourable if not a happy old age, in the society of the lettered and the scientific, whom to the last she served and protected.

But the heart, if not the spirit of this great woman, and most unfortunate of mothers, was broken. "She had experienced all the vicissitudes of fortune. From an humble station she had been raised to greatness, only to taste the superior bitterness of an exalted rank. She was doomed to weep over the death of one of her sons, and over the life of another. The terrible death of Caracalla, though her good sense must have long taught her to expect it, awakened the feelings of a mother and an empress. She descended with a painful struggle into the condition of a subject, and soon withdrew herself, by a voluntary death, from an anxious and a humiliating dependence." She refused all food and died of starvation.

JULIA MAMMEA,

MOTHER of Alexander Severus, emperor of Rome, in 222, was possessed of equal genius and courage. She educated her son very carefully for the throne, rendering him a man of virtue and sensibility. Severus thought so highly of his mother that he consulted her in every thing, and followed her advice. Julia having heard of Origen, sent for him, and is supposed to have been converted by him to Christianity. She was murdered with her son, in Gaul, by the discontented soldiery, in 235.

JULIA MÆSA,

GRANDMOTHER of Heliogabalus, emperor of Rome, was a great politician, and a virtuous woman. She strove to counteract the bad counsels of the mother of the emperor, and bring him back to common sense and duty. She saw that the Romans would not long bear such a shameful yoke, and she induced the emperor, who always retained his respect for her, to nominate his cousin, Alexander Severus, his successor. Julia Mæsa attained a happy and respected old age, and was placed by Alexander Severus in the list of divinities.

JULIA SÆMIUS,

MOTHER of Heliogabalus, emperor of Rome, was a native of Apamea; her father was Julius Avitus, and her mother, Mæsa. Her sister, Julia Mammea, was the second wife of the emperor Septimus Severus. Julia Sæmius was made president of a senate of women, which she had elected, to decide the quarrels and affairs of the Roman matrons, an office of some difficulty, if not honour. She at last provoked the people by her debaucheries, extravagance, and cruelties, and was murdered with her son and family, in 222.

JULIA,

A VIRGIN and martyr of Carthage. At the sack of Carthage by Genseric, king of the Vandals, Julia was sold to a heathen merchant, and carried to Syria. Here she was discovered to be a Christian, by her refusal to take a part in some of the festivals instituted in honour of the female deities and was put to death, in 440.

JULIANNA,

WIFE of Eustace de Breteuil, was the natural daughter of Henry I. of England. Her husband having confided to her the defence of the castle de Breteuil, in 1119, she defended it bravely against her father, at the head of a large army. Her father had taken her two sons prisoners, and given them to their enemies, who had mutilated their faces. When Julianna found that she could hold out no longer, she sent to desire an interview with her father, who, suspecting no treachery, went to meet her, when she attempted to kill him. Henry avoided the blow, and forced her to surrender. She was obliged to leave the castle ignominiously, and went to rejoin her husband at Pacy-sur-Eure.

K.

KHAULA,

AN Arabian heroine, who, in the famous battle of the Yermouks, between the Greeks and the Arabs, in the seventh century, rallied the Arabs, when they were driven back by the furious onset of their assailants, and, with several other of the chief women, took the command of the army. In leading the van, Khaula was beaten to the ground by a Greek, when Wafeira, one of her female friends, rescued her, by striking off his head with one blow. This courageous conduct so animated the Arabs, that they routed the Greeks with great loss. Khaula afterwards married the caliph Ali.

L.

LABANA,

A MOORISH-SPANIARD, of a noble family at Corduba. She was a most accurate poetess, and also was skilled in philosophy and music. She died young, in 995.

LAURA,

THE beloved of Petrarch, is better known by that title, than by her own name of Laura de Noyes. She was born at Avignon, and married Hugo de Sade. Petrarch first saw her in 1327, and conceived a passion for her, which existed during her life; yet her chastity has never been called in question. Petrarch wrote three hundred and eighteen sonnets and eighty-eight songs, of which Laura was the subject. She died of the plague, in 1348, aged thirty-eight. She is said to have had a graceful figure, a sweet voice, a noble and distinguished appearance, and a countenance which inspired tenderness.

The poetry of Petrarch gave Laura a wide celebrity during her lifetime. It is recorded, that the king of Bohemia, arriving at Avignon, sought out this well-sung lady, and kissed her on the forehead, in token of homage. All this may appear very pleasant; romantic young ladies may even account Laura a very fortunate woman; but there is a dark side to the picture. The husband of Laura was not pleased with the notoriety which the devotion of Petrarch conferred on the object of his passion or his poetry. No wonder the jealousy of the husband, even an Italian husband, should have been awakened; and though no real infidelity of his wife was ever discovered, yet it was not possible he could enjoy the quiet happiness of domestic life, which is based on perfect confidence in the affections as well as principles of the married pair. The children of this ill-matched couple showed either that their training was neglected, or their natural gifts very mediocre; both consequences unfavourable to the character of their mother. Of Laura's nine sons, not one was ever distinguished for sense or spirit; and her only daughter conducted herself in such an irregular manner, that her friends were forced to shut her up in a convent. Such were the children of this "beloved of Petrarch." Surely, Laura's celebrity can be no object of envy to any good mother who has good children. And Petrarch—could he have been an honourable man, who, for twenty-two years, made love to another man's wife?

LEELA,

Of Granada, a Moorish-Spaniard, who was celebrated for her learning. She died in the early part of the thirteenth century.

LEVI,

JUSTIN DE, daughter of André Perotti, of Sasso Ferrato, a descendant of the illustrious house of Levi, was born at Cremona, in the fourteenth century, and was a successful writer of Italian poetry. She was a contemporary and correspondent of Petrarch. She addressed to him a sonnet, to which he replied by another. But, to avoid the appearance of rivalry with this celebrated poet, she determined to write only in French. She married Louis de Puytendre, a French gentleman, living on the borders of the Rhine, and was the ancestress of Clotilde de Surville.

LEIVA,

MARIA VIRGINIA DI. Horace remarks, in an often-quoted sally, that many heroes worthy of renown have existed, acted, and been forgotten, because there was no bard to cast his sacred light around their deeds. The interest awakened by the poet, is indeed universal and far-spreading. Who, for instance, does not feel more alive to the identity of Agamemnon—the very king noted by Homer—or of Andromache, or of Helen, than to the well-authenticated existence of many an actual prince or pretty woman, who, wanting the bard, is made known to us merely by chronological tablets? It is that sort of interest, inspired by being the subject of the pen of genius, that renders the Signora Di Leiva worthy a place in these sketches. Manzoni, in the best romance Italy has ever produced—we may say, one of the best romances to be found in any language—has given importance to the memory of an otherwise obscure gentlewoman. Those versed in Italian literature, need not be reminded of the interesting and strongly depicted account of the lady of Monza; but little is to be added to the episode of the “Promessi Sposi.”

It must be stated, that the circumstances detailed in that work did not really happen at Monza, but in some obscure bourg, whose name cannot now be ascertained; the real name of the lady was Maria Virginia di Leiva. Her father, Antonio di Leiva, from an unjust ambition to endow his son with an excessive wealth, immured this unfortunate daughter in a convent, where she was forced to take the veil, without the smallest vocation or sentiment of religion. To recompense her for this sacrifice, uncommon privileges were extended to her; she was accountable to nobody for her time or actions, and this led to her ruin. A young nobleman, of dissolute habits and abandoned life, found means to attract her attention from a neighbouring house—to gain her affections, and to seduce her. Thus far Manzoni:—but the work called the Monaca di Monza, by Rossini, which affects to give a detailed and continued life of this lady, is entirely incorrect and without real foundation. The true end of her history is, that the scandalous life she led, was brought by report to the ears of the Cardinal Borromeo, who quietly withdrew her from the scene of her errors, placed her in another monastery, under strict overseeing, and in fine, by tenderness and spiritual exhortations, awakened her torpid conscience, instructed her in religious truths, and brought about a sincere repentance. She became as eminent for the saintly piety of her latter days, as she had been offensive from her early licentiousness. Her seducer, after a series of fearful crimes—among which murder was to be reckoned—came to an untimely and violent death.

LIoba,

A RELATION of St. Boniface, the intrepid apostle of Northern Europe, was placed by him at the head of a convent which he had founded for women, in the midst of the barbarous tribes of Germany, not far from the monastery of Fulda. She was a very learned woman for that age, and was thoroughly acquainted with the writings of the Fathers, ecclesiastical law, and theology. The Bible was almost always in her hands, and even during her sleep she had it read to her. All her life, Lioba was considered a saint. She was the only woman who was ever allowed to enter the monastery of Fulda. When St. Boniface was massacred at Friesland, he requested to be buried near Lioba; “I wish,” said he, “to wait with her for the day of resurrection. Those who have laboured together for Christ, ought together to receive their reward.”

LOIS and EUNICE,

MOTHER and daughter, were Jewish women, and early believers in the Christian faith; they resided at Lystra, a city of Lycaonia. Eunice was the mother of Timothy, who was the first bishop of the Ephesians, and the favourite convert and friend of the apostle Paul. As the husband of Eunice was a Greek, the religious education of Timothy must have been entirely the work of his mother and grandmother. This is proved by what Paul says in his epistle to Timothy regarding the “unfeigned faith” of these two noble women. He judged the piety of this gifted young man by the measure of excellence they possessed; and if Timothy came up to this standard of the female soul, Paul was satisfied. Thus was the piety of woman held up as the pattern for the best of men, by the sternest and most masculine mind among the apostles. See Acts, chap. xvi., and 2 Timothy, chap. i.

LOSA,

ISABELLA, a native of Cordova, Spain, was so illustrious for her knowledge of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, that she was honoured with the degree of D. D. When she became a widow, she took the habit of St. Clair, went to Italy, and founded there the hospital of Loretto, where she ended her days, in acts of devotion and benevolence, March 5th, 1546, aged seventy-three.

LOUISA,

Of Savoy, countess of Angoulême, wife of Charles, duke of Orleans, and mother of Francis I., who succeeded to the throne of France in 1515. Immediately on his accession, he raised Angoulême into a duchy from motives of filial affection. Louisa had been eminently beautiful, and even then, time had diminished her charms but little, while the gifts of nature were carefully improved and embellished by cultivation. Gifted with strong talents, and a mind active, vigorous, penetrating, and decisive, she aimed at the acquisition of power, but, unhappily for the nation, her virtues were overbalanced by her vices; her passions were strong and impetuous, and to their gratification she sacrificed all a woman should hold dear; vain, avaricious, intriguing, jealous, and implacable, she thwarted the best concerted plans of her son, and occasioned the greatest distress to the nation.

Francis, on his Italian expedition, left his mother regent of the kingdom, and, after his return from it, when his duchy of Milan was threatened by the Pope, and Lautrec was appointed its governor, Louisa, partly from avarice, and partly from an inveterate dislike she had conceived for Lautrec, who had spoken too freely of some of her intrigues, seized and appropriated the three hundred thousand crowns which had been raised for the pay of the Milanese troops. Lautrec performed prodigies of valour, but the Swiss mercenaries, who formed the greater part of the army, enraged at not receiving their pay, left him, and Lautrec was obliged to return to France. The king was so enraged at the loss of the Milanese, that he at first refused to see him; but, having at length obtained an audience, he justified himself by imputing the disasters of the campaign to the want of the promised money. Francis flew into a violent passion with Semblancy, superintendant of the finances, insisting on knowing what had become of the money he had ordered to be sent to Italy; the minister, a man of virtue and integrity, who had grown grey in the service of his country, confessed he had been obliged to pay it to the duchess d'Angoulême, who had taken the consequences on herself; but that infamous woman had the presumption to deny the fact, though Semblancy produced her receipt for the amount. When Semblancy had thus justified himself in the eyes of Francis, and continued to enjoy his place, the vindictive Louisa soon suborned one of his clerks to accuse him of peculation; he was tried by partial judges, condemned, and executed.

Louisa's affections had long been fixed on the duke of Bourbon, but finding her love rejected by a prince sincerely attached to his wife, in revenge she prejudiced the king against him. The death of the duchess of Bourbon revived her former tenderness, and she offered her hand to the duke. This being rejected with contempt, she doomed Bourbon to destruction. A law-suit was commenced against him, to recover some possessions he held in right of his wife; and the judges, overawed by Louisa, pronounced a sentence by which his estate was sequestered. Bourbon, driven to desperation by this injustice, entered into a treaty with Henry VIII., of England, and Charles V., of Germany, against the king of France.

At first, Francis was successful in repelling the confederate princes, which encouraged him to attempt, in person, the recovery of the Milanese; in vain did his mother and his wisest ministers dissuade him from it; he departed, leaving the duchess regent of the kingdom. After the battle of Pavia, at which he had lost his army and his liberty, he addressed the following note to his mother, "Madame, all is lost except our honour." The captivity of the king, and the loss of a flourishing army, added to a discontent prevailing throughout the kingdom, seemed to threaten a general insurrection. In this trying emergency, the magnanimity of Louisa was eminently displayed, and the kingdom, which her passions had endangered, her abilities were exerted to save. She assembled, at Lyons, the princes of the blood, the governors of the provinces, and the notables of the realm, who generously resolved to ransom immediately the officers and soldiers taken at Pavia. The army and garrisons were recruited, and enabled to repel the Imperialists, while Louisa conciliated the favour of the king of England, whom she disengaged from the confederacy; and to her mediation Francis acknowledged himself indebted for his liberty, which he recovered in March, 1526. The terms of his liberation by the emperor were so exorbitant that he never intended to fulfil them, and the Pope absolved him from his oath.

Consequently, hostilities continued, till Margaret of Austria and the duchess of Angoulême met at Cambray, and settled the terms of pacification, whence the peace was called the "Ladies' Peace." Louisa died, 1571. In obedience to her counsels, Francis completed, after her death, her favourite project of annexing the duchy of Brittany to the crown.

LUCILLA,

A DAUGHTER of M. Aurelius, celebrated for her youthful virtues and her beauty; and also notorious, at a later period, for her debaucheries and misfortunes. At the age of sixteen, her father sent her to Syria, to marry the emperor Verus, who was then at war with the Parthians and Armenians. Lucilla loved her husband passionately, and, at first, conducted herself with great modesty and discretion; but, seeing Verus plunge into dissipations of every kind, while he neglected her, she yielded to the fashion of the times, and became very profligate. After the death of Verus, she married, by order of her father, an old but virtuous senator. She was accused of incest with her brother Commodus; and when he treated her with coldness, she, with many of the senators, conspired against him. The plot was discovered, and Lucilla was banished, in 185. Soon after, she was put to death by her brother, in the thirty eighth year of her age.

LUCY, ST.,

A VIRGIN martyr, born at Syracuse. She refused to marry a young man who addressed her, because she had determined to devote herself to religion, and, to prevent his importunities, she gave her whole fortune to the poor. Enraged at this, the young man accused her, before Paschasius the heathen judge, of professing Christianity, and Lucy was put to death by him, in 305.

M.

MALATESTI,

BATTISTA, of Urbino. This very erudite lady was the daughter of Guido di Montefeltro, lord of Urbino. She was a pupil of Leonardo Bruni. She understood Latin, and was so expert in philosophy that she was able to hold public theses

As a widow, she maintained a fair and wise government of her dominions, until having reached a very advanced age, she retired into the convent of St. Clara, where she finished her life in pious tranquillity. She died in 1460.

MARGARET OF ANJOU,

QUEEN-CONSORT of England, was daughter of Regnier, or René, titular king of Sicily, Naples, and Jerusalem, descended from the counts of Anjou, and brother of Charles V. of France. Brought up in the petty court of Anjou, her natural strength of mind was not enfeebled by indulgence, and she was considered the most accomplished princess of her time, when she was selected by cardinal Beaufort for the wife of Henry VI. of England. She was married in 1445, when only sixteen, to share with a weak prince a throne disturbed by rancorous and contending factions. She naturally threw herself into that party which had favoured her marriage, of which the earl of Suffolk was the chief; and when the destruction of Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, was effected by their machinations, she was generally suspected of being privy to his murder. The surrender of the province of Maine, in France, to the king of that country, who was Margaret's uncle, in consequence of a secret article in the marriage treaty, aggravated the odium under which Margaret and Suffolk laboured; and the sacrifice of that nobleman, which followed, is said to have cost her more tears than are usually shed on the loss of a political ally.

Her son was born in 1453, while the national discontents were rising to a crisis. She was soon after called upon to exert all the vigour of her character in resisting the Yorkists, who had defeated the royal army at St. Albans. Though Henry VI. was taken prisoner, she raised troops, and defended the royal cause with so much spirit, that she effected a favourable compromise, and restored her husband to the sovereignty. The war, however, was renewed, and at the battle of Northampton, the Lancastrians were totally routed, and Henry again taken prisoner. Margaret, with her son, fled to Durham, and thence to Scotland. Returning into the north of England, she interested the nobles there in her cause, and collected a powerful army. With this she met the duke of York at Wakefield, and totally defeated him. The duke was killed in this battle, and, by the order of Margaret, his head was struck off, and, crowned with a paper diadem, was placed on the gates of York. His youngest son, Rutland, was killed in cold blood by the furious Clifford; several prisoners of distinction were put to death, and an example given of the cruelties which marked the progress of this unnatural war.

In 1461, the queen defeated the earl of Warwick, partizan of Edward, son of the duke of York, at the second battle of St. Albans, in which she recovered the person of the king, now a passive agent in the hands of friends and foes. She displayed her fierce and cruel disposition, by ordering lord Bonville to be executed, to whose care Henry had been entrusted by the Yorkists, and to whom the powerless king had promised pardon. The approach of Edward with a superior force, obliged her again to retreat to the north, and that prince was elevated to the throne by the Londoners, and the lords of the Yorkists.

Margaret's influence, and the licentiousness in which her troops were indulged, increased the Lancastrian party to sixty thousand men. It was met at Towton, in Yorkshire, by Edward and Warwick, at the head of forty thousand men, and a battle was fought, March 1461, which was the bloodiest of these destructive wars. The Lancastrians were defeated, and Margaret and Henry, who had remained at York, hastily retreated to Scotland. After soliciting aid in vain from that country, she went over to France for the same purpose: and by offering to deliver Calais to the French, should Henry be restored to the crown, she obtained the succour of two thousand men, with which she landed in Scotland. Joined by some of her partizans, and a band of freebooters, she made an incursion into the north of England, and proceeded to Hexham. She was there met and defeated by a force under lord Montague.

The unfortunate queen fled with her son into a forest, where she was seized by a band of robbers, who took her jewels, and treated her with great indignity. While they were quarrelling about the booty, Margaret escaped, and fled wearied and terrified into the depths of the forest. Seeing a man coming towards her with a drawn sword, she summoned up all her courage, and going to meet him, "Here, friend," said she, "I commit to your protection the son of your king." Struck by the nobleness and dignity of her manner, and charmed with the confidence reposed in him, the man, though a robber, devoted himself to her service. He concealed the queen and her son for some time in the woods, and then led them to the coast, whence they escaped to Flanders.

Margaret went to her father's court, where she remained several years, while her husband was imprisoned in the Tower of London. In 1470, the rebellion of the earl of Warwick against Edward, and his subsequent arrival in France, produced an alliance between him and the exiled queen. It was agreed that Warwick should endeavour to restore the house of Lancaster, and that Edward, the son of Margaret and Henry, should marry his daughter Anne, which alliance took place in France. Warwick landed in England, and Edward was forced to escape to Flanders. Margaret was preparing to second his efforts; but on the very day on which she landed at Weymouth, the battle of Barnet, April 14th, 1471, terminated the life of Warwick, and the hopes of the confederacy. Margaret, with her son, took refuge in the sanctuary of Beaulieu, in Hampshire, intending to return to France; but being encouraged by the increase of her party, she advanced to Tewksbury, where she was met by Edward, who totally defeated her, and took her and her son prisoners, the latter of whom was cruelly put to death. Margaret was confined in the Tower, where her husband died about the same time. Louis XI. ransomed her, and she returned again to her father's protection.

The home to which the loving René welcomed his forlorn daughter, was a castle on the river Mayence; the scenery was beautiful, and the king had a gallery of paintings and sculpture, which he took delight in adorning with his own paintings; he had also ornamented the walls of his garden with heraldic designs carved in marble. It was in such pursuits that René, a true Provençal sovereign, found alleviations for his afflictions. But Margaret's temperament was of too stormy a nature to admit of the slightest alleviation of her griefs. She passed her whole time in bitter regrets, or unavailing sorrows. This intensity of suffering affected her constitution. The agonies and agitations she had undergone seemed to turn her blood into gall: her eyes were sunken and hollow, her skin was disfigured by a dry, scaly leprosy, until this princess, who had been a miracle of beauty, such as the world seldom beholds, became a spectacle of horror.

Her errors and her misfortunes were the result of the circumstances by which she was surrounded; her talents and virtues were of a lofty stamp; had she been married to a stronger-minded man, she would no doubt have been a better and a happier woman.

MARGARET,

COUNTRESS of the Tyrol and duchess of Carinthia. Her father Henry succeeded to the throne of Bohemia, at the death of Winzeslaus III., but was expelled from it by John of Luxemburg. Henry preserved the title of king and retired to the castle of the Tyrol, where, in 1318, was born the princess Margaret. This sole heiress of the Tyrol and of Carinthia soon became the aim of the houses of Austria, Bavaria, and Luxemburg. King John of Bohemia, with finesse superior to the others, ingratiated himself with the count of Tyrol, who agreed to betroth the countess Margaret, then seven years old, to his son John, yet an infant. The union did not take place till the year 1338, when Margaret had reached the age of twenty.

This princess, who was of a light and frivolous disposition, open to flattery, and easily swayed by the designing, had an invincible repugnance to her husband, who, to the petulance of a beardless boy, joined the haughtiness of a sovereign. The ambition of the house of Bavaria took advantage of these circumstances, and secret negotiations were opened with Margaret. Her marriage with John was cancelled, and the emperor proposed one of his sons as his successor. Some suspicions entering the mind of John, he proceeded to harsh measures with his wife, causing her to be guarded in a tower of the castle of the Tyrol. This was a very imprudent step; for it excited her subjects to such indignation, that the emissaries of Bavaria found it an easy matter to excite a revolt. John was himself driven from the country, and Margaret fell into the hands of the emperor.

Ludovic, margrave of Brandenburg, was selected to become the new spouse of Margaret. His handsome person, pleasing manners, and military reputation, easily reconciled her to the decree. But he manifested extreme repugnance to wed a princess who was without intrinsic merit, who was lawfully married to another, and who was related to him within the permitted degrees of consanguinity. His father silenced all these scruples; the dower of Margaret, in his eyes, neutralized every objection. He used his imperial power to annul her first marriage, and proceeded to unite her with Ludovic.

In the year 1361, Ludovic died suddenly, and many attributed his death to poison; some even hinted that Margaret was implicated; but there exist no proofs of such an atrocity. The death of their only son, Mainard, in the flower of his age, has also been by some ascribed to his mother's malice. But the most authentic historians are far from attributing to her such revolting wickedness. What can really be proved is her want of capacity, which was shown in the mistakes she made when, for a short time, the powers of government were concentrated in her hands. Rodolph, who, by many manoeuvres and intrigues, had captivated the favours of Margaret, had, in the life-time of Ludovic, obtained from her a settlement investing him with the inheritance of the Tyrol in case of her husband and son dying without heirs. He, taking advantage of her weakness, induced her to abdicate her sovereignty in his favour; painting the troubles that invest a throne, and the life of pleasure and ease she would lead in a court that was then the first in Europe. She had an appointed revenue of 6000 gold marks, and four princely residences. When all was concluded, she proceeded with the widow of Mainard to the court of Vienna, where she was received with most distinguished attention. She passed six years of tranquillity, if insignificant pleasures deserve that term, and died in 1369. She was buried in the convent of St. Croce, near Baden

MARGARET, ST.,

A VIRGIN, who is said to have suffered martyrdom at Antioch, in 275. She is not mentioned by the ancient martyrologists, and she did not become famous till the eleventh century. A festival is held in honour of her memory on the 20th of July. The Orientals reverence her under the name of St. Pelagia, or St. Marina, and the western church under that of St. Geruma, or St. Margaret.

MARGARET,

SISTER of Edgar Atheling, grandson of Edmund Ironsides, king of England, fled to Scotland on the invasion of William the Conqueror, and married Malcolm, king of that country. She was a very amiable and benevolent princess. Her sons, Edgar, Alexander, and David, successively filled the throne of Scotland; and her daughter Matilda married Henry I. of England. She died November 16th, 1093, aged forty-seven.

MARGARET,

DAUGHTER of Robert, duke of Burgundy, married Louis Hutin, king of France, in 1305. She was a beautiful but very licentious woman. Her lover was flayed alive, and she herself was strangled to death, in 1315.

MARGARET OF SCOTLAND,

THE first wife of Louis XI. of France, died in 1445, at the age of twenty-six, before her husband had ascended the throne. Margaret was devoted to literature, and, while she lived, patronised men of learning and genius. Her admiration for the poet Alain Chartier is said to have induced her to kiss his lips, as he sat asleep one day in a chair. Her attendants being astonished at this act of condescension, the princess replied that "she did not kiss the man, but the lips which had given utterance to so many exquisite thoughts." She excited in the gloomy and ferocious Louis XI. a taste for science and literature, which lasted long after her death. She left no children. Her death is said to have been caused by the calumnies circulated against her; of which, however, she was proved innocent.

MARGARET,

DAUGHTER of Raymond Berenger, count of Provence, married St. Louis, king of France, in 1254, and attended him during his wars in the Holy Land with the Saracens; when, on his captivity, she behaved with heroic intrepidity in the defence of Damiatta. She died at Paris in 1285, aged seventy-six.

MARGARET,

THE Semiramis of the North, third daughter of Waldemar, king of Denmark, was born in 1353. At the age of six she was contracted to Haguin, king of Norway; but the Swedes, of whom his father Magnus was king, insisted on his renouncing the alliance; and to oblige them, he consented to demand Elizabeth of Holstein in marriage, whom he espoused by proxy. But, on her voyage to Norway, a storm drove her off the coast of Denmark, where she was detained by Waldemar until his daughter was married to Haguin in 1366.

Waldemar died in 1375, leaving only two daughters, of whom Margaret was the younger. Olaus, the son of Margaret, was at that time king of Norway; and as the grandson of Magnus, who had however been deposed, he had some claims on the crown of Sweden. The eldest daughter, Ingeburga, wife of Henry, duke of Mecklenburg, had also a son, but the right of succession was then confused and uncertain, and Margaret contrived that the election should be decided in favour of her son, then eleven years old, who was placed on the throne, under her guidance as regent. Haguin died soon after; and Olaus died in 1387, at the age of twenty-two; with him the male line was extinct, and custom had not yet authorized the election of a woman. Henry of Mecklenburg omitted nothing that could advance his pretensions; but Margaret's genius, and well-placed liberality, won over the bishops and clergy, which was in effect gaining the greater part of the people, and she was unanimously elected queen of Denmark.

But her ambition grasped at the crown of Norway also; she sent deputies to solicit the states, gained over the chief people by money, and found means to render herself mistress of the army and garrisons; so that, had the nation been otherwise disposed, she would in the end have succeeded; but they readily yielded to her wishes. The Norwegians, perceiving that the succession was in danger of being extinct, entreated her to secure it by an advantageous marriage; but she received the proposal coldly. To satisfy, however, their desire, she consented to appoint a successor; but fixed on one so young that she would have full time to satisfy her ambition before he could be of age to take any share in the government; yet he was the true heir, and grandson of her sister.

She recommended herself so strongly to the Swedes, who were oppressed by their king Albert, who had gone to war with her, that they renounced their allegiance to that prince, and made her a solemn offer of their crown, thinking that her good sense would set bounds to her ambition, and prevent any encroachment on their rights. She accepted the offer, marched to their assistance, defeated Albert, who was deposed, in 1388, after a war of seven years. She then imprisoned him another seven years, till he made a solemn renunciation of his crown, and retired to the dominions of his brother, the duke of Mecklenburg. Margaret then assumed the reins of government in Sweden, and was distinguished by the appellation of the Semiramis of the North.

In 1395, she associated with her in the three elective kingdoms, her great-nephew Eric, duke of Pomerania. She governed with absolute authority; and when reminded of her oaths by the nobility, who added, "they had the records of them," she replied, "I advise you to keep them carefully; as I shall keep the castles and cities of my kingdom, and all the rights belonging to my dignity."

At the treaty of Calmar, concluded in 1397, she endeavoured to make the union of the three kingdoms perpetual, and introduced Eric separately to all the deputies. She represented to them, with eloquence and address, the advantages that would accrue from the consolidation of the three nations into one kingdom; that it would put an end to the frequent wars which desolated them, and render them entirely masters of the commerce of the Baltic; keep in awe the Hanse-towns, grown powerful by the divisions of her people; and acquire for them all the advantages resulting from a perfect conformity of laws, customs, and interests. The majesty of her person, the strength of her arguments and her eloquence, gained over the deputies. They approved and established a fundamental law, which was received by the three nations, and solemnly confirmed by oath. This was the celebrated law called the union of Calmar, which only served to show how impotent are human wishes, though conceived with wisdom and forwarded by address.

Margaret is charged with only one political error, that of suffering Olaus to grant the important duchy of Keswick to the house of Holstein, whose enmity they thus wished to do away, but which proved a thorn in her side till the death of the duke; when she, by her vigorous measures, forced his successors to hold their possessions as a fief from Denmark.

Distinguished at the same time for moderation, solid judgment, enterprising and persevering ambition, Margaret receives different characters from Danish and Swedish historians. The latter were prejudiced against her, because she abridged the power of the nobles and favoured the clergy; but she was exceeded by none in prudence, policy, and true magnanimity. She died suddenly, in 1412, at the age of fifty-nine.

Though merciful, she made the wisest regulations for strict justice, and to prevent offenders being screened from punishment. Private oppressions and abuses she did away, and decreed that assistance should be given to all who were shipwrecked on her coasts; for which acts of humanity she provided rewards by law. She exerted all her power to repress piracies; and by her regulations laid the foundations for future commerce. It was in her reign that we first meet with the mention of the copper mines of Sweden. In fact, she equalled the most famous politicians. Her father, perceiving while she was yet a child her surprising elevation of soul and mental resources, said that nature had been deceived in forming her, and instead of a woman had made a hero.

MARGARET OF VALOIS,

QUEEN of Navarre, and sister to Francis I. of France, was born at Angoulême, in 1492; being the daughter of Charles of Orleans, duke of Angoulême, and Louisa of Savoy. In 1509, she married Charles, the last duke of Alençon, who died at Lyons, after the battle of Pavia, in 1525. The widow went to Madrid, to attend her brother, who had been taken prisoner in that battle by the Spaniards, and was then ill. She was of the greatest service to her brother, obliging Charles and his ministers, by her firmness, to treat him as his rank required. His love equalled her merits, and he warmly promoted her marriage with Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre. The offspring of this union was Joan d'Albret, mother of Henry IV.

Margaret filled the part of a queen with exemplary goodness, encouraging arts, learning, and agriculture, and everything that could contribute to the prosperity of the kingdom. She died in 1549, of a cold, caught while making observations on a comet. During her life, she inclined to the Protestant faith, but the Roman Catholics say that she was reconverted before she died.

She wrote well in prose and verse, and was called the Tenth Muse; and the Margaret, or pearl, surpassing all the pearls of the East. Some of her works are, "Heptameron, or Novels of the Queen of Navarre;" "Les Marguerites de la Marguerite des Princesses," a collection of her productions, formed by John de la Haye, her valet-de-chambre. A long poem was entitled, "The Triumph of the Lamb;" and another, "The Complaints of a Prisoner."

MARGARET OF YORK,

SISTER of Edward IV. of England, married Charles the Rash, duke of Burgundy. She rendered herself notorious by the opposition she made to the accession of Henry VII. to the throne of England, in 1485; and the impostures she supposed to disturb his reign.

MARGARET,

DAUGHTER of Maximilian I., emperor of Germany, was betrothed to the dauphin of France, afterwards Charles VIII., but did not marry him. She married the infanta of Spain in 1497, who died the same year. In 1501, she married Philibert, duke of Savoy, who died in 1504. She was governess of the Netherlands, and displayed her religious zeal against the Lutherans. She died, December, 1530, aged fifty.

MARGARETTA OF SAXONY

Was born in the year 1416, and was the daughter of Ernst, Archduke of Austria, and Cimburgia, his wife. In 1431, she married Frederick the Mild, of Saxony, and brought to her husband a dower of 29,000 ducats, which was then considered so great a sum, that the chroniclers mention it as something very extraordinary. She was the mother of eight children, two of whom, Ernst and Albert, are particularly mentioned, on account of an incident which nearly cost them their lives. Margaretta had proved herself so wise a counsellor in state affairs, that her husband not only accorded her the right (which she also exercised) of coining legal money, but also, to assist in governing the state. She contributed much, by her wise counsels, to put an end to the bloody wars between the brothers. After these wars were over, she drew upon herself and her husband the hatred of Kuntz von Kaufunger, a brave but wicked knight, who, thinking himself aggrieved, resolved to avenge himself upon his patrons. During the temporary absence of Frederick, Kuntz penetrated, with two companions, into the castle, and kidnapped the two princes. As soon as Margaretta discovered that her enemy had carried off her children, she ordered the alarm-bells to be rung throughout the country, and sent out armed men in pursuit of the robbers. They were discovered in a wood near Grunhair, and captured by a collier; who, when he was requested to name his reward, asked only permission to have the privilege to make as much charcoal, free of expense, as he and his family could attend to. When, in the year 1467, her husband died, she assumed the reins of government, and proved herself truly a mother to her subjects. She was the first sovereign who provided public rooms where the poor could have an opportunity to warm themselves, during the severe winter months. Margaretta died, February 12th, 1486, in her seventieth year, after she had lived a widow for more than twenty-two years.

MARTIA,

SURNAMED Proba, or the Just, was, according to Hollinshed, "the widow of Gutiline, king of the Britons, and was left protectress of the realm during the minority of her son. Perceiving much in the conduct of her subjects which needed reformation, she devised sundry wholesome laws, which the Britons, after her death, named the Martian statutes. Alfred caused the laws of this excellently-learned princess, whom all commended for her knowledge of the Greek tongue, to be established in the realm." These laws, embracing trial by jury and the just descent of property, were afterwards collated and further improved by Edward the Confessor. Thus there are good reasons for believing that the remarkable code of laws, called the common law of England, usually attributed to Alfred, were by him derived from the laws first established by a British queen, a woman.

MARY,

THE mother of our Lord and Saviour, was the daughter of Eli, or Joachim, of the house of David. She dwelt in the city of Nazareth; and her personal history commences with the salutation of the angel, "Hail, highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women."

It was the angel Gabriel that thus addressed her. What appearance this ministering spirit wore, we are not told; but it seems that she felt it was an angel, and was "troubled," as she could not comprehend the purport of the salutation. Then Gabriel went on to unfold the purpose of God towards her; that she was to be the blessed mother of the holy Messiah, the "Jesus;" called the Son of the Highest."

To be the mother of "Shiloh" had been, probably, the hope and prayer of many a pious mother in Israel, from the time of Jacob's prediction. But, though Isaiah had prophesied that "a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us," still it is not probable this was understood literally, or that any Jewish virgin had even hoped to be thus miraculously endowed with the privilege of motherhood.

Mary of Nazareth was a young and humble maiden, betrothed to a poor man, a carpenter named Joseph. Could she, in her lowly estate, ever have dreamed of the glory awaiting her? She could not. She had, in all truth and humility, only been solicitous to perform, from her heart, every duty before her, in the fear and love of God; thus it was that she "found favour with God."

When the angel had assured her she should be the blessed mother of the promised Messiah, and had answered her simple, child-like question, "How shall this be?" she instantly believed, and accepted the high mission.

Zacharias did not believe the announcement made to him by Gabriel of the birth of John. The priest was righteous—as man is righteous—but the difference between the masculine and the feminine nature is most strikingly illustrated in these two examples; Zacharias was earthward in his doubts, his reason; Mary was heavenward in her faith, her feelings. He believed not the angel, and was struck dumb; she believed, and "the Holy Ghost overshadowed" her!

Great, indeed, must have been her faith, when it wholly overcame all fear of man, all selfish considerations. She was betrothed, and therefore not only her reputation, but her life, would be placed in jeopardy if she were proven to have been unfaithful to her plighted husband. When assured that she should "bear a Son," who would not be Joseph's son, it would seem natural that some fears for her own safety might have clouded her faith. But no; her humble, trusting answer was, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word." Worthy was Mary to be the mother of our Saviour;—that the human nature, He who was very God took on himself, should be derived from her, the obedient woman! Thus is the high and holy mission of her sex indicated;—to receive the promises of God in humble faith, and transmute these, as it were, like living principles, into the souls of their sons.

The next event in Mary's life was her visit to her cousin Elisabeth, who lived in the "Hill country." Elisabeth was old, but the angel had promised her a son, and had also told Mary of this event. The meeting between these two holy and happy women is one of the most beautiful and sublime exhibitions of piety and inspiration to be found in the world's history. Elisabeth, "filled with the Holy Ghost," poured out the blessing of heaven on the believing virgin mother, and predicted the fulfilment of every promise. Then Mary breathed forth that sweetest strain of triumphant faith, love, and thanksgiving, ever recorded as the production of a human mind.—And Mary said,

"My soul doth magnify the Lord.
My Spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour.
He hath regarded the low estate of his handmaid;
Behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed.
For he that is mighty hath done me great things;
And holy is his name.
His mercy is on them that fear him from generation to generation.
He hath showed strength with his arm;
He hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts.
He hath put down the mighty from their seats,
And exalted them of low degree.
He hath filled the hungry with good things;
And the rich he hath sent empty away.
He hath holpen his servant Israel,
In remembrance of his mercy.
As he spake to our fathers,
To Abraham and his seed forever."

Though the mental endowments of woman will never atone for the lack of moral excellence, yet we are glad to find, as we do from these records of holy writ, that the mother of our Saviour possessed the highest order of genius, that which can comprehend the beautiful in the true and the good, and give fitting expression to these sublime ideas and holy feelings. She was then prepared by her natural gifts, to imbue the opening mind of her divine son with those lofty aspirations, those tender sympathies, which, as a man, he always exhibited. His human soul, derived from a woman, trained by a woman, was most truly womanly in its characteristics. Examine the doctrines he taught, the duties and virtues he enforced, the examples he set—where, in any of these, are the distinctive traits men vaunt as proofs of masculine greatness? Physical strength, earthly honours, riches, worldly wisdom, even the gifts of intellect and the pride of learning, our Saviour put all these down far, far beneath meekness, mercy, purity, patience, charity, humility; qualities and graces always considered peculiarly feminine; qualities and graces his blessed mother had displayed and commended.

From the birth of her first-born son, Mary seems to have been absorbed in his destiny. We only see her when ministering to him. That his nature and office were revealed to her, the Bible records; and that she was his first disciple is also indicated, as she first applies the term "my Saviour" to God. She kept all these divine revelations, "all these sayings in her heart." A woman's heart was the only human heart which then held the secret that the Saviour had come.

And it was at the suggestion of a woman, of Mary, that the first miracle of the Saviour was performed. There seems to be a strange misapprehension in many minds respecting the circumstances attending this miracle—the changing of the water into wine—as if our Saviour spoke chidingly, or disrespectfully, to his mother. The word "Woman" is in reality a nobler and more beautiful appellation than Lady or Madam, or any other conventionalism or title. It is the Eden name of the female, and when our Saviour used it, was most honourable. It appears from the sacred narrative, that Mary, discovering there was no wine, and feeling assured in her own soul that the time was come for her divine Son to begin his mission of love, intimated this to him.

His reply—"Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come;" seems to have been in answer to her intuitive faith, he fearing she had anticipated the time of his "beginning." But the sequel shows she was right. And her perseverance was rewarded, when, having ordered the servants to do "whatsoever he saith unto you;"—and they had filled the water-pots with water—it "was made wine." What a triumph this to the power of maternal influence! to the gift of insight or harmony with heavenly things which the mind of a true, and pure, and pious woman possesses! Even the Son of God, when he came in the form of man to redeem the world, was to be subject to this influence; and only at his mother's persuasion begin his miracles!

That, during the three eventful years which followed, Mary watched the ministry of her divine son, rejoicing in his wonderful deeds of love and mercy, and weeping with him in his sorrows, there can be no doubt. And she was beside him in his last agony. We see in this the immense power of her love; though he was condemned to die the bitter death of a felon; forsaken of all his followers save a few women; of all his chosen disciples save one—the faithful, gentle, loving, womanlike John; and though the dreadful scene would be "a sword to pierce through her own soul"—yet Mary the mother was near the cross of the Christ. And the last throb of human affection the Son of God manifested was for his mother. With his dying breath, he consigned her to the care of the beloved John.

We have one last glimpse of this "highly favoured among women," as a meek and earnest follower of the faith the risen Saviour had established. In the "Acts of the Apostles" it is recorded that in an upper room at Jerusalem, where the eleven apostles "abode"—"these all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus."

Her history commences with the heavenly salutation, and ends, appropriately, with prayer. Her youth was distinguished by the favour of God; her maturity by active piety and faithful discipleship; her age by fervent devotion and hallowed communion with the first church. Her birth-place, death, and burial, are not recorded; but the life is highest in honour whose records are of holy acts and heroic fidelity. What she said prophetically of herself has proved true—"All generations shall call me blessed." Can the like be said of any man? See St. Luke, chap. i., and St. John, chap. ii. and xix.

MARY,

THE wife of Cleophas, was mother of James, Jude, Josés, Simeon, and Salome. Cleophas and Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary, were probably brothers, which made these Marys sisters. Her children are therefore represented as the brothers of our Lord. She early believed on the Saviour, attended to his preaching, and ministered to his support. She witnessed his crucifixion, and prepared spices to embalm his body; and went, with Mary Magdalene and Salome, "early to the sepulchre." It was this Mary who, with Salome, saw the vision of the angel, and heard from him those cheering words, "Be not afraid; ye seek Jesus of Nazareth; he is risen," &c.

MARY,

MOTHER of Mark, the Evangelist. She had a house in Jerusalem, where it is thought that the apostles retired, after the ascension of our Lord, and where they received the Holy Ghost. After the imprisonment of Peter, the faithful assembled at this house, and were praying there, when Peter, delivered by the angel, knocked at the door.

MARY AND MARTHA,

SISTERS of Lazarus, whom Jesus raised from the dead, lived with their brother at Bethany, a village near Jerusalem. Jesus had a particular affection for this family, and often resorted to their house. One day Martha, preparing an entertainment for him, while Mary sat at his feet, listening to his words, wished her sister's assistance, and said to Jesus, "Do you not see, Lord, that my sister leaves me to minister alone? Bid her come to help me." But Jesus said, that "Mary had chosen the better part, that should not be taken from her."

Six days before the passover, Jesus came to Bethany, and was at meat in the house of Simon. Martha attended, and Lazarus was one of the guests. Mary took a pound of spikenard, the most precious perfume of the kind, and poured it over the head and feet of Jesus.

The sisters were of one mind in the reverence and love they bore him; yet the characters of the two are in striking contrast—Martha was active,

Mary contemplative. Martha seems to have been a creature of impulse; Mary was slower of apprehension, and, of course, less sudden in her resolves and movements. Martha had the most fervent faith; Mary the most humble piety. "Jesus loved Martha and her sister, and Lazarus." What a beautiful illustration is here! showing that the sweet, pure affections of domestic life are sanctified by the best blessings of heaven. See St. John, chap. xi.

MARY MAGDALENE

SEEMS to have been an inhabitant of Magdala, otherwise called Dalmanutha. The city is supposed to have been situated somewhere on the eastern coast of the sea of Galilee. Wherever it was, it probably gave the surname of Magdalene to this Mary. It has been asserted by some writers, that she was a plaister of hair to the women of her city; but all we certainly know of her, is contained in the New Testament. We are there taught, she had been a great sinner, that she repented, came to the feet of Jesus, while he "sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, and began to wash his feet with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with precious ointment." Her penitence and humility are graphically portrayed; and she has ever since that time been as a star of hope to the fallen sisterhood, proving, that from the lowest depths of degradation the true penitent may be raised, if she will, like Mary Magdalene, turn from her sins, and love the Lord Jesus Christ. From the moment when Mary Magdalene heard those sweet words from the Saviour, "Thy sins are forgiven," she seems to have devoted herself to his followers; and at the cross, and at the sepulchre, she proved that her faith was as firm and devoted, as her love was true and holy. According to the apostle St. John, Mary Magdalene was the first person who reached the sepulchre on the eventful morning, "when it was yet dark;" she first discovered that the stone was taken away from the sepulchre; and to her, the risen Saviour first made himself manifest. This female disciple was honoured above even the beloved John; for he and all the other disciples were taught by her that Jesus had risen from the tomb.

MARY OF FRANCE

Is one of the first of her sex who wrote French verses, and she holds a distinguished rank among the Anglo-Norman poets. Her learning, her enlightened opinions, and the courage she showed in speaking the truth to ears little accustomed to hear it, place her far in advance of her age. It is to be regretted that the writings of this celebrated woman have thrown no light on her private life, or the name and rank of her family. She was born in France, and probably in Normandy, in 1200. She went to England, where she composed all her works, and died about 1268. Her first productions are lays in French, relating the adventures of valiant knights. There are fourteen of them; she also wrote a hundred and three fables, which show a great penetration into cha racter, deep reflection, and are written in an easy and unaffected style.

MARY OF BRABANT,

DAUGHTER of Henry III., duke of Brabant, married Philip the Bold of France, in 1274. She was accused of poisoning her husband's eldest son, by a former marriage; but was deemed innocent because of the knight, who was sent by her brother to challenge her accusers, proving victorious. She was a woman of a cultivated mind, and possessed great influence. She died in 1321.

MARY OF ANJOU,

DAUGHTER of Louis II., king of Sicily and duke of Anjou, was the wife of Charles VII., and the mother of Louis XI. of France. She was a woman of a very heroic character; and though insulted and neglected by her husband, during the latter part of their married life, she applied all the powers of her great mind to secure the crown to him. She died in 1463, aged fifty-nine. She was a devoted mother, and superintended herself her children's education.

MARY,

DAUGHTER of Henry VII. of England, and wife of Louis XII. of France. He died soon afterwards, and she married Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, by whom she had a daughter, the mother of Lady Jane Grey. She died in 1534, aged thirty-seven.

MARY,

DAUGHTER of Charles, duke of Burgundy, married Maximilian, son of Frederick, emperor of Austria, and thus transferred the dominions of Burgundy to the house of Austria. She died at Bruges, 1482, in consequence of a fall from her horse, while she was hunting.

MARY OF ARRAGON,

DAUGHTER of Sancho III., and wife of Otho of Germany, is said to have been put to death, in 998, for causing the death of the count of Modena, whom she falsely accused of attempts on her virtue.

MATILDA,

OF Scotland, daughter of Malcolm Canmore, king of Scotland, and Margaret Atheling, a descendant of the Anglo-Saxon line of England's kings, was a beautiful and accomplished lady. She married Henry I. of England, and proved a wise and excellent queen. She was charitable to the poor, and always watchful to do what was most useful for her people. She caused bridges to be built, and roads to be made and repaired, while she acted as regent during her husband's absence in Normandy. As king Henry was obliged to pass most of his time in Normandy, then belonging to the English crown, in order to suppress the continual revolts of his Norman subjects, the good Matilda was left to govern England in her own way. She was always popular; and at her decease, in 1118, she was "passionately lamented by every class of the people, to whom her virtues and wisdom had rendered her inexpressibly dear." She was mother of the empress Matilda.

MATILDA, or MAUD,

EMPRESS of Germany, and queen of England, daughter of Henry I., king of England, and Matilda of Scotland, was born in 1102. At eight years of age, she was betrothed to Henry V., emperor of Germany, and was sent to that country for education. The emperor dying without issue, in 1125, Matilda returned to her father's court, who, having lost his only son, caused all his nobles, prelates, &c., to swear fealty to her as his successor, in case he died without male issue; and in 1127, he married her to Geoffrey Plantagenet, eldest son of Fulke, count of Anjou.

Matilda went to reside in Normandy, where, in 1132, her son, afterwards Henry II., was born. By the death of her father, in 1135, she became heiress of all his dominions in England and France. She was then at Anjou with her husband, of which circumstance her cousin Stephen, earl of Blois, took advantage, and seized on the crown of England. The barons of Normandy also submitted to Stephen; but his administration soon becoming unpopular, Matilda, in 1139, landed in England, and a number of powerful barons declared in her favour. A civil war ensued, and in 1141, Stephen was taken prisoner, and Matilda crowned queen in the cathedral of Winchester.

But no sooner was she seated on the throne, than her haughty and impolitic conduct irritated the nobles and estranged her friends. She refused to listen to their requests, or to the petition of the Londoners for the restoration of the laws of Edward the Confessor. Conspiracies were formed against her, and she was obliged, in 1148, to flee to Normandy, where she resided till her death, in 1167. The art of government consists mainly in an accurate knowledge of the human heart; by which princes acquire the art of conciliating the affections of those around them, and by graceful condescensions, win the regard of the lower orders, of whom the great body of the nation, emphatically called "the people," is composed. The German education of the empress Matilda, as well as her pride, prevented her from duly estimating the importance of these things; and thus she failed in obtaining the crown of England, which was hers in the order of regular succession.

MATILDA,

COUNTESS of Tuscany, daughter of Boniface, marquis of Mantua, was born in 1039. Her mother Beatrice, sister of Henry III., emperor of Germany, after the death of Boniface, married Galezo, duke of Lorraine, and contracted Matilda to Godfrey Gibbosus, or Crookback, duke of Spoleto and Tuscany, Galezo's son by a former marriage. This alliance alarmed Henry, who marched into Italy, took his sister prisoner, and carried her to Germany, hoping to dissolve the agreement; but he died soon after, in 1056. Matilda's husband also died, in 1076, and she was afterwards married to Azo V., marquis of Ferrara, from whom she was divorced by the pope, as she was also from her third husband, Welfo V., duke of Bavaria, whom she married in 1088. She parted from him in 1095. Dispossessed of her estates by the emperor Henry III., she recovered them, with vast additions, by the aid of the pope, Gregory VII.; who was always a friend of hers, and to whose interests Matilda through life devoted herself. She died in 1115, leaving all her estates to the see of Rome.

Matilda, in her wars with the emperor, manifested an indomitable firmness, that no reverses could shake. It would be tedious to trace the various brawls—they hardly deserve the dignified name of wars—which vexed the little sovereignties of that period. Matilda was so situated as to be shaken by every swell of the storm, but she emerged with honour from all her conflicts. With rare heroism she made and sustained sieges, manœuvred troops, and, after many disasters, proved victorious, enlarged her dominions, and exalted her fame. Dante, so severe upon every flaw, gives this lady unqualified praise in his “Purgatorio,” where she is celebrated in beautiful verse.

MATILDA,

DAUGHTER of Baldwin de Lille, count of Flanders, married her cousin, William of Normandy, afterwards king of England. The pope granted them absolution on their marriage, on condition of their erecting two chapels, which they did. She is distinguished for working the tapestry in wool, portraying the descent upon England, which is still preserved in the cathedral at Bayeux. She was a woman of great kindness and generosity; and her death, in 1083, was a source of unfeigned sorrow to her husband, and deep regret of the people both of England and Normandy.

MATTUGLIANI MEA.

AMONG the women who gave lustre to the literature of Bologna during the fifteenth century, was Bartolomea, whom her contemporaries universally called Mea. She is supposed to have been the wife of Michele Mattugliani, or Mattugani, a man honoured and respected by his fellow-citizens, both for his own merit, and for the elevated situation to which his birth entitled him. She is represented as beautiful, accomplished, and learned. A modern Bolognese writer has indulged his imagination with the probabilities of a romantic attachment between her and the young Carlo Cavalcabo; but this is mere fantasy: we have nothing to authenticate, or even afford the slightest base for such a legend. On the contrary, Mea appears to have been a prudent, virtuous wife.

Carlo Cavalcabo, elevated to the lordship of Bologna in 1405, took pleasure in a select society of intellectual persons. He addressed to the Bolognese poetess a poetical epistle which breathes nothing but the most respectful friendship. She replied to it by an answer in terza rima, which is the only one of her works now extant. The poetry is graceful, sweet, and of an elevated moral tone. She enumerates the titles and honours of Cavalcabo, gives him just praise without adulation. In a dignified manner she thanks him for attributing so much merit to her, while she modestly disclaims his praises; she says they will be to her an incentive to improvement. Then follows a learned account of those women who have honoured their sex by virtue, with deprecations for those who have sought other than honest fame. She concludes by exhorting the lord of Cremona to meritorious enterprises.

MESSALINA VALERIA,

DAUGHTER of Messala Barbatius, was married to Claudius, emperor of Rome, before he came to the empire. She had great influence over her husband, and was as notorious for her cruelties as for her licentiousness. By the instigation of Messalina and her minions, Claudius was led to commit many of those excesses that disgraced his reign. At length, when Claudius was at Ostia, Messalina, in utter contempt of all appearance of propriety, married publicly her lover Lilius, a young nobleman of great beauty. When Claudius heard of the dishonour inflicted on him, he exclaimed, with terror, “Am I still emperor?” His fears were dispelled, and Lilius, with a number of Messalina’s other accomplices, were put to death. She was preparing to go to Claudius, to appease his anger, in which she would probably have succeeded, when Narcissus, the freedman of the emperor, gave orders to kill her, in the year 46. Her name has become almost a common appellation for women of abandoned characters.

MESSALINA,

WIFE of Nero, also called Statilia, was descended from a consular family, and married the consul Atticus Visticus, whom Nero murdered. She received her husband's murderer with tenderness, and married four husbands before she came to the imperial throne. After the death of Nero, in 68, she retired from public life, and occupied herself with literary pursuits. Otho, the eighth emperor of Rome, next addressed her, but before their marriage he destroyed himself, in the year 69.

MONICA,

MOTHER of Augustine, bishop of Hippo, was born of Christian parents, in Numidia. She was not so much indebted to her mother's care, as to that of an old servant of the house, who had nursed her father. This pious servant never suffered the children to drink even water, except at meals, telling them, that if they ever became mistresses, the custom of drinking would remain; and they would indulge it with wine, not water. Yet Monica learned by degrees to drink wine, having been sent to draw it for the use of the family; but having been called a drunkard by one of the maids when in a passion, she, struck with shame that such a reproach should be addressed to her, gave up the practice forever.

She was married to Patricius, a pagan, a native of Tagasta, in Numidia, and endeavoured, by her gentleness, to win him over to her faith, patiently enduring his passionate temper, in the hope that his natural goodness and benevolence would one day make him a restraint to himself. Many of her friends complained to her of the harsh treatment they received from their husbands, when she advised them to follow her plan; which some did, and afterwards thanked her for her counsel. She also completely gained the heart of her unkind and prejudiced mother-in-law. She was never known to repeat any thing that might cause a quarrel, but only what would heal and reconcile.

Though so obedient to her husband, Monica prevailed on him to allow their son Augustine, born in the year 357, to be brought up a Christian; but though he made great progress in learning, he was, in early life, very dissipated. Patricius, who only wished him to be learned and eloquent, was satisfied; but Monica grieved over his errors, and prayed constantly for him, and patiently remonstrated with him for more than nine years. Her husband died a Christian, leaving her only this one son as an object of solicitude.

Augustine had been led away by the doctrine of the Manichees, and still continuing his dissolute life, she entreated a bishop to reason him out of his errors.

"Your son," said he, "is too much elated at present, and carried away by the pleasing novelty of his error, to regard any arguments. Let him alone; only continue praying to the Lord for him; he will, in the course of his studies, discover his error."

But Monica, with floods of tears, persisted in her request. At last, a little out of temper, on account of her importunity, he exclaimed, "Begone, good woman; it is impossible a child of such tears should perish." And the result proved that the bishop was correct, though not till after the anxious mother had waited in mingled anxiety and hope for many years.

She had followed her son to Rome, on hearing of his illness, and remained there with him afterwards. They were conversing one evening on holy subjects: the world appeared of no value to either. Monica said, "Son, what I should do here, and why I am here, I know not; the hope of this life is now quite spent. One thing only, your conversion, was an object for which I wished to live. My God has given me this in a large measure. What do I here?" Five days after this she was seized with a fever. Some one lamented that she was about to die in a foreign land—she had formerly been troubled about it. "Nothing," said she, "is far from God; and I do not fear that he will not know where to find me at the resurrection." She died on the ninth day of her illness, in the fifty-sixth year of her age.

N.

NOGAROLA ISOTTA,

A LEARNED lady of Verona. She was well acquainted with philosophy, theology, and the learned languages; and her reputation was so great, that cardinal Bessarion went to Verona to converse with her. In a dialogue on the question whether Adam or Eve were the greater sinner in eating the forbidden fruit, she ably defended the cause of the mother of mankind against Louis Fosearo. She died, universally respected, in 1468, aged thirty-eight. Five hundred and sixty-six of her letters were preserved in De Thou's library. She was the daughter of Leonardo and of Bianca Borromeo. She passed her life in the bosom of her family, loved by all her friends, and honoured and esteemed by the most illustrious literati of her day. She has done much to render her name celebrated, but would probably have accomplished still more, had not a premature death removed her from earthly glories. Her works are—"A Dialogue on Original Sin;" "An Elegy on a Beautiful Villa;" "Epistles Preserved in the Ambrosian Library;" "Oration to the Bishop Ermolao, written in Latin;" "An Eulogy on Girolano, Doctor of Divinity;" and a "Latin Epistle to Ludovico Foscarni."

NOGAROLA,

ARCO d'ANGELA, of Verona, was very learned in the Holy Scriptures, and made metrical translations of some of the poetical books. She was a remarkably beautiful and virtuous woman. She lived contemporary with the celebrated Isotta. She has left some epistles, elegantly written.

NOVELLA,

DAUGHTER of John Andreas, a famous canonist of the fourteenth century, was born in Bologna, where her father was professor. He loved his daughter Novella extremely, and instructed her so well in all parts of learning, that when he was engaged in any affair that hindered him from reading lectures to his scholars, he sent his daughter in his stead; but lest her beauty should prevent the attention of her hearers, she had a little curtain drawn before her.

She was married to John Caldesimus, a learned canonist, and did not long survive her marriage. To perpetuate her memory, her father, Andreas, entitled his commentary on the Decretals of Gregory X. "the Novellæ."

OLGA,

WIFE of Igor, the second monarch of Russia, was born of the best family in Plescow. She bore Igor one son, called Swetoslaw. Igor being murdered by the Drewenses, Olga revenged his death. She went afterwards to Constantinople, where she was baptized by the name of Helen. The emperor, John Zimisces, was her godfather, and fell in love with her; but she, alleging their spiritual affinity, refused to marry him. Her example induced many of her subjects to embrace Christianity, but had no effect on her son. She died at Pereslaw, in the eightieth year of her age, fourteen years after her baptism.

OCTAVIA,

DAUGHTER of Claudius, emperor of Rome, and Messalina, was betrothed to Silanus; but through the intrigues of Agrippina, the niece and fourth wife of Claudius, she was married, when only fifteen, to the emperor Nero. This wretched tyrant soon divorced her to marry Poppæa, who had her banished to Campania. She was recalled by the people; but Poppæa, resolved on her ruin, caused her to be again banished to an island. There she was ordered to kill herself by opening her veins. She died at the age of twenty. Her head was cut off and carried to Poppæa. To great personal charms, Octavia added modesty, sweetness, beneficence, purity of manners, talents, and irreproachable conduct; and the people in Rome mourned her loss with the greatest grief. She died about the year 56.

P.

PACHECO,

DONNA MARIA, wife of Don John de Padilla, young nobleman, who was at the head of the confederacy in Castile, during the minority of Charles V., called the Holy Junta, raised to recover those laws and liberties the Castilians had always prized so highly. During their hostile operations, they were in much distress for money. Donna Maria, a woman of great abilities and unbounded ambition, proposed to seize all the magnificent ornaments in the cathedral of Toledo; but lest that action, apparently sacrilegious, should offend the people, she and her retinue went in a solemn procession to the church, and implored pardon of the saints, whose shrines she was about to violate. The populace thus appeased, they stripped the cathedral and obtained the necessary funds.

In a subsequent engagement, in 1521, the young and brave Padilla was taken prisoner, and condemned to death. He wrote an affectionate letter to his wife, exhorting her to consider his death as his deliverance. This blow was fatal to the confederacy. The city of Toledo alone, animated by Donna Maria, who sought to revenge her husband's death, held out. The prudence and vigour with which she acted justified the confidence the people reposed in her. She wrote to the French general, encouraging him to invade Navarre; she endeavoured to arouse the other Castilian cities; raised soldiers; and, by keeping the death of their beloved general fresh in the minds of the people, she prevented them from being dispirited. Her enemies in vain endeavoured to undermine her popularity; the city was invested, but she defended it so vigorously that no progress was made in reducing it, till the clergy, whose property she had been forced to invade, openly deserted her, and persuaded the credulous multitude that her influence over them was the effect of enchantment; and that she was assisted by a familiar spirit in the form of a negro maid. Incensed at these suggestions, they themselves took up arms against her, drove her out of the city, and surrendered it to the royalists. She then retired to the citadel, which she defended with amazing fortitude, four months longer; and, when reduced to the last extremity, fled in disguise to Portugal, where she had many relations, and where she passed the remainder of her life.

PADILLA,

MARY DE, a Spanish lady, mistress of Pedro the Cruel, king of Castile in 1350. She possessed such influence over him, that three days after his marriage with the beautiful and virtuous Blanche de Bourbon, he repudiated her for his guilty mistress. After his divorce from Blanche, Pedro married Jeanne de Castro; and two days after was again at the feet of the all-powerful Padilla, who dying soon after, was buried with all the magnificence due to a crowned head.

PAMPHILA,

A GRECIAN authoress, who flourished in Nero's reign, and wrote a general history in thirty-three books, much commended by the ancients, but not extant. She died in the first century after Christ.

PAULA, ST.,

A ROMAN lady of noble birth and great learning. She embraced Christianity; and when she became a widow, she retired to Bethlehem, where she built a monastery, and led a very devout and ascetic life. St. Jerome was the director of her charitable institutions, and he also taught her to read the Scriptures in Hebrew. She died in 407, aged sixty. It is said that she was descended from the families of the Gracchi and Scipios.

PAULINA,

A ROMAN lady of exquisite beauty, and great wealth and virtue, lived in the reign of Tiberius, about the year 30. She was married to Saturninus, a husband worthy of her. Decius Mundus, a Roman knight, fell desperately in love with her, and tried every means, in vain, to obtain her affections. He even offered her two hundred thousand drachmæ. At length Ide, a female domestic of his father's, offered to enable him to accomplish his object for fifty thousand drachmæ, which he gave her. This woman, knowing Paulina's great veneration for Isis, bribed several of the priests of this goddess, who went to Paulina, and told her that the god Anubis was passionately enamoured of her, and that she must visit him. Elated with this honour, Paulina communicated the desire to her husband, who, confiding in her virtue, cheerfully granted the request. She went to the temple, and, being shut up in the dark, Mundus was introduced to her as Anubis. Upon the third day after this, Mundus met Paulina, and, in a keen and sarcastic speech, ridiculed her for her credulity, and informed her of her mistake. Paulina, in the greatest distress, hastened to her husband, and urged him vehemently not to suffer such an indignity to pass unpunished. Saturninus appealed to Tiberius, who caused Ide and the priests of Isis to be crucified for sacrilege, the temple of Isis to be thrown down, and her statue cast into the Tiber. Mundus was simply banished.

PAULINA,

WIFE of Seneca, the celebrated Roman philosopher, insisted upon sharing her husband's fate, who was condemned to die by the order of the emperor Nero. Her veins were accordingly opened at the same time; but fainting from loss of blood, Nero sent and commanded her wounds to be bound up, and conjured her to live. She, however, survived her husband but a short time, looking wan and miserable, and oppressed with the deepest melancholy. She was much younger than her husband. These events occurred about the year 68.

PERPETUA,

VIVIA, a Carthaginian lady, about twenty-two years of age, suffered for her faith during the persecution of the Christians by Severus, emperor of Rome. Her father, a pagan, who loved her tenderly, went to console her in her imprisonment, and attempted to persuade her to renounce Christianity. Perpetua, however, remained firm, which so incensed him, that he beat her severely, and did not visit her for some days. In the mean time she was baptized, having only been a catechumen before. On refusing to sacrifice to idols, she was confined in a dark dungeon and deprived of her infant. Her father again visited her, and in the most tender and affectionate manner entreated her, for his sake and that of her child, to renounce her faith; but she said, "God's will must be done." After her condemnation, Perpetua and Felicitas, another Christian woman, were thrown to a mad bull, who wounded them severely, but did not kill them. Perpetua then caused her brother to be called, and, addressing herself to him and another Christian, she said, "Continue firm in the faith, love one another, and be not offended at our sufferings."

The people insisted on having the martyrs brought into the amphitheatre, that they might see them die. The beauty of Perpetua, and the weak state of Felicitas, who had just been confined, excited some compassion among the savage beholders. Perpetua fell into the hands of an unskilful gladiator, but she guided his trembling hand to her throat. She perished in 205.

PETRONILLA,

DONA, daughter of Ramiro the monk, was betrothed in her infancy to Raymond, count of Barcelona. The conditions of this marriage, that united Catalonia to Arragon, in 1137, were, that the count himself should never bear the title of "King," but merely that of "Prince" of Arragon, and that the offspring of the queen should succeed to the throne and kingship; that the arms of Catalonia should be united with those of Arragon, but that the standard-bearer should always be an Arragonian; and that the Arragonians should invoke the name of St. George, as that of their patron.

Petronilla gave birth, in 1150, to her eldest son, Raymond, who succeeded to the throne under the name of Alfonso; and subsequently to Pedro, who inherited Sardinia, Carcassone, and Narbonne. She had also two daughters, Aldonza or Dulcis, who, in 1181, married Sancho, prince of Portugal, and another, whose name is not recorded, though she is said to have married Armengaul, count of Urgel.

The queen, being extremely ill previous to the birth of her eldest child, made a will, providing that should the infant prove a son, he should succeed to the crown, but, if a daughter, the throne should be inherited by her husband. This will, excluding a female from inheriting the crown, was ever after quoted as a precedent against the sovereigns of Arragon, when they attempted to bequeath the crown to a daughter.

Raymond dying in August of 1162, Petronilla reigned one year, during the minority of her son, but on his attaining his thirteenth year, in 1163, by the advice of the nobles, resigned the crown to him. The queen died on the 3d of October, 1173, in Barcelona. She was a wise and good ruler over her people.

PHEBE,

A DEACONESS of the port of Corinth called Cenchrea. St. Paul had a particular esteem for her, and Theodoret thinks he lodged at her house while at Corinth. She brought to Rome the epistle he wrote to the Romans, wherein she is so highly commended.

In this epistle, the apostle names, with warm approval, the faith and works of a number of women who appear to have been devoted and important servants of the church at Rome. Priscilla, Mary, Junia, Tryphena and Tryphosa, Persis, Julia, the sister of Nereus, and the "mother of Rufus," whom the apostle calls "mine;" a touching tribute to the virtues of this Christian woman. There was no man among the Christian converts ever saluted by Paul with the title of father; and that he found a woman worthy of the tender, holy title of mother, shows how highly, in his estimation, ranked the piety of the gentle sex. The important trust reposed in Phebe proves, also, the efficient help he derived from woman's ministry in the cause of Christ. See Romans, chap. xvi. A. D. 60.

PHILIPPA OF HAINAULT,

DAUGHTER of the earl of Hainault, married Edward III., king of England, in 1327. In 1346, when, after the victorious battle of Cressy, Edward lay before Calais, David Bruce, king of Scotland, invaded the north of England, and ravaged the country as far as Durham. He was there met by queen Philippa, at the head of twelve thousand men, commanded by Lord Percy; after a fierce engagement, the Scots were entirely defeated, and their king and many of the nobility taken prisoners. As soon as Philippa had secured her royal captive, she crossed the sea at Dover, and was received in the English camp, before Calais, with all the éclat due to her rank and her victory. Here her intercession is said to have saved the lives of the six citizens of Calais, who were condemned to death by Edward.

Philippa's conduct was always marked by wisdom and generosity, and she was on all occasions the confidant and adviser of her husband. She died before Edward, leaving several children, the eldest of whom was the celebrated Black Prince. Philippa is said to have founded Queen's College, Oxford; but her agency in establishing a manufacturing colony of Flemings at Norwich, in the year 1335, was of far greater importance to the prosperity of the nation. "Blessed be the memory of Edward III. and Philippa of Hainault, his queen, who first invented clothes," says a monastic chronicler. He meant that by the advice of the queen, the English first manufactured cloth.

Philippa was also the friend and patroness of Chaucer and Froissart.

PISE, or PISANA, CHRISTINE DE,

Was born in Venice, in 1363; and, at the age of five years, was taken by her father to France, where he emigrated upon the invitation of Charles V. Thomas de Pise was one of the marked men of his age; possessing all the learning and all the science that could then be attained, his ambitious genius struggled for something beyond, and took the path of astrology. Lamb makes the quaint lament that, through our modern men of science, the stars have become merely astronomical. It was quite otherwise in the fourteenth century; then the stars were really "the poetry of heaven," and the scientific men, poets, through whose imaginations the highest destinies passed, dignified with an august feeling of preternatural skill, that, however false, must have elevated their tone of self-appreciation to something beyond the vanities of our times. Charles V. honoured Thomas de Pise, and made him his astrologer. Thomas gave his daughter a learned education. The child having an hereditary brightness of mind, applied herself with diligence, and became remarkable, ere she reached womanhood, for her many acquirements. She was well acquainted with history, and equal to any of the scholars of the day in the Greek and Latin languages. She married, early in life, Stephen Castel, a gentleman of Picardy. Shortly after this, her father died; and, at the age of twenty-five, having also lost her husband, she was left destitute of all human support, having no relations in France. To add to her distress, the inheritance of her husband was litigated by some members of his family, and she had great difficulty to obtain a portion of it. Being a foreigner, she was obliged to rely entirely on her own energies; and she applied herself to a resource never before sought by a female. Christine de Pise was the first woman who used her literary abilities to support her household, and made her pen procure bread for her children. Louis, duke of Orleans, brother of Charles VI., was a prince of elegant tastes, and a patron of letters; he discerned the merit of Christine, and invited her frequently to his court, where she met with honourable attention. This unfortunate young man was, as is well known, assassinated by emissaries of the duke of Burgundy. After his death, and the confusion of parties that ensued, the insanity of the king, the invasion of France by the English, all these national misfortunes darkened the state of literature, and obstructed farther progress in social improvement.

Christine lived to an advanced age in the privacy of domestic life. She died in 1441. Some of her poems, which are full of tenderness, were printed in Paris, in 1529; others remain in manuscript, in the royal library. "The Life of Charles V.," written by desire of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, is considered her best prose performance. One of her first books was called, "A Hundred Stories of Troyes." She also wrote several long poems. She had three children, one of whom retired to a convent, where Christine passed the latter part of her life.

Henry IV. invited her to the English court; and she was every where received with that homage and veneration which her virtues and talents deserved. True feminine purity and refinement prevail throughout her writings. All her works are written in French.

PLACIDIA,

A DAUGHTER of Theodosius the Great, sister to Honorius and Arcadius, was born about the year 388, and was brought up in the palace of Constantinople. At the third siege and sack of Rome by Alaric, in 410, Placidia was one of the captives carried away by him; she was treated with the respect due her rank; and Ataulphus, Alaric's successor, married her in 414. She bore him a son who soon died. In 415, Ataulphus was murdered by Singeric, who usurped the Gothic throne, and treated the royal widow with great ignominy, obliging her to walk twelve miles before his chariot. Singeric was soon after assassinated, and Placidia was ransomed by the Romans for 600,000 measures of wheat, and returned to Italy.

In 417, Honorius compelled Placidia to marry his general, Constantius, as a reward for his services. She became the mother of Valentinian III. and Honoria. By Placidia's instigation, Constantius urged Honorius to admit him to a partnership in the empire, by which elevation she obtained the title of Augusta; their titles, however, were not acknowledged at the court of Constantinople. Placidia again became a widow in 421. When her son, Valentinian III., was declared emperor, in 425, Placidia assumed the reins of government, during his minority. Her administration was neither wise nor vigorous. She died at Rome, in the year 450.

POLLA ARGENTARIA,

WIFE of Lucan, the Latin poet, who wrote a poem on her merits. This poem is now lost, but her name is immortalized by two other poets of that age, Martial and Statius. Lucan was condemned to death by Nero; but the tyrant allowed him to choose the way in which he would die. He chose the warm bath and an open artery; but entreated his wife to live, and transcribe his great poem, the "Pharsalia;" which she promised him to do. It is said that, after his mournful death, she shut herself up in a solitary retreat, with the bust of Lucan beside her, and there carefully revised the three first books of the "Pharsalia."

POMPEIA PLOTINA,

A ROMAN lady, who married Trajan while he was a private individual. She entered Rome in procession with her husband when he was saluted emperor, in the year 99, and distinguished herself by her affability, humanity, and kindness to the poor and friendless. It is recorded that on approaching the threshold of the palace raised by Nero, she gazed for a moment upon the vast and splendid monument of so many crimes, and polluted by so many vices; then turning to the people, and raising her hands and eyes heavenward, she exclaimed, "May the gods send me forth from this august palace, whenever I may be destined to leave it, even as I now enter it; and may the high destiny to which fortune now raises me leave me in possession of the same qualities with which I this day assume it."

The people applauded her speech and seem always to have loved and revered her. And she proved herself worthy of this warm esteem. She was remarkable for the dignity of her deportment, and for the influence which her chaste example had on the morals of Roman society. Plotina loved tranquillity, and sought to incline her husband's heart to the arts of peace; but Trajan was a soldier, and his passion for military glory superseded to the last his wisdom and his discretion. As Plotina could not dissuade him from his last expedition into Africa and Asia, she accompanied him; was by his side when he passed the Tigris over a bridge of boats; and when he died she was beside him and received his last breath. Then, after she had, by her energy and influence, made her favourite Adrian emperor, she brought back the ashes of her husband to Rome; and still enjoyed all the honours and titles of a Roman empress under Adrian, who, by her means, had succeeded to the vacant throne. At her death, which occurred in the year 122, she was ranked among the goddesses, and received divine honours.

PONTHIEU,

ADELAIDE, a French lady whose adventures during the crusades under St. Louis, king of France in the 13th century, have furnished a subject for a romance, a tragedy, and an opera.

PRISCA,

A ROMAN lady, a convert to Christianity, was horribly tortured, and afterwards beheaded, for refusing to abjure her religion and to sacrifice to idols, under the emperor Claudius, about the year 275.

PROBA,

VALERIA FALCONIA, was the wife of Adolphus, the Roman proconsul, in the reigns of Honorius and Theodosius the Younger. She composed a Virgilian cento upon the books of the Old and New Testaments, which was printed at Frankfort, in 1541. She also wrote an epitaph on her husband.

PULCHERIA,

A DAUGHTER of Theodosius the Great, emperor of Rome, in 379. She was eminent for her piety, moderation, and virtue.

PULCHERIA ÆLIA,

BORN in 399, was the daughter of Arcadius, emperor of the East. She reigned conjointly with her brother, Theodosius, a mild and feeble prince. The vigorous wisdom of Pulcheria, though only two years the elder, compensated for his defects, and she maintained, by meekness and discretion, that ascendancy over him which a superior capacity always gives. Adorned with all the graces of beauty, at fifteen she took a vow of virginity, and persuaded her two younger sisters to do the same. She consecrated herself to the service of God and the state, and divided her time between prayer, charity, and the affairs of the empire. At sixteen, she took the name of Augusta, and as she had always the prudence to preserve her brother's honour, she governed in his name with great success. She gave him the credit of completing the destruction of idolatrous temples and worship, which was due to the spirit, firmness, and wise lenity of her measures. Pulcheria's great natural sagacity enabled her to discover at once how she ought to act, and she executed her purposes with promptitude and vigour.

The empire was agitated by factions, when first she stood at its helm; but it soon enjoyed a perfect peace under her wise administration; she taught her brother to respect the rights of property, saying, that "The more princes abstained from touching the wealth of their people, the greater would be their resources in the wants of the state."

When Theodosius, weak and irresolute, neglected her advice, and suffered himself to be guided by his eunuchs, the empire soon felt and mourned the change. On his death, in 450, as he left but one child, a daughter, married to Valentinian III., Pulcheria became sole mistress of the empire. For political reasons she married Marcian, an old officer in the army, whom she made emperor. She lived four years after, till 454, maintaining the same exemplary character. Her loss was deeply regretted. She alone had sustained the imperial dignity, under the reign of her imbecile brother; and after his death, had placed the crown on a head worthy to wear it. During her life she was a mother to the poor, and she left them her possessions at her death.

R.

RADEGONDE, ST.,

DAUGHTER of Bertarius, king of Thuringia, was taken prisoner in 529, when only eight years old, by Clotaire, king of Normandy. Her childish grace and beauty made such an impression on Clotaire that he resolved to educate her for his wife. She was carefully taught, and, at the age of ten, she renounced paganism for Christianity, in consequence of the instructions of those by whom she was surrounded, and from that early age conceived an ardent desire to devote herself wholly to religion. She was so much opposed to the idea of becoming one of the wives of Clotaire, that when the time approached for that event, she fled, but was brought back to Soissons, and married in spite of her reluctance. Radegonde, to avoid as much as possible her new duties, became literally the servant of the poor and the sick. Having received as a marriage present, the royal domain of Atrés, she converted it into a hospital for indigent women, for whom she performed the most menial and repulsive services. She also passed a great part of her time in reading, or conversing with learned and pious men.

Radegonde spent six years in this way, during all which time, Clotaire obstinately refused to let her go into a convent. A brother of the young queen's had been taken prisoner at the same time, and as he grew up he showed so much of the pride and temper of his race, that Clotaire had him put to death. This was too much for Radegonde to endure, and Clotaire, not wishing to be annoyed by her grief, allowed her to go to Médard, bishop of Noyon, whose reputation for sanctity had extended throughout all France, for consolation. When she arrived at Noyon, she found Médard in his cathedral, and she immediately exclaimed, "Priest of God! I wish to leave the world, and consecrate myself to the Lord." At these words the guard who accompanied her crowded around her, and protested against such an act. While Médard hesitated as to what course he should take, Radegonde fled to the sacristy, threw the dress of a nun over her royal apparel, and returning, said to Médard, "If you refuse to receive me, if you fear man more than God, you will have to answer for it before the Shepherd of the flock."

These words put an end to the uncertainty of the bishop. He annulled, on his own authority, the forced marriage of the queen, consecrated her to God, and sent away the soldiers, who had not dared to offer any farther opposition. Radegonde went to Tours for greater safety, and when Clotaire, still ardently attached to her, sent to reclaim her, she fled to Poitiers. Here the energetic remonstrances of Germain, bishop of Paris, obliged him to leave her, and he allowed her to found a convent there, which she did about 550, where she passed the rest of her life. She was at first the abbess of this convent, but after it was firmly established, she gave up her authority to a lady younger than herself, whom she called Agnes, and lived for the remainder of her life as a simple nun. Her convent held a high reputation in that age for the devotion of its members to religion, and also for their cultivation of literature and the arts. Radegonde died at Poitiers, August 13th, 590. She was afterwards canonized.

ROCHIER,

AGNES DU, was a very beautiful girl, the only daughter of a rich tradesman of Paris. Her father left her a handsome fortune, but at the age of eighteen she turned recluse, in the parish of St. Opertune, in 1403. Recluses built themselves a little chamber adjoining the walls of some church. The door of the cell was sealed with great pomp by the bishop, and never again opened. A little window was left, from whence the recluse heard the offices of the church, and received the necessaries of life. Agnes du Rochier lived to the age of ninety-eight.

RODHIA,

A MOORISH Spaniard of Cordova, the freedwoman of king Abdelrahman, who wrote many volumes on rhetoric. She is said to have lived one hundred and seven years, and died in 1044.

ROSAMOND

WAS the wife of Alboin of Albovinus, king of Lombardy, in the sixth century. Alboin slew her father, Gunimond, king of a neighbouring horde, in battle, and married his daughter by force. And, in order to retain a monument of his victory, he converted the skull of Gunimond into a drinking-cup, which he sent full of wine to Rosamond. In revenge, she had him assassinated.

ROSAMOND,

DAUGHTER of Walter de Clifford, lord Hereford, was the favourite mistress of Henry II., of England. To conceal this amour from his jealous queen, Eleanor, Henry is said to have removed Rosamond to a labyrinth in Woodstock park, where, however, his wife discovered her and obliged her to take poison. Some authors declare that the fair Rosamond died at Godstow nunnery, near Oxford. She had two sons by Henry, William, surnamed Longsword, and Jeffrey, archbishop of York.

ROSARES,

ISABELLA DE, preached in the great church of Barcelona, in Spain. In the reign of Paul III., pope of Rome, she went to that city, and by her eloquence, she converted many of the Jews to Christianity.

ROSSI,

BLANCHE DE, the wife of Battista de la Porta of Padua, was a noble, brave, and faithful woman. In 1237, during the war between the Ghibellines and Guelfs, she went with her husband, who was sent as commander of the forces to Bassano, to defend the city against the tyrant Ezzelino.

Blanche fought by the side of her husband in various skirmishes and upon the walls of the city, and often took the place of his aid-de-camp, when the man was exhausted by his duty. When the city fell into the hands of the enemy by treachery, Battista was killed at the head of his soldiers, fighting to the last. Blanche, tied with cords, was dragged before the conqueror. The tyrant, inflamed by her beauty, offered her liberty and wealth if she would consent to make his house her home. She refused indignantly, and threw herself out of the window—but, contrary to her expectation, she escaped unharmed, and was again brought before her enemy. She now had recourse to stratagem. She pretended to accept the tyrant's proposals, and made only one condition, that of seeing once more the body of her husband. The tyrant consented, and ordered his guards to accompany her to the grave. When they had arrived at it, and after the heavy stone had been removed, she jumped into the grave and caused the stone to fall upon and crush her. Thus died the noble wife of Battista.

ROSSI,

PROPERZIA DE. It is uncertain when this illustrious artist was born, but various reasons induce us to fix the date towards 1495. The cities of Bologna and Modena still dispute the honour of having produced her; and such is the cloud that rests upon her early days, that it has never been ascertained who were her parents—and some have even been uncertain whether she was a married or single woman—whether the name of Rossi descended to her from a father, or was given by a husband. The latter doubt is entirely set to rest by Georgio Vasari, who, in his biography of celebrated artists, calls Properzia “a virtuous maiden, possessing every merit of her sex, together with science and learning all men may envy.”

She began her progress in the arts by learning to draw of Raimondi—but as the predilection of the age was for sculpture, she soon turned all her attention to that art. Many of her works are still extant and admired. In possession of the Grassi family, at Bologna, is a sculptured representation of our Saviour's passion, where eleven figures are introduced as spectators, each with a characteristic expression, and the whole carved on a peach-stone. She also assisted in the sculptures that adorn the three gates of the façade of St. Petronius. There is also a very fine figure, in marble, of count Guido di Pepoli, unquestionably her production. She died February 24th, 1530, and George Vasari thus writes: “The lovely maiden was this day made perfect.” All the Bolognese mourned her death, for she was considered a miracle of nature. The following epitaph was written by Vincenzo of Bonaccorso Pitti:

*Fero splendor di due begni occhi accrebbe
Già marmi a marmi; e stupor nuovo e strano
Rividi marmi delicta mano
Fea dianzi vivi, ah! morte invidia n' ebbe.*

R U F I N A,

CLAUDIA, a noble British lady, who lived about the year 100, wife of Aulus Rufus Pudens, a Bomanian philosopher, and one of the Roman equestrian order. She is said to have been an intimate associate of the poet Martial, who, in many places, highly extols her for beauty, learning, and virtue. Of her poetic writings, Balæus mentions a book of Epigrams, an “Elegy on her Husband's Death,” and other poems; besides which she wrote many things in prose.

S.

S A B I N A,

JULIA, grand-niece and heiress of Trajan, and wife of Adrian, emperor of Rome, is celebrated for her private as well as her public virtues. Adrian had married Sabina chiefly through the favour of the empress Plotina; he never loved her, and treated her with the greatest asperity; and the empress was so irritated by his unkindness, that she boasted in his presence that she had disdained to make him a father, lest his children should be more odious and tyrannical than he himself was. The behaviour of Sabina at last so exasperated Adrian, that he poisoned her, or, according to some, obliged her to destroy herself. Divine honours were paid to her memory. She died about 138, after she had been married to Adrian thirty-eight years. It is difficult to assign any motive less unworthy than the base passion of envy for the cruel treatment Sabina endured from her husband. Adrian did not feel flattered by the means which had placed him on the greatest throne in the world. He owed it to Plotina—a woman; and though he was never ungrateful to her, yet Sabina, the niece of Trajan, was really, in birth, above him; and he never forgave her for this superiority. To implicate her in some plot or crime, seemed his first desire. He set spies about her to watch her conduct, and even had the meanness to intercept and read all her letters. After the death of her aunt Plotina, he overwhelmed Sabina with his contempt and calumny. One of the historians of his reign says that he engaged “les personnes de sa cour à lui faire éprouver les plus sanglantes mortifications, et la maltraita tellement qu'elle finit par se donner la mort.” And this wretch was one of the best emperors who governed Rome! That the soul of the woman had not thus lost its love of the good and the true, is proven in this sad history of Sabina;—with all his scrutiny, the vindictive Adrian could never find cause of accusation against her. She was murdered, not executed.

SABINA,

POPPÆA, was a daughter of Titus Ollius. She married a Roman knight, Rufus Crispinus, by whom she had a son. Her beauty captivated Otho, one of Nero's favourites, and afterwards the eighth emperor of Rome. He took her from her husband, and married her; but Nero, who had seen her, and heard her accomplishments extolled, soon took possession of her, and sent Otho to preside over one of the Roman provinces. Nero then repudiated his wife, Octavia, on pretence of barrenness, and married Poppæa, who had Octavia banished and put to death. Nero soon began to treat Poppæa with barbarity, and she died of a kick she received from him during her pregnancy, about the year 65. Her funeral was performed with great pomp, and statues were raised to her memory. She left one son by Nero. She was so anxious to preserve her beauty, that five hundred asses were kept to afford her milk, in which she bathed daily; and from their milk she invented a kind of pomatum, called Poppæanum.

ST. CECILIA,

THE patroness of music, is said to have been a Roman lady, born of noble parents, about the year 235. Her story, as related by the Roman Catholics, is, that her parents married her to a young pagan nobleman, Valerianus. Cecilia told him, on her wedding-night, that she was visited nightly by an angel. Valerianus desired to see the angel; and his bride told him that it would be impossible, unless he would become a Christian. This he consented to, and was baptized by pope Urban I.; after which, returning to his wife, he found her at prayer, and by her side a beautiful young man, clothed with brightness. Valerianus conversed with the angel, who foretold his martyrdom, and that of his brother, Tiburtius. In a few years, Valerianus and Tiburtius were beheaded. Cecilia was offered her life, if she would sacrifice to the idols; but she refused, and was thrown into a caldron of boiling water. St. Cecilia is said to have excelled so greatly in music, as to have drawn the angel from the celestial regions by her melody.

SAINTE DES PREZ,

A PUPIL of Agnes de Bragelongne de Planey, lived in the thirteenth century. She was a French poetess. At the age of twelve, she fell in love with Seymour, an English gentleman, who was then thirty, and who did not reciprocate her affection till ten years after, when he married her; but she died soon. Guillebert d'Erneville, a celebrated troubadour, was one of her suitors.

SALOME,

ONLY daughter of Antipater, a man of eminence in Idumea, and of Cypron, an Arabian lady of illustrious descent, was sister to Herod, afterwards

Herod the Great of Judea. She was an ambitious and intriguing woman, and conceived a strong dislike to Mariamne, Herod's wife, because Mariamne reproached her with the meanness of her family, in comparison with the royal race of the Asmo-neans, from whom she herself was descended. She therefore accused Mariamne to Herod of too great intimacy with Joseph, who was both the uncle and husband of Salome, but whom she was willing to sacrifice, to revenge herself on her innocent sister-in-law. Herod, enraged, had Joseph immediately put to death; but his great love for Mariamne induced him to spare her. Some time after, Salome again accused Mariamne of infidelity, and an attempt to poison Herod, which so exasperated him, that he ordered his wife to be executed. When the two sons of Mariamne, Aristobulus and Alexander, were grown up, Salome, envious of their popularity, and fearing lest they should revenge their mother's death, resolved on their destruction, notwithstanding that Aristobulus had married her daughter, Berenice. She succeeded so well in embittering Herod against them, that he accused them before Cæsar of conspiring against him. But they were acquitted. She made two or three other attempts to effect the same object; but failing in them, and losing the confidence of Herod, she resolved to marry Syllæus, prime minister to Obodas, king of Arabia. But when Syllæus found that he would have to conform to the Jewish faith, he declined the proposal. Salome still continued in love with Syllæus; but Herod compelled her to marry Alexas, a friend of his. She afterwards used her influence against Antipater, Herod's eldest son and heir, who had procured the death of his half-brothers, Aristobulus and Alexander; and Antipater was executed. After Herod's death, Salome, by her intrigues, caused dissensions between his two remaining sons, Archelaus and Antipas; but these were settled by Cæsar, who gave to Salome the royal palace at Askelon, besides the cities of Jamnia, Azotus, and Phasaelis, and a large sum of money, which was left her by her brother. She seems to have passed the rest of her life in tranquillity.

SALOME,

THE daughter of Herodias and Herod Philip. She so delighted her uncle and mother's husband, Herod Antipas, by her dancing, that he promised her whatever she asked. At her mother's instigation, she requested the head of John the Baptist. Salome married her uncle, Herod the Great; and afterwards Aristobulus, son of Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had several children.

SALOME,

WIFE of Zebedee, and mother of James the Greater, and John the Evangelist. She was one of those holy women who attended and administered to our Saviour in his journeys. She requested of Jesus that her two sons might sit one on his right, and the other on his left hand. Mark xv. 40. She followed Christ to Calvary, and did not forsake him at the cross. She was one of those women who came early on Sunday morning with perfumes to embalm the body of Christ.

S APPHIRA,

THE wife of Ananias, who, with her husband, made pretence of becoming converts to the religion of Jesus, soon after the apostles commenced their mission. We only hear of this couple, because of one wicked act. The disciples of the new faith then shared their property in common. Ananias sold his possessions, pretending to bring all the money to the apostles, while "he kept back part of the price, his wife also being privy."

For this lie, Ananias and Sapphira were struck down dead. The record is remarkable in another respect; it is the only example given in the New Testament of an evil deed, or act of apostasy, done by any woman who professed to follow the Saviour. See Acts, chap. v.

S APPHIRA,

THE wife of a rich merchant in Gueldres, equally distinguished for her beauty and virtue. Rhinsauld, a German officer, and governor of the town of Gueldres, became enamoured of her, and finding promises and presents ineffectual, imprisoned her husband, pretending that he kept up a traitorous correspondence with the enemies of the state. Sapphira yielded to the passion of the governor, to obtain the promised release of her husband; but Rhinsauld had given private orders for his execution. Sapphira complained to Charles, duke of Burgundy, who ordered Rhinsauld to marry her, and make over to her all his possessions. As soon as this was done, Charles ordered him to be put to death. Thus the children of a wife whom he had seduced, and a husband whom he had murdered, inherited his wealth. This happened in the fifteenth century.

S CALA,

ALEXANDRA, was daughter of Bartholemi Scala, an Italian, eminent as a statesman and man of letters in the fifteenth century, and was a very accomplished woman. She became the wife of the celebrated Marullus, whose avowed reason for marrying her was to become perfect in the Latin tongue. Nevertheless, she was not only a learned, but an excellent and a beautiful woman. She was often praised by Politian in Greek. She died in 1506. Marullus wrote several poems in her praise.

SELVAGGIA, RICCIARDA,

WAS of a noble family of Pistoia, and beloved by Cino, a famous scholar and poet of the fourteenth century. The parents of Ricciarda were haughty, and though she returned the love of the young poet, it was unknown to her family. At length her father, who belonged to the faction of the Bianchi, was banished, with his family, from Pistoia, by the faction of the Neri. They took refuge in a little fortress among the Apennines, where they suffered severe privations. Cino hastened to comfort them, and the parents now received him gladly; but Ricciarda drooped under the pressure of anxiety and want, and died in a few months. Her parents and her lover buried her in a nook among the mountains; and many years afterwards, when Cino had been crowned with wreaths and honours, he made a pilgrimage to her tomb. Ricciarda, or Selvaggia, as she is usually called, possessed poetical talents which were then considered of a high order. Some of her "Madrigals" are now extant; but her chief fame rests on being the beloved of Cino. In the history of Italian poetry, Selvaggia is distinguished as the "bel numero una," the fair number one of the four celebrated women of the fourteenth century. The others were Dante's Beatrice, Petrarch's Laura, and Boccaccio's Fiammetta.

SENENA, or SINA,

WIFE of Gryffyd, son of Llewellyn, prince of North Wales. Gryffyd having been supplanted and imprisoned by his younger brother, David, Senena, a woman of spirit and address, in concert with the bishop of Bangor, and many of the Welsh nobility, entered into a treaty with Henry III. of England, hoping to interest him in her husband's cause. She managed the business so well that she induced Henry to demand Gryffyd of his brother, who gave him up, but, at the same time, infused such suspicions of Gryffyd into the breast of Henry, that he confined him in the Tower of London. After two years' imprisonment, Gryffyd was killed by a fall, while attempting to escape, in the presence of his wife and son, who shared his captivity, 1244. This son afterwards became joint sovereign of Wales, with his brother.

SETON,

LADY, was the wife of Sir Alexander Seton, who was acting-governor of Berwick-upon-Tweed, at the time that important fortress was besieged by Edward III. The garrison, being reduced to a scarcity of provisions, proposed to surrender upon the terms that there should be an armistice of five days, and if in that interval the town and castle should not be relieved by two hundred men-at-arms, or by battle, they should be given up to Edward; the lives and property of the inhabitants to be protected. The eldest son of Sir Alexander Seton was one of the hostages delivered by the Scots for the performance of the conditions: the younger son of Seton was also a prisoner in Edward's hands, having been taken in a sally.

No sooner had Edward obtained the hostages, than he insisted on the immediate surrender of the town, threatening Sir Alexander, that if he refused, his two sons should immediately be hung in front of the ramparts. The governor was thunderstruck, and, in his agony, was on the point of sacrificing his country's honour to his paternal tenderness, when he was roused and supported in his duty by his wife, the mother of these two sons. Lady Seton came suddenly forward, and called upon her husband to stand firm to his honour and his country. She represented, that if the savage monarch did really put his threat into execution, they should become the most wretched of parents, but their sons would have died nobly for their country, and they themselves could wear out life in sorrow for their loss ; but, that if he abandoned his honour, their king, their country, their consciences, nay, their sons themselves, would regard them with contempt ; and that they should not only be miserable, but entail lasting disgrace on those they sought to save. Never did Spartan or Roman matron plead with the eloquence of the most exalted virtue, more forcibly against the weakness of her own and her husband's mind. And when she saw, across the water, preparations actually making for the death of her sons, and beheld her husband, at the dreadful spectacle, again giving way, she drew him from the horrid scene, and thus saved his honour, though at the sacrifice of their children. The tyrant put them to death. This was in July, 1332.

S FORZA,

BIANCA MARIA VISCONTI, was the natural child of Filippo Visconti ; and, being his only daughter, she was legitimated, and apportioned with the dowry of a princess ; and, in 1441, she was married to Francesco Sforza, duke of Milan. She was then fifteen years of age, and distinguished among all the ladies of the court for beauty and elegance. The duchess, though not of a race eminent for piety, had always an inclination for promoting religious institutions ; by her influence over her husband, who loved her passionately, she was now in a situation to gratify her pious wishes. She placed the first stone in the temple of St. Agnes, in Milan ; and, nine years afterwards, erected the church of St. Nicolas, and founded the monastery of Corpo Cristo, in Cremona. But her most useful and greatest establishment was the grand hospital of Milan, a magnificent edifice, which she caused to be begun in 1456, but which was not completed until 1797. After the death of her husband, she was regent for her son, Galeazzo. In her administration she exhibited the utmost strictness, good sense, and political ability. Her son, when arrived at manhood, ungratefully forgetting all he owed to her care and prudence, rendered his conduct so distasteful to her, by his arrogance and rudeness, that she retired to an estate she possessed at Marignard, where she began a plan of life to be pursued in good works and pious duties ; when a sudden death terminated her existence, at the age of forty-two, in the year 1468.

S FORZA,

IROLITA, wife of Alphonso II., king of Naples. Born at Milan, 1445 ; died, 1488. She understood the classical languages ; and Lascari wrote a grammar for her, in Greek. Argelatti declares that she wrote Latin with consummate elegance.

In the Ambrosian Library, at Milan, are preserved two orations, in Latin, spoken by her in Mantua, to pope Pius II. In the monastery of Santa Croce is to be seen an autograph manuscript of a codex to Cicero's treatise De Senectute, in which she has produced striking thoughts in a finished style of expression.

S HORE,

JANE, the celebrated mistress of Edward IV., king of England, was the wife of Matthew Shore, a goldsmith in Lombard-street, London. She is represented as extremely beautiful, cheerful, and very generous. She never used her great influence over the king to the prejudice of any one, but in favour of the unfortunate. After his death, she attached herself to Lord Hastings ; and when he was executed by Richard III., Jane Shore was also arrested on the accusation of witchcraft ; however, she was only condemned to a public penance as an adulteress, and the loss of her property. Sir Thomas More saw her in the reign of Henry VIII., poor, old, and shrivelled, without the least trace of her former beauty. The popular tradition of her dying of hunger in a ditch, is untrue.

S OPHIA,

OF Hispali, was a Spanish-Arabian lady, celebrated for her poetry and oratory. She died in 1039. None of her writings are now extant. She had a sister, Maria, who was also a poet and a learned lady.

S ULPITIA,

A ROMAN poetess, who lived in the reign of Domitian, in the first century after Christ. She has been called the Roman Sappho. There are none of her writings left but a fragment of a satire against Domitian, who published a decree for the banishment of the philosophers from Rome. This satire has usually been printed at the end of the Satires of Juvenal, to whom it has been sometimes falsely attributed. From the invocation, it would seem that she was the author of many other poems, and the first Roman lady who taught her sex to vie with the Greeks in poetry. Her language is easy and elegant, and she appears to have had a ready talent for satire. She is mentioned by Martial and Sidonius Apollinaris, and is said to have addressed to her husband Calenus, who was a Roman knight, "A Poem on Conjugal Love." The thirty-fifth epigram in Martial's tenth book refers to her poem on conjugal love:

"Omnes Sulpiciam legant puellæ,
Uni quæ cupiant viro placere.
Omnes Sulpiciam legant mariti,
Uni qui cupiant placere nuptæ."

SURVILLE,

MARGUERITE ELEONORE CLOTILDE DE, of the noble family of Vallon Chalys, was the wife of Berenger de Surville, and lived in those disastrous times which immediately succeeded the battle of Agincourt. She was born in 1405, and educated in the court of the count de Foix, where she gave an early proof of literary and poetical talent, by translating, when eleven years old, one of Petrarch's Canzoni, with a harmony of style wonderful, not only for her age, but for the time in which she lived. At the age of sixteen, she married the Chevalier de Surville, then, like herself, in the bloom of youth, and to whom she was passionately attached. In those days no man of high standing, who had a feeling for the misery of his country, or a hearth and home to defend, could avoid taking an active part in the scenes of barbarous strife around him; and De Surville, shortly after his marriage, followed his heroic sovereign, Charles VII., to the field. During his absence, his wife addressed to him the most beautiful effusions of conjugal tenderness to be found in the compass of poetry.

Clotilde has entitled her first epistle "Heroïde à mon époux Bérenger;" and as it is dated in 1422, she could not have been more than seventeen when it was written. The commencement recalls the superscription of the first letter of Heloise to Abelard:

"Clotilde, au sien ami, douce mande accolade!
A son époux, salut, respect, amour!
Ah, tandis qu'explorée et de cœur si malade,
T'e quier la nuit, te redemande au jour—
Que deviens? où cours tu? Lion de ta bien-aimée,
Où les destins, entraînent donc tes pas?
Faut que le dise, hélas! s'en crois la renommée
De bien long temps ne te reverrai pas?"

Among some other little poems, which place the conjugal and maternal character of Clotilde in a most charming light, one deserves notice for its tender and heartfelt beauty. It is entitled "Balade à mon premier né," and is addressed to her child, apparently in the absence of its father.

"O chère enfantelet, vrai portrait de ton père!
Dors sur le sein que ta bouche a pressé!
Dors petit!—clos, ami, sur le sein de ta mère,
Tien doux aïeul, par le somme oppressé.
Bel ami—chère petit! que ta pupille tendre,
Goute un sommeil que plus n'est fait pour moi:
Je veille pour te voir, te nourrir, te défendre,
Ainz qu'il est doux ne veiller que pour toi!"

Contemplating him asleep, she says,

"N'était ce teint fleuri des couleurs de la pomme,
Ne le diriez vous dans les bras de la mort?"

Then, shuddering at the idea she had conjured up, she breaks forth into a passionate apostrophe to her sleeping child.

"Arrête, chère enfant! j'en fémis toute entière—
Réveille toi! chassé un fatal propos!
Mon fils... pour un moment—ah revois la lumière!
Au prix du tien, rends-moi tout mon repos!"

Douce erreur! il dormait... c'est, assez, je respire.
Songes légers, flattez son doux sommeil
Ah! quand verrai celui pour qui mon cœur soupire,
Au miens cotés jouir de son réveil?

* * * * *
Quand reverrai celui dont as reçu la vie?
Mon jeune époux, le plus beau des humains
Oui—déjà crois voir ta mère, aux cieux ravie,
Que tends vers lui tes innocentes mains.
Comme ira se duisant à ta première caresse!
Au miens baisers com' t'ira disputant!
Ainz ne compte, à toi seul, d'épuiser sa tendresse,—
A sa Clotilde en garde bien autant!"

Her husband, count de Surville, closed his brief career of happiness and glory (and what more than these could he have asked of heaven?) at the siege of Orleans, where he fought under the banner of Joan of Arc. He was a gallant and a loyal knight; so were hundreds of others who then strewed the desolated fields of France: and De Surville had fallen undistinguished amid the general havoc of all that was noble and brave, if the love and genius of his wife had not immortalized him.

Clotilde, after her loss, resided in the château of her husband, in the Lyonnais, devoting herself to literature and the education of her son; and it is very remarkable, considering the times in which she lived, that she neither married again, nor entered a religious house. The fame of her poetical talents, which she continued to cultivate in her retirement, rendered her at length an object of celebrity and interest. The duke of Orleans happened one day to repeat some of her verses to Margaret of Scotland, the first wife of Louis XI.; and that accomplished patroness of poetry and poets wrote her an invitation to attend her at court; which Clotilde modestly declined. The queen then sent her, as a token of her admiration and friendship, a wreath of laurel, surmounted with a bouquet of daisies, (Marguerites, in allusion to the name of both,) the leaves of which were wrought in silver and the flowers in gold, with this inscription: "Marguerite d'Ecosse à Marguerite d'Helicon." We are told that Alain Chartier, envious, perhaps, of these distinctions, wrote a satirical quatrain, in which he accused Clotilde of being deficient in l'air de cour; and that she replied to him, and defended herself, in a very spirited rondeau. Nothing more is known of the life of this interesting woman, but that she had the misfortune to survive her son as well as her husband; and dying at the advanced age of ninety, in 1495, she was buried with them in the same tomb.

SYBELLA,

WIFE of Robert of Normandy, son of William the Conqueror, lived in the twelfth century. Her husband was wounded by a poisoned arrow, and, while he slept, Sybella applied her lips to the wound, and drew forth the venom, which soon caused her death.

SYMPHOROSA,

A ROMAN matron, living in the reign of Trajan, embraced the Christian faith with her seven sons. During Trajan's persecution of the Christians, about the year 108, Symphrosa was ordered to sacrifice to the heathen deities. Refusing to comply with this command, she and her sons were cruelly put to death. Many other women suffered death in this persecution for the same cause.

T.

TENDA,

BEATRICE, was born in 1370, in a castle erected in a valley which opens to the north of the celebrated Col di Tenda. Her progenitors were counts Lascari di Ventimiglia, sovereigns of a large province in the maritime region of the Alps, and more properly were called counts di Tenda. How or why Beatrice was given in marriage to the celebrated condottier, Facino Cane, cannot now be ascertained. Probably her family constrained her to this union. By him she was, however, always treated with the greatest consideration and respect; his glories and treasures were divided with her; and while his wife, she received sovereign honours, and by her gentle influence she mitigated the natural cruelty of his disposition. The elevation of Facino Cane was owing to these circumstances. The viscount's family had rendered their sovereignty odious throughout Lombardy by a course of crimes and oppressions beyond endurance. In their domestic relations assassinations and poisonings were frequent; towards their subjects they were cruel and unjust; and towards other princes their outrageous violations of the most solemn treaties seemed to render an alliance with them impossible. Things had arrived at such a point, that at the death of duke Giovanni, all classes were determined to put an end to their dominion. The principal captains of the provinces assembled, and elected the most distinguished of their leaders, Facino Cane, to be at the head of a new government. He, a very warlike and unscrupulous man, soon rendered himself master of the state of Milan; and to the power he would doubtless soon have added the title of duke, had not death taken him off in the midst of his glory and conquests.

K

He left every possession in the hands of his widow; and from this state of things the viscount's faction evolved a plan for re-obtaining their former dignities. The heir of that house, Filippo Visconti, lived in seclusion; he was brought forward, and by various manœuvres familiar to politicians, a marriage was effected between him and Beatrice di Tenda. By this connection she resigned the treasures, the fortresses, the army of Facino Cane, and by these means he obtained an easy conquest over the various little rulers of the neighbourhood, and, building on the foundation erected by Facino, achieved a state more extended and powerful than had been enjoyed by his predecessors. A curious result of perverse sentiments arose from this; the more he felt that the valour and conduct of Facino had contributed to his grandeur, the plainer he perceived that these qualities eclipsed all that the Viscounts could boast of, the more he hated any allusion to the brave condottier; and he felt a growing aversion to Beatrice as the widow of this man, and as the person to whom his own elevation was owing. Besides, she was twenty years older than he; and though she was still handsome, and eminently endowed with accomplishments and mental charms, his inclinations were fixed upon a young girl named Agnes de Maino. At first his hate manifested itself in neglect and contumelious treatment. Beatrice, who had been in the time of Facino the adored object of every attention, the cynosure of all eyes, was now exposed to jeers, and left to solitude. To amuse her dreary hours, she sought to draw around her the society of some persons of letters and talents, and among whom was Orombello, a young gentleman quite remarkable for his sprightly conversation, his many acquirements, and especially his skill in music. This intimacy with the duchess, though perfectly innocent and harmless, was seized upon by Filippo as a pretext for the destruction of his guiltless wife. Calumnies and aspersions were followed by imprisonment; next came the rack. Under its tortures, Orombello avowed whatever they proposed; but on the firmer spirit of Beatrice torture had no effect to oblige her to distort the truth. With a despot and a Visconti, judgment was pronounced as he ordered; and the unhappy victims were condemned to be executed. Beatrice was so much beloved by the people, that Filippo ordered her judgment and decapitation to take place at night, and in the secret dungeons of the castle, as open measures might have caused a revolt. Before the blow of the executioner was allowed to fall, they were again cruelly submitted to the torture, and Orombello again weakly gave way. Beatrice, still superior to bodily suffering, addressed him in a very noble speech, which has been transmitted from an ear-witness. After reproaching him for basely uttering falsehoods in that tremendous hour, she pathetically turned to God, and addressed him in a solemn prayer, as the being who knew her innocence, and as the sole support left to her. They were buried in the court-yard without any memorial. The purity and excellence of Beatrice were disputed by nobody; and her violent death was in fact a judicial murder. Her melancholy story has been the theme of poets and romance writers, and has been sung by the plaintive genius of Bellini.

THECLA,

A NOBLE lady of Alexandria, in Egypt, who transcribed the whole of the Bible into the Greek, from the original Septuagint copy then in the Alexandrian library; and this ancient copy is still preserved, and is the celebrated Alexandrian manuscript, so often appealed to by commentators. It was presented to Charles I. of England, by the patriarch of Constantinople, in 1628.

THEODELINDA,

QUEEN of the Lombards, was the daughter of Garibaldo, duke of Bavaria. She was betrothed to Childebert, but rejected by his mother, the haughty Brunchild. She afterwards, in 589, married Antari, king of the Lombards, with whom she lived in great affection; when in 590 he died, not without suspicion of poison. The people were very much attached to her; but that turbulent age seemed to require a stronger hand than that of a young girl, to sway the rod of empire. She therefore found it expedient to contract a second marriage with Flavius Agilulphus, who, as her husband, was invested with the ensigns of royalty before a general congress at Milan. She was destined to be a second time a widow. Agilulphus died in 615. From that time she assumed the government as regent, which she maintained with vigour and prosperity; she encouraged and improved agriculture; endowed charitable foundations; and, in accordance with what the piety of that age required, built monasteries. What was more extraordinary, and seems to have been rarely thought of by the men sovereigns of that day, she reduced the taxes, and tried to soften the miseries of the inferior classes. She died in 628, bitterly lamented by her subjects. Few men have exhibited powers of mind so well balanced as were those of Theodelinda; and this natural sense of the just and true fitted her for the duties of government.

THEODORA,

EMPRESS of the East, the wife of Justinian famous for her beauty, intrigues, ambition, and talents, and for the part she acted in the direction of affairs, both in church and state, in the reign of her husband. Her father was the keeper of the beasts for public spectacles at Constantinople, and she herself was a dancer at the theatre, and a courtesan notorious for her contempt of decency, before her elevation to the throne. Justinian saw her on the stage, and made her his mistress during the reign of his uncle Justin, whose consent he at length obtained for his marriage with Theodora; and a Roman law, which prohibited the marriage of the great officers of the empire with actresses, was repealed in her favour. She was crowned, together with Justinian, in 527; and the death of Justin, shortly after, left her in possession of sovereign authority, through the blind partiality and weakness of her imperial consort. She made use of the power she had attained to raise from obscurity her friends and favourites, and to avenge herself of her enemies. According to Procopius, she continued to indulge herself in the most degrading sensuality after she became empress; and, if the disgusting detail which he gives of her crimes is to be believed, seldom indeed has a brothel been disgraced by scenes of more infamous profligacy than those exhibited in the palace of Theodora. With all her faults, however, this woman displayed courage and presence of mind in circumstances of difficulty and danger; for in the alarming sedition at Constantinople, in 532, her counsels animated the drooping spirits of Justinian, and induced him to forego his inglorious design of fleeing before the rebels, who were subsequently reduced to subjection by Belisarius. Theodora died of a cancer in 548, much to the regret of her surviving husband.

THOMA,

A MOORISH Spaniard, also called Habeba of Valencia. She wrote celebrated books on grammar and jurisprudence. She died in 1127.

THUSNELDA,

THE wife of Herman, or Armin, the prince of the Cherusky and conqueror of Voro. She was born in the year 7 of the new era. A daughter of Segest, a prince of the Cherusky, she married Herman contrary to the wish of her father, who was the ally and friend of the Romans. When Herman took up arms in behalf of his people, she did everything in her power to sustain him in his arduous undertaking. One day, while Herman was pursuing the enemy, Segest attacked his castle, where Thusnelda had been left under the care of Herman's mother, and carried her off, before her husband could hasten to her assistance. Thusnelda remained for a while a prisoner in the hands of her cruel father, who finally delivered her over to the Romans, as a victim for her husband's attempt to liberate his people. Herman made several desperate attempts to rescue her, but in vain; she was carried to Rome with her little son, and nothing further was discovered of her fate.

TORNABUONI,

LUCREZIA, of Florence, was the wife of Pietro de Medici, and mother of Lorenzo the Magnificent. She was a zealous promoter of literature. Under her patronage, and by her encouragement, Pulci published his Morgante. She wrote in Spenserian stanza, or, as the Italians term it, octave rhyme—"The Life of St. John," "The History of Judith," of "Susanna," and of "Tobit," besides the "Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary." She died, 1482.

U.

URRACA, or PATERNA,

Was the wife of Don Ramiro, a king of Oviedo and Leon, who succeeded Don Alphonso on the throne of Spain. Urraca was a very pious Catholic, and celebrated for her zeal in contributing to endow churches. She lavished rich gifts on the church of St. James (Santiago,) in gratitude to that saint for the assistance he rendered the Christians against the Moors at the battle of Clavjo, where he is said to have appeared, armed cap-a-pie, mounted on a white charger, and bearing a white banner, with a red cross embroidered in the centre. This is the origin of invoking this patron saint on the eve of battle, and of the war-cry, of "Santiago y cierra España"—St. James and close Spain! Doña Urraca died in 861, and was buried by the side of her husband, who had died in 831, in the church of St. Mary, in Oviedo.

URGULANIA,

A ROMAN lady, was a favourite of the empress Livia, mother of Tiberius. So insolent did she grow upon this, that she refused to go to the Senate to give in her evidence, and therefore the prætor was obliged to repair to her house to examine her. Lucius Piso sued her for a debt, and Urgulania withdrew to the emperor's palace, refusing to appear; but Piso proceeded in his suit; and, although Tiberius promised his mother that he would solicit the judges in favour of Urgulania, Livia was at length obliged to have the sum which Piso claimed paid to him.

URGULANILLA,

GRAND-DAUGHTER of Urgulania, was married to the emperor Claudius, before he was raised to the empire. He had by her a son and daughter. Claudius repudiated Urgulanilla on account of her bad reputation, and her being suspected of murder. In that age of crime, it was a mark of her discretion or innocence when no murder was proven against her.

V.

VALADA,

A MOORISH Spaniard, daughter of king Almos-takeph, of Corduba, was greatly skilled in polite learning. She more than once contended with scholars noted for their learning, and always bore away the palm. She died in 1091.

VALENTINE,

OF Milan, daughter of John Galeas, duke of Milan, and of Isabelle, the youngest of the ten children of John II. of France, married, in 1389, Louis, duke of Orleans, brother of Charles VI. of France. She was a beautiful and accomplished woman, and appears, in the midst of that disastrous epoch in French history, like an angel of goodness and beauty. The first few years that Valentine passed in France, were spent in the midst of festivals, and all kinds of amusements. Although her husband was unfaithful to her, he surrounded her with all splendour and luxury suited to her rank and station. She occupied herself principally in taking care of her children, and in literary pursuits, for which she, as well as her husband, had a decided taste.

The insanity of her brother-in-law, Charles VI., affected Valentine deeply, and she exerted herself to the utmost to calm his paroxysms, and console him for the negligence of his wife. Charles, in his turn, became very much attached to her; he called her his well-beloved sister, went every day to see her, and in the midst of his ravings could always be controlled by her. Her power over the unhappy monarch seemed to the ignorant populace so supernatural, that she was accused of using sorcery, and, to prevent disagreeable consequences, her husband sent her, in 1395, to the duchy of Orleans.

This exile, so painful to Valentine, terminated in 1398, when she was recalled to Paris; after this time she lived principally at Blois, superintending the education of her sons, till the death of Louis d'Orleans, who was assassinated by the duke of Burgundy, in 1407. Unable to avenge his death, she died of a broken heart, in 1408, aged thirty-eight, recommending to her children, and to John, count of Dunois, the natural son of her husband, the vindication of their father's reputation and glory.

VALERIA,

DAUGHTER of the emperor Dioclesian, who had abdicated the throne in 305, was married to Galerius, on his being created Cæsar, about 292. Galerius became emperor of Rome in 305, and died in 311. He recommended Valeria, and his natural son Candidien, whom he had caused Valeria to adopt, as he had no other, to Licinius, his friend, whom he had raised to be emperor. Valeria was rich and beautiful, and Licinius wished to marry her; but Valeria, to avoid this, fled from the court of Licinius, with her mother Prisca and Candidien, and took refuge with Maximin, one of the other emperors. He had already a wife and children, and as the adopted son of Galerius, had been accustomed to regard Valeria as his mother. But her beauty and wealth tempted him, and he offered to divorce his present wife if she would take her place. Valeria replied, "That still wearing the garb of mourning, she could not think of marriage; that Maximin should remember his father, the husband of Valeria, whose ashes were not yet cold; that he could not commit a greater injustice than to divorce a wife by whom he was beloved; and that she could not flatter herself with better treatment; in fine, that it would be an unprecedented thing for a woman of her rank to engage in a second marriage."

This reply roused Maximin's fury. He proscribed Valeria, seized upon her possessions, tortured some of her officers to death, and took the rest away from her, banished her and her mother, and caused several ladies of the court, friends of theirs, to be executed on a false accusation of adultery. Valeria, exiled to the deserts of Syria, found means to inform Dioclesian of her misery; and he sent to Maximin, desiring the surrender of his daughter, but in vain: the unhappy father died of grief. At length Prisca and Valeria went disguised to Nicomedia, where Licinius was, and mingled unknown among the domestics of Candidien. Licinius soon became jealous of him, and had him assassinated at the age of sixteen. Valeria and Prisca again fled, and for fifteen months wandered in disguise through different provinces. At length they were discovered and arrested in Thessalonica, in 315, and were condemned to death by Licinius, for no other crime than their rank and chastity. They were beheaded, amidst the tears of the people, and their bodies were thrown into the sea. Some authors assert that they were Christians.

VARANO DI COSTANZA,

BORN at Camerino, 1428. She had a learned and literary education. Her family having lost the signory of Camerino, she made a Latin harangue to Bianca Visconti, in order to obtain its restitution. Having failed in her eloquence, she wrote to the principal sovereigns of Italy to procure assistance, and this time her efforts resulted successfully. At the restoration of her father she addressed a large assembly in a Latin oration. This erudite lady became the wife of Alexander Sforza, sovereign of Pesaro. She died in 1447, at the age of nineteen, leaving a son, Costanzo. She has left several orations and some epistles.

VELEDA, or VELLEDA,

WAS a German prophetess, who lived in the country of the Bructeri in the first century. She exercised a powerful influence over her own countrymen, and the Romans regarded her with great awe and dread. She was venerated as a goddess, and to increase the respect with which she was regarded, she lived in a high tower, allowing no one to see her, and communicating her directions, on the important affairs of her nation, to the people, through one of her relations. She instigated her countrymen to rebel against the Romans.

VICTORINA,

A CELEBRATED Roman matron, who placed herself at the head of the Roman armies, and made war against the emperor Gallienus. Her son Victorinus, and her grand-son of the same name, were declared emperors, but when they were assassinated, Victorina invested with the imperial purple one of her favourites, called Petricius. She was some time after poisoned, in 269, and according to some by Petricius himself.

VON DER WART,

GERTRUDE, was the wife of baron Von der Wart, who was accused, in the fourteenth century, of being an accomplice in the murder of Albert, emperor of Germany. There is every reason to believe that Von der Wart was innocent, but he was condemned to be broken on the wheel; and during the whole of his sufferings, which lasted for two days and nights, his wife braved the queen's anger and the inclemency of the weather to watch by his scaffold, and soften, as much as possible, the tortures of that agonizing death. During one of the days, she saw the queen, who, in male attire, and surrounded by her courtiers, rode up to see how Von der Wart was bearing his sufferings. The queen ordered Gertrude to be sent away, but some more compassionate persons interfering, she was allowed to remain.

Her own sufferings, with those of her unfortunate husband, are most touchingly described in a letter which she afterwards wrote to a female friend, and which was published some years ago, at Haarlam, in a book entitled, "Gertrude Von der Wart, or Fidelity unto Death." Mrs. Hemans wrote a poem of great pathos and beauty, commemorating this sad story.

W.

WALPURGA, or WALPURGIS,

A SAINT in the Roman Catholic Church, was born in England, and was the sister of St. Willibald, first bishop of Eichstädt, in Germany, and niece of St. Boniface, the apostle to the Germans. She went to Germany as a missionary, and was made abbess of a convent at Heidenheim, in Franconia. She was a learned woman, and wrote a work in Latin, entitled, "The Travels of St. Willibald." She died in 778, and was canonized after her death by the pope. From some accidental association, the night previous to the first of May is called, in many parts of Germany, Walpurgis night.

WOODVILLE,

ELIZABETH, was the widow of Sir John Grey, who lost his life in the battle of Bernard's Heath. Edward IV. king of England, married her, though he had before demanded Bona of Savoy, sister to the queen of France, in marriage. The story of the courtship and marriage of this beautiful woman is like a romance; how king Edward first saw her, when, clad in the deepest weeds of widowhood, she threw herself at his feet and pleaded for the restoration of the inheritance of her fatherless sons; how the king fell desperately in love with her; how she resisted his passion, till he offered her honourable marriage; the secrecy of the espousals; and the grandeur of her queenly life with the wretchedness of her lot after the death of Edward, are all like scenes in a highly-wrought fiction. The effect of the ill-assorted marriage was soon apparent on the fortunes of Edward. It made the French king, and also the earl of Warwick, his enemy. The queen's happiness was embittered by Edward's infidelity. After the death of Edward, in 1483, her two sons were murdered by their uncle Richard III., who had usurped the crown. After the battle of Bosworth, where Richard was defeated and killed by Henry, earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., the conqueror married Elizabeth, the daughter of Edward IV. and Elizabeth, thus uniting the houses of York and Lancaster.

Elizabeth took a third husband, Lord Stanley. She died in the convent of Bermondsey, where her son-in-law, Henry VII., had provided an asylum for her years and misfortunes. The daughter of Elizabeth, then queen of England, attended her death-bed, and paid her grand-mother every attention.

ZAIDA,

A MOORISH princess, daughter of Benabet, king of Seville, married Alfonso VI., king of Castile and Leon. Zaida is said to have been induced to adopt the Christian faith by a dream, in which St. Isidorus appeared to her and persuaded her to become a convert. Her father, when she acquainted him with the resolution she had formed, made no objections; but fearful it might cause discontent among his subjects, he allowed her to escape to Leon. Thither she fled; the Christian sovereigns instructed her in the new creed, and had her baptized Isabel; or, as some assert, Mary. Zaida subsequently became the third wife of Alfonso, the king; though Pelagius, the bishop of Oviedo, denies that she was married to that sovereign, asserting she was only his mistress. She bore the king one son, Don Sancho, and died soon afterwards, near the close of the eleventh century.

ZENOBIA SEPTIMIA,

QUEEN of Palmyra, was a native of Syria, and a descendant of the Ptolemies. She was celebrated for her beauty, the melody of her voice, her mental talents, literary acquirements, and her distinguished heroism and valour, as well as her modesty and chastity. "Her manly understanding," says Gibbon, "was strengthened and adorned by study. She was not ignorant of the Latin tongue, and possessed in equal excellence the Greek, the Syriac, and the Egyptian languages; she had drawn up, for her own use, an epitome of Oriental history, and familiarly compared the beauties of Homer and Plato, under the tuition of the sublime Longinus."

She married Odenatus, a Saracen prince, who had raised himself from a private station to the dominion of the East; and she delighted in those exercises of war and the chase to which he was devoted. She often accompanied her husband on long and toilsome marches, on horseback or on foot, at the head of his troops; and many of his victories have been ascribed to her skill and valour.

Odenatus was assassinated, with his son Herod, by his nephew Maronius, about the year 267, in revenge for a punishment Odenatus had inflicted on him. Maronius then seized upon the throne; but he had hardly assumed the sovereign title, when Zenobia, assisted by the friends of her husband, wrested the government from him, and put him to death. For five years she governed Palmyra and the East with vigour and ability; so that by her success in warlike expeditions, as well as by the wisdom and firmness of her administration, she aggrandized herself in Asia, and her authority was recognized in Cappadocia, Bithynia, and Egypt. She united with the popular manners of a Roman princess, the stately pomp of the Oriental courts, and styled herself "Queen of the East." She attended, herself, to the education of her three sons, and frequently showed them to her troops, adorned with the imperial purple.

When Aurelian succeeded to the Roman empire, dreading the power of such a rival, and determined to dispossess her of some of the rich provinces under her dominion, he marched, at the head of a powerful army, into Asia; and, having defeated the queen's general, Zabdas, near Antioch, Zenobia retreated to Emessa, whither she was pursued by Aurelian. Under the walls of that city, another engagement, commanded and animated by Zenobia herself, took place, in which the emperor was again victorious. The unfortunate queen withdrew the relics of her forces to Palmyra, her capital, where she was pursued by Aurelian. Having closely invested the city, he found the besieged made a most spirited resistance.

It was after he had been wounded by an arrow, that he wrote his memorable letter to the senate of Rome, defending himself from the charge of protracting the siege unnecessarily.

"The Roman people," says Aurelian, "speak with contempt of the war I am waging against a woman. They are ignorant both of the character and of the power of Zenobia. It is impossible to enumerate her warlike preparations of stones, of arrows, and every species of missile weapons. Every part of the walls is provided with two or three balistæ, and artificial fires are thrown from her military engines. The fear of punishment has armed her with a desperate courage. Yet still I trust in the protecting deities of Rome, who have hitherto been favourable to all my undertakings."

But though Aurelian appeared confident of final success, yet he found the conquest of Palmyra so difficult that he proposed very advantageous offers to Zenobia, if she would submit and surrender the city. She rejected his terms, in the following haughty letter, addressed to the emperor himself: "It is not by writing, but by arms, that the submission you require from me can be obtained. You have dared to propose my surrender to your prowess. You forget that Cleopatra preferred death to servitude. The Saracens, the Persians, the Armenians, are marching to my aid; and how are you to resist our united forces, who have been more than once scared by the plundering Arabs of the desert? When you shall see me march at the head of my allies, you will not repeat an insolent proposition, as though you were already my conqueror and master."

Whatever may be thought of the prudence of this reply, the courage and patriotism of the queen are shown to be of the highest order. She subscribed this daring epistle, "Zenobia, Queen of the East, to Aurelian Augustus."

It was her last triumph. She held out a long time, expecting aid from her allies; but the disturbed state of the country, and the bribes of Aurelian, prevented their arrival. After protracting the siege as long as possible, Zenobia, determined not to surrender, mounted one of the swiftest of her dromedaries, and hastened towards the Euphrates, with a view of seeking an asylum in the Persian territories. But being overtaken in her flight, she was brought back to Aurelian, who sternly demanded of her, how she dared to resist the emperors of Rome. She replied, "Because I could not recognise as such, Gallienus and others like him; you, alone, I acknowledge as my conqueror and my sovereign."

At Emessa, the fate of Zenobia was submitted to the judgment of a tribunal, at which Aurelian presided. Hearing the soldiers clamouring for her death, Zenobia, according to Zosimus, weakly purchased her life, with the sacrifice of her well-earned fame, by attributing the obstinacy of her resistance to the advice of her ministers. It is certain that these men were put to death; and as Zenobia was spared, it was conjectured her accusations drew down the vengeance of the emperor on the heads of her counsellors; but the fact has never been proven. One of the victims of this moment of cowardice, was the celebrated Longinus, who calmly resigned himself to his fate, pitying his unhappy mistress, and comforting his afflicted friends. He was put to death in 273.

Zenobia, reserved to grace the triumph of Aurelian, was taken to Rome, which she entered on foot, preceding a magnificent chariot, designed by her, in the days of her prosperity, for a triumphal entry into Rome. She was bound by chains of gold, supported by a slave, and so loaded with jewels, that she almost fainted under their weight.

She was afterwards treated more humanely by the victor, who presented her an elegant residence near the Tiber, about twenty miles from Rome, where she passed the rest of her life as a Roman matron, emulating the virtues of Cornelia. Whether she contracted a second marriage, with a Roman senator, as some have asserted, is uncertain. Her surviving son, Vhaballat, withdrew into Armenia, where he possessed a small principality, granted him by the emperor; her daughters contracted noble alliances, and her family was not extinct in the fifth century. She died about the year 300.

Zenobia had written a "History of Egypt;" and, previous to her defeat by Aurelian, she interested herself in the theological controversies of the times; and, either from policy or principle, protected Paul of Samosata, the celebrated unitarian philosopher, whom the council of Antioch had condemned. In estimating her character, it may well be said that she was one of the most illustrious women who have swayed the sceptre of royalty; in every virtue which adorns high station, as far superior to Aurelian, as soul is superior to sense. But moral energy was then overborne by physical force; the era was unpropitious for the gentle sex; yet her triumphs and her misfortunes alike display the wonderful power of woman's spirit.

ZOBEIDE, or ZOEBD-EL-KHEMATIN,

THAT is, the flower of women, was the cousin and wife of the celebrated caliph Haroun al Raschid. She was a beautiful, pious, and benevolent woman, and is said to have founded the city of Tauris, in Persia. She is frequently mentioned in the "Arabian Nights." She died in 831.

ZOE,

FOURTH wife of Leo VI., emperor of Constantinople, was mother of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, during whose minority, 912, she governed with great wisdom and firmness. She crushed the rebellion of Constantine Ducas, made peace with the Saracens, and obliged the Bulgarians to return to their own country. Though thus entitled to the gratitude of her son and the people, she was obliged, by the intrigues of the courtiers, to retire to a private station, and she died in exile.

ZOE,

DAUGHTER of Constantine IX., was born in 978. She married Argyrus, who succeeded her father; but she soon caused her husband to be strangled, and married Michael the Paphlagonian, whom she placed on the throne. She was afterwards confined in a monastery; but on Michael's death, in her sixty-fourth year, she married Constantine Monomachus. She died eight years after this third marriage, in 1050. Another Zoe, daughter of the Stylian, married the emperor Leo, the philosopher, and died in less than two years after, in 893.

REMARKS ON THE THIRD ERA.

THIS portion of time, comprising three hundred and fifty years, commencing with the year 1500 and closing in 1850, though very brief compared with the first era, and short even when measured with the second, yet contains a wonderfully increased number of remembered names among women. Many of these have by their writings contributed greatly to the improvement of morals in literature and society, and also to the progress of popular education: some have become celebrated for their attainments in science and art; and a considerable number have "put on the whole armour of God," and gone forth as messengers of good tidings to their heathen sisters, or as teachers of little children in the way of righteousness. These have been the loveliest examples of true piety, manifested by deeds of disinterested benevolence and Christian love, which have blest the world and uplifted the heart of humanity.

We have now reached the point where woman has gained a sure foundation on which to build her house, if she is wise, (see Proverbs xiv. 1st verse): that foundation is a knowledge of the Word of God.

The declaration of Jehovah to the tempter or spirit of Evil,—"I will put enmity between thee and the woman,"—(which is explained at length in the Preface) may be traced in its fulfilment throughout the whole course of history, profane as well as sacred. The tempter has assailed men in their sensuous nature, changing what should have been the pure, protecting love, sanctified by the true marriage of one man with one woman, into unholy lust, which degrades, pollutes, and destroys all hope for the feminine sex. Licentiousness, polygamy, divorce — these are sins against woman as well as against God's law, established at the Creation, reiterated in the four-fold example of those saved from the "Flood;" but which law, wicked men, instigated by the devil, have in every age of the world disregarded, annulled, or broken. Therefore it is that the progress of human nature, in regaining the path of righteousness, has been so slow. God helped the physical weakness of the first woman by giving to her keeping, the moral destiny of her husband and children, in the hope of the promised seed; thus God sanctified, by a spiritual or moral Providence* the honour of the mother's office and the glory of the true wife.

Woman was again aided by the special providence which shortened human life, thus rendering the male sex dependent on female care and training for, comparatively, a very large portion of their lives. And, lastly, at the close of the first era, when the moral sense or instinct of woman was nearly darkened, God sent forth His true light, constrained men to see, and thus saved the race.

Rome's last patriot was a woman, the noble-minded Agrippina. When she was starved to death, by order of the brutal Tiberius, the last gleam of hope for humanity seemed fading from the world. The enmity of the spirit of Evil had nearly destroyed the purity, and with it the power for good, of the woman. And it is worthy of note that the year when Agrippina was murdered was the very year in which Jesus Christ was crucified! But His death was followed by His glorious resurrection, bringing life and immortality to the knowledge of the world, and exalting woman by making the virtues consonant with her nature, the rule for man also. Thus God proclaimed anew, as it were, that the moral power of the world was confided to the woman!

* I term that a moral providence, where Divine interposition has evidently been exerted to advance the moral condition of an individual or a people: giving the succession to Jacob; saving and training Moses; and preserving the Jews under Ahasuerus, were each and all moral providences

Jesus Christ, whose life and lessons were a stern rebuke of the selfishness, licentiousness, and unbelief of men, and the true witness and tender encouragement of the disinterestedness, the purity or penitence, and faith of woman, Jesus Christ gave the first mission of his Gospel to his women disciples. These were sent to make known to the apostles the great doctrine they were to preach to all the world — that Christ was risen from the dead. (See St. Mat. xxviii. 9, 10.— St. John, xx. 17.) Does it not seem impossible that men, the appointed teachers of this Gospel, should ever have sought to disparage and degrade the sex whose faithfulness and devotion the Saviour had thus publicly honoured? But so it has been. The Roman Catholic church degraded women, when it degraded marriage by making the celibacy of the priests a condition of greater holiness than married life. From this falsehood against the Word of God, came those corrupting sins which, at the close of our Second Era, seemed about to dissolve the whole fabric of civilized society, and spread the most polluting crimes of heathen nations over the Christian world.* How the powers of darkness must have triumphed, when their machinations had drawn on their poor, deluded servants to destroy the then most noble and wonderful exemplar of womanly purity, patriotism, and piety the world contained! The fire that consumed Joan of Arc seemed to have reduced to ashes the hopes of that progress in morality, which regard for its development in the feminine character can, humanly speaking, only ensure. But God's good providence again baffled the powers of evil. In the same year, perchance at the very moment this meek martyr patriot laid down her life, there was a poor, persecuted exile in Strasburg, carving those little wooden blocks, destined to open an Art which would ensure, to the end of time, the means of improvement and moral influence to the feminine mind.

The art of printing holds the next place to the Gospel, in the emancipation of women from the power of wicked men.

When the great Reformer threw his ink-stand at the demon on the wall, he used the most potent weapon of exorcism against the powers of darkness which Divine Providence had then put into his hands. It was by reading the Word of God that the nine nuns of Nimptsch discerned the contrast between the Christian life, and the daily routine of the cloister. They left their superstitions and returned to the duties God imposes on the sex. Among these nuns was Catharine Bora; and when Luther made his declaration of uniting himself with her in the true and holy marriage ordained by the Creator as the state good for man, then the Reformer gave a surety for the moral progress of humanity, which the enemy of good has never been able to overcome. But this improvement is only where the Bible is read, and its authority acknowledged. The Chinese nation cannot advance in moral culture while their women are consigned to ignorance and imbecility: the nations of the East are slaves to sensuality and sin, as well as to foreign masters; and thus they must remain till Christianity, breaking the fetters of polygamy from the women, shall give to the mothers of men freedom, education, and influence.

The last fifteen hundred years hardly add a leaf to our record from the life of heathendom, but the Era is remarkable for the development of genius and talent in a new race of women — the Anglo-Saxon. Hitherto, the great nations of antiquity, with those of Southern and Western Europe, have furnished nearly all the names recorded. Now the sceptre of woman's power, always founded in morals, has passed to the British Island, and from thence to our United American nation. The reasons are obvious. No other nations have the Bible in their homes; or the preached Gospel on every Sabbath; or a free press; and no other nations have guaranteed the personal freedom of subject and citizen. As men reach a higher standard of Christian civilization, their minds are lifted up to understand the moral nature of woman; then their estimate of her fitness to aid in the great movements of humanity and religion is exalted, and the wife goes forth to help her husband in the most lofty and holy mission human beings can hold,—that of conveying the light of the Gospel to the world that is still in darkness.

This Third Era bears the names of illustrious queens, who have ruled their people with a wisdom above that of kings; of good and gifted women who have won the high places of genius, and performed noble deeds of philanthropy. But the name which, concentrating the attributes of genius with the excellencies of womanly character, brought out in the heroism of acting or suffering in the greatest cause, is that of Ann H. Judson.

* "Such was the almost universal corruption of the clergy during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, that the priestly office had fallen into almost general disrepute: the isolated virtue of a few faithful servants of God had not sufficed to redeem it from contempt. The Reformation, by abolishing the celibacy of the ecclesiastics, restored the sanctity of wedlock. The marriage of the clergy put an end to an untold amount of secret profligacy. The Reformers became examples to their flocks in the most endearing and important of human relationship,—and it was not long before the people rejoiced to see the ministers of religion in the character of husbands and fathers."—D'Aubigne's History of the Reformation.

THIRD ERA.

FROM THE YEAR 1500 TO 1850.*

A.

ABARCA, MARIA DE,

A SPANISH lady, distinguished herself, in the middle of the seventeenth century, by the peculiar excellence of the portraits she painted. She was contemporary with Rubens and Velasquez, by whom she was much esteemed. The time of her death is unknown.

ABINGTON, FRANCES,

AN eminent English actress, whose maiden name was Barton, was born in 1735. Some part of her earlier life she is said to have spent in great poverty, and when about fifteen, she joined a company of strolling players. In 1752, she was engaged at the Haymarket, London, where she was received with great applause. In 1755, she married Mr. James Abington, and in 1759, she left London for Dublin, where she was long the chief theatrical favourite. Her forte was in comedy; and as the finished lady, or romping chambermaid, she was equally at home. In 1761, Mrs. Abington left her husband to reside with Mr. Needham, who bequeathed her part of his fortune at his death. In 1799 she quitted the stage, and died at London in 1815.

ACCIAIOLI, MAGDALEN,

A NATIVE of Florence, celebrated for her beauty and genius. She was a great favourite of Christina, duchess of Tuscany, and wrote poems in a very pleasing and elegant style. She died in 1610.

ACCORAMBONI, VITTORIA,

WAS born in 1585, of a noble family, in Agudio, a little town of the duchy of Urbino. From her infancy, she was remarked for extraordinary beauty and loveliness. Her father established his residence at Rome during her early youth; there she became the "cynosure" of the neighbouring nobility, as well as that of Rome. Her father married her to Felice Peretti, nephew and adopted son of the cardinal Montalto, afterwards Pope Sixtus V. In the family of her husband she was adored, and all her desires anticipated; when, in the midst of seeming prosperity and delight, Peretti was entrapped into a solitary situation, and murdered. Rumour attributed this assassination to the prince Paolo Orsini, who was madly enamoured of Vittoria; nor was she free from suspicion of having consented to this crime. She certainly justified her accusers, by speedily uniting herself in marriage to the prince. From this step, sprang her melancholy catastrophe. Orsini was not young; he had grown enormously stout, and was afflicted with complaints that menaced him with sudden death. In order to provide for the possible widowhood of his young wife, he made a will, which, by endowing her largely, awakened the cupidity and animosity of his natural heirs. After his death, which happened as had been anticipated, at the conclusion of an inordinate feast, the duchess took possession of her inheritance. She was not allowed to enjoy it long; her palace was entered by forty masked assassins, who cruelly plunged a dagger in her heart, and besides, murdered her brother, who resided with her.

She takes a place among the literary women of Italy, having been admired for her poetical talents during her life. And there exists in the Ambrosian library at Milan, a volume of her sonnets, full of grace and sentiment.

* Including the names of all the distinguished women who are deceased.

ACKLAND, LADY HARRIET,

WIFE of Major Ackland, an officer in that portion of the British army in America under the command of General Burgoyne, accompanied her husband to America in 1776, and was with him during the disastrous campaign of 1777, which terminated in Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga. Accustomed as she was to every luxury, she shrank from no hardship or danger, while allowed to remain with her husband; and her gentleness and conciliatory manners often softened the bitterness of political animosity.

Major Ackland being taken prisoner at the battle of Saratoga, Lady Harriet determined to join him; and obtaining from Burgoyne a note, commending her to the protection of General Gates, she set out in an open boat, during a violent storm, accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Brudenell, a chaplain in the British army, her own maid and her husband's valet, to the American camp. Here she was kindly received, and allowed to join her husband. After Major Ackland's return to England, he was killed in a duel, caused by his resenting some aspersions cast on the bravery of the British soldiers in America; and the shock of his death deprived Lady Harriet of her reason for two years. She afterwards married the same Mr. Brudenell who had accompanied her to the camp of General Gates. Lady Harriet outlived her second husband many years, and died at a very advanced age.

In a work by Madame de Riedesel, who was also at the battle of Saratoga, (her husband, Major de Riedesel, was one of the German officers employed by the English government in the war against the American colonies,) she makes this mention of the subject of our memoir:

"Lady Ackland's tent was near ours. She slept there, and spent the day in the camp. On a sudden, she received the news that her husband was mortally wounded, and taken prisoner. She was greatly distressed; for she was much attached to him, though he was rude and intemperate; yet a good officer. She was a very lovely woman. And lovely in mind, as in person."

ADAMS, ABIGAIL,

WIFE of John Adams, second President of the United States, was daughter of the Rev. William Smith, minister of a Congregational church at Weymouth, Massachusetts, and of Elizabeth Quincy. She was born Nov. 22d, 1744, and, in Oct. 1767, married John Adams, then a lawyer, residing at Weymouth. Mr. Adams was appointed minister plenipotentiary to the court of Great Britain, and, in 1784, Mrs. Adams sailed from Boston to join him. She returned in 1788, having passed one year in France and three in England. On her husband's being appointed Vice President, in 1789, she went to reside at Philadelphia, then the seat of government, with him; as she also did when he was chosen President, in 1797. After Mr. Adams' defeat, in 1800, they retired to Quincy, where Mrs. Adams died, Oct. 28th, 1818. Her letters to her son, John Quincy Adams, were very much admired. She was a woman of true greatness and elevation of mind, and, whether in public or private life, she always preserved the same dignified and tranquil demeanour. As the mistress of a household, she united the prudence of a rigid economist with the generous spirit of a liberal hospitality; faithful and affectionate in her friendships, bountiful to the poor, kind and courteous to her dependants, cheerful, and charitable in the intercourse of social life with her neighbours and acquaintances, she lived in the habitual practice of benevolence, and sincere, unaffected piety. In her family relations, few women have left a pattern more worthy of imitation by her sex.

Her letters have been collected, and, with a Biographical Sketch by her grand-son, Charles F. Adams, were published some years since. We will give a few extracts, first, from a letter to her son, John Quincy Adams, the sixth President of the United States.

* * * *

"Your father's letters came to Salem, yours to Newburyport, and soon gave ease to my anxiety, at the same time that it excited gratitude and thankfulness to Heaven, for the preservation you all experienced in the imminent dangers which threatened you. You express, in both your letters, a degree of thankfulness. I hope it amounts to more than words, and that you will never be insensible to the particular preservation you have experienced in both your voyages. You have seen how inadequate the aid of man would have been, if the winds and the seas had not been under the particular government of that Being, who 'stretched out the heavens as a span,' who 'holdeth the ocean in the hollow of his hand,' and 'rideth upon the wings of the wind.'

"If you have a due sense of your preservation, your next consideration will be, for what purpose you are continued in life. It is not to rove from clime to clime, to gratify an idle curiosity; but every new mercy you receive is a new debt upon you, a new obligation to a diligent discharge of the various relations in which you stand connected; in the first place, to your great Preserver; in the next, to society in general; in particular, to your country, to your parents, and to yourself.

"The only sure and permanent foundation of virtue is religion. Let this important truth be engraven upon your heart. And also, that the foundation of religion is the belief of the one only God, and a just sense of his attributes, as a being infinitely wise, just, and good, to whom you owe the highest reverence, gratitude, and adoration; who superintends and governs all nature, even to clothing the lilies of the field, and hearing the young ravens when they cry; but more particularly regards man, whom he created after his own image, and breathed into him an immortal spirit, capable of a happiness beyond the grave; for the attainment of which he is bound to the performance of certain duties, which all tend to the happiness and welfare of society, and are comprised in one short sentence, expressive of universal benevolence, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' This is elegantly defined by Mr. Pope, in his 'Essay on Man.'

'Remember, man, the universal cause
Acts not by partial, but by general laws,
And makes what happiness we justly call,
Subsist not in the good of one, but all.
There's not a blessing individuals find,
But some way leans and hearkens to the kind.'

"Thus has the Supreme Being made the good will of man towards his fellow-creatures an evidence of his regard to Him, and for this purpose has constituted him a dependent being and made his happiness to consist in society. Man early discovered this propensity of his nature, and found

'Eden was tasteless till an Eve was there.'

"Justice, humanity, and benevolence are the duties you owe to society in general. To your country the same duties are incumbent upon you, with the additional obligation of sacrificing ease, pleasure, wealth, and life itself for its defence and security. To your parents you owe love, reverence, and obedience to all just and equitable commands. To yourself,—here, indeed, is a wide field to expatiate upon. To become what you ought to be, and what a fond mother wishes to see you, attend to some precepts and instructions from the pen of one, who can have no motive but your welfare and happiness, and who wishes, in this way, to supply to you the personal watchfulness and care, which a separation from you deprived you of at a period of life, when habits are easiest acquired and fixed; and, though the advice may not be new, yet suffer it to obtain a place in your memory, for occasions may offer, and perhaps some concurring circumstances unite, to give it weight and force.

"Suffer me to recommend to you one of the most useful lessons of life, the knowledge and study of yourself. There you run the greatest hazard of being deceived. Self-love and partiality cast a mist before the eyes, and there is no knowledge so hard to be acquired, nor of more benefit when once thoroughly understood. Ungoverned passions have aptly been compared to the boisterous ocean, which is known to produce the most terrible effects. 'Passions are the elements of life,' but elements which are subject to the control of reason. Whoever will candidly examine themselves, will find some degree of passion, peevishness, or obstinacy in their natural tempers. You will seldom find these disagreeable ingredients all united in one; but the uncontrolled indulgence of either is sufficient to render the possessor unhappy in himself, and disagreeable to all who are so unhappy as to be witnesses of it, or suffer from its effects.

"You, my dear son, are formed with a constitution feelingly alive; your passions are strong and impetuous; and, though I have sometimes seen them hurry you into excesses, yet with pleasure I have observed a frankness and generosity accompany your efforts to govern and subdue them. Few persons are so subject to passion, but that they can command themselves, when they have a motive sufficiently strong; and those who are most apt to transgress will restrain themselves through respect and reverence to superiors, and even, where they wish to recommend themselves, to their equals. The due government of the passions, has been considered in all ages as a most valuable acquisition. Hence an inspired writer observes, 'He that is slow to anger, is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city.' This passion, co-operating with power, and unrestrained by reason, has produced the subversion of cities, the desolation of countries, the massacre of nations, and filled the world with injustice and oppression. Behold your own country, your native land, suffering from the effects of lawless power and malignant passions, and learn betimes, from your own observation and experience, to govern and control yourself. Having once obtained this self-government, you will find a foundation laid for happiness to yourself and usefulness to mankind. 'Virtue alone is happiness below;' and consists in cultivating and improving every good inclination, and in checking and subduing every propensity to evil. I have been particular upon the passion of anger, as it is generally the most predominant passion at your age, the soonest excited, and the least pains are taken to subdue it;

—'what composes man, can man destroy.'

"I do not mean, however, to have you insensible to real injuries. He who will not turn when he is trodden upon is deficient in point of spirit; yet, if you can preserve good-breeding and decency of manners, you will have an advantage over the aggressor, and will maintain a dignity of character which will always insure you respect, even from the offender.

"I will not overburden your mind at this time. I mean to pursue the subject of self-knowledge in some future letter, and give you my sentiments upon your future conduct in life, when I feel disposed to resume my pen.

"In the mean time, be assured, no one is more sincerely interested in your happiness, than your ever affectionate mother."

From another letter to this her favourite son, of a later date, we will add a few sentences which breathe the true mother's heart.

"After two years' silence, and a journey of which I can scarcely form an idea, to find you safely returned to your parent, to hear of your health and to see your improvements! You cannot know, should I describe to you, the feelings of a parent. Through your father, I sometimes heard from you, but one letter only ever reached me after you arrived in Russia. Your excuses, however, have weight and are accepted; but you must give them further energy by a ready attention to your pen in future. Four years have already passed away since you left your native land and this rural cottage; humble indeed when compared to the palaces you have visited, and the pomp you have been witness to; but I dare say, you have not been so inattentive an observer as to suppose, that sweet peace and contentment cannot inhabit the lowly roof and bless the tranquil inhabitants, equally guarded and protected in person and property in this happy country as those who reside in the most elegant and costly dwellings. If you live to return, I can form to myself an idea of the pleasure you will take in treading over the ground and visiting every place your early years were accustomed wantonly to gambol in; even the rocky common and lowly whortleberry bush will not be without their beauties.

"My anxieties have been and still are great, lest the numerous temptations and snares of vice should vitiate your early habits of virtue, and destroy those principles, which you are now capable of reasoning upon, and discerning the beauty and utility of, as the only rational source of happiness here, or foundation of felicity hereafter. Placed as we are in a transitory scene of probation, drawing nigher and still nigher day after day to that important crisis which must introduce us into a new system of things, it ought certainly to be our principal concern to become qualified for our expected dignity.

"What is it, that affectionate parents require of their children, for all their care, anxiety, and toil on their account? Only that they would be wise and virtuous, benevolent and kind.

"Ever keep in mind, my son, that your parents are your disinterested friends, and that if, at any time, their advice militates with your own opinion or the advice of others, you ought always to be diffident of your own judgment; because you may rest assured, that their opinion is founded on experience and long observation, and that they would not direct you but to promote your happiness. Be thankful to a kind Providence, who has hitherto preserved the lives of your parents, the natural guardians of your youthful years. With gratitude I look up to Heaven, blessing the hand which continued to me my dear and honoured parents until I was settled in life; and, though now I regret the loss of them, and daily feel the want of their advice and assistance, I cannot suffer as I should have done, if I had been early deprived of them."

* * * * *

We will now give a few extracts from the letters to her husband;—and first, from one dated October 25th, 1782.

"MY DEAREST FRIEND,

"The family are all retired to rest; the busy scenes of the day are over; a day which I wished to have devoted in a particular manner to my dearest friend; but company falling in prevented it, nor could I claim a moment until this silent watch of the night.

"Look, (is there a dearer name than friend? Think of it for me,) look to the date of this letter, and tell me, what are the thoughts which arise in your mind? Do you not recollect that eighteen years have run their circuit since we pledged our mutual faith to each other, and the hymeneal torch was lighted at the altar of love? Yet, yet it burns with unabating fervour. Old Ocean has not quenched it, nor old Time smothered it in this bosom. It cheers me in the lonely hour; it comforts me even in the gloom which sometimes possesses my mind.

"It is, my friend, from the remembrance of the joys I have lost, that the arrow of affliction is pointed. I recollect the untitled man to whom I gave my heart, and, in the agony of recollection, when time and distance present themselves together, wish he had never been any other. Who shall give me back time? Who shall compensate to me those years I cannot recall? How dearly have I paid for a titled husband? Should I wish you less wise, that I might enjoy more happiness? I cannot find that in my heart. Yet Providence has wisely placed the real blessings of life within the reach of moderate abilities; and he who is wiser than his neighbour sees so much more to pity and lament, that I doubt whether the balance of happiness is in his scale.

"I feel a disposition to quarrel with a race of beings who have cut me off, in the midst of my days, from the only society I delighted in. 'Yet no man liveth for himself,' says an authority I will not dispute. Let me draw satisfaction from this source, and, instead of murmuring and repining at my lot, consider it in a more pleasing view. Let me suppose, that the same gracious Being, who first smiled upon our union and blessed us in each other, endowed my friend with powers and talents for the benefit of mankind, and gave him a willing mind to improve them for the service of his country. You have obtained honour and reputation at home and abroad. Oh! may not an inglorious peace wither the laurels you have won.

"I wrote you by Captain Grinnell. The Firebrand is in great haste to return, and I fear will not give me time to say half I wish. I want you to say many more things to me than you do; but you write so wise, so like a minister of state. I know your embarrassments. Thus again I pay for titles. Life takes its complexion from inferior things. It is little attentions and assiduities that sweeten the bitter draught and smooth the rugged road.

"I have repeatedly expressed my desire to make a part of your family. But 'Will you come and see me?' cannot be taken in that serious light I should choose to consider an invitation from those I love. I do not doubt but that you would be glad to see me, but I know you are apprehensive of dangers and fatigues. I know your situation may be unsettled, and it may be more permanent than I wish it. Only think how the words, 'three, four, and five years' absence' sound! They sink into my heart with a weight I cannot express. Do you look like the miniature you sent? I cannot think so. But you have a better likeness, I am told. Is that designed for me? Gracious Heaven! restore to me the original, and I care not who has the shadow."

* * * * *

From another letter of November, the same year:—

"MY DEAREST FRIEND,

"I have lived to see the close of the third year of our separation. This is a melancholy anniversary to me, and many tender scenes arise in my mind upon the recollection. I feel unable to sustain even the idea that it will be half that period ere we meet again. Life is too short to have the dearest of its enjoyments curtailed; the social feelings grow callous by disuse, and lose that pliancy of affection which sweetens the cup of life as we drink it. The rational pleasures of friendship and society, and the still more refined sensations of which delicate minds only are susceptible, like the tender blossom, when the rude northern blasts assail them, shrink within and collect themselves together, deprived of the all-cheering and beamy influence of the sun. The blossom falls, and the fruit withers and decays; but here the similitude fails, for, though lost for the present, the season returns, the tree vegetates anew, and the blossom again puts forth.

"But, alas! with me those days which are past are gone for ever, and time is hastening on that period when I must fall to rise no more, until mortality shall put on immortality, and we shall meet again, pure and disembodied spirits. Could we live to the age of the antediluvians, we might better support this separation; but, when three-score years and ten circumscribe the life of man, how painful is the idea, that, of that short space, only a few years of social happiness are our allotted portion!

Should at my feet the world's great master fall, Himself, his world, his throne, I'd scorn them all."

"No. Give me the man I love; you are neither of an age or temper to be allured by the splendour of a court, or the smiles of princesses. I never suffered an uneasy sensation on that account. I know I have a right to your whole heart, because my own never knew another lord; and such is my confidence in you, that, if you were not withheld by the strongest of all obligations, those of a moral nature, your honour would not suffer you to abuse my confidence."

Here is the description of a scene in London, when Mrs. Adams was there, in 1786.

"London, 2 April, 1786.

"YOUR kind letter, my dear niece, was received with much pleasure. These tokens of love and regard, which I know flow from the heart, always find their way to mine, and give me a satisfaction and pleasure beyond anything which the ceremony and pomp of courts and kingdoms can afford.

The social affections are and may be made the truest channels for our pleasures and comforts to flow through. Heaven formed us not for ourselves but others,

'And bade self-love and social be the same.'

"Perhaps there is no country where there is a fuller exercise of those virtues than ours at present exhibits, which is, in a great measure, owing to the equal distribution of property, the small number of inhabitants in proportion to its territory, the equal distribution of justice to the poor as well as the rich, to a government founded in justice and exercised with impartiality, and to a religion which teaches peace and good-will to man; to knowledge and learning being so easily acquired and so universally distributed; and to that sense of moral obligation which generally inclines our countrymen to do to others as they would that others should do to them. Perhaps you will think that I allow to them more than they deserve, but you will consider that I am only speaking comparatively. Human nature is much the same in all countries, but it is the government, the laws, and religion, which form the character of a nation. Wherever luxury abounds, there you will find corruption and degeneracy of manners. Wretches that we are, thus to misuse the bounties of Providence, to forget the hand that blesses us, and even deny the source from whence we derived our being.

"But I grow too serious. To amuse you, then, my dear niece, I will give you an account of the dress of the ladies at the ball of the Comte d'Adhémar; as your cousin tells me that she some time ago gave you a history of the birth-day and ball at court, this may serve as a counterpart. Though, should I attempt to compare the apartments, St. James's would fall as much short of the French Ambassador's, as the court of his Britannic Majesty does of the splendour and magnificence of that of his Most Christian Majesty. I am sure I never saw an assembly room in America, which did not exceed that at St. James's in point of elegance and decoration; and, as to its fair visitors, not all their blaze of diamonds set off with Parisian rouge, can match the blooming health, the sparkling eye, and modest deportment of the dear girls of my native land. As to the dancing, the space they had to move in gave them no opportunity to display the grace of a minuet, and the full dress of long court-trains and enormous hoops, you well know were not favourable for country dances, so that I saw them at every disadvantage; not so the other evening. They were much more properly clad;—silk waists, gauze, or white or painted tiffany coats, decorated with ribbon, beads, or flowers, as fancy directed, were chiefly worn by the young ladies. Hats turned up at the sides with diamond loops and buttons of steel, large bows of ribbons and wreaths of flowers, displayed themselves to much advantage upon the heads of some of the prettiest girls England can boast. The light from the lustres is more favourable to beauty than daylight, and the colour acquired by dancing, more becoming than rouge, as fancy dresses are more favourable to youth than the formality of a uniform. There was as great a variety of pretty dresses, borrowed wholly from France, as I have ever seen; and amongst the rest, some with sapphire-blue satin waists, spangled with silver, and laced down the back and seams with silver stripes; white satin petticoats trimmed with black and blue velvet ribbon; an odd kind of head-dress, which they term the 'helmet of Minerva.' I did not observe the bird of wisdom, however, nor do I know whether those who wore the dress had suitable pretensions to it. 'And pray,' say you, 'how were my aunt and cousin dressed?' If it will gratify you to know, you shall hear. Your aunt, then, wore a full-dress court cap without the lappets, in which was a wreath of white flowers, and blue sheafs, two black and blue flat feathers (which cost her half a guinea a-piece, but that you need not tell of), three pearl pins, bought for court, and a pair of pearl ear-rings, the cost of them—no matter what; less than diamonds, however. A sapphire blue demi-saison with a satin stripe, sack and petticoat trimmed with a broad black lace; crape flounce, &c.; leaves made of blue ribbon, and trimmed with white floss; wreaths of black velvet ribbon spotted with steel beads, which are much in fashion, and brought to such perfection as to resemble diamonds; white ribbon also, in the Vandyke style, made up of the trimming, which looked very elegant; a full dress handkerchief, and a bouquet of roses. 'Full gay, I think, for my aunt.' That is true, Lucy, but nobody is old in Europe. I was seated next the duchess of Bedford, who had a scarlet satin sack and coat, with a cushion full of diamonds, for hair she has none, and is but seventy-six, neither. Well, now for your cousin; a small, white Leghorn hat, bound with pink satin ribbon; a steel buckle and band which turned up at the side, and confined a large pink bow; large bow of the same kind of ribbon behind; a wreath of full-blown roses round the crown, and another of buds and roses withinside the hat, which, being placed at the back of the hair, brought the roses to the edge; you see it clearly; one red and black feather, with two white ones, completed the head-dress. A gown and coat of Chambéri gauze, with a red satin stripe over a pink waist, and coat flounced with crape, trimmed with broad point and pink ribbon; wreaths of roses across the coat; gauze sleeves and ruffles. But the poor girl was so sick with a cold, that she could not enjoy herself, and we retired about one o'clock, without waiting supper, by which you have lost half a sheet of paper, I dare say; but I cannot close without describing to you Lady N—— and her daughter. She is as large as Captain C——'s wife, and much such a made woman, with a much fuller face, of the colour and complexion of Mrs. C——, who formerly lived with your uncle Palmer, and looks as if porter and beef stood no chance before her; add to this, that it is covered with large red pimples, over which, to help the natural redness, a coat of rouge is spread; and, to assist her shape, she was dressed in white satin, trimmed with scarlet ribbon. Miss N—— is not so large, nor quite so red, but has a very small eye, with the most impudent face you can possibly form an idea of, joined to manners so masculine, that I was obliged frequently to recollect that line of Dr. Young's,

'Believe her dress; she's not a grenadier;'

to persuade myself that I was not mistaken."

* * * * *

Extract from a letter to a female friend, written in 1809, when Mrs. Adams was about 65 years of age:—

"Ossian says, 'Age is dark and unlovely.' When I look in my glass, I do not much wonder at the story related of a very celebrated painter, Zeuxis, who, it is said, died of laughing at a comical picture he had made of an old woman. If our glass flatters us in youth, it tells us truths in age. The cold hand of death has frozen up some of the streams of our early friendships; the congelation is gaining upon our vital powers, and marking us for the tomb. 'May we so number our days as to apply our hearts unto wisdom.'

'The man is yet unborn, who duly weighs an hour.'

"When my family was young around me, I used to find more leisure, and think I could leave it with less anxiety than I can now. There is not any occasion for detailing the whys and the wherefores. It is said, if riches increase, those increase that eat them; but what shall we say, when the eaters increase without the wealth? You know, my dear sister, if there be bread enough, and to spare, unless a prudent attention manage that sufficiency, the fruits of diligence will be scattered by the hand of dissipation. No man ever prospered in the world without the consent and co-operation of his wife. It behoves us, who are parents or grand-parents, to give our daughters and grand-daughters, when their education devolves upon us, such an education as shall qualify them for the useful and domestic duties of life, that they should learn the proper use and improvement of time, since 'time was given for use, not waste.' The finer accomplishments, such as music, dancing, and painting, serve to set off and embellish the picture; but the groundwork must be formed of more durable colours.

"I consider it as an indispensable requisite, that every American wife should herself know how to order and regulate her family; how to govern her domestics, and train up her children. For this purpose, the all-wise Creator made woman an help-meet for man; and she who fails in these duties does not answer the end of her creation.

'Life's cares are comforts; such by Heaven designed;
They that have none must make them, or be wretched.
Cares are employments; and, without employ,
The soul is on a rack, the rack of rest.'

I have frequently said to my friends, when they have thought me overburdened with care, I would rather have too much than too little. Life stagnates without action. I could never bear merely to vegetate;

'Waters stagnate when they cease to flow.'

These letters have an air of romantic sentiment ; and yet it was only the expression of true feeling which Mrs. Adams always exhibited in her daily conduct. Her grand-son, Charles F. Adams, thus accounts for the style which characterizes her correspondence :

"In her neighbourhood, there were not many advantages of instruction to be found ; and even in Boston, the small metropolis nearest at hand, for reasons already stated, the list of accomplishments within the reach of females was, probably, very short. She did not enjoy an opportunity to acquire even such as there might have been, for the delicate state of her health forbade the idea of sending her away from home to obtain them. In a letter, written in 1817, the year before her death, speaking of her own deficiencies, she says : 'My early education did not partake of the abundant opportunities which the present days offer, and which even our common country schools now afford. I never was sent to any school. I was always sick. Female education, in the best families, went no further than writing and arithmetic ; in some few and rare instances, music and dancing.' Hence it is not unreasonable to suppose that the knowledge gained by her was rather the result of the society into which she was thrown, than of any elaborate instruction.

"This fact, that the author of the letters in the present volume never went to any school, is a very important one to a proper estimate of her character. For, whatever may be the decision of the long-vexed question between the advantages of public and those of private education, few persons will deny, that they produce marked differences in the formation of character. Seclusion from companions of the same age, at any time of life, is calculated to develop the imaginative faculty, at the expense of the judgment ; but especially in youth, when the most durable impressions are making. The ordinary consequence, in females of a meditative turn of mind, is the indulgence of romantic and exaggerated sentiments drawn from books, which, if subjected to the ordinary routine of large schools, are worn down by the attrition of social intercourse. These ideas, formed in solitude, in early life, often, though not always, remain in the mind, even after the realities of the world surround those who hold them, and counteract the tendency of their conclusions. They are constantly visible in the letters of these volumes, even in the midst of the severest trials. They form what may be considered the romantic turn of the author's mind ; but, in her case, they were so far modified by a great admixture of religious principle and by natural good sense, as to be of eminent service in sustaining her through the painful situations in which she was placed, instead of nursing that species of sickly sensibility, which too frequently, in similar circumstances, impairs, if it does not destroy, the power of practical usefulness."

Many women fill important stations with the most splendid display of virtues ; but few are equally great in retirement ; there they want the animating influence of a thousand eyes, and the inspiration of homage and flattery. This is human nature in its common form ; and though female nature is often beautifully displayed in retirement, yet to change high station for a quiet home is a trial few women would have borne with such sweet serenity as did Mrs. Adams. She was, in retirement at Quincy, the same dignified, sensible, and happy woman, as when at the capitol, surrounded by fashion, wit, and intellect. This serenity arose from a settled and perfect, but philosophical and Christian contentment, which great minds only can feel. Such purity and elevation of soul preserve the faculties of the mind, and keep them vigorous even in old age. Thus lived this genuine daughter of America, leaving at her peaceful death, a rich legacy of the loftiest virtues, made manifest by her example, as the inheritance of the women of her beloved country.

ADAMS, HANNAH,

A CELEBRATED American writer, was born in Medfield, Massachusetts, in 1755. Her father was a respectable farmer in that place, rather better educated than persons of his class usually were at that time ; and his daughter, who was a very delicate child, profited by his fondness for books. So great was her love for reading and study, that when very young she had committed to memory nearly all of Milton, Pope, Thomson, Young, and several other poets.

When she was about seventeen her father failed in business, and Miss Adams was obliged to exert herself for her own maintenance. This she did at first by making lace, a very profitable employment during the revolutionary war, as very little lace was then imported. But after the termination of the conflict she was obliged to resort to some other means of support ; and having acquired from the students who had boarded with her father, a competent knowledge of Latin and Greek, she undertook to prepare young men for college ; and succeeded so well, that her reputation was spread throughout the state.

Her first work, entitled, "The View of Religions," which she commenced when she was about thirty, is a history of the different sects in religion. It caused her so much hard study and close reflection, that she was attacked before the close of her labours by a severe fit of illness, and threatened with derangement. Her next work was a carefully written "History of New England;" and her third was on "The Evidences of the Christian Religion." Though all these works showed great candour and liberality of mind and profound research, and though they were popular, yet they brought her but little besides fame; which, however, had extended to Europe, and she reckoned among her correspondents many of the learned men of all countries. Among these was the celebrated abbé Gregoire, who was then struggling for the emancipation of the Jews in France. He sent Miss Adams several volumes, which she acknowledged were of much use to her in preparing her own work, a "History of the Jews," now considered one of the most valuable of her productions. Still, as far as pecuniary matters went, she was singularly unsuccessful, probably from her want of knowledge of business, and ignorance in worldly matters; and, to relieve her from her embarrassments, three wealthy gentlemen of Boston, with great liberality, settled an annuity upon her, of which she was kept in entire ignorance till the whole affair was completed.

The latter part of her life passed in Boston, in the midst of a large circle of friends, by whom she was warmly cherished and esteemed for the singular excellence, purity, and simplicity of her character. She died, November 15th, 1832, at the age of seventy-six, and was buried at Mount Auburn; the first one whose body was placed in that cemetery. Through life, the gentleness of her manners, and the sweetness of her temper were child-like; she trusted all her cares to the control of her heavenly Father; and she did not trust in vain.

ADORNI, CATHARINE FIESCHI,

A GENOESE lady, married a dissipated young man, Julian Adorni, whom, by her modest and virtuous conduct, she reclaimed. After his death she retired to Geneva, where she devoted herself to acts of piety and benevolence. She wrote several works on divinity; and died in 1510, aged sixty-three.

ADRICHOMIA, CORNELIA,

A DESCENDANT of the noble family of Adricem, and a nun in Holland of the St. Augustine order, who lived in the sixteenth century, published a poetical version of the psalms, with several other religious poems. Her excellent understanding and erudition are commended by writers of her own time. She composed for herself the following epitaph:

Corpus homo, animam superis Cornelia mando;
 Pulve rulerta caro vermibus esca datur.
 Non ac lacrymas, non singultus, tristesque querelas,
 Sed Christo oblatum nunc precor umbra preces.

AGNESI, MARIA GAETANA,

A NATIVE of Milan, born March 16th, 1718, gave early indications of extraordinary abilities, devoted herself to the abstract sciences, and at the age of nineteen supported a hundred and ninety-one theses, which were afterwards published. She attained such consummate skill in mathematics, that the pope allowed her to succeed her father as professor at Bologna. Her knowledge of ancient and modern languages was also extensive. She died in 1799, at Milan, where several years before she had taken the veil. Her great work is "Analytical Institutions," and has been translated by the Rev. John Colson, of the University of Cambridge. This able mathematician considered "The Analytical Institutions" of Agnesi such an excellent work, that he studied Italian in order to translate it into English. At his death he left the manuscript ready for publication. The commentators of Newton were acquainted with her mathematical works, while they were in manuscript. In 1801, the works were published in two volumes, at the expense of Baron Maseres, to do honour to her memory, and also to prove that women have minds capable of comprehending the most abstruse studies. Her eulogy was pronounced in Italian by Frisé, and translated into French by Boulard. In her genius she resembled Mrs. Somerville.

AGREDA, MARIE D',

SUPERIOR of a convent at Agreda, in Spain, founded by her parents, wrote a fanatical book on the life of the Virgin Mary, which she said had been revealed to her from heaven. A translation of this extravagant book, which was prohibited at Rome, was published at Brussels in 1717. Notwithstanding the absurdities of this work, it was deemed so fascinating and dangerous by the theological faculty at Paris, that it was thought proper to censure it. A violent opposition was made to the censure by some of the doctors of the Sorbonne, which, on this important occasion, were divided into two fierce parties, to one of whom the name of Agredians was given, which they long retained. One of the propositions of this singular work was—"That God gave to the holy virgin all that he would, and would give her all that he could, and could give her all that was not of the essence of God."

Marie d'Agreda died in 1665, aged sixty-three. Great efforts were made at Rome to procure her canonization, but without effect.

AGOSTINA, THE MAID OF SARAGOSSA.

SPAIN can boast of having produced heroines from the earliest records of history. The glorious memory of the women of Saguntum and Numantia, in the time of the Romans, and of Maria Pacheco, widow of the celebrated Padilla, may be paralleled in our days by the fame of Agostina of Saragossa.

This illustrious maiden exposed her life for her king and country at the memorable siege of Saragossa in 1808. General Le Fevre had been despatched in the June of that year to reduce Saragossa, where the royal standard of the Bourbons had been unfurled. This city was not fortified; it was surrounded by an ill-constructed wall, twelve feet high by three broad, intersected by houses; these houses, the neighbouring churches and convents, were in so dilapidated a state, that from the roof to the foundation were to be seen in each immense breaches; apertures begun by time and increased by neglect. A large hill, called Il Torero, commanded the town at the distance of a mile, and offered a situation for most destructive bombardment. Among the sixty thousand inhabitants there were but two hundred and twenty regular troops, and the artillery consisted of ten old cannon.

The French began the siege in a rather slothful style; they deemed much exertion unnecessary; Saragossa, they said, was only inhabited by monks and cowards. But their opinions and their efforts were destined to an entire revolution. Very seldom in the annals of war has greater heroism, greater bravery, greater horror and misery been concentrated, than during the two months that these desperate patriots repelled their invaders. No sacrifices were too great to be offered, no extremities too oppressive to be endured by the besieged; but, as it often occurs among the noblest bodies of men, that one sordid soul may be found open to the far-reaching hand of corruption, such a wretch happened to be entrusted with a powder-magazine at Saragossa. Under the influence of French gold, he fired the magazine on the night of the 2d of June. To describe the horrors that ensued would be impossible. The French, to whom the noise of the explosion had been a signal, advanced their troops to the gates. The population, shocked, amazed, hardly knowing what had occurred, entirely ignorant of the cause, bewildered by conflagration, ruins, and the noise of the enemy's artillery unexpectedly thundering in their ears, were paralyzed, powerless; the overthrow, the slaughter of those who stood at the ramparts, seemed more like a massacre than a battle; in a short time the trenches presented nothing but a heap of dead bodies. There was no longer a combatant to be seen; nobody felt the courage to stand to the defence.

L

At this desperate moment an unknown maiden issued from the church of Nostra Donna del Pillas, habited in white raiment, a cross suspended from her neck, her dark hair dishevelled, and her eyes sparkling with supernatural lustre! She traversed the city with a bold and firm step; she passed to the ramparts, to the very spot where the enemy was pouring on to the assault; she mounted to the breach, seized a lighted match from the hand of a dying engineer, and fired the piece of artillery he had failed to manage; then kissing her cross, she cried with the accent of inspiration — “Death or victory!” and reloaded her cannon. Such a cry, such a vision, could not fail of calling up enthusiasm; it seemed that heaven had brought aid to the just cause; her cry was answered — “Long live Agostina!”

“Forward, forward, we will conquer!” resounded on every side. Nerved by such emotions, the force of every man was doubled, and the French were repulsed on all sides.

General Lefevre, mortified at this unexpected result, determined to reduce the place by famine, as well as to distress it by bombardment from Il Torero. The horrors that followed his measures would be too painful to detail, but they afforded Agostina an opportunity of displaying her intrepidity. She threw herself in the most perilous positions, to rescue the unhappy beings wounded by the bombs or by the falling of timbers. She went from house to house, visiting the wounded, binding up their hurts, or supplying aid to the sick and starving. The French, by their indomitable perseverance, had, from step to step, rendered themselves masters of nearly half the city. Lefevre thought his hour of triumph had now certainly arrived—he sent to the commandant, Palafox, to demand a capitulation. Palafox received this in public; he turned to Agostina, who stood near him, completely armed — “What shall I answer?”

The girl indignantly replied, “War to the knife!”

Her exclamation was echoed by the populace, and Palafox made her words his reply to Lefevre.

Nothing in the history of war has ever been recorded, to resemble the consequence of this refusal to capitulate. One row of houses in a street would be occupied by the Spanish, the opposite row by the French. A continual tempest of balls passed through the air; the town was a volcano; the most revolting butchery was carried on for eleven days and eleven nights. Every street, every house, was disputed with musket and poignard. Agostina ran from rank to rank, everywhere taking the most active part. The French were gradually driven back; and the dawn of the 17th of August, saw them relinquish this long-disputed prey, and take the road to Pampeluna. The triumph of the patriots—their joy, was unspeakable. Palafox rendered due honours to the brave men who had perished, and endeavoured to remunerate the few intrepid warriors who survived—among them was Agostina. But what could be offered commensurate with the services of one who had saved the city? Palafox told her to select what honours she pleased—any thing would be granted her. She modestly answered that, she begged to be allowed to retain the rank of engineer, and to have the privilege of wearing the arms of Saragossa. The rest of her life was passed in honourable poverty, until the year 1826, when she died,

"By all her country's wishes blest!"

AGUILAR, GRACE,

WAS born at Hackney, England, June, 1816. Her father was Emanuel Aguilar, a merchant descended from the Jews of Spain. Grace was the eldest child; and her delicate health, during infancy and early youth, was a source of great solicitude to her parents. She was educated almost entirely at home, her mother being her instructor till she attained the age of fourteen, when her father commenced a regular course of reading to her, while she was employed in drawing or needlework. At the age of seven she began keeping a regular journal; when she was about fifteen she wrote her first poetry; but she never permitted herself the pleasure of original composition until all her duties and her studies were performed.

Grace Aguilar was extremely fond of music; she had been taught the piano from infancy; and, in 1831, commenced the harp. She sang pleasantly, preferred English songs, invariably selecting them for the beauty or sentiment of the words. She was also passionately fond of dancing; and her cheerful, lively manners, in the society of her young friends, would scarcely have led any to imagine how deeply she felt and pondered the serious and solemn subjects which afterwards formed the labour of her life. She enjoyed all that was innocent; but the sacred feeling of duty always regulated her conduct. Her mother once expressed the wish that Grace would not waltz; and no solicitation could afterwards tempt her. Her mother also required her to read sermons, and study religion and the Bible regularly; this was done by Grace cheerfully, at first as a task, but finally with much delight; for evidence of which we will quote her own words in one of her works, "Women of Israel."

"This (reading the Bible and studying religion) formed into a habit, and persevered in for life, would in time, and without labour or weariness, give the comfort and the knowledge that we seek; each year would become brighter and more blest; each year we should discover something we knew not before; and, in the valley of the shadow of death, feel to our heart's core that the Lord our God is Truth."

The first published work of Miss Aguilar was "The Magic Wreath," a little poetical work. Soon afterwards, "Home Influences" appeared; and then, the "Women of Israel." All of these works are highly creditable to the literary taste and talents of the writer; and they have a value beyond what the highest genius could give—the stamp of truth, piety, and love, and an earnest desire to do good to her fellow-beings. The death of her father, and the cares she took on herself in comforting her mother, and sustaining the exertions of her brothers, undermined, by degrees, her delicate constitution. She went abroad for her health, and died in Frankfort, in 1847. She was buried there in the cemetery, one side of which is set apart for the Jews, the people of her faith. The stone which marks the spot bears upon it a butterfly and five stars, emblematic of the soul in heaven; and beneath appears the inscription—"Give her of the fruit of her hands, and let her own works praise her in the gates."

Her works do indeed praise her. She died at the early age of thirty-one, and was never at leisure to pursue literature as her genius would have prompted, had not her spirit been so thoroughly subjected to her womanly duties. She seems always to have striven to make her life useful. She shows this in writing chiefly for her own sex; and her productions will now be stamped with the value which her lovely character, perfected and crowned by a happy death, imparts. She could not speak for some time before her decease; but having learned to use her fingers, in the manner of the deaf and dumb, almost the last time they moved, it was to spell upon them feebly—"Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."

Since her decease, a work which she left in manuscript has been published, entitled "Woman's Friendship." The following poem is from her "Magic Wreath." Its subject will be found in the biography of Ingeborge.

"He clasp'd that slight and faded form,
Unto a heart that bled;
The monarch's tears fell thick and warm
Upon that drooping head.
Her long fair hair, long as a veil
Of faint and shadowy gold,
Around a face, which a wild tale
Of bitter anguish told.
'Oh! what avail my crown and state
When thou art from me flown!
Thy Philip's heart is desolate,
My beautiful, my own!
I cannot, cannot bid thee go;
My curse on Gregory's head!
I will proclaim him as my foe,
Though princes strike me dead.'

"My liege, my husband, heed me not,
But peace to France restore,
Oh! be this broken heart forgot,
And thou—she could no more,
She rais'd her head, that soft blue eye
Could scarce the monarch meet;
She grasped his robe—with one low sigh
Sunk fainting at his feet.
And on that pale and beauteous face
Th' imperial Philip gaz'd;
Then to a wild and strain'd embrace
That death-like form he rais'd.
One kiss, impassion'd, on her brow—
Ah! 'twill not break that sleep;
And he to whom e'en princes bow
Now turn'd aside to weep.
Oh! 'twas of power a cruel stroke
Such loving hearts to sever;
Ere Agnes from that long trance woke,
They parted—and forever."

AIGUILLON, DUCHESS D',

NIECE of the Cardinal de Richelieu, was the first lady of high rank whose house was opened to all men of letters. There men of talent were received, together with the greatest noblemen of the court. These assemblies had much influence on the manners of the French. The duchess was a woman of intelligence, piety, and the greatest generosity. After the death of Richelieu, under the direction of the devout Vincent de Paul, she united in all benevolent works. She endowed hospitals, bought slaves to set them free, liberated prisoners, and maintained missionaries in France and distant countries. She died in 1675.

AIKIN, LUCY,

AN English writer, was the only daughter of Dr. Aikin, the brother of Mrs. Barbauld. Like her father and aunt, she devoted herself to literature. Her principal works are, "Epistles on the Character of Women," "Juvenile Correspondence," "The Life of Zuinglius, the Reformer," and a "History of the Court of Queen Elizabeth." She lived in the latter part of the eighteenth and the early part of the present century. Her "Memoir" of her father, Dr. John Aikin, is a beautiful tribute of filial affection. She was enabled, by the careful education he had given her, to enjoy the pleasures of mental intercourse with him; and how well she repaid his care, this monument she has constructed to the memory of his genius and goodness is a touching and enduring proof. At the close of the Memoir, she describes the feebleness which oppressed his body, while yet his mind could enjoy, in a degree, the pleasures of intellect; and in such a way as necessarily made him entirely dependent on female care and society.

Thus it invariably is at the close of man's life, as well as at its beginning, that he must rely for his enjoyment, comfort, life even, on the love, the care, and the sympathy of woman. The more faithfully he cherishes his wife, and educates his daughters, the happier and better will he be through life, and at his dying hour.

The following are the remarks to which we alluded:—

"That life may not be prolonged beyond the power of usefulness, is one of the most natural, and apparently of the most reasonable wishes man can form for the future;—it was almost the only one which my father expressed or indulged, and I doubt not that every reader will be affected with some emotions of sympathetic regret on learning that it was in his case lamentably disappointed. To those whose daily and hourly happiness chiefly consisted in the activity and enjoyment diffused over his domestic circle by his talents and virtues, the gradual extinction of this mental light was a privation afflictive and humiliating beyond expression. But in all the trials and sorrows of life, however severe, enough of alleviation is blended to show from what quarter they proceed; and there were still circumstances which called for grateful acknowledgment. The naturally sweet and affectionate disposition of my dear father; his strictly temperate and simple habits of living, and the mastery over his passions which he had so constantly exercised, were all highly favourable circumstances; and their influence long and powerfully counteracted the irritability of disease, and caused many instructive, and many soothing and tender impressions to mingle with the anxieties and fatigues of our long and melancholy attendance.

"His literary tastes were another invaluable source of comfort; long after he was incapacitated from reading himself, he would listen with satisfaction during many hours in the day to the reading of others; poetry, in particular, exercised a kind of spell over him; Virgil and Horace he heard with delight for a considerable period, and the English poets, occasionally, to the very last. The love of children, which had always been an amiable feature in his character, likewise remained; and the sight of his young grand-children sporting around him, and courting his attention by their affectionate caresses, had often the happy effect of rousing him from a state of melancholy languor, and carrying at least a transient emotion of pleasure to his heart."

The writings of Miss Aikin are attractive from the quiet, good sense, refined taste, and kind spirit always exhibited. Her last work, "The Life of Addison," was somewhat severely criticised in regard to the accuracy of dates, and some other matters, of minor importance when compared with the value of this contribution to the memory of a good man and an accomplished scholar. The character of Mr. Addison was never before set in so favourable a light; and Miss Aikin deserves to have her memory revered by all who love to see the works which genius has left made themes of affectionate study, by one who could sympathize with the literary tastes, and benevolent feelings of the philanthropist and the author.

AÏSSÉ, DEMOIS,

Was born in Circassia, 1689, and was purchased by the count de Ferriol, the French ambassador at Constantinople, when a child of four years, for 1500 livres. The seller declared her to be a Circassian princess. She was of great beauty. The count took her with him to France, and had her taught all the accomplishments of the day. She lived with his sister, Madame de Ferriol, (see p. 313) surrounded by snares, which she happily escaped, till her fatal love for the chevalier d'Aydie, who had taken the vows at Malta. Aydie wished to obtain a release from them, but his mistress herself opposed the attempt. The fruit of this love was a daughter, born in England. Aïssé became afterwards a prey to the bitterest remorse; she tried in vain to resist her passion, and sank under the struggle between her love and her conscience. She died 1727, at the age of thirty-eight. Her letters were published, first with notes by Voltaire, and afterwards, in 1806, with the letters of Mesdames de Villars, Lafayette, and de Tencin. They are written in a pleasant, fluent strain, and contain many anecdotes of the prominent persons of her time.

AIROLA, ANGELICA VERONICA,

A GEONESE lady of high rank, who lived in the seventeenth century. She learned the art of painting from Dominico Fiasella; after which she executed some good pictures on religious subjects, most of them for the churches and convents of her native city. At the close of her life she became a nun of the order of St. Bartholomew della Olivella, at Genoa.

ALACOQUE, MARIE,

A NUN in the convent of the Visitation, at Paraillemonial, in the province of Burgundy, who was born about the middle of the seventeenth century, was celebrated for her sanctity throughout all France. She, in conjunction with Claude de la Colombière, a famous Jesuit, and confessor to the duchess of York, wife of James, afterwards James II. of England, gave a form to the celebration of the solemnity of the heart of Christ, and composed an office for the occasion. The renowned defender of the bull Unigenitus, John Joseph Languet, afterwards archbishop of Sens, was an ardent admirer of this holy fanatic, and published, in 1729, a circumstantial account of her life. She imagined that Christ appeared to her in a vision, and demanded her heart, which, when she gave him, he returned enclosed in his own, saying, "Henceforth thou shalt be the beloved of my heart." With such wild imaginings the book of the visions of Marie Alacoque is filled, but at the time they were written they had an astonishing effect. In 1674, she declared that her divine bridegroom had showed to her his heart, and told her that he was determined, in these last days, to pour out all the treasures of his love on those faithful souls who would devote themselves to an especial adoration of it; and commanded her to acquaint father la Colombière, his servant, that he should institute a yearly festival to his heart, and promise, to such as should dedicate themselves to it, eternal happiness. The Jesuits immediately complied with this celestial mandate, and in all parts of the world, fraternities were formed, and passion-masses, and nine-day devotions, were instituted to the honour of the heart of Jesus. In all Spain there was not a nun who had not a present from the Jesuits of a heart, cut out of red cloth, to be worn next the skin. The display of a burning zeal for making proselytes was regarded as the peculiar characteristic of the true worshipper of the heart.

ALBANY, or ALBANI, LOUISA,

COUNTESS of, daughter of prince Stolberg-Gedern, in Germany, was born in 1753, and married in 1772 to Charles James Edward, called the young Pretender, grandson of James II. They resided at Rome, and had a little court, by which they were addressed as king and queen. In 1780, Louisa left her husband, who was much older than herself, and with whom she did not agree, and retired to a convent. She afterwards went to France; but on her husband's death in 1788, she returned to Italy, and settled in Florence. She was then privately married to count Victor Alfieri, the Italian poet, who died at her house in 1803. She, however, still went by the name of countess of Albany, widow of the last of the Stuarts, up to the time of her death. She was fond of literature and the arts, and her house was the resort of all distinguished persons in Florence. She died there January 29th, 1824, aged seventy-two.

Her name and her misfortunes have been transmitted to posterity in the works and the autobiography of Alfieri. This famous poet called her mia donna, and confessed that to her he owed his inspiration. Without the friendship of the countess of Albany, he has said that he never should have achieved anything excellent: "Senza laquella non aurei mai fatta nulla di buono." The sketch of his first meeting with her is full of sentiment and genuine poetry. Their love for each other was true, delicate and faithful; and their ashes now repose under a common monument, in the church of Santa Croce, at Florence, between the tombs of Machiavelli and Michael Angelo.

ALBEDYHL,

BARONESS D', a Swedish writer, authoress of Gefion, an epic poem, published at Upsala, in 1814, has been called the Swedish Sévigné, from the elegance of her epistolary style.

ALBEMARLE, ANNE CLARGES,

DUCHESS of, was the daughter of a blacksmith; who gave her an education suitable to the employment she was bred to, which was that of a milliner. As the manners are generally formed early in life, she retained something of the smith's daughter, even at her highest elevation. She was first the mistress, and afterwards the wife of general Monk. He had such an opinion of her understanding, that he often consulted her in the greatest emergencies. As she was a thorough royalist, it is probable she had no inconsiderable share in the restoration of Charles II. She is supposed to have recommended several of the privy-councillors in the list which the general presented to the king soon after his landing. It is more than probable that she carried on a very lucrative trade in selling offices, which were generally filled by such as gave her most money. She was an implacable enemy to Lord Clarendon; and had so great an influence over her husband, as to prevail upon him to assist in the ruin of that great man, though he was one of his best friends. Indeed, the general was afraid to offend her, as her anger knew no bounds. Nothing is more certain than that the intrepid commander, who was never afraid of bullets, was often terrified by the fury of his wife.

ALBRET, CHARLOTTE D',

DUCHESS de Valentinois, sister of John D'Albret, king of Navarre, and wife of Cæsar Borgia, son of Pope Alexander VI., whose misfortunes she shared, without reproaching him for his vices, was pious, sensible, and witty, and had much genius for poetry. She died in 1514.

ALBRET, JEANNE D',

DAUGHTER of Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre, and his wife, the illustrious Margaret of Navarre, sister of Francis I. of France, ranks high among women distinguished for their great qualities. In 1500, when Jeanne was only eleven, she was married, against her own and her parents' wishes, to the duke of Cleves, by her uncle Francis, who feared lest her father should give her in marriage to Philip, son of the emperor of Germany, Charles V. The nuptials were never completed, and were soon declared null and void by the pope, through the intercession of the king of Navarre.

In October, 1548, Jeanne was again married, at Moulins, to Antoine de Bourbon, duke de Vendôme, to whom she bore two sons, who died in their infancy. Her third son, afterwards Henry IV. of France, was born at Pau, in Navarre, December 15th, 1553. The king of Navarre, from some whimsical ideas respecting the future character of the child, had promised his daughter to show her his will, which she was anxious to see, if, during the pangs of childbirth, she would sing a Bearnaise song. This Jeanne promised to do, and she performed her engagement, singing, in the language of Bearn, a song commencing

"Notre Dame du bout du pont, aidez moi en cette heure."

On the death of her father, May 25th, 1555, Jeanne became queen of Navarre. Like her mother, she was the protectress of the reformed religion, of which, it is believed, she would, with her husband, have made a public profession, but for the menaces of Henry II. of France, and the pope. In 1558, in consequence of the dangers that threatened them, they were compelled to make a visit to the court of France, leaving their son and their kingdom under the joint care of Susanne de Bourbon, wife to Jean d'Albret, and Louis d'Albret, bishop of Lescar. About this time, Jeanne, young, gay, and lovely, began to display less zeal than her husband in the cause of the reformers. Fond of amusements, and weary of preaching and praying, she remonstrated with her husband respecting the consequences of his zeal, which might prove the ruin of his estates. Eventually, however, Jeanne became the protectress of Calvinism, which her husband not merely renounced, but persecuted the reformers, gained over by the stratagems of Catharine de Medicis, and by advantages proposed to him by Philip II. and the court of Rome. Jeanne resisted the entreaties of her husband, and, resenting his ill-treatment of the reformers, she retired from France.

In Nov. 1562, the king of Navarre died of a wound he received at the siege of Rouen, regretting, on his death-bed, his change of religion, and declaring his resolution, if he lived, of espousing more zealously than ever the cause of the Reformation. On the following Christmas, the queen made a public proclamation of her faith, and abolished popery throughout her dominions. At the same time, she fortified Bearn against the Spaniards, who, it was reported, were plotting to surprise the city. The offices of the Roman Catholic church were prohibited throughout Bearn, its altars overthrown, and its images destroyed. Twenty ministers were recalled to instruct the people in their own language, academies were established, and the affairs of the state, both civil and ecclesiastical, were regulated by the queen.

In 1563, Jeanne had been cited to Rome by the pope; the Inquisition, in case of her non-appearance, declared her lands and lordships confiscated, and her person subjected to the penalties appointed for heresy. But the court of France revoked the citation, conceiving it militated against the liberties of the Gallican church. By the insurrections of her Roman Catholic subjects, Jeanne was kept in continual alarm; but, holding the reins of government with a vigorous hand, she rendered all their projects abortive.

In 1568, she left her dominions to join the chiefs of the Protestant party. She mortgaged her jewels to raise money for the troops, and going, with her young son, Henry, devoted from his birth to the cause of the Reformation, to Rochelle, she assembled and harangued the troops; and addressed letters to the foreign princes, and particularly to the queen of England, imploring their pity and assistance.

In the meantime, the Roman Catholics of Bearn, assisted by Charles IX., taking advantage of the absence of the queen, seized on the greater part of the country, of which, however, the count de Montgomery dispossessed them, and violated the articles of capitulation, by causing several of the leaders of the insurrection to be put to death. This breach of honour and humanity admits of no excuse.

An alliance was proposed, by the court of France, between Henry of Navarre and Margaret of Valois, sister of Charles IX., to which, by specious offers and pretences, Jeanne was induced to lend an ear; having taken a journey to Paris for the preparation of these inauspicious nuptials, she was seized with a sudden illness, and, not without suspicions of poison, expired soon after, June 10th, 1572, in the forty-fourth year of her age.

She was accustomed to say, "that arms once taken up should never be laid down, but upon one of three conditions—a safe peace, a complete victory, or an honourable death." Her daughter, Catharine, wife of the duke de Bar, continued a Protestant all her life.

Jeanne possessed a strong and vigorous understanding, a cultivated mind, and an acquaintance with the languages. She left several compositions in prose and verse. The following extemporary stanzas was made by her, on visiting the printing-press of Robert Stephens, May 21st, 1566:

"Art singulier, d'ici aux derniers ans,
Représentez aux enfans de ma race
Que j'ai suivi des craignants Dieu la trace,
Afin qu'ils soient les mêmes pas suivans."

The second is her reply to M. Ballay, who had complimented her "Impromptu" very highly:

Que mériter on ne puisse l'honneur
Qu'avez escript, je n'en suis ignorante;
Et si ne suis pour cela moins contente,
Que ce n'est moy à qui appartient l'heur
Je cognois bien le pris et la valeur
De ma louange, et cela ne me tente
D'en croire plus que ce qui se présente,
Et n'en sera de gloire enflé mon cœur;
Mais qu'un Bellay ait daigné de l'escire,
Honte je n'ay à vous et chacun dire,
Que je me tiens plus contente du tiers,
Plus satisfaite, et encor glorieuse,
Sans mériter me trouver si heureuse,
Qu'on puisse voir mon nom en vos papiers.

De leurs grands faits les rares anciens
Sont maintenant contents et glorieux,
Ayant trouvé poètes curieux
Les faire vivre, et pour tels je les tiens
Mais j'ose dire (et cela je maintiens)
Qu'encor ils ont un regret ennuyeux,
Dont ils seront sur moymesme envieux,
En gémissant aux Champs-Élyséens :
C'est qu'ils voudroient (pour certain je le scay)
Revivre ici et avoir un Bellay,
Ou qu'un Bellay de leur temps eust été
Car ce qui n'est savez si dextrement
Feindre et parer, que trop plus aisément
Le bien du bien seroit par vous chanté.

Le papier gros et l'encre trop espesse,
La plume lourde et la main bien pesante ;
Stile qui point l'oreille ne contente,
Foible argument et mots pleins de rudesse
Monstrent assez mon ignorance expresse ;
Et si n'en suis moins hardie et ardente,
Mes vers semer, si sujet se présente :
Et qui pis est, en cela je m'adresse
A vous, qui pour plus aigres les gouter,
En les meslant avecques des meilleurs,
Faictes les miens et vostres escouter.
Telle se voit difference aux couleurs :
Le blanc au gris scait bien son lustre oster.
C'est l'heur de vous, et ce sont mes malheurs

Le temps, les ans, d'armes me serviront
Pour pouvoir vaincre ma jeune ignorance,
Et dessus moy à moymesme puissance
A l'advenir, peut-estre, donneront.
Mais quand cesz ans sur mon chef doubleront
Si le hault ciel un tel age m'avance,
Gloire j'auray d'heureuse récompense,
Si puis atteindre à celles qui seront
Par leur chef-d'œuvre en los toujours vivantes
Mais tel cuider seroit trop plein d'audace,
Bien suffira si près leurs excellentes
Vertus je puis trouver une petite place.
Encor je sens mes forces languissantes,
Pour espérer du ciel tel heur et grace."

ALBRIZZI, TEOTOCHI ISABELLA.

THIS lady, of much celebrity for her talents, was born on the island of Corfu, of one of the most illustrious families of that island. Her father, count Spinosi Teotochi, was for many years president of the senate of the Ionian islands. At a very early age, Isabella was married to Carlo Marino, a Venetian nobleman, whom she accompanied to Italy, which she never left again during her life.

Marino was a man of letters, and the author of a history of Venetian commerce; it was his society and guidance which determined the literary bent of her mind, and gave the first impetus to her studious habits; but his existence was prematurely terminated, and her subsequent union with the count Albrizzi placed her in a situation where her talents and tastes obtained complete development. Her house at Venice became the resort of all the noted characters resident in Italy, or visiting its storied land. Lord Byron, Cuvier, Canova, Denon, Foscolo and Humboldt, were the habitués of her saloon. Byron called her the Venetian De Stael. She possessed that fine tact that belongs to a feeling heart, combined with the courtesy which a life passed in good society bestows. It was observed, that amid the concourse of strangers, artists, authors, and notable persons of every sort and nation—and even Chinese have been seen at her conversazione—nobody, however obscure, was ever neglected; nobody left her house without an agreeable impression. She has written one very interesting work, "Life of Vittoria Colonna," in which simplicity and elegance are remarkably combined. A little work, in which she has defended the "Mirza of Alfieri" against the attacks of a celebrated critic, has been highly praised. The "Portraits of Celebrated Contemporaries," from the subject, the author, and its intrinsic merits, became justly popular. "The Observations upon the Works of Canova," a book inspired by friendship, manifests a judicious taste for the arts; is full of instruction for strangers, and interest for philosophic and poetic minds.

As a mother, her devotion was complete and her intelligence admirable. She gave unwearied pains to the moral and intellectual education of her children, and administered their property with consummate ability. Nor did these loving cares go unrewarded; she had the happiness of possessing in her sons, tender and congenial friends, in seeing them partake with her, the general esteem, and in her last painful malady, their assiduity and filial affection softened the pangs of death, and smoothed her passage to the tomb.

ALOYSIA, SIGEA,

Of Toledo, a Spanish lady, and celebrated for her learning, who wrote a letter to Paul III., the pope of Rome, in 1540, in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, and Syriac. She was afterwards called to the court of Portugal, where she composed several works, and died young.

ALTOVITI, MARSEILLE D',

A FLORENTINE lady, who settled at Marseilles, and devoted herself to writing Italian poetry. She died in 1609.

AMELIA, ANNA,

DUCHESS of Weimar, was a German princess, highly distinguished for her talents and virtues, whose patronage was powerfully exerted for the improvement of taste and learning among her countrymen. She was the daughter of the duke of Brunswick, and the niece of Frederick II. of Prussia. Her birth took place October 24th, 1739. At the age of seventeen, she was married to the duke of Weimar, who left her a widow, after a union of about two years. The commencement of the seven years' war, which then took place, rendered her situation peculiarly embarrassing, as, while herself a minor, she was called to the guardianship of her infant son, the sovereign of the little state over which she presided. To add to her difficulties, she found herself obliged, as a princess of the empire, to take part against her uncle, the great Frederick. But he treated her personally with great respect, and though her provinces suffered severely, they were preserved from absolute ruin. When peace was established, she directed her cares to the education of her sons, and the public affairs of the duchy. Her regency was attended with great advantages to the country. In the administration of justice, the management of the revenue, in public establishments, she was alike sedulous; and under her fostering patronage a new spirit sprang up among her people, and diffused its influence over the north of Germany. Foreigners of distinction, artists, and men of learning, were attracted to her court, either as visitors or fixed residents. The use of a large library was given to the public; a new theatre erected, and provision was made for the improved education of youth. The university of Jena underwent a revision, and the liberality of the princess was exerted in modifying and extending the establishment. She delighted in the society of men of talents and literature, and succeeded in drawing within the circle of her influence many individuals of high celebrity. The city of Weimar became the resort of the most distinguished literary men of Germany, whom the duchess encouraged, by her liberal patronage, to come and reside at her court. Wieland, Herder, Schiller, and Goethe, formed a constellation of genius of which any city might be proud. They all held some distinguished office about her court. The duchess withdrew, in 1775, from public life, having given up the sovereign authority to her eldest son, then of age. Her health, which had suffered from a recent severe attack of illness, made this retirement desirable; and she also anticipated great gratification from the study of those arts to which she had always been attached, especially music, with which she was intimately acquainted. The conclusion of her life was clouded by misfortune; and the deaths of several of her relatives, the ruin of royal houses with which she was connected, and the miseries occasioned by the French invasion of Germany, contributed to embitter the last moments of her existence. She died in April, 1807, and was interred on the 19th of that month at Weimar.

AMMANATI, LAURA BATTIFERRI,

WIFE of Bartholemew Ammanati, a Florentine sculptor and architect, was daughter of John Anthony Battiferri, and born at Urbino, in 1513. She became celebrated for her genius and learning. Her poems are highly esteemed. She was one of the members of the Introvati Academy at Sienna; and died at Florence, in 1589, aged seventy-six.

She is considered one of the best Italian poets of the sixteenth century.

ANDREINI, ISABELLA,

Was born at Padua, in 1653. She became an actress of great fame, and was flattered by the applauses of men of wit and learning of her time. The Italian theatre was considered, in that day, a literary institution. She is described as a woman of elegant figure, beautiful countenance, and melodious voice; of taste in her profession, and conversant with the French and Spanish languages; nor was she unacquainted with philosophy and the sciences. She was a votary of the muses, and cultivated poetry with ardour and success. The Intenti academicians of Pavia, conferred upon her the honours of their society, and the title of Isabella Andreini, Comica Gelosa, Academica Intenta, detta l'Accessa. She dedicated her works to cardinal Aldobrandini, (nephew to pope Clement VIII.) by whom she was greatly esteemed, and for whom many of her poems were composed. In France, whither she made a tour, she met with a most flattering reception from the king, the queen, and the court. She died in 1604, at Lyons, in the forty-second year of her age. Her husband was overwhelmed with affliction at her loss, and erected a monument to her memory, in the city in which she expired, inscribed with an epitaph commemorative of her virtues. The learned strove to outdo each other in pronouncing panegyrics on her character. Even a medal was struck, with this inscription, "Æterna Fama."

Her works are numerous, and still much admired by the lovers of Italian literature; they are readily found in print. She left a son, born in 1578, who was also a poet; he wrote, among other things, "Adamo," a sacred drama, in five acts, with chorusses, &c., Milan, 1613, and 1617, with prints, designed by Carlo Antonio Proccachini, a celebrated landscape painter of his time, and of the school of the Carracci; but in a wretched style, Paradise being represented as full of clipt hedges, squares, parterres, straight walks, &c. But what is more interesting, Voltaire, in his visit to England, in 1727, suggested that Milton took his hint of his Paradise Lost from this drama. This obtained little credit at the time, and was contemptuously rejected by Dr. Johnson, in his Life of Milton. Mr. Hayley, however, has revived the question, and with considerable advantage to Voltaire's supposition; and it seems now to be the opinion, that the coincidence between Andreini's plan and Milton's, is too great to be the effect of chance. But the "Adamo" is here only of importance as showing the influence of the talents of the mother in forming the mind of her son. Her "Æterna Fama" was his inspiration.

ANGUSCIOLA, SOPHONISBA,

BETTER known by the name of Sophonisba, an Italian painter of great eminence, both in portrait and historical painting, was born at Cremona in 1533, and died at Genoa in 1626. She was twice married. She was of a very distinguished family, and was first taught by Bernardino Campo of Cremona, and afterwards learned perspective and colouring from Bernardo Gatti, called Soraio. Her principal works are portraits, yet she executed several historical subjects with great spirit; the attitudes of her figures are easy, natural, and graceful. She became blind through over-application to her profession, but she enjoyed the friendship of some of the greatest characters of the day. Vandyck acknowledged himself more benefited by her than by all his other studies. Some of the principal works by this artist are the "Marriage of St. Catharine," and a portrait of herself, playing on the harpsichord with an old female attendant in waiting.

ANGUSCIOLA, LUCIA,

SISTER of the above-mentioned, was an artist of considerable skill. She obtained a reputation equal to Sophonisba's, by her portraits, as well for truth and delicacy of colouring, as for ease of attitude and correctness of resemblance.

ANNA IWANOWNA,

EMPRESS of Russia, was the second daughter of the czar Iwan, or John, the elder brother, and for some time the associate of Peter the Great. She was born February 8th, 1694. In 1710 she married Frederic William, duke of Courland, who died in 1711. On the death of the emperor Peter II., in 1730, she was declared empress by the council of state, the senate, and the principal military officers at Moscow. They passed over her elder sister, the duchess of Mecklenburg, and the princess Elizabeth, daughter of Peter the Great, and afterwards empress, thinking that, with Anna for an empress, they might reduce the government to a limited monarchy; but they were unsuccessful in their intrigues, for though she consented to all the required conditions, yet when she felt her position secure, she annulled her promises, and declared herself empress and autocrat of all the Russias.

The empress Anna had a good share of the ability which has long distinguished the imperial family of Russia; and managed the affairs of the empire with superior judgment. She was not, however, a very popular sovereign, owing to the many oppressive acts of her favourite Biron, a minion whom she had raised from a low condition to be duke of Courland. She discountenanced the drunkenness in which both sexes used to indulge; only one nobleman was allowed, as a special favour, to drink as much as he pleased; and she also discouraged gaming. Her favourite amusements were music and the theatre. The first Italian opera was played at St. Petersburg, in her reign. She also directed the famous palace of ice to be built. She died in 1740.

ANN AMELIA,

PRINCESS of Prussia, sister to Frederick the Great, born in 1723, died 1787. She distinguished herself by her taste for the arts. She set to music "The Death of the Messiah" by Romler. She was a decided friend to the far-famed baron Trenck; and there can be no doubt, that this attachment for the princess, was the cause of Trenck's misfortunes. Frederick was incensed that a subject should aspire to the hand of his sister. She continued her attachment to Trenck when both had grown old, and Frederick was in his grave, but death prevented her from providing for Trenck's children as she intended.

ANNE OF AUSTRIA,

QUEEN of Louis XIII. of France, and regent during the minority of Louis XIV., was daughter of Philip II. of Spain, and was married to Louis XIII. in 1615. Anne found a powerful enemy in cardinal Richelieu, who had great influence over the king, and she was compelled to yield, as long as he lived, to the great minister.

Had Anne possessed greater talents, or been more agreeable, the case might have been different; but her coldness and gravity of demeanour, which only covered frivolity, alienated Louis XIII. Her attachment to her native country was also represented as a crime by the cardinal, and his whispers as to her betraying intelligence, brought upon Anne the ignominy of having her person searched, and her papers seized.

When it was known that the queen was in disgrace, the malcontent nobles, with Gaston, the king's brother, at their head, rallied around her, and she was implicated in a conspiracy against Louis XIII. Richelieu took advantage of this, to represent her as wishing to get rid of Louis to marry Gaston; and Anne was compelled to appear before the king's counsel to answer this grave charge. Her dignity here came to her aid, and, scorning to make a direct reply, she merely observed, contemptuously, "That too little was to be gained by the change, to render such a design on her part probable." The duke of Buckingham's open court to the neglected queen, also gave rise to malicious reports.

On the death of Louis XIII., Anne, as mother of the infant king, held the undisputed reins; and she gave one great proof of wisdom in her choice of cardinal Mazarin as a minister. However, some oppressive acts of Mazarin gave birth to a popular insurrection, which terminated in a civil war, called the war of the Fronde, in which Anne, her minister, and their adherents, were opposed to the nobility, the citizens, and the people of Paris. But Anne and Mazarin came off triumphant. The result of this rebellion, and of Anne of Austria's administration, was, that the nobles and middle classes, vanquished in the field, were never afterwards able to resist the royal power, up to the great revolution. Anne's influence over the court of France continued a long time; her Spanish haughtiness, her love of ceremonial, and of power, were impressed on the mind of her son, Louis XIV. Some modern French writers have pretended to find reasons for believing this proud queen was secretly married to cardinal Mazarin, her favourite adviser and friend. But no sufficient testimony, to establish the fact of such a strange union, has been adduced. The queen died in 1666, aged sixty-four. She was a very handsome woman, and celebrated for the beauty of her hands and arms.

Anne of Austria appears to have been estimable for the goodness and kindness of her heart, rather than for extraordinary capacity; for the attractions of the woman rather than the virtues of the queen; a propensity to personal attachments, and an amiable and forgiving temper, were her distinguishing characteristics. A woman who procured her subsistence by singing infamous songs, exposed to sale one grossly reflecting on the queen. This woman, after having exercised her odious profession for some time, was committed to prison. Anne, hearing of the miserable situation to which the wretch who had defamed her was abandoned, secretly sent to her abundant relief. The last favour which the queen-mother exacted from her son, was to recal a gentleman by whom she had been libelled.

In a history of the press of Caille, an anecdote appears, by which it may be seen that Anne of Austria loved literature, and sustained its freedom and dignity. Antoine Berthier, librarian of Paris, having formed a design to add to the life of Cardinal Richelieu two volumes of letters and memoirs, which he had carefully collected, addressed himself to the regent, to whom he intimated that, without a powerful protection, he dared not hazard the publication, as many persons still living and received with favour at court, were freely treated in this collection. "Proceed without fear," replied she, "and make so many blush for vice, that, for the future, virtue only may find repose in France."

The life of this queen had been marked with vicissitude, and clouded by disquiet. At one period, subjected by an imperious minister, whose yoke she had not the resolution to throw off, she became an object of compassion even to those who caballed and revolted against her; yet her affections were never alienated from France, in favour of which she interested herself, with spirit and zeal, in the war against her native country. The French, at length, relinquished their prejudices, and did her justice. The latter years of her life were passed in tranquillity, in retirement, and in the exercise of benevolence.

The following curious portrait, in which, with an affectation of antithesis, some malice and prejudice seem manifested, is drawn of her by Cardinal de Retz:—"The queen had, beyond any person I have ever seen, that kind of wit which is necessary not to appear a fool to those unacquainted with her. She possessed more sharpness than pride, more pride than grandeur, more of manner than solidity, more avidity for money than liberality, more liberality than selfishness, more attachment than passion, more of hardness than fierceness, a memory more retentive of injuries than benefits, more desire of being pious than piety, more obstinacy than firmness, and more of incapacity than of any of the foregoing qualities."

Anne of Austria was interred at St. Denis; her heart was carried to Le Val de Grace, of which she had been the foundress; and the following epitaph was made on her:

"Sister, wife, mother, daughter of kings! Never was any more worthy of these illustrious titles"

A N N E

QUEEN of England, second daughter of James II by his first wife Anne Hyde, was born at Twickenham on the 6th of February, 1664. She was educated in the religion of the church of England; and, in 1683, married prince George, brother of Christian V., king of Denmark. At the revolution in 1688, Anne and her husband adhered to the dominant party of her brother-in-law William III.; and, by act of settlement, the English crown was guaranteed to her and her children in default of issue to William and Mary. But all her children died in infancy or early youth.

Anne ascended the throne on the death of William in 1702; and two months afterwards, England, the Empire, and Holland, declared war against France and Spain; in which Marlborough and Peterborough, the English generals, and Leake, Rooke, Shovel, and Stanhope, the English admirals, greatly distinguished themselves. During the brilliant course of Marlborough's conquests, the spirit of political intrigue, which was perhaps never more fully developed than in the latter years of the reign of Anne, was stifled by the enthusiasm of the people. But as the war of the succession proceeded with few indications of its being brought to an end, the great commander of the English forces gradually lost his popularity, from the belief that his own avarice and ambition were the principal causes of the burdens which the war necessarily entailed upon the nation. A formidable party, too, had arisen, who asserted the supremacy of the church and the doctrine of the right divine of kings and the passive obedience of subjects — opinions which had expelled James II. from his kingdom, and had placed his childless daughter upon the throne. These opinions, however, were supposed to be indirectly encouraged by the queen, and were exceedingly popular amongst a passionate and unreasoning people.

In July, 1706, the legislative union of Scotland and England was completed, which was mainly owing to the earnest and steady efforts of the queen in favour of the union. Anne was all her life under the control of her favourites, first of the duchess of Marlborough, and afterwards of Mrs. Masham. The duchess of Marlborough, a woman of the most imperious, ambitious, avaricious, and disagreeable character, kept the queen in a state of subjection or terror for more than twenty years. The detail of the scenes occurring between them would hardly be believed, were it not authenticated by careful writers. Miss Strickland, in her "History of the Queens of England," has given this curious subject a thorough examination.

Anne was mother of seventeen children, all of whom died young. When left a widow, she would not listen to the entreaties of the parliament (although but forty-four years old at the time) to conclude another marriage, which might throw new obstacles in the way of the restoration of her own family. She now intended to put all power into the hands of the tories, who were then the majority in the three kingdoms. The duchess of Marlborough lost her influence; Godolphin, Sunderland, Somers, Devonshire, Walpole, Cowper, were superseded by Harley, earl of Oxford; Bolingbroke, Rochester, Buckingham, George Grenville, and Sir Simon Harcourt; and the parliament was dissolved. Peace was resolved upon. Marlborough was accused, suspended and banished. Meanwhile Anne, notwithstanding the measures which she publicly took against her brother, seems not to have given up the hope of securing to him the succession; but the irreconcilable enmity of Oxford and Bolingbroke, the former of whom accused the latter of favouring the Pretender, was an insurmountable obstacle.

Grieved at the disappointment of her secret wishes, the queen fell into a state of weakness and lethargy, and died July 20th, 1714. The words, "O, my dear brother, how I pity thee!" which she pronounced on her death-bed, unveiled the secret of her whole life. The reign of Anne was distinguished not only by the brilliant successes of the British arms, but also as the golden age of English literature, on account of the number of admirable and excellent writers who flourished at this time; among whom were Pope and Addison.

It may be considered the triumph of the English high-church party, owing to her strong predilection for the principles by which it has always been actuated. Her private character was amiable; but her good sense was rendered ineffectual from the want of energy. The kindness of her disposition obtained for her the title of the good queen Anne. She was an excellent wife and mother, and a kind mistress.

The common people loved her well, a sure proof of her real worth as a woman and a sovereign. So strong was this feeling of veneration for her character and memory, that for many years after her death her name had power to agitate or excite them. In the reign of George I., Edmund Curl was set in the pillory for some of his libellous publications, and told the mob, who surrounded him, "that he was put there for speaking well of the memory of good queen Anne." Upon hearing this, the people (mob in English parlance) not only laid aside the missiles with which they had come prepared to pelt him, but they waited patiently till he had stood his appointed time, and then "escorted him to his own house with great respect." Anne deserved this love of her people, because in all her conduct she showed that her wish was to do them good. Unhappily for them, she had not the energy to do what she would willingly have had done. The education of the poor was at that time utterly neglected. The queen endeavoured to have the abuses of the "charity schools" rectified; but her appeal to the archbishop of Canterbury, though she wrote a letter to him herself, was unavailing.

One remarkable feature in the literary progress of that age must not be forgotten. Miss Strickland thus describes it:

"In the first year of the reign of Anne, an annual was established called the Ladies' Diary, or Women's almanack; according to its prospectus 'containing directions for love, marriage, preserving (not hearts, but plums and gooseberries), cookery, perfumery, bills of fare, and many other concerns peculiar to the fair sex.' The editor's description of this unique performance throws some light on the domestic customs of an age little known though very near. There was a copy of verses in praise of queen Anne, which were actually spoken 'in the lord-mayor's parlor by one of the blue-coat boys (at the last thanksgiving-day, about the Vigo business), with universal applause.' Then the calendar, with the common notes of the year, the times when marriage comes in and out, and the eclipses all in one page. A 'picture of the queen in copper' (that is, a copperplate engraving), very well performed. The rest of the literature consisted of 'delightful tales.' The preface was a dissertation on the happiness of England, enjoyed under the reign of queen Elizabeth and the present queen (Anne). Many ardent aspirations the worthy editor made to obtain the lives of celebrated queens, more particularly queens of England, and he even names Margaret of Anjou on his list, but gives up the undertaking on the most solemn conviction 'that no dates of birth or death can be found for any queen excepting queen Elizabeth and queen Anne.' 'This being the first almanac printed for the use of the fair sex, and under the reign of a glorious woman,' saith Mr. Tipper, 'some would advise me to dedicate it to the queen, with some such dedication as this:

"To the queen's most excellent majesty. This Ladies' Diary, or Woman's Almanack, being the first ever published for the peculiar use of the fair sex, is, with all humility, dedicated to your most sacred majesty."

The work was successful; the oldest of all English annuals by at least a hundred years, it is the survivor of most of them. The "Ladies' Diary" is published to this day—the only mathematical periodical in Great Britain. Thus the "good queen Anne" deserves that her memory be kindly regarded by her own sex, for the encouragement she gave to female talent, when so little estimation was awarded it. Two celebrated women flourished in her reign, Mary Astell, and Elizabeth Elstob.

ANNE OF FERRARA,

DAUGHTER of Hercules II., duke of Ferrara, married, in 1549, Francis duke of Guise, and behaved with great spirit and courage during the wars of the League. She was imprisoned for some time at Blois.

ANNE DE GONZAGUE,

WIFE of Edward count Palatine, died at Paris, in 1684, aged sixty-eight; and was honoured with an eulogium by the celebrated Bossuet.

ARBLAY, MADAME D',

BETTER known to the world as Frances Burney, was the second daughter of Dr. Burney, author of a "History of Music." She was born at Lynn-Regis, in the county of Norfolk, England, on the 13th of June, 1752. Her father was organist at Lynn, but in 1760 he removed to London, his former residence; where he numbered among his familiar friends Garrick, Barry the artist, the poets Mason and Armstrong, and other celebrated characters.

Fanny, though at the age of eight she did not know her letters, yet was shrewd and observant; and as soon as she could read, commenced to scribble. At fifteen she had written several tales, unknown to any one but her sister.

The only regular instruction she ever received, was when she was, together with her sister Susanna, placed for a short period at a boarding-school in Queen Square, that they might be out of the way during their mother's last illness; and when the melancholy tidings of this lady's death were communicated to them, the agony of Frances, though then but nine years of age, was so great that the governess declared she had never met with a child of such intense feelings.

But though she received little regular education, there was no want of industry and application on her part; for, at an early age, she became acquainted with the best authors in her father's library, of which she had the uncontrolled range; and she was accustomed to write extracts from, and remarks upon, the books she read, some of which it is said would not have disgraced her maturer judgment.

She had also the advantage of the example of her father's own industry and perseverance, to stimulate her to exertion; for Dr. Burney, notwithstanding his numerous professional engagements as a teacher of music, studied and acquired the French and Italian languages on horseback, from pocket grammars and vocabularies he had written out for the purpose.

In the French language his daughter Frances received some instructions from her sister Susanna, who was educated in France; and in Latin, at a later period, she had some lessons from Dr. Johnson himself, though it must be confessed, she does not seem to have taken much delight in this study—applying to that learned language rather to please her tutor than herself.

Dr. Burney had, at the period of her youth, a large circle of intellectual and even literary acquaintance, and at his house often congregated an agreeable but miscellaneous society, including, besides many eminent for literature, several accomplished foreigners, together with native artists and scientific men; and his children, emancipated from the restraints of a school-room, were allowed to be present at, and often to take a share in, the conversation of their father's guests; by which their minds were opened, their judgments enlightened, and their attention turned to intellectual pursuits; perhaps in a far greater degree than if they had regularly undergone all the drudgery of the usual routine of what is termed "education."

The following is a comparative sketch of the character of Miss Frances Burney, drawn about this period by her younger sister, Susanna, afterwards Mrs. Phillips,—to whom her diary was subsequently addressed.

"Sister Fanny is unlike her [Hester Burney, the eldest daughter] in almost everything, yet both are very amiable, and love each other as sincerely as ever sisters did. The characteristics of Hetty seem to be wit, generosity, and openness of heart; Fanny's, sense, sensibility, and bashfulness, and even a degree of prudery. Her understanding is superior, but her diffidence gives her a bashfulness before company with whom she is not intimate, which is a disadvantage to her. My eldest sister shines in conversation, because, though very modest, she is totally free from any mauvaise honte; were Fanny equally so, I am persuaded she would shine no less. I am afraid my eldest sister is too communicative, and that my sister Fanny is too reserved. They are both charming girls—des filles comme il y en a peu."

Dr. Burney was at this period accustomed to employ his daughters in copying out his manuscripts for the press, tracing over and over again the same page, with the endless alterations his critical judgment suggested. Upon these occasions Frances was his principal amanuensis, and thus she became early initiated in all the mysteries of publication, which was of much advantage to her when she began to write for the press.

At seventeen, Miss Burney wrote "Evelina," her first published novel, and now considered by good judges her best work; though "Cecilia" is the more highly finished. "Evelina" was published in 1778, and soon became popular in London. Its author did not long remain unknown, and Miss Burney attained a celebrity few young novel-writers have ever enjoyed. She was introduced to Dr. Johnson, and speedily gained an enviable place in his favour. He appreciated very justly, both the abilities and moral excellence of Miss Burney. On one occasion, speaking of her work, he observes, "Evelina seems a work that should result from long experience, and deep and intimate knowledge of the world; yet it has been written without either. Miss Burney is a real wonder. What she is, she is intuitively. Dr. Burney told me she had the fewest advantages of any of his daughters, from some peculiar circumstances. And such has been her timidity, that he himself had not any suspicion of her powers. * * * Modesty with her is neither pretence nor decorum; it is an ingredient in her nature; for she who could part with such a work for twenty pounds, could know so little of its worth or of her own, as to leave no possible doubt of her humility."

Miss Burney's next publication was "Cecilia," which work called forth an eulogium from the celebrated Mr. Burke. In a letter to Miss Burney he says, "There are few—I believe I may say fairly there are none at all—that will not find themselves better informed concerning human nature, and their stock of observations enriched, by reading your 'Cecilia.' " * * * "I might trespass on your delicacy if I should fill my letter to you with what I fill my conversation to others; I should be troublesome to you alone if I should tell you all I feel and think on the natural vein of humour, the tender pathetic, the comprehensive and noble moral, and the sagacious observation, that appear quite throughout this extraordinary performance."

In a few years after this, Miss Burney, through the favourable representations made concerning her by her venerable friend Mrs. Delany, was invited to accept a place in the household of queen Charlotte. A popular writer thus sketches the result, and the subsequent events of her chequered life:

"The result was, that in 1786 our authoress was appointed second keeper of the robes to queen Charlotte, with a salary of £200 a-year, a footman, apartments in the palace, and a coach between her and her colleague. The situation was only a sort of splendid slavery. 'I was averse to the union,' said Miss Burney, 'and I endeavoured to escape it; but my friends interfered—they prevailed—and the knot is tied.' The queen appears to have been a kind and considerate mistress; but the stiff etiquette and formality of the court, and the unremitting attention which its irksome duties required, rendered the situation peculiarly disagreeable to one who had been so long flattered and courted by the brilliant society of her day. Her colleague, Mrs. Schwellenberg, a coarse-minded, jealous, disagreeable German favourite, was also a perpetual source of annoyance to her; and poor Fanny at court was worse off than her heroine Cecilia was in choosing among her guardians. Her first official duty was to mix the queen's snuff, and keep her box always replenished, after which she was promoted to the great business of the toilet, helping her majesty off and on with her dresses, and being in strict attendance from six or seven in the morning till twelve at night! From this grinding and intolerable destiny Miss Burney was emancipated by her marriage, in 1793, with a French refugee officer, the Count D'Arblay. She then resumed her pen, and in 1795 produced a tragedy, entitled 'Edwin and Elgitha,' which was brought out at Drury Lane, and possessed at least one novelty—there were three bishops among the dramatis personæ. Mrs. Siddons personated the heroine, but in the dying scene, where the lady is brought from behind a hedge to expire before the audience, and is afterwards carried once more to the back of the hedge, the house was convulsed with laughter! Her next effort was her novel of 'Camilla,' which she published by subscription, and realized by it no less than three thousand guineas. In 1802 Madame D'Arblay accompanied her husband to Paris. The count joined the army of Napoleon, and his wife was forced to remain in France till 1812, when she returned and purchased, from the proceeds of her novel, a small but handsome villa, named Camilla Cottage. Her success in prose fiction urged her to another trial, and in 1814 she produced 'The Wanderer,' a tedious tale in five volumes, which had no other merit than that of bringing the authoress the large sum of £1500. The only other literary labour of Madame D'Arblay was a memoir of her father, Dr. Burney, published in 1832. Her husband and her son (the Rev. A. D'Arblay of Camden Town chapel, near London) both predeceased her—the former in 1818, and the latter in 1837. Three years after this last melancholy bereavement, Madame D'Arblay herself paid the debt of nature, dying at Bath, in January, 1840, at the great age of eighty-eight. Her 'Diary and Letters' edited by her niece, were published in 1842, in five volumes. If judiciously condensed, this work would have been both entertaining and valuable; but at least one half of it is filled with small unimportant details and private gossip, and the self-admiring weakness of the authoress shines out in almost every page. The early novels of Miss Burney form the most pleasing memorials of her name and history. In them we see her quick in discernment, lively in invention, and inimitable, in her own way, in portraying the humours and oddities of English society. Her good sense and correct feeling are more remarkable than her passion. Her love scenes are prosaic enough, but in 'showing up' a party of 'vulgarly genteel' persons, painting the characters in a drawing-room, or catching the follies and absurdities that float on the surface of fashionable society, she has rarely been equalled. She deals with the palpable and familiar; and though society has changed since the time of 'Evelina,' and the glory of Ranelagh and Marylebone Gardens has departed, there is enough of real life in her personages, and real morality in her lessons, to interest, amuse, and instruct. Her sarcasm, drollery, and broad humour, must always be relished."

We will now give a few extracts from the first and the last works of this interesting writer.

From "Evelina."

A PRETENDED HIGHWAY ROBBERY.

"When we had been out near two hours, and expected every moment to stop at the place of our destination, I observed that Lady Howard's servant, who attended us on horseback, rode on forward till he was out of sight, and soon after returning, came up to the chariot window, and delivering a note to Madame Duval, said he had met a boy who was just coming with it to Howard Grove, from the clerk of Mr. Tyrell.

"While she was reading it, he rode round to the other window, and, making a sign for secrecy, put into my hand a slip of paper, on which was written, 'Whatever happens, be not alarmed, for you are safe, though you endanger all mankind!'

"I really imagined that Sir Clement must be the author of this note, which prepared me to expect some disagreeable adventure: but I had no time to ponder upon it, for Madame Duval had no sooner read her own letter, than, in an angry tone of voice, she exclaimed, 'Why, now, what a thing is this; here we're come all this way for nothing!'

"She then gave me the note, which informed her that she need not trouble herself to go to Mr. Tyrell's, as the prisoner had had the address to escape. I congratulated her upon this fortunate incident; but she was so much concerned at having rode so far in vain, that she seemed less pleased than provoked. However, she ordered the man to make what haste he could home, as she hoped at least to return before the captain should suspect what had passed.

"The carriage turned about, and we journeyed so quietly for near an hour that I began to flatter myself we should be suffered to proceed to Howard Grove without further molestation, when, suddenly, the footman called out, 'John, are we going right?'

"'Why, I ain't sure,' said the coachman; 'but I'm afraid we turned wrong.'

"'What do you mean by that, sirrah?' said Madame Duval; 'why, if you lose your way, we shall be all in the dark.'

"'I think we should turn to the left,' said the footman.

"'To the left!' answered the other; 'No, no; I'm pretty sure we should turn to the right.'

"'You had better make some inquiry,' said I.

"'Ma foi,' cried Madame Duval, 'we're in a fine hole here; they neither of them know no more than the post. However, I'll tell my lady as sure as you're born, so you'd better find the way.'

"'Let's try this road,' said the footman.

"'No,' said the coachman, 'that's the road to Canterbury; we had best go straight on.'

"'Why, that's the direct London road,' returned the footman, 'and will lead us twenty miles about.'

"'Pardie,' cried Madame Duval; 'why, they won't go one way nor t'other; and, now we're come all this jaunt for nothing, I suppose we shan't get home to night.'

"'Let's go back to the public-house,' said the footman, 'and ask for a guide.'

"'No, no,' said the other; 'if we stay here a few minutes, somebody or other will pass by; and the horses are almost knocked up already.'

"'Well, I protest,' cried Madame Duval, 'I'd give a guinea to see them sots horse-whipped. As sure as I'm alive they're drunk. Ten to one but they'll overturn us next.'

"After much debating, they at length agreed to go on till we came to some inn, or met with a passenger who could direct us. We soon arrived at a small farm-house, and the footman alighted and went into it.

"In a few minutes he returned, and told us we might proceed, for that he had procured a direction. 'But,' added he, 'it seems there are some thieves hereabouts, and so the best way will be for you to leave your watches and purses with the farmer, whom I know very well, and who is an honest man, and a tenant of my lady's.'

"'Thieves!' cried Madame Duval, looking aghast; 'the Lord help us! I've no doubt but we shall be all murdered!'

"The farmer came to us, and we gave him all we were worth, and the servants followed our example. We then proceeded, and Madame Duval's anger so entirely subsided, that, in the mildest manner imaginable, she entreated them to make haste, and promised to tell their lady how diligent and obliging they had been. She perpetually stopped them to ask if they apprehended any danger, and was at length so much overpowered by her fears, that she made the footman fasten his horse to the back of the carriage, and then come and seat himself within it. My endeavours to encourage her were fruitless; she sat in the middle, held the man by the arm, and protested that if he did but save her life, she would make his fortune. Her uneasiness gave me much concern, and it was with the utmost difficulty I forbore to acquaint her that she was imposed upon; but the mutual fear of the captain's resentment to me, and of her own to him, neither of which would have any moderation, deterred me. As to the footman, he was evidently in torture from restraining his laughter, and I observed that he was frequently obliged to make most horrid grimaces from pretended fear, in order to conceal his risibility.

"Very soon after, 'The robbers are coming!' cried the coachman.

"The footman opened the door, and jumped out of the chariot.

"Madame Duval gave a loud scream.

"I could no longer preserve my silence. 'For heaven's sake, my dear madam,' said I, 'don't be alarmed; you are in no danger; you are quite safe; there is nothing but——'

"Here the chariot was stopped by two men in masks, who, at each side, put in their hands, as if for our purses. Madame Duval sunk to the bottom of the chariot, and implored their mercy. I shrieked involuntarily, although prepared for the attack: one of them held me fast, while the other tore poor Madame Duval out of the carriage, in spite of her cries, threats, and resistance.

"I was really frightened, and trembled exceedingly. 'My angel!' cried the man who held me, 'you cannot surely be alarmed. Do you not know me? I shall hold myself in eternal abhorrence if I have really terrified you.'

"'Indeed, Sir Clement, you have,' cried I; 'but, for heaven's sake, where is Madame Duval?—why is she forced away?'

"'She is perfectly safe; the captain has her in charge; but suffer me now, my adored Miss Anville, to take the only opportunity that is allowed me to speak upon another, a much dearer, much sweeter subject.'

"And then he hastily came into the chariot, and seated himself next to me. I would fain have disengaged myself from him, but he would not let me. 'Deny me not, most charming of women,' cried he—'deny me not this only moment lent me to pour forth my soul into your gentle ears, to tell you how much I suffer from your absence, how much I dread your displeasure, and how cruelly I am affected by your coldness!'

"'Oh, sir, this is no time for such language; pray, leave me; pray, go to the relief of Madame Duval; I cannot bear that she should be treated with such indignity.'

"'And will you—can you command my absence? When may I speak to you, if not now?—does the captain suffer me to breathe a moment out of his sight?—and are not a thousand impertinent people for ever at your elbow?'

"'Indeed, Sir Clement, you must change your style, or I will not hear you. The impertinent people you mean are among my best friends, and you would not, if you really wished me well, speak of them so disrespectfully.'

"'Wish you well! Oh, Miss Anville, point but out to me how in what manner I may convince you of the fervour of my passion—tell me but what services you will accept from me, and you shall find my life, my fortune, my whole soul at your devotion.'

"'I want nothing, sir, that you can offer. I beg you not to talk to me so—so strangely. Pray, leave me; and pray, assure yourself you cannot take any method so successful to show any regard for me, as entering into schemes so frightful to Madame Duval, and so disagreeable to myself.'

"'The scheme was the captain's; I even opposed it; though I own I could not refuse myself the so long wished-for happiness of speaking to you once more without so many of—your friends to watch me. And I had flattered myself that the note I charged the footman to give you would have prevented the alarm you have received.'

"'Well, sir, you have now, I hope, said enough; and if you will not go yourself to seek for Madame Duval, at least suffer me to inquire what is become of her.'

"'And when may I speak to you again?'

"'No matter when; I don't know; perhaps—'

"'Perhaps what, my angel?'

"'Perhaps never, sir, if you torment me thus.'

"'Never! Oh, Miss Anville, how cruel, how piercing to my soul is that icy word! Indeed I cannot endure such displeasure.'

"'Then, sir, you must not provoke it. Pray, leave me directly.'

"'I will, madam; but let me at least make a merit of my obedience—allow me to hope that you will in future be less averse to trusting yourself for a few moments alone with me.'

"I was surprised at the freedom of this request; but while I hesitated how to answer it, the other mask came up to the chariot door, and, in a voice almost stifled with laughter, said, 'I've done for her! The old buck is safe; but we must sheer off directly, or we shall be all a-ground.'

"Sir Clement instantly left me, mounted his horse, and rode off. The captain, having given some directions to his servants, followed him.

"I was both uneasy and impatient to know the fate of Madame Duval, and immediately got out of the chariot to seek her. I desired the footman to show me which way she was gone; he pointed with his finger, by way of answer, and I saw that he dared not trust his voice to make any other. I walked on at a very quick pace, and soon, to my great consternation, perceived the poor lady seated upright in a ditch. I flew to her, with unfeigned concern at her situation. She was sobbing, nay, almost roaring, and in the utmost agony of rage and terror. As soon as she saw me, she redoubled her cries, but her voice was so broken, I could not understand a word she said. I was so much shocked, that it was with difficulty I forbore exclaiming against the cruelty of the captain for thus wantonly ill-treating her, and I could not forgive myself for having passively suffered the deception. I used my utmost endeavours to comfort her, assuring her of our present safety, and begging her to rise and return to the chariot.

"Almost bursting with passion, she pointed to her feet, and with frightful violence she actually beat the ground with her hands.

"I then saw that her feet were tied together with a strong rope, which was fastened to the upper branch of a tree, even with a hedge which ran along the ditch where she sat. I endeavoured to untie the knot, but soon found it was infinitely beyond my strength. I was therefore obliged to apply to the footman; but being very unwilling to add to his mirth by the sight of Madame Duval's situation, I desired him to lend me a knife. I returned with it, and cut the rope. Her feet were soon disentangled, and then, though with great difficulty, I assisted her to rise. But what was my astonishment when, the moment she was up, she hit me a violent slap on the face! I retreated from her with precipitation and dread, and she then loaded me with reproaches which, though almost unintelligible, convinced me that she imagined I had voluntarily deserted her; but she seemed not to have the slightest suspicion that she had not been attacked by real robbers.

"I was so much surprised and confounded at the blow, that for some time I suffered her to rave without making any answer; but her extreme agitation and real suffering soon dispelled my anger, which all turned into compassion. I then told her that I had been forcibly detained from following her, and assured her of my real sorrow at her ill-usage.

"She began to be somewhat appeased, and I again entreated her to return to the carriage, or give me leave to order that it should draw up to the place where we stood. She made no answer, till I told her that the longer we remained still, the greater would be the danger of our ride home. Struck with this hint, she suddenly, and with hasty steps, moved forward.

"Her dress was in such disorder that I was quite sorry to have her figure exposed to the servants, who, all of them, in imitation of their master, hold her in derision; however, the disgrace was unavoidable.

"The ditch, happily, was almost dry, or she must have suffered still more seriously; yet so forlorn, so miserable a figure, I never before saw. Her head-dress had fallen off; her linen was torn; her negligee had not a pin left in it; her petticoats she was obliged to hold on; and her shoes were perpetually slipping off. She was covered with dirt, weeds, and filth, and her face was really horrible, for the pomatum and powder from her head, and the dust from the road, were quite pasted on her skin by her tears, which, with her rouge, made so frightful a mixture that she hardly looked human.

"The servants were ready to die with laughter the moment they saw her; but not all my remonstrances could prevail on her to get into the carriage till she had most vehemently reproached them both for not rescuing her. The footman, fixing his eyes on the ground, as if fearful of again trusting himself to look at her, protested that the robbers avowed they would shoot him if he moved an inch, and that one of them had stayed to watch the chariot, while the other carried her off; adding, that the reason of their behaving so barbarously, was to revenge our having secured our purses. Notwithstanding her anger, she gave immediate credit to what he said, and really imagined that her want of money had irritated the pretended robbers to treat her with such cruelty. I determined, therefore, to be carefully on my guard, not to betray the imposition, which could now answer no other purpose than occasioning an irreparable breach between her and the captain.

"Just as we were seated in the chariot, she discovered the loss which her head had sustained, and called out, 'My God! what is become of my hair? Why, the villain has stole all my curls!'

"She then ordered the man to run and see if he could find any of them in the ditch. He went, and presently returning, produced a great quantity of hair in such a nasty condition, that I was amazed she would take it; and the man, as he delivered it to her, found it impossible to keep his countenance; which she no sooner observed, than all her stormy passions were again raised. She flung the battered curls in his face, saying, 'Sirrah, what do you grin for? I wish you'd been served so yourself, and you wouldn't have found it no such joke; you are the impudentest fellow ever I see, and if I find you dare grin at me any more, I shall make no ceremony of boxing your ears.'

"Satisfied with the threat, the man hastily retired, and we drove on."

From "The Diary."

A DAY OF HAPPINESS IN A PALACE.

"Tuesday, March 10th, 1789.—This was a day of happiness indeed!—a day of such heartfelt public delight as could not but suppress all private disturbance.

"The king sent to open the house of lords by commission.

"The general illumination of all London proved the universal joy of a thankful and most affectionate people, who have shown so largely, on this trying occasion, how well they merited the monarch thus benignantly preserved.

"The queen, from her privy purse, gave private orders for a splendid illumination at this palace: Rebecca painted a beautiful transparency; and Mr. Smelt had the regulation of the whole.

"The King—Providence—Health—and Britannia, were displayed with elegant devices: the queen and princesses, all but the youngest, went to town to see the illumination there; and Mr. Smelt was to conduct the surprise. It was magnificently beautiful.

"When it was lighted and prepared, the princess Amelia went to lead her papa to the front window: but first she dropped on her knees, and presented him a paper with these lines—which, at the queen's desire, I had scribbled in her name, for the happy occasion:—

TO THE KING.

'Amid a rapt'rous nation's praise
That sees thee to their prayers restor'd,
Turn gently from the gen'ral blaze,—
Thy Charlotte woos her bosom's lord.
Turn and behold where, bright and clear,
Depictur'd with transparent art,
The emblems of her thought appear,
The tribute of a grateful heart.

O! small the tribute, were it weigh'd
 With all she feels—or half she owes!
 But noble minds are best repaid
 From the pure spring whence bounty flows

P. S. The little bearer begs a kiss
 From dear papa, for bringing this.

"I need not, I think, tell you, the little bearer begged not in vain. The king was extremely pleased. He came into a room belonging to the princesses, in which we had a party to look at the illuminations, and there he stayed above an hour; cheerful, composed, and gracious! all that could merit the great national testimony to his worth this day paid him."

A ROYAL READING PARTY.

"In one of our Windsor excursions at this time, while I was in her majesty's dressing-room, with only Mr. De Luc present, she suddenly said, 'Prepare yourself, Miss Burney, with all your spirits, for to-night you must be reader.'

"She then added that she recollected what she had been told by my honoured Mrs. Delany, of my reading Shakspeare to her, and was desirous that I should read a play to herself and the princesses; and she had lately heard, from Mrs. Schwellenberg, 'nobody could do it better, when I would.'

"I assured her majesty it was rather when I could, as any reading Mrs. Schwellenberg had heard must wholly have been better or worse according to my spirits, as she had justly seemed to suggest.

"The moment coffee was over the princess Elizabeth came for me. I found her majesty knotting, the princess royal drawing, princess Augusta spinning, and lady Courtown I believe in the same employment; but I saw none of them perfectly well.

"'Come, Miss Burney,' cried the queen, 'how are your spirits?—How is your voice?'

"'She says, ma'am,' cried the kind princess Elizabeth, 'she shall do her best!'

"This had been said in attending her royal highness back. I could only confirm it, and that cheerfully,—to hide fearfully.

"I had not the advantage of choosing my play, nor do I know what would have been my decision had it fallen to my lot. Her majesty had just begun Colman's works, and 'Polly Honeycomb' was to open my campaign.

"'I think,' cried the queen most graciously, 'Miss Burney will read the better for drawing a chair and sitting down.'

"'O yes, mamma! I dare say so!' cried princess Augusta and princess Elizabeth, both in a moment.

"The queen then told me to draw my chair close to her side. I made no scruples. Heaven knows I needed not the addition of standing! but most glad I felt in being placed thus near, as it saved a constant painful effort of loud reading.

"'Lady Courtown,' cried the queen, 'you had better draw nearer, for Miss Burney has the misfortune of reading rather low at first.'

"Nothing could be more amiable than this opening. Accordingly, I did, as I had promised, my best; and, indifferent as that was, it would rather have surprised you, all things considered, that it was not yet worse. But I exerted all the courage I possess, and, having often read to the queen, I felt how much it behooved me not to let her surmise I had any greater awe to surmount.

"It is but a vulgar performance; and I was obliged to omit, as well as I could at sight, several circumstances very unpleasant for reading, and ill enough fitted for such hearers.

"It went off pretty flat. Nobody is to comment, nobody is to interrupt; and even between one act and another not a moment's pause is expected to be made.

"I had been already informed of this etiquette by Mr. Turbulent and Miss Planta; nevertheless, it is not only oppressive to the reader, but loses to the hearers so much spirit and satisfaction, that I determined to endeavour, should I again be called upon, to introduce a little break into this tiresome and unnatural profundity of respectful solemnity. My own embarrassment, however, made it agree with me for the present uncommonly well.

"Lady Courtown never uttered one single word the whole time; yet is she one of the most loquacious of our establishment. But such is the settled etiquette.

"The queen has a taste for conversation, and the princesses a good-humoured love for it, that doubles the regret of such an annihilation of all nature and all pleasantry. But what will not prejudice and education inculcate? They have been brought up to annex silence to respect and decorum: to talk, therefore, unbid, or to differ from any given opinion even when called upon, are regarded as high improprieties, if not presumptions.

"They none of them do justice to their own minds, while they enforce this subjection upon the minds of others. I had not experienced it before; for when reading alone with the queen, or listening to her reading to me, I have always frankly spoken almost whatever has occurred to me. But there I had no other examples before me, and therefore I might inoffensively be guided by myself; and her majesty's continuance of the same honour has shown no disapprobation of my proceeding. But here it was not easy to make any decision for myself: to have done what lady Courtown forbore doing would have been undoubtedly a liberty.

"So we all behaved alike; and easily can I now conceive the disappointment and mortification of poor Mr. Garrick when he read 'Lethe' to a royal audience. Its tameness must have tamed even him, and I doubt not he never acquitted himself so ill.

"The next evening I had the same summons; but 'The English Merchant' was the play, which did far better. It is an elegant and serious piece, which I read with far greater ease, and into which they all entered with far greater interest.

"The princess royal was so gracious when the queen left the room, upon our next coming to town, to pay me very kind compliments upon my own part of the entertainment, though her brother the duke of Clarence happened to be present. And the two other princesses were full of the characters of the comedy, and called upon me to say which were my favourites, while they told me their own, at all our subsequent meetings for some time.

This is all I have been able to recollect of March in which my dearest readers might not themselves be writers. Chiefly I rejoice they witnessed the long-wished, long-dreaded interview with my formerly most dearly loved Mrs. Thrale—not writing it saves me much pang.”

POETRY IN A PALACE.

“You may suppose my recovery was not much forwarded by a ball given at the Castle on Twelfth-Day. The queen condescended to say that I might go to bed, and she would content herself with the wardrobe-woman, in consideration of my weak state; but then she exhorted me not to make it known to the Schwellenberg, who would be quite wretched at such a thing.

I returned my proper thanks, but declined the proposal, so circumstanced, assuring her majesty that it would make me wretched to have an indulgence that could produce an impropriety which would make Mrs. Schwellenberg so through my means.

And now to enliven a little: what will you give me, fair ladies, for a copy of verses written between the queen of Great Britain and your most small little journalist?

The morning of the ball the queen sent for me, and said she had a fine pair of old-fashioned gloves, white, with stiff tops and a deep gold fringe, which she meant to send to her new master of the Horse, lord Harcourt, who was to be at the dance. She wished to convey them in a copy of verses, of which she had composed three lines, but could not get on. She told me her ideas, and I had the honour to help her in the metre; and now I have the honour to copy them from her own royal hand:—

TO THE EARL OF HARCOURT.

Go, happy gloves, bedeck earl Harcourt's hand,
And let him know they come from fairy-land,
Where ancient customs still retain their reign,
To modernize them all attempts were vain.
Go, cries queen Mab, some noble owner seek,
Who has a proper taste for the antique.

Now, no criticising, fair ladies!—the assistant was allowed neither a pen nor a moment, but called upon to help finish, as she might have been to hand a fan. The earl, you may suppose, was sufficiently enchanted.

How, or by whom, or by what instigated, I know not, but I heard that the newspapers, this winter, had taken up the cause of my apparent seclusion from the world, and dealt round comments and lamentations profusely. I heard of this with much concern.”

LETTER TO A FRIEND IN AFFLICTION.

“The sad turn of your thoughts softens without surprising me, the misfortune was so unexpected; nevertheless, the religious view in which your melancholy places it convinces me your grief will give way, when it can, and not be nourished repiningly or without effort. How, how shall I wish and pray, my dearest M., that a scene of new and permanent maternal comfort may repay, in some measure, your past afflictions, and awaken and enliven you to new happiness! I only fear the terror you will conceive from every possible alarm may lessen the coming consolation, by increasing its anxiety. Endeavour, my dear friend, endeavour, d'avance, to prepare your mind for a confidence without which you can enjoy nothing, and which, without exertion, will now surely fly you.

M

A singular instance of the unhappiness of wanting this confidence has lately fallen under my eyes. The mother of a very fine child felt and indulged a solicitude so great that, by degrees, it became a part of her existence; she was never without it,—in presence, in absence, in sickness, in health,—no matter which,—prosperity and adversity made no difference; and the anxiety grew to such a height that she is now threatened with a consumption herself, from no other cause. You know, and may perhaps divine her. She used to walk out by the side of the nurse with a watch in her hand, to measure, to a minute, the exact time it spent in the air. She started forward to meet every passenger, and examine their appearance, before she suffered the child to proceed in its walk; and turned it to the right to avoid one face, and presently back to the left that it might not see another. She rose in the dead of night to go and look at it; she quitted all society two or three times in a visit, to examine it; and, in short, she made herself, her husband, and all her friends miserable by this constant distrust and apprehension, and is now, in a languishing and declining state, sent southward to try the change of air for herself, while all the time the child is one of the most healthy, beautiful, and robust I ever saw in my life.

What a world is this! can one help to exclaim, when the first of blessings can thus be rendered a scourge to our friends and an infelicity to ourselves? For this lady, who, happy in her conjugal fate, had no wish but for a child, has never known a tranquil day since her boon has been granted.”

THE KING'S BIRTHDAY.

“June 4th, 1791.—Let me now come to the 4th, the last birthday of the good, gracious, benevolent king I shall ever, in all human probability, pass under his royal roof.

The thought was affecting to me, in defiance of my volunteer conduct, and I could scarce speak to the queen when I first went to her, and wished to say something upon a day so interesting. The king was most gracious and kind when he came into the state dressing-room at St. James's, and particularly inquired about my health and strength, and if they would befriend me for the day. I longed again to tell him how hard I would work them, rather than let them, on such a day, drive me from my office; but I found it better suited me to be quiet; it was safer not to trust to any expression of loyalty, with a mind so full, and on a day so critical.

With regard to health, my side is all that is attended with any uneasiness, and that is sometimes a serious business. Certainly there is nothing premature in what has been done.

And—O picquet!—life hardly hangs on earth during its compulsion, in these months succeeding months, and years creeping, crawling, after years.

At dinner Mrs. Schwollenberg presided, attired magnificently. Miss Goldsworthy, Mrs. Stainforth, Messrs. De Luc and Stanhope dined with us; and while we were still eating fruit, the duke of Clarence entered.

He was just risen from the king's table, and waiting for his equipage to go home and prepare for the ball. To give you an idea of the energy of his royal highness's language, I ought to set apart a general objection to writing, or rather intimating, certain forcible words, and beg leave to show you, in genuine colours, a royal sailor.

We all rose, of course, upon his entrance, and the two gentlemen placed themselves behind their chairs, while the footman left the room; but he ordered us all to sit down, and called the men back to hand about some wine. He was in exceeding high spirits and in the utmost good humour. He placed himself at the head of the table, next Mrs. Schwollenberg, and looked remarkably well, gay, and full of sport and mischief, yet clever withal, as well as comical.

"Well, this is the first day I have ever dined with the king, at St. James's on his birthday. Pray, have you all drunk his majesty's health?"

"No, your roy'l highness: your roy'l highness might make dem do dat," said Mrs. Schwollenberg.

"O, by — will I! Here, you (to the footman); bring champagne! I'll drink the king's health again, if I die for it! Yet, I have done pretty well already: so has the king, yet I promise you! I believe his majesty was never taken such good care of before. We have kept his spirits up, I promise you; we have enabled him to go through his fatigues; and I should have done more still, but for the ball and Mary—I have promised to dance with Mary!"

Princess Mary made her first appearance at court to-day: she looked most interesting and unaffectedly lovely: she is a sweet creature, and perhaps, in point of beauty, the first of this truly beautiful race, of which princess Mary may be called pendant to the prince of Wales.

Champagne being now brought for the duke, he ordered it all round. When it came to me I whispered to Westerhaults to carry it on: the duke slapped his hand violently on the table, and called out, "O, by —, you shall drink it!"

There was no resisting this. We all stood up, the duke sonorously gave the royal toast.

"And now," cried he, making us sit down again, "where are my rascals of servants? I sha'n't be in time for the ball; besides, I've got a deuced tailor waiting to fix on my epaulette!"

Here, you, go and see for my servants! d'ye hear? Scamper off!"

Off ran William.

"Come, let's have the king's health again. De Luc, drink it. Here, champagne to De Luc!"

I wish you could have seen Mr. De Luc's mixed simper—half pleased, half alarmed. However, the wine came and he drank it, the duke taking a bumper for himself at the same time.

"Poor Stanhope!" cried he; "Stanhope shall have a glass too! Here, champagne! what are you all about? Why don't you give champagne to poor Stanhope?"

Mr. Stanhope, with great pleasure, complied, and the duke again accompanied him.

"Come hither, do you hear?" cried the duke to the servants; and on the approach, slow and submissive, of Mrs. Stainforth's man, he hit him a violent slap on the back, calling out, "Hang you! why don't you see for my rascals?"

Away flew the man, and then he called out to Westerhaults, "Hark'ee! bring another glass of champagne to Mr. De Luc!"

Mr. De Luc knows these royal youths too well to venture at so vain an experiment as disputing with them; so he only shrugged his shoulders and drank the wine. The duke did the same.

"And now, poor Stanhope," cried the duke; "give another glass to poor Stanhope, d'ye hear?"

"Is not your royal highness afraid," cried Mr. Stanhope, displaying the full circle of his borrowed teeth, "I shall be apt to be rather up in the world, as the folks say, if I tope on at this rate?"

"Not at all! you can't get drunk in a better cause. I'd get drunk myself if it was not for the ball. Here, champagne! another glass for the philosopher! I keep sober for Mary."

"O, your royal highness!" cried Mr. De Luc, gaining courage as he drank, "you will make me quite droll of it if you make me go on,—quite droll!"

"So much the better! so much the better! it will do you a monstrous deal of good. Here, another of champagne for the queen's philosopher!"

Mr. De Luc obeyed, and the duke then addressed Mrs. Schwollenberg's George. "Here! you! you! why, where is my carriage? run and see, do you hear?"

Off hurried George, grinning irrepressibly.

"If it was not for that deuced tailor, I would not stir. I shall dine at the Queen's house on Monday, Miss Goldsworthy; I shall come to dine with princess royal. I find she does not go to Windsor with the queen."

The queen meant to spend one day at Windsor, on account of a review which carried the king that way.

Some talk then ensued upon the duke's new carriage, which they all agreed to be the most beautiful that day at court. I had not seen it, which, to me, was some impediment against praising it.

He then said it was necessary to drink the queen's health.

The gentlemen here made no demur, though

Mr. De Luc arched his eyebrows in expressive fear of consequences.

"A bumper," cried the duke, "to the queen's gentleman-usher."

They all stood up and drank the queen's health.

"Here are three of us," cried the duke, "all belonging to the queen; the queen's philosopher, the queen's gentleman-usher, and the queen's son; but, thank Heaven, I'm nearest!"

"Sir," cried Mr. Stanhope, a little affronted, "I am not now the queen's gentleman-usher; I am the queen's equerry, sir."

"A glass more of champagne here! What are you all so slow for? Where are all my rascals gone? They've put me in one passion already this morning. Come, a glass of champagne for the queen's gentleman-usher!" laughing heartily.

"No, sir," repeated Mr. Stanhope; "I am equerry now, sir."

"And another glass to the queen's philosopher!"

Neither gentleman objected; but Mrs. Schwel-lenberg, who had sat laughing and happy all this time, now grew alarmed, and said, "Your royal highness, I am afraid for the ball!"

"Hold you your potato-jaw, my dear," cried the duke, patting her; but, recollecting himself, he took her hand and pretty abruptly kissed it, and then, flinging it hastily away, laughed aloud, and called out, "There! that will make amends for anything, so now I may say what I will. So here! a glass of champagne for the queen's philosopher and the queen's gentleman-usher! Hang me if it will not do them a monstrous deal of good?"

Here news was brought that the equipage was in order. He started up, calling out, "Now, then, for my deuced tailor!"

"O, your royal highness!" cried Mr. De Luc, in a tone of expostulation, "now you have made us droll, you go!"

Off, however, he went. And is it not a curious scene? All my amazement is, how any of their heads bore such libations.

In the evening, I had by no means strength to encounter the ball-room. I gave my tickets to Mrs. and Miss Douglass.

Mrs. Stainforth was dying to see the princess Mary in her court dress. Mr. Stanhope offered to conduct her to a place of prospect. She went with him. I thought this preferable to an unbroken evening with my fair companion, and, Mr. De Luc thinking the same, we both left Mrs. Schwel-lenberg to untire, and followed. But we were rather in a scrape by trusting to Mr. Stanhope after all this champagne: he had carried Mrs. Stainforth to the very door of the ball-room, and there fixed her—in a place which the king, queen, and suite, must brush past in order to enter the ball-room. I had followed, however, and the crowds of beef-eaters, officers, and guards, that lined all the state-rooms through which we exhibited ourselves, prevented my retreating alone. I stood, therefore, next to Mrs. Stainforth, and saw the ceremony.

The passage was made so narrow by attendants, that they were all forced to go one by one. First, all the king's great state-officers, amongst whom I recognized lord Courtown, Treasurer of the Household; lord Salisbury carried a candle!—'tis an odd etiquette. These being passed, came the king—he saw us and laughed; then the queen's Master of the Horse, lord Harcourt, who did ditto; then some more.

The Vice-Chamberlain carries the queen's candle, that she may have the arm of the Lord Chamberlain to lean on; accordingly, lord Aylesbury, receiving that honour, now preceded the queen: she looked amazed at sight of us. The kind princesses one by one acknowledged us. I spoke to sweet princess Mary, wishing her royal highness joy; she looked in a delight and an alarm nearly equal. She was to dance her first minuet. Then followed the Ladies of the Bedchamber, and lady Harcourt was particularly civil. Then the Maids of Honour, every one of whom knew and spoke to us. I peered vainly for the Duke of Clarence, but none of the princes passed us. What a crowd brought up the rear! I was vexed not to see the Prince of Wales.

Well, God bless the king! and many and many such days may he know!

I was now so tired as to be eager to go back; but the queen's philosopher, the good and most sober and temperate of men, was really a little giddy with all his bumpers, and his eyes, which were quite lustrous, could not fix any object steadily: while the poor gentleman-usher—equerry, I mean—kept his mouth so wide open with one continued grin,—I suppose from the sparkling beverage,—that I was every minute afraid its pearly ornaments, which never fit their case, would have fallen at our feet. Mrs. Stainforth gave me a significant look of making the same observation, and, catching me fast by the arm, said, "Come, Miss Burney, let's you and I take care of one another;" and then she safely toddled me back to Mrs. Schwel-lenberg, who greeted us with saying, "Vel! bin you much amused? Dat prince William—orders de duke de Clarence—bin raelly ver merry—orders vat you call tipsy."

ARCHINTA, MARGHERITA,

WAS born in Milan towards the beginning of the sixteenth century. She was of noble birth, but more distinguished for her talent than for this accident of nature. She composed many lyric poems, and pieces of music, according to the taste of that age.

ARMYNE, LADY MARY,

DAUGHTER of Henry Talbot, fourth son of George, earl of Shrewsbury, married Sir William Armyne, and distinguished herself by her knowledge of history, divinity, and of the languages. She was very liberal to the poor, and contributed largely to the support of the missionaries sent to North America. She endowed three hospitals; and died in 1675.

ARNAUDE DE ROCAS,

ONE of the daughters of Chypriotes, who, after the taking of Nicosie, in 1570, was carried away by the Turks and held in captivity. Arnaude, destined by her beauty for the seraglio of the sultan, was, with several of her companions, put into a vessel about to sail for Constantinople. But, preferring death to dishonour, the heroic maiden contrived, in the dead of night, to convey fire to the powder-room, and perished, amidst the wreck of the vessel, with the victims of her desperation.

ARNAULD, MARIE ANGELIQUE,

SISTER of Robert, Antoine, and Henri Arnauld, was abbess of the Port-Royal convent, and distinguished herself by the reformation and sanctity she introduced there, and also at the convent of Maubuisson, where she presided five years. She returned to Port-Royal, and died in 1661, aged seventy. Her mother and six of her sisters passed the evening of their life in her convent.

She was early distinguished for her capacity and her virtues. While at Maubuisson, she became acquainted with St. Francis de Sales, bishop of Geneva, who continued through his whole life to correspond with her. She displayed peculiar skill and sagacity in the changes she introduced into the convents under her control. Careful to exact nothing of the nuns of which she had not set the example, she found, in the respect and emulation she inspired, an engine to which constraint is powerless. Self-denial, humility, and charity, were among the most prominent of her virtues.

ARNAULD, ANGELIQUE,

NIECE to the celebrated Marie Angelique Arnauld, abbess of Port-Royal, entered the cloister at six years of age, and formed herself upon the model of her aunts, by whom she was educated. She inherited their virtues and endowments, and was at length elevated to the same station, which she filled with equal dignity and capacity. She was distinguished for her taste and penetration, and for her eloquence and facility in speaking and composition. She died January 29th, 1684, at the age of fifty-nine.

ARNAULD, CATHARINE AGNES,

WAS chosen, while yet in her noviciate, by her elder sister, Marie Angelique, to be the mistress of the novices at the convent of Port-Royal. During the five years that Marie Angelique passed in the abbey at Maubuisson, Catharine was entrusted with the government of Port-Royal, and appointed coadjutrix with her sister, who was desirous of resigning it wholly to her management. Agnes, respected and beloved by the nuns, instructed them no less by her example than by her eloquent discourses. She was equally celebrated for her talents and her piety. She was the author of two small treatises, entitled "Le Chapelet Secret du Saint Sacrement," and "L'Image de la Religieuse, parfaite et imparfaite." The former was censured by some members of the Sorbonne, and it was suppressed.

Catharine Agnes Arnauld died February 19th, 1671, at the age of seventy-seven.

ARNOULT, SOPHIE,

A PARISIAN actress, born at Paris, February 17th, 1740. Her father kept a hôtel garni, and gave her a good education. Nature endowed her with wit, sensibility, a charming voice, and great personal attractions. Chance brought her upon the stage, where she delighted the public from 1757 to 1778. The princess of Modena happened to be in retirement at the Val de Grâce, and was struck with a very fine voice that sang at evening mass. Sophie Arnoult was the songstress; and on the princess speaking of her discovery, she was obliged, against her mother's wish, to join the royal choir. This paved the way for Sophie to the Parisian opera, where she soon became queen. All persons of rank, and all the literati, sought her society; among the latter, were D'Alembert, Diderot, Helvétius, Duclos, and Rousseau. She was compared to Aspasia and Ninon de l'Enclos. Her wit was so successful, that her bons mots were collected. It was sometimes severe, yet it made her no enemies. She died in 1802. In the beginning of the revolution, she bought the personage at Luzarche, and transformed it into a country-house, with this inscription over the door, Ite missa est. Her third son, Constant Dioville de Brancas, colonel of cuirassiers, was killed at the battle of Wagram.

ARRAGON, JOAN OF,

WAS the wife of Ascanio Colonna, prince of Tagliacozza, who was made grand constable of the kingdom of Naples by Charles V, in 1520. He assisted the imperial forces when Rome was besieged, under the command of Bourbon, in 1527, and obtained a great reputation for bravery and military skill. Like all the petty sovereigns of that age of war and violence, his life was one of vicissitude and agitation. He died in the state prison of Castel Nuovo, at Naples, in 1557. He has been accused of traitorous practices with the French, at that time at war with his country; other authorities say that he was incarcerated by orders of the Inquisition. His son, Marc Antonic Colonna, appears to have been one of those heroes, "Impiger iracundus, inexorabilis acer," born to give and take blows all his life. His gallantry at the battle of Lepanto, and daring actions while viceroy of Sicily, merit the praise of a good soldier. He died, it is supposed, by poison; no unusual close of the stormy existences of the leaders of that time.

Of Joan herself, there are no anecdotes recorded. Nothing is known of the events of her life; but a more widely-spread contemporary celebrity is attached to few women. All the writers of her epoch, speak of her in terms that appear hyperbolic, so very extravagant are their epithets—divine, perfect, adorable, are the least of these. She is very much commended for her good judgment, practical sense, courage, and fortitude; but we are no where told how or where she exerted these qualities. Agostine Ninfo, a physician and philosophic writer, in speaking of perfect beauty, proposes Joan of Arragon as an example. Eulogies were composed to her honour by the greatest wits of her time; and in most languages, as Greek, Latin, Italian, French, Spanish, Slavonic, Polish, Hungarian, and even Hebrew and Chaldean; one of the most singular monuments, undoubtedly, that gallantry ever raised to female merit. This homage was decreed her in 1555, at Venice, in the Academy of Dabbiosi, and a volume was published there in 1558, a few years before her death, with this magnificent title, "Temple to the divine Lady Signora Joan of Arragon—constructed by all the most elegant minds, in all the polite languages of the world." She died in 1577.

ARRAGON, TULLIA D',

AN Italian poetess, who lived about the middle of the sixteenth century, was the natural daughter of Peter Tagliava d'Arragon, archbishop of Palermo and a cardinal, himself an illegitimate descendant of the royal house of Arragon. She was a woman of great beauty, genius, and education, so that the first scholars of the age celebrated her praises with enthusiastic admiration. Girolamo Muzio, by whom she was passionately beloved, expatiates, in the third book of his letters, on her talents and virtues; her perfections are the constant theme of his poems, in which she is sometimes spoken of under the name of Thalia and Syrrhenie.

One of her most celebrated productions was a poem, entitled "Dell'Infinita d'Amor." She also wrote "Il Meschino," or "The Unfortunate One," a poetical romance. In her early years, she resided at Ferrara, Rome and Venice; but the latter part of her life she spent at Florence, where she died.

ARUNDEL, LADY BLANCHE,

A DAUGHTER of the earl of Worcester, and wife of lord Arundel of Wardour, is celebrated for her heroic defence of Wardour Castle, in Wiltshire, England. She was summoned to surrender, May 24, 1643, by Sir Edward Hungerford, commander-in-chief of the parliamentary forces in Wiltshire, at the head of about thirteen hundred men; but lady Arundel, whose husband was then at Oxford, replied, that she had the orders of her lord to keep the castle, and those orders she was determined to obey. On this reply the battery commenced, and continued without intermission for nearly six days. The castle contained but twenty-five fighting-men; and wearied with exertion their strength began to fail, when the ladies and their maid-servants took their place in keeping watch, and loading their muskets. The women and children were repeatedly offered safety if the besieged would surrender, but they chose rather to perish than to buy their own lives at the expense of those of their brave soldiers.

At length, reduced to extremity, lady Arundel was forced to surrender, after making stipulations that the lives of all in the fortress should be spared, &c. The conditions were agreed to, but all excepting that relating to their personal safety were violated. Lady Arundel, and her children, were carried prisoners to Shaftesbury, where her two sons, children of seven and nine, were taken from her. She died October 29th, 1649, at the age of sixty-six. Her husband had died at Oxford, in 1643, of wounds he received in the battle of Lansdown, in the service of Charles I.

Lady Arundel is buried with her husband, near the altar of an elegant chapel, at Wardour Castle. On the monument is an inscription, which, after giving their titles and ancestry, thus concludes: "This lady, as distinguished for her courage as for the splendour of her birth, bravely defended, in the absence of her husband, the castle of Wardour, with a spirit above her sex, for nine days, with a few men, against Sir Edward Hungerford, Edmund Ludlow, and their army, and then delivered it up on honourable terms. Obit. 28 October, 1649, Etat. 66. Requiescat in pace. 'Who shall find a valiant woman? The price of her is as things brought from afar off, and from the uttermost coast. The heart of her husband trusteth in her.'—Prov. 31."

ARUNDEL, MARY,

Was the daughter of sir Thomas Arundel, knight. She was married, first to Robert Ratcliff, who died without issue, 1566; secondly, to Henry Howard, earl of Arundel.

She translated from English into Latin "The Wise Sayings and Eminent Deeds of the Emperor Alexander Severus." This translation is dedicated to her father; the manuscript is in the royal library at Westminster. She translated also from Greek into Latin, select "Sentences of the seven wise Grecian Philosophers." In the same library are preserved, of her writing, "Similies collected from the books of Plato, Aristotle, Seneca, and other philosophers," which she also dedicated to her father.

ASCHAM, MARGARET,

Was married in 1554 to Roger Ascham, the celebrated preceptor of queen Elizabeth, Margaret brought a considerable fortune to her husband, and what was of more worth, a heart and mind willing and qualified to aid him. To her care the world is indebted for Mr. Ascham's book, entitled "The Schoolmaster;" to which she prefixed an epistle dedicatory, to the honourable Sir William Cecil, knight. The work was published in 4to, 1570, London, and reprinted in 1589. Mrs. Ascham is supposed to lie interred with her husband, in the church of St. Sepulchre, London.

ASKEW, ANNE,

DAUGHTER of Sir William Askew, of Kelsay, in Lincolnshire, England, was born in 1529. She received a liberal and learned education, and early manifested a predilection for theological studies. Her eldest sister, who was engaged to Mr. Kyme of Lincolnshire, died before the nuptials were completed. Sir William Askew, unwilling to lose a connexion which promised pecuniary advantages, compelled his second daughter, Anne, notwithstanding her remonstrances and resistance, to fulfil the engagement entered into by her sister. But, however reluctantly she gave her hand to Mr. Kyme, to whom she bore two children, she rigidly fulfilled the duties of a wife and mother.

Though educated in the Roman Catholic religion, Anne became interested in the Reformation, which was causing great excitement in the minds of all persons of thought and education at that time; and devoted herself to the examination of the Bible and other works from which both parties affected to derive their faith. She was at length convinced of the truth of the doctrine of the reformers, and declared herself a convert to their principles. Her presumption in daring to exercise her own judgment so incensed her husband, that, at the suggestion of the priest, he drove her with ignominy from his house. Anne, conceiving herself released by this treatment from the obligations that had been imposed on her, determined to sue for a separation, and for this purpose she went to London.

Here she met with a favourable reception at court, and was particularly distinguished by the queen, Catharine Parr, who favoured in secret the doctrines of the reformation. But her husband and the priest accused her to Henry VIII., rendered more than usually irritable, vindictive, and tyrannical by declining health, of dogmatizing on the subject of the real presence, a doctrine of which he was particularly tenacious. The sex and youth of the heretic aggravated the bitterness of her adversaries, who could not forgive a woman the presumption of opposing argument and reason to their dogmas.

Anne was seized, in March, 1545, and taken into custody. She was repeatedly examined respecting her faith, transubstantiation, masses for departed souls, &c. &c. Her answers to the questions proposed to her were more clear and sensible than satisfactory to her inquisitors. The substance and particulars of this examination were written by herself and published after her death.

On the twenty-third of March, a relation succeeded, after several ineffectual attempts, in bailing her. But she was soon apprehended again, and summoned before the king's council at Greenwich. She replied to their inquiries with firmness, and without prevarication. She was remanded to Newgate, and not allowed to receive visits from any one, even from Dr. Latimer. She wrote herself to the king and chancellor, explaining her opinions; but her letter served only to aggravate her crime. She was then taken to the Tower, and interrogated respecting her patrons at court, but she heroically refused to betray them. Her magnanimity served but to incense her persecutors, who endeavoured to extort a confession from her by the rack; but she sustained the torture with fortitude and resignation. The chancellor, Wriothesely, commanded the lieutenant of the Tower to strain the instrument of his vengeance; on receiving a refusal, he threw off his gown, and exercised himself the office of executioner. When Anne was released from the rack, every limb was dislocated and she fainted with anguish. After she recovered, she remained sitting on the ground for two hours, calmly reasoning with her tormentors. She was carried back to her confinement, and pardon and life were offered to her if she would recant; but she refused, and was condemned to the stake.

A report having been circulated, that the prisoner had yielded, Anne wrote a letter to John Lascelles, her former tutor, and to the public justifying herself of the charge. She also drew up a confession of her faith, and an attestation of her innocence, which she concluded by a prayer for fortitude and perseverance. A gentleman who saw her the day previous to her execution, observes, that amidst all her pains and weakness, (being unable to rise or stand without assistance) her expression of mingled enthusiasm and resignation showed a sweetness and serenity inexpressibly affecting.

At the stake, letters were brought to her from the chancellor, exhorting her to recant, and promising her pardon. Averting her eyes from the paper, she replied, that "She came not thither to deny her Lord and Master." The same proposition was made to her four fellow-sufferers, but without success. While Shaxton, an apostate from his principles, harangued the prisoners, she listened attentively, nicely distinguishing, even at that terrible moment, between what she thought true and what erroneous. She was burnt at Smithfield, July 16th, 1546, in the twenty-fifth year of her age.

ASTELL, MARY,

An ornament of her sex and country, was the daughter of Mr. Astell, a merchant at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, where she was born, about 1668. She was well educated, and amongst other accomplishments was mistress of the French, and had some knowledge of the Latin tongue. Her uncle, a clergyman, observing her uncommon genius, took her under his tuition, and taught her mathematics, logic, and philosophy. She left the place of her nativity when she was about twenty years of age, and spent the remaining part of her life at London and Chelsea. Here she pursued her studies with assiduity, made great proficiency in the above sciences, and acquired a more complete knowledge of the classic authors. Among these, Seneca, Epictetus, Hierocles, Antoninus, Tully, Plato, and Xenophon, were her favourites.

Her life was spent in writing for the advancement of learning, religion, and virtue; and in the practice of those devotional duties which she so zealously and pathetically recommended to others, and in which, perhaps, no one was ever more sincere and devout. Her sentiments of piety, charity, humility, friendship, and other Christian graces, were very refined and sublime; and she possessed them in such a distinguished degree, as would have done her honour even in primitive times. But religion sat very gracefully upon her, unattended with any forbidding airs of sourness and bigotry. Her mind was generally calm and serene; and her conversation was not only interesting, but highly entertaining. She would say, "The good Christian alone has reason, and he always ought to be cheerful;" and, "That dejected looks and melancholy airs were very unseemly in a Christian." But these subjects she has treated at large in her excellent writings. Some very great men bear testimony to the merit of her works; such as Atterbury, Hickes, Walker, Norris, Dodwell, and Evelyn.

She was remarkably abstemious, and seemed to enjoy an uninterrupted state of health, till a few years before her death; when, having a severe operation performed on her, for a cancer in the breast, it so much impaired her constitution, that she did not survive it. When she was confined to her bed by a gradual decay, and the time of her dissolution drew nearer, she ordered her shroud and coffin to be made, and brought to her bed-side, and there to remain in her view, as a constant memento of her approaching fate, and to keep her mind fixed on proper contemplations. She died in 1731, in the sixty-third year of her age, and was buried at Chelsea.

Her writings are as follow: "Letters Concerning the Love of God," published 1695; "An Essay in Defence of the Female Sex, in a Letter to a Lady, written by a Lady," 1696; "A Serious Proposal to the Ladies, for the Advancement of their true and greatest Interest," &c.; and a second part to the same, 1697; "An Impartial Enquiry into the Causes of Rebellion and Civil War in this kingdom, in an Examination of Dr. Kennet's Sermon," 1703-4; "Moderation Truly Stated; or, a Review of a late Pamphlet intituled Moderation a Virtue, or the Occasional Conformist Justified from the Imputation of Hypocrisy," 1704. The prefatory discourse is addressed to Dr. Davenant, author of the pamphlet, and of essays on peace and war, &c. "A Fair Way with the Dissenters and their Patrons, not writ by Mr. Lindsay, or any other furious Jacobite, whether a Clergyman or Layman; but by a very Moderate Person, and a Dutiful Subject to the Queen," 1704. While this treatise was in press, Dr. Davenant published a new edition of his "Moderation still a Virtue;" to which she immediately returned an answer, in a postscript in this book. Her next work was "Reflections upon Marriage," to which is added a preface in answer to some objections, 1705. She next published "The Christian Religion as Professed by a Daughter of the Church of England," &c., 1705. This pamphlet was attributed to Bishop Atterbury. Her next work was "Six Familiar Essays on Marriage, Crosses in Love and Friendship, written by a Lady," 1706. "Bartlemy Fair; or, an Enquiry after it," was her last, published in 1709, and occasioned by Colonel Hunter's celebrated Letter on Enthusiasm. It was republished in 1722, without the words "Bartlemy Fair."

ASTORGAS, MARCHIONESS OF,

A LADY who lived in the latter part of the seven-teenth century, in Spain, during the reign of Charles II., killed with her own hands a beautiful woman, the mistress of her husband, and having prepared the heart of her victim, placed it at dinner before her husband. When he had eaten it, she rolled the head of the woman to him on the table. She then took refuge in a convent, where she became insane through rage and jealousy.

AUBESPINE, MAGDALEN DE L',

A FRENCH lady, celebrated for her wit and beauty; was the wife of Nicholas de Neuville, seigneur de Villeroi. She composed several works in verse and prose, and died on her own demesne, in 1596. Ronsard held her in high estimation. She is also complimented by Francis Grudé, by whom we are informed, that she translated, in verse, the epistles of Ovid.

AUNOY, MARIE CATHARINE JUNELLE DE BARNEVILLE, COMTESSE D',

WIDOW of the Count D'Aunoy, and niece of the celebrated Madame Destoges, died in 1705. She wrote with ease, though negligently, in the department of romance. People of a frivolous taste still read with pleasure her "Tales of the Fairies," four volumes in duodecimo, and especially her "Adventures of Hippolytus, Earl of Douglas," a story natural and interesting in the style, with abundance of the marvellous in the adventures. Her "Memoires Historiques de ce qui c'est passé de plus Remarquable en Europe depuis 1672 jus qu'en, 1679," are a medley of truth and falsehood. She wrote also "Memoirs of the Court of Spain," where she had lived with her mother, a work which presents us with no favourable idea of the Spanish nation. Her "Memoirs of the Court of England" was rather better arranged; and a "History of John de Bourbon, Prince de Karency," in three volumes duodecimo, which is one of those historical romances that are the offspring of slender abilities joined to a warm imagination. Her husband, the Count D'Aunoy, being accused of high treason, by three Normans, very narrowly escaped with his head. One of his accusers, struck with remorse of conscience, declared the whole charge to be groundless. The countess left four daughters.

AVOGADRO, LUCIA,

AN Italian poetess, displayed early poetical talents, and won the praise even of Tasso. Only a few of her lyrics still remain, but they justify the praise that was bestowed upon her. She died in 1568.

AUSTEN, JANE,

AN English novelist, was born at Steventon, in Hampshire, on the 16th of December, 1775, her father being the rector of that parish. He died while Miss Austen was still young, and his widow and two daughters retired to Southampton, and subsequently to the village of Chawton, in the same county, where the novels of Jane Austen were written. "Sense and Sensibility;" "Pride and Prejudice;" "Mansfield Park;" and "Emma," were published anonymously during the author's life. Her other two works, "Northanger Abbey" and "Persuasion," were published after her death. In May, 1817, Miss Austen's health rendered it necessary that she should remove to some place where constant medical aid could be procured, and she went to Winchester, where she died on the 24th of July, aged forty-two. Her beauty, worth, and genius, made her death deeply lamented. The consumption, of which she died, seemed only to increase her mental powers. She wrote while she could hold a pen, and the day before her death composed some stanzas replete with fancy and vigour. The great charm of Miss Austen's works lie in their truth and simplicity, and in their high finish and naturalness. Sir Walter Scott speaks of her in the highest terms. Another writer, who appears to have known her well, thus describes her:

"Of personal attractions, she possessed a considerable share. Her stature was that of true elegance. It could not have been increased without exceeding the middle height. Her carriage and deportment were quiet, yet graceful. Her features were separately good. Their assemblage produced an unrivalled expression of that cheerfulness, sensibility, and benevolence, which were her real characteristics. Her complexion was of the finest texture. It might with truth be said, that her eloquent blood spoke through her modest cheek. Her voice was extremely sweet. She delivered herself with fluency and precision. Indeed, she was formed for elegant and rational society, excelling in conversation as much as in composition. In the present age, it is hazardous to mention accomplishments. Our authoress would, probably, have been inferior to few in such acquirements, had she not been so superior to most in higher things. She had not only an excellent taste for drawing, but, in her earlier days, evinced great power of hand in the management of the pencil. Her own musical attainments she held very cheap. Twenty years ago, they would have been thought more of, and twenty years hence, many a parent will expect her daughter to be applauded for meaner performances. She was fond of dancing, and excelled in it. It remains now to add a few observations on that which her friends deemed more important; on those endowments, which sweetened every hour of their lives.

If there be an opinion current in the world, that perfect placidity of temper is not reconcilable to the most lively imagination, and the keenest relish for wit, such an opinion will be rejected for ever by those who have had the happiness of knowing the authoress of the following works. Though the frailties, foibles, and follies of others could not escape her immediate detection, yet even in their vices did she never trust herself to comment with unkindness. The affectation of candour is not uncommon; but she had no affectation. Faultless herself, as nearly as human nature can be, she always sought, in the faults of others, something to excuse, to forgive, or forget. Where extenuation was impossible, she had a sure refuge in silence. She never uttered either a hasty, a silly, or a severe expression. In short, her temper was as polished as her wit. Nor were her manners inferior to her temper. They were of the happiest kind. No one could be often in her company without feeling a strong desire of obtaining her friendship, and cherishing a hope of having obtained it. She was tranquil without reserve or stiffness; and communicative without intrusion or self-sufficiency. She became an authoress entirely from taste and inclination. Neither the hope of fame nor profit mixed with her early motives. Most of her works, as before observed, were composed many years previous to their publication. It was with extreme difficulty that her friends, whose partiality she suspected, whilst she honoured their judgment, could prevail on her to publish her first work. Nay, so persuaded was she that its sale would not repay the expense of publication, that she actually made a reserve from her very moderate income to meet the expected loss. She could scarcely believe what she termed her great good fortune when 'Sense and Sensibility' produced a clear profit of about £150. Few so gifted were so truly unpretending. She regarded the above sum as a prodigious recompense for that which had cost her nothing. Her readers, perhaps, will wonder that such a work produced so little at a time when some other authors have received more guineas than they have written lines. The works of our authoress, however, may live as long as those which have burst on the world with more éclat. But the public has not been unjust; and our authoress was far from thinking it so. Most gratifying to her was the applause which, from time to time, reached her ears from those who were competent to discriminate. Still, in spite of such applause, so much did she shrink from notoriety, that no accumulation of fame would have induced her, had she lived, to affix her name to any productions of her pen. In the bosom of her own family she talked of them freely, thankful for praise, open to remark, and submissive to criticism. But in public she turned away from any allusion to the character of an authoress. She read aloud with very great taste and effect. Her own works, probably, were never heard to so much advantage as from her own mouth; for she partook largely in all the best gifts of the comic muse. She was a warm and judicious admirer of landscape, both in nature and on canvass. At a very early age, she was enamoured of Gilpin on the Picturesque; and she seldom changed her opinions either on books or men.

"Her reading was very extensive in history and belles lettres; and her memory extremely tenacious. Her favourite moral writers were Johnson, in prose, and Cowper, in verse. It is difficult to say at what age she was not intimately acquainted with the merits and defects of the best essays and novels in the English language. Richardson's power of creating, and preserving the consistency of his characters, as particularly exemplified in 'Sir Charles Grandison,' gratified the natural discrimination of her mind, whilst her taste secured her from the errors of his prolix style and tedious narrative. She did not rank any work of Fielding quite so high. Without the slightest affectation, she recoiled from everything gross. Neither nature, wit, nor humour, could make her amends for so very low a scale of morals.

"Her powers of inventing characters seems to have been intuitive, and almost unlimited. She drew from nature; but, whatever may have been surmised to the contrary, never from individuals. The style of her familiar correspondence was in all respects the same as that of her novels. Everything came finished from her pen; for, on all subjects, she had ideas as clear as her expressions were well chosen. It is not hazarding too much to say, that she never despatched a note or letter unworthy of publication.

"One trait only remains to be touched on. It makes all others unimportant. She was thoroughly religious and devout; fearful of giving offence to God, and incapable of feeling it towards any fellow-creature.

"She retained her faculties, her memory, her fancy, her temper, and her affections, warm, clear, and unimpaired, to the last. Neither her love of God, nor of her fellow-creatures, flagged for a moment. She made a point of receiving the sacrament before excessive bodily weakness might have rendered her perception unequal to her wishes. She wrote whilst she could hold a pen, and with a pencil when a pen was become too laborious. Her last voluntary speech conveyed thanks to her medical attendant; and to the final question asked of her, purporting to know her wants, she replied, 'I want nothing but death.'"

In our selection from the writings of this estimable lady, we quote from "Northanger Abbey;" it is simple in plot, and the heroine may be found in every-day life. She is nevertheless an exquisite creation of fancy, but her naturalness makes her loveliest charm; and first, we have her manner of training at home, or rather how she was permitted to grow up, like a wild flower, in her own sweet way:

THE HEROINE'S CHILDHOOD.

"No one who had ever seen Catherine Morland in her infancy would have supposed her born to be a heroine. Her situation in life, the character of her father and mother, her own person and disposition, were all equally against her. Her father was a clergyman, without being neglected, or poor, and a very respectable man, though his name was

Richard—and he had never been handsome. He had a considerable independence, besides two good livings—and he was not in the least addicted to locking up his daughters. Her mother was a woman of useful plain sense, with a good temper, and, what is more remarkable, with a good constitution. She had three sons before Catherine was born; and instead of dying in bringing the latter into the world, as any body might expect, she still lived on—lived to have six children more—to see them growing up around her, and to enjoy excellent health herself. A family of ten children will be always called a fine family, where there are heads and arms and legs enough for the number; but the Morlands had little other right to the word, for they were in general very plain, and Catherine, for many years of her life, as plain as any. She had a thin awkward figure, a sallow skin, without colour, dark lank hair, and strong features;—so much for her person;—and not less unpropitious for heroism seemed her mind. She was fond of all boys' plays, and greatly preferred cricket, not merely to dolls, but to the more heroic enjoyments of infancy, nursing a dormouse, feeding a canary-bird, or watering a rose-bush. Indeed she had no taste for a garden; and if she gathered flowers at all, it was chiefly for the pleasure of mischief—at least, so it was conjectured from her always preferring those which she was forbidden to take. Such were her propensities—her abilities were quite, as extraordinary. She never could learn or understand anything before she was taught; and sometimes not even then, for she was often inattentive, and occasionally stupid. Her mother was three months in teaching her only to repeat the 'Beggars' Petition;' and, after all, her next sister, Sally, could say it better than she did. Not that Catherine was always stupid—by no means; she learned the fable of 'The Hare and many Friends,' as quickly as any girl in England. Her mother wished her to learn music; and Catherine was sure she should like it, for she was very fond of tinkling the keys of the old forlorn spinnet; so, at eight years old, she began. She learned a year, and could not bear it;—and Mrs. Morland, who did not insist on her daughters being accomplished in spite of incapacity or distaste, allowed her to leave off. The day which dismissed the music-master was one of the happiest of Catherine's life. Her taste for drawing was not superior; though whenever she could obtain the outside of a letter from her mother, or seize upon any other odd piece of paper, she did what she could in that way, by drawing houses and trees, hens and chickens, all very much like one another. Writing and accounts she was taught by her father; French by her mother: her proficiency in either was not remarkable, and she shirked her lessons in both whenever she could. What a strange, unaccountable character! for with all these symptoms of profligacy at ten years old, she had neither a bad disposition nor a bad temper; was seldom stubborn, scarcely ever quarrelsome, and very kind to the little ones, with few interruptions of tyranny; she was moreover noisy and wild, hated confinement and cleanliness, and loved nothing so well in the world as rolling down the green slope at the back of the house.

Such was Catherine Morland at ten. At fifteen, appearances were mending; she began to curl her hair and long for balls; her complexion improved, her features were softened by plumpness and colour, her eyes gained more animation, and her figure more consequence. Her love of dirt gave way to an inclination for finery, and she grew clean as she grew smart; she had now the pleasure of sometimes hearing her father and mother remark on her personal improvement. 'Catherine grows quite a good-looking girl—she is almost pretty to-day,' were words which caught her ears now and then; and how welcome were the sounds! To look almost pretty, is an acquisition of higher delight to a girl who has been looking plain the first fifteen years of her life, than a beauty from her cradle can ever receive.

Mrs. Morland was a very good woman, and wished to see her children everything they ought to be; but her time was so much occupied in lying-in and teaching the little ones, that her elder daughters were inevitably left to shift for themselves; and it was not very wonderful that Catherine, who had by nature nothing heroic about her, should prefer cricket, base-ball, riding on horseback, and running about the country at the age of fourteen, to books—or at least books of information—for, provided that nothing like useful knowledge could be gained from them, provided they were all story and no reflection, she had never any objection to books at all, but from fifteen to seventeen she was in train for a heroine; she read all such works as heroines must read to supply their memories with those quotations which are so serviceable and so soothing in the vicissitudes of their eventful lives.

From Pope, she learnt to censure those who 'bear about the mockery of woe.'

From Gray, that

'Many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its fragrance on the desert air.'

From Thomson, that

————— 'It is a delightful task
To teach the young idea how to shoot.'

And from Shakspeare, she gained a great store of information—among the rest, that ————— 'Trifles, light as air,

Are, to the jealous, confirmation strong,
As proofs of Holy Writ.'

That

'The poor beetle, which we tread upon,
In corporal sufferance, feels a pang as great
As when a giant dies.'

And that a young woman in love always looks ————— 'like Patience on a monument

Smiling at Grief.'

So far, her improvement was sufficient—and in many other points, she came on exceedingly well; for though she could not write sonnets, she brought herself to read them; and though there seemed no chance of her throwing a whole party into raptures by a prelude on the pianoforte of her own composition, she could listen to other people's performance with very little fatigue. Her greatest deficiency was in the pencil—she had no notion of drawing—not enough even to attempt a sketch of her lover's profile, that she might be detected in the design. There she fell miserably short of the true heroic height. At present, she did not know her own poverty, for she had no lover to pourtray. She had reached the age of seventeen without having seen one amiable youth who could call forth her sensibility; without having inspired one real passion, and without having exerted even any admiration but what was very moderate and very transient. This was strange indeed! But strange things may generally be accounted for if their cause be fairly searched out. There was not one lord in the neighbourhood; no, not even a baronet. There was not one family among their acquaintance who had reared and supported a boy accidentally found at their door—not one young man whose origin was unknown. Her father had no ward, and the 'squire of the parish no children.

But when a young lady is to be a heroine, the perverseness of forty surrounding families cannot prevent her. Something must and will happen to throw a hero in her way."

Mr. Allen, who owned the chief of the property about Fullerton, the village in Wiltshire where the Morlands lived, was ordered to Bath for the benefit of a gouty constitution; and his lady, a good-humoured woman, fond of Miss Morland, and probably aware that if adventures will not befall a young lady in her own village, she must seek them abroad, invited her to go with them. Mr. and Mrs. Morland were all compliance, and Catherine all happiness.

THE HEROINE AT A BALL.

"So they went to Bath, and Catherine made her first appearance in the ball-room, anticipating a most delightful evening; for she had come to be happy. But the party was late, and poor Miss Morland never had the offer of a partner. But there was good fortune in store for her; and this is the history of the second ball.

"They made their appearance in the lower rooms; and here fortune was more favourable to our heroine. The master of the ceremonies introduced to her a very gentleman-like young man as a partner. His name was Tilney. He seemed to be about four or five-and-twenty, was rather tall, had a pleasing countenance, a very intelligent and lively eye, and, if not quite handsome, was very near it. His address was good, and Catherine felt herself in high luck. There was little leisure for speaking while they danced; but when they were seated at tea, she found him as agreeable as she had already given him credit for being. He talked with fluency and spirit—and there was an archness and pleasantry in his manner which interested, though it was hardly understood by her. After chatting some time on such matters as naturally arose from the objects around them, he suddenly addressed her with—'I have hitherto been very remiss, madam, in the proper attentions of a partner here; I have not yet asked you how long you have been in Bath; whether you were ever here before; whether you have been at the Upper Rooms, the theatre, and the concert; and how you like the place altogether. I have been very negligent—but are you now at leisure to satisfy me in these particulars? If you are, I will begin directly.”

“You need not give yourself that trouble, sir.”

“No trouble, I assure you, madam.” Then forming his features into a set smile, and affectingly softening his voice, he added, with a simpering air, “Have you been long in Bath, madam?”

“About a week, sir,” replied Catherine, trying not to laugh.

“Really!” with affected astonishment.

“Why should you be surprised, sir?”

“Why, indeed!” said he, in his natural tone—“but some emotion must appear to be raised by your reply, and surprise is more easily assumed, and not less reasonable than any other. Now let us go on. Were you never here before, madam?”

“Never, sir.”

“Indeed! Have you yet honoured the Upper Rooms?”

“Yes, sir, I was there last Monday.”

“Have you been to the theatre?”

“Yes, sir, I was at the play on Tuesday.”

“To the concert?”

“Yes, sir, on Wednesday.”

“And are you altogether pleased with Bath?”

“Yes, I like it very well.”

“Now I must give one smirk, and then we may be rational again.”

Catherine turned away her head, not knowing whether she might venture to laugh.

“I see what you think of me,” said he gravely—“I shall make but a poor figure in your journal to-morrow.”

“My journal!”

“Yes, I know exactly what you will say; Friday, went to the Lower Rooms; wore my sprigged muslin robe with blue trimmings—plain black shoes—appeared to much advantage; but was strangely harassed by a queer, half-witted man, who would make me dance with him, and distressed me by his nonsense.”

“Indeed, I shall say no such thing.”

“Shall I tell you what you ought to say?”

“If you please.”

“I danced with a very agreeable young man, introduced by Mr. King—had a great deal of conversation with him—seems a most extraordinary genius; hope I may know more of him. That, madam, is what I wish you to say.”

“But, perhaps, I keep no journal.”

“Perhaps you are not sitting in this room, and I am not sitting by you. These are points in which a doubt is equally possible. Not keep a journal! How are your absent cousins to understand the tenor of your life in Bath without one? How are the civilities and compliments of every day to be related as they ought to be, unless noted down every evening in a journal? How are your various dresses to be remembered, and the particular state of your complexion, and curl of your hair to be described in all their diversities, without having constant recourse to a journal? My dear madam, I am not so ignorant of young ladies’ ways as you wish to believe me; it is this delightful habit of journalising which largely contributes to form the easy style of writing for which ladies are so generally celebrated. Everybody allows that the talent of writing agreeable letters is peculiarly female. Nature may have done something, but I am sure it must be essentially assisted by the practice of keeping a journal.”

“I have sometimes thought,” said Catherine, doubtfully, “whether ladies do write so much better letters than gentlemen! That is—I should not think the superiority was always on our side.”

“As far as I have had opportunity of judging, it appears to me that the usual style of letter-writing among women is faultless, except in three particulars.”

“And what are they?”

“A general deficiency of subject, a total inattention to stops, and a very frequent ignorance of grammar.”

“Upon my word! I need not have been afraid of disclaiming the compliment. You do not think too highly of us in that way.”

“I should no more lay it down as a general rule that women write better letters than men, than that they sing better duets, or draw better landscapes. In every power, of which taste is the foundation, excellence is pretty fairly divided between the sexes.”

They were interrupted by Mrs. Allen: “My dear Catherine,” said she, “do take this pin out of my sleeve; I am afraid it has torn a hole already; I shall be quite sorry if it has, for this is a favourite gown, though it cost but nine shillings a yard.”

“That is exactly what I should have guessed it, madam,” said Mr. Tilney, looking at the muslin.

“Do you understand muslins, sir?”

“Particularly well; I always buy my own cravats, and am allowed to be an excellent judge; and my sister has often trusted me in the choice of a gown. I bought one for her the other day, and it was pronounced to be a prodigious bargain by every lady who saw it. I gave but five shillings a yard for it, and a true Indian muslin.”

Mrs. Allen was quite struck by his genius. “Men commonly take so little notice of those things,” said she: “I can never get Mr. Allen to know one of my gowns from another. You must be a great comfort to your sister, sir.”

“I hope I am, madam.”

“And pray, sir, what do you think of Miss Morland’s gown?”

“It is very pretty, madam,” said he, gravely, examining it; “but I do not think it will wash well; I am afraid it will fray.”

“How can you,” said Catherine, laughing, “be so ——” she had almost said strange.

“I am quite of your opinion, sir,” replied Mrs. Allen; “and so I told Miss Morland when she bought it.”

“But then, you know, madam, muslin always turns to some account or other; Miss Morland will get enough out of it for a handkerchief, or a cap, or a cloak. Muslin can never be said to be wasted. I have heard my sister say so forty times, when she has been extravagant in buying more than she wanted, or careless in cutting it to pieces.'

"Bath is a charming place, sir; there are so many good shops here. We are sadly off in the country; not but what we have very good shops in Salisbury, but it is so far to go; eight miles is a long way; Mr. Allen says it is nine, measured nine; but I am sure it cannot be more than eight; and it is such a fag—I come back tired to death. Now here one can step out of doors and get a thing in five minutes."

Mr. Tilney was polite enough to seem interested in what she said; and she kept him on the subject of muslins till the dancing recommenced. Catherine feared, as she listened to their discourse, that he indulged himself a little too much with the foible of others. — "What are you thinking of so earnestly?" said he, as they walked back to the ball-room; "not of your partner, I hope; for by that shake of the head, your meditations are not satisfactory."

Catherine coloured, and said, "I was not thinking of any thing."

"That is artful and deep, to be sure; but I had rather be told at once that you will not tell me."

"Well then, I will not."

"Thank you; for now we shall soon be acquainted, as I am authorised to tease you on this subject whenever we meet; and nothing in the world advances intimacy so much."

They danced again; and, when the assembly closed, parted, on the lady's side at least, with a strong inclination for continuing the acquaintance. Whether she thought of him so much while she drank her warm wine and water, and prepared herself for bed, as to dream of him when there, cannot be ascertained; but I hope it was no more than in a slight slumber, or a morning doze at most; for if it be true, as a celebrated writer has maintained, that no young lady can be justified in falling in love before the gentleman's love is declared, it must be very improper that a young lady should dream of a gentleman before the gentleman is first known to have dreamed of her."

Mr. Tilney proved to be a young clergyman, with a very lovely sister, Eleanor, and a very selfish, proud father, General Tilney. After several disappointments, which, to the romantic fancy of our little heroine, appeared like the scenes in a novel, Mr. Tilney and his sister took the happy Catherine out for a walk.

A WALK AND CONVERSATION.

"The next morning was fair, and Catherine almost expected another attack from the assembled party. With Mr. Allen to support her, she felt no dread of the event; but she would gladly be spared a contest, where victory itself was painful; and was heartily rejoiced, therefore, at neither seeing nor hearing any thing of them. The Tilneys called for her at the appointed time; and no new difficulty arising, no sudden recollection, no unexpected summons, no impertinent intrusion to disconcert their measures, my heroine was most unnaturally able to fulfil her engagement, though it was made with the hero himself. They determined on walking round Beechen Cliff, that noble hill, whose beautiful verdure and hanging coppice render it so striking an object from almost every opening in Bath.

"I never look at it," said Catherine, as they walked along the side of the river, "without thinking of the south of France."

"You have been abroad, then?" said Henry, a little surprised.

"Oh! no, I only mean what I have read about. It always puts me in mind of the country that Emily and her father travelled through, in the 'Mysteries of Udolpho.' But you never read novels, I dare say?"

"Why not?"

"Because they are not clever enough for you—gentlemen read better books."

"The person, be it gentleman or lady, who has not pleasure in a good novel, must be intolerably stupid. I have read all Mrs. Radcliffe's works, and most of them with great pleasure. The Mysteries of Udolpho, when I had once begun it, I could not lay down again; I remember finishing it in two days—my hair standing on end the whole time."

"Yes," added Miss Tilney, "and I remember that you undertook to read it aloud to me, and that when I was called away for only five minutes, to answer a note, instead of waiting for me, you took the volume in the Hermitage-walk, and I was obliged to stay till you had finished it."

"Thank you, Eleanor;—a most honourable testimony. You see, Miss Morland, the injustice of your suspicions. Here was I, in my eagerness to get on, refusing to wait only five minutes for my sister; breaking the promise I had made of reading it aloud, and keeping her in suspense at a most interesting part, by running away with the volume, which, you are to observe, was her own, particularly her own. I am proud when I reflect on it, and I think it must establish me in your good opinion."

"I am very glad to hear it, indeed, and now I shall never be ashamed of liking Udolpho myself. But I really thought, before, young men despised novels amazingly."

"It is amazingly; it may well suggest amazement, if they do—for they read nearly as many as women. I myself have read hundreds and hundreds. Do not imagine that you can cope with me in a knowledge of Julias and Louisas. If we proceed to particulars, and engage in the never-ceasing inquiry of 'Have you read this?' and 'Have you read that?' I shall soon leave you as far behind me as—what shall I say?—I want an appropriate simile;—as far as your friend Emily herself left poor Valancourt when she went with her aunt into Italy. Consider how many years I have had the start of you. I had entered on my studies at Oxford, while you were a good little girl, working your sampler at home!"

"Not very good, I am afraid. But now, really do not you think Udolpho the nicest book in the world?"

"The nicest;—by which, I suppose, you mean the neatest. That must depend upon the binding."

"Henry," said Miss Tilney, "you are very impertinent. Miss Morland, he is treating you exactly as he does his sister. He is for ever finding fault with me, for some incorrectness of language, and now he is taking the same liberty with you. The word 'nicest,' as you used it, did not suit him; and you had better change it as soon as you can, or we shall be overpowered with Johnson and Blair all the rest of the way."

"I am sure," cried Catherine, "I did not mean to say any thing wrong; but it is a nice book, and why should not I call it so?"

"Very true," said Henry, "and this is a very nice day, and we are taking a very nice walk, and you are two very nice young ladies. Oh! it is a very nice word, indeed!—it does for every thing. Originally, perhaps, it was applied only to express neatness, propriety, delicacy, or refinement;—people were nice in their dress, in their sentiments, or their choice. But now every commendation on every subject is comprised in that one word."

"While, in fact," cried his sister, "it ought only to be applied to you, without any commendation at all. You are more nice than wise. Come, Miss Morland, let us leave him to meditate over our faults in the utmost propriety of diction, while we praise Udolpho in whatever terms we like best. It is a most interesting work. You are fond of that kind of reading?"

"To say the truth, I do not much like any other."

"Indeed!"

"That is, I can read poetry and plays, and things of that sort, and do not dislike travels. But history, real solemn history, I cannot be interested in. Can you?"

"Yes, I am fond of history."

"I wish I were, too. I read it a little as a duty, but it tells me nothing that does not either vex or weary me. The quarrels of popes and kings, with wars or pestilences, in every page. The men all so good for nothing, and hardly any women at all—it is very tiresome: and yet I often think it odd that it should be so dull, for a great deal of it must be invention. The speeches that are put into the heroes' mouths, their thoughts and designs—the chief of all this must be invention, and invention is what delights me in other books."

"Historians, you think," said Miss Tilney, "are not happy in their flights of fancy. They display imagination without raising interest. I am fond of history—and am very well contented to take the false with the true. In the principal facts, they have sources of intelligence in former histories and records, which may be as much depended on, I conclude, as any thing that does not actually pass under one's own observation; and, as for the little embellishments you speak of, they are embellishments, and I like them as such. If a speech be well drawn up, I read it with pleasure, by whomsoever it may be made—and probably with much greater, if the production of Mr. Hume or Mr. Robertson, than if the genuine words of Caractacus, Agricola, or Alfred the Great."

"You are fond of history! and so are Mr. Allen and my father; and I have two brothers who do not dislike it. So many instances within my small circle of friends is remarkable! At this rate, I shall not pity the writers of history any longer. If people like to read their books, it is all very well; but to be at so much trouble in filling great volumes, which, as I used to think, nobody would willingly ever look into, to be labouring only for the torment of little boys and girls, always struck me as a hard fate; and though I know it is all very right and necessary, I have often wondered at the person's courage that could sit down on purpose to do it."

"That little boys and girls should be tormented," said Henry, "is what no one at all acquainted with human nature in a civilized state can deny; but on behalf of our most distinguished historians, I must observe that they might well be offended at being supposed to have no higher aim; and that, by their method and style, they are perfectly well qualified to torment readers of the most advanced reason and mature time of life. I use the verb, 'to torment,' as I observed to be your own method, instead of 'to instruct,' supposing them to be now admitted as synonymous."

"You think me foolish to call instruction a torment; but if you had been as much used as myself to hear poor little children first learning their letters and then learning to spell, if you had ever seen how stupid they can be for a whole morning together, and how tired my poor mother is at the end of it, as I am in the habit of seeing almost every day of my life at home, you would allow that to torment and to instruct, might sometimes be used as synonymous words."

"Very probably. But historians are not accountable for the difficulty of learning to read; and even you yourself, who do not altogether seem particularly friendly to very severe, very intense application, may perhaps be brought to acknowledge that it is very well worth while to be tormented for two or three years of one's life, for the sake of being able to read all the rest of it. Consider—if reading had not been taught, Mrs. Radcliffe would have written in vain—or perhaps might not have written at all."

Catherine assented—and a very warm panegyric from her on that lady's merits closed the subject. The Tilneys were soon engaged in another, on which she had nothing to say. They were viewing the country with the eyes of persons accustomed to drawing, and decided on its capability of being formed into pictures, with all the eagerness of real taste. Here Catherine was quite lost. She knew nothing of drawing—nothing of taste—and she listened to them with an attention which brought her little profit, for they talked in phrases which conveyed scarcely any idea to her. The little which she could understand, however, appeared to contradict the very few notions she had entertained on the matter before. It seemed as if a good view were no longer to be taken from the top of a high hill, and that a clear blue sky was no longer a proof of a fine day. She was heartily ashamed of her ignorance. A misplaced shame. Where people wish to attach, they should always be ignorant. To come with a well-informed mind, is to come with an inability of administering to the vanity of others, which a sensible person would always wish to avoid. A woman, especially if she have the misfortune of knowing any thing, should conceal it as well as she can.

The advantages of natural folly in a beautiful girl have been already set forth by the capital pen of a sister author;—and to her treatment of the subject I will only add, in justice to men, that though to the larger and more trifling part of the sex, imbecility in females is a great enhancement of their personal charms, there is a portion of them too reasonable and too well-informed themselves to desire any thing more in woman than ignorance. But Catherine did not know her own advantages—did not know that a good-looking girl, with an affectionate heart and a very ignorant mind, cannot fail of attracting a clever young man, unless circumstances are particularly untoward. In the present instance, she confessed and lamented her want of knowledge; declared that she would give any thing in the world to be able to draw; and a lecture on the picturesque immediately followed, in which his instructions were so clear that she soon began to see beauty in every thing admired by him, and her attention was so earnest, that he became perfectly satisfied of her having a great deal of natural taste. He talked of fore-grounds, distances, and second distances—side-screens, and perspectives—lights and shades;—and Catherine was so hopeful a scholar, that when they gained the top of Beechen Cliff, she voluntarily rejected the whole city of Bath, as unworthy to make part of a landscape. Delighted with her progress, and fearful of wearying her with too much wisdom at once, Henry suffered the subject to decline, and by an easy transition from a piece of rocky fragment and the withered oak which he had placed near its summit, to oaks in general, to forests, the enclosure of them, wastelands, crown-lands and government, he shortly found himself arrived at politics; and from politics, it was an easy step to silence. The general pause which succeeded his short disquisition on the state of the nation, was put an end to by Catherine, who, in rather a solemn tone of voice, uttered these words:—"I have heard that something very shocking, indeed, will soon come out in London."

Miss Tilney, to whom this was chiefly addressed, was startled, and hastily replied, "Indeed!—and of what nature?"

"That I do not know, nor who is the author. I have only heard that it is to be more horrible than any thing we have met with yet."

"Good heaven!—Where could you hear of such a thing?"

"A particular friend of mine had an account of it in a letter from London yesterday. It is to be uncommonly dreadful. I shall expect murder and every thing of the kind."

"You speak with astonishing composure! But I hope your friend's accounts have been exaggerated;—and if such a design is known beforehand, proper measures will undoubtedly be taken by government to prevent its coming to effect."

"Government," said Henry, endeavouring not to smile, "neither desires nor dares to interfere in such matters. There must be murder; and government cares not how much."

The ladies stared. He laughed, and added, "Come, shall I make you understand each other, or leave you to puzzle out an explanation as you can? No—I will be noble. I will prove myself a man, no less by the generosity of my soul than the clearness of my head. I have no patience with such of my sex as disdain to let themselves sometimes down to the comprehension of yours. Perhaps the abilities of women are neither sound nor acute—neither vigorous nor keen. Perhaps they may want observation, discernment, judgment, fire, genius, and wit."

"Miss Morland, do not mind what he says; but have the goodness to satisfy me as to this dreadful riot?"

"Riot!—what riot?"

"My dear Eleanor, the riot is only in your own brain. The confusion there is scandalous. Miss Morland has been talking of nothing more dreadful than a new publication which is shortly to come out, in three duodecimo volumes, two hundred and seventy-six pages in each, with a frontispiece to the first, of two tombstones and a lantern—do you understand?—And you, Miss Morland—my stupid sister has mistaken all your clearest expressions. You talked of expected horrors in London—and instead of instantly conceiving, as any rational creature would have done, that such words could relate only to a circulating library, she immediately pictured to herself a mob of three thousand men assembling in St. George's Fields; the bank attacked, the Tower threatened, streets of London flowing with blood, a detachment of the 12th Light Dragoons, (the hopes of the nation,) called up from Northampton to quell the insurgents, and the gallant captain Frederick Tilney, in the moment of charging at the head of his troop, knocked off his horse by a brickbat from an upper window. Forgive her stupidity. The fears of the sister have added to the weakness of the woman; but she is by no means a simpleton in general."

Catherine looked grave. "And now, Henry," said Miss Tilney, "that you have made us understand each other, you may as well make Miss Morland understand yourself—unless you mean to have her think you intolerably rude to your sister, and a great brute in your opinion of women in general. Miss Morland is not used to your odd ways."

"I shall be most happy to make her better acquainted with them."

"No doubt;—but that is no explanation of the present."

"What am I to do?"

"You know what you ought to do. Clear your character handsomely before her. Tell her that you think very highly of the understanding of women."

"Miss Morland, I think very highly of the understanding of all the women in the world—especially of those—whoever they may be—with whom I happen to be in company."

"That is not enough. Be more serious."

"Miss Morland, no one can think more highly of the understanding of women than I do. In my opinion, nature has given them so much, that they never find it necessary to use more than half."

"We shall get nothing more serious from him now, Miss Morland. He is not in a sober mood. But I do assure you that he must be entirely misunderstood, if he can ever appear to say an unjust thing of any woman at all, or an unkind one of me."

It was no effort to Catherine, to believe that Henry Tilney could never be wrong. His manner might sometimes surprise, but his meaning must always be just:—and what she did not understand, she was almost as ready to admire, as what she did. The whole walk was delightful, and though it ended too soon, its conclusion was delightful too;—her friends attended her into the house, and Miss Tilney, before they parted, addressing herself with respectful form, as much to Mrs. Allen as to Catherine, petitioned for the pleasure of her company to dinner on the day after the next. No difficulty was made on Mrs. Allen's side—and the only difficulty on Catherine's was in concealing the excess of her pleasure."

THE ROMANCE OF MYSTERY.

The tendency to exaggerate every occurrence, so common with enthusiastic and undisciplined minds, and to invest commonplace occurrences with the rainbow tints of fancy, is well depicted in the scene we shall now give.

General Tilney, who had been informed Catherine was a great heiress, wished to obtain her wealth, and for that purpose planned a marriage between his son Henry and her. To make this sure, he invited her to go with the family to Northanger Abbey, and pass a few weeks. The idea was delightful to Catherine, who longed to see an old abbey or castle, where, she was sure, strange things must have occurred. She found, in the room appropriated to her use, an old chest—

"She advanced and examined it closely; it was of cedar, curiously inlaid with some darker wood, and raised about a foot from the ground, on a carved stand of the same. The lock was silver, though tarnished from age; at each end were the imperfect remains of handles, also of silver, broken, perhaps, prematurely, by some strange violence; and, on the centre of the lid, was a mysterious cipher in the same metal. Catherine bent over it intently, but without being able to distinguish any thing with certainty. She could not, in whatever direction she took it, believe the last letter to be a T: and that it should be any thing else in that house was a circumstance to raise no common degree of astonishment. If not originally theirs, by what strange events could it have fallen into the Tilney family?

Her fearful curiosity was every moment growing greater; and seizing, with trembling hands, the hasp of the lock, she resolved at all hazards to satisfy herself at least as to its contents. With difficulty, for something seemed to resist her efforts, she raised the lid a few inches; but at that moment a sudden knocking at the door of the room made her, starting, quit her hold, and the lid closed with alarming violence. This ill-timed intruder was Miss Tilney's maid, sent by her mistress to be of use to Miss Morland; and though Catherine immediately dismissed her, it recalled her to the sense of what she ought to be doing, and forced her, in spite of her anxious desire to penetrate this mystery, to proceed in her dressing without farther delay. Her progress was not quick, for her thoughts and her eyes were still bent on the object so well calculated to interest and alarm; and though she dared not waste a moment upon a second attempt, she could not remain many paces from the chest. At length, however, having slipped one arm in her gown, her toilette seemed so nearly finished, that the impatience of her curiosity might safely be indulged. One moment surely might be spared; and, so desperate should be the exertion of her strength, that, unless secured by supernatural means, the lid in one moment should be thrown back. With this spirit she sprang forward, and her confidence did not deceive her. Her resolute effort threw back the lid, and gave to her astonished eyes the view of a white cotton counterpane, properly folded, reposing at one end of the chest in undisputed possession!

She was gazing on it with the first blush of surprise, when Miss Tilney, anxious for her friend's being ready, entered the room, and to the rising shame of having harboured for some minutes an absurd expectation, was then added the shame of being caught in so idle a search. "That is a curious old chest, is not it?" said Miss Tilney, as Catherine hastily closed it, and turned away to the glass. "It is impossible to say how many generations it has been here. How it came to be first put in this room I know not, but I have not had it moved, because I thought it might sometimes be of use in holding hats and bonnets. The worst of it is that its weight makes it difficult to open. In that corner, however, it is at least out of the way."

Catherine had no leisure for speech, being at once blushing, tying her gown, and forming wise resolutions with the most violent despatch. Miss Tilney gently hinted her fear of being late; and in half a minute they ran down stairs together, in an alarm not wholly unfounded, for General Tilney was pacing the drawing-room, his watch in his hand, and having, on the very instant of their entering, pulled the bell with violence, ordered "dinner to be on the table directly!"

Catherine trembled at the emphasis with which he spoke, and sat pale and breathless, in a most humble mood, concerned for his children, and de-testing old chests; and the general, recovering his politeness as he looked at her, spent the rest of his time in scolding his daughter, for so foolishly hurrying her fair friend, who was absolutely out of breath from haste, when there was not the least occasion for hurry in the world: but Catherine could not at all get over the double distress of having involved her friend in a lecture and been a great simpleton herself, till they were happily seated at the dinner table, when the general's complacent smiles, and a good appetite of her own, restored her to peace. The dining-parlour was a noble room, suitable in its dimensions to a much larger drawing-room than the one in common use, and fitted up in a style of luxury and expense which was almost lost on the unpractised eye of Catherine, who saw little more than its spaciousness and the number of their attendants. Of the former, she spoke aloud her admiration; and the general, with a very gracious countenance, acknowledged that it was by no means an ill-sized room; and farther confessed, that, though as careless on such subjects as most people, he did look upon a tolerably large eating-room as one of the necessities of life; he supposed, however, "that she must have been used to much better sized apartments at Mr. Allen's?"

"No, indeed," was Catherine's honest assurance; "Mr. Allen's dining-parlour was not more than half as large:" and she had never seen so large a room as this in her life. The general's good humour increased. Why, as he had such rooms, he thought it would be simple not to make use of them; but, upon his honour, he believed there might be more comfort in rooms of only half their size. Mr. Allen's house, he was sure, was exactly of the true size for rational happiness.

The evening passed without any farther disturbance, and, in the occasional absence of General Tilney, with much positive cheerfulness. It was only in his presence that Catherine felt the smallest fatigue from her journey; and even then, even in moments of languor or restraint, a sense of general happiness preponderated, and she could think of her friends in Bath without one wish of being with them.

The night was stormy; the wind had been rising at intervals the whole afternoon; and by the time the party broke up, it blew and rained violently. Catherine, as she crossed the hall, listened to the tempest with sensations of awe, and, when she heard it rage round a corner of the ancient building and close with sudden fury a distant door, felt for the first time that she was really in an Abbey. Yes, these were characteristic sounds;—they brought to her recollection a countless variety of dreadful situations and horrid scenes, which such buildings had witnessed, and such storms ushered in; and most heartily did she rejoice in the happier circumstances attending her entrance within walls so solemn!—She had nothing to dread from midnight assassins or drunken gallants. Henry had certainly been only in jest in what he had told her that morning. In a house so furnished, and so guarded, she could have nothing to explore or to suffer; and might go to her bed-room as securely as if it had been her own chamber at Ruelerton. Thus wisely fortifying her mind, as she proceeded up stairs, she was enabled, especially, on perceiving that Miss Tilney slept only two doors from her, to enter her room with a tolerably stout heart; and her spirits were immediately assisted by the cheerful blaze of a wood fire. "How much better is this," said she, as she walked to the fender, "how much better to find a fire ready lit, than to have to wait shivering in the cold till all the family are in bed, as so many poor girls have been obliged to do, and then to have a faithful old servant frightening one by coming in with a fagot! How glad I am that Northanger is what it is! If it had been like some other places, I do not know that, in such a night as this, I could have answered for my courage;—but now, to be sure, there is nothing to alarm one."

She looked around the room. The window curtains seemed in motion. It could be nothing but the violence of the wind penetrating through the divisions of the shutters; and she stepped boldly forward, carelessly humming a tune, to assure herself of its being so, peeped courageously behind each curtain, saw nothing on either low window-seat to scare her, and on placing a hand against the shutter, felt the strongest conviction of the wind's force. A glance at the old chest, as she turned away from this examination, was not without its use; she scorned the causeless fears of an idle fancy, and began with a most happy indifference to prepare herself for bed. "She should take her time; she should not hurry herself; she did not care if she were the last person up in the house. But she would not make up her fire; that would seem cowardly, as if she wished for the protection of light after she was in bed." The fire, therefore, died away, and Catherine, having spent the best part of an hour in her arrangements, was beginning to think of stepping into bed, when, on giving a parting glance round the room, she was struck by the appearance of a high, old-fashioned black cabinet, which, though in a situation conspicuous enough, had never caught her notice before. Henry's words, his description of the ebony cabinet which was to escape her observation at first, immediately rushed across her; and though there could be nothing really in it, there was something whimsical; it was certainly a very remarkable coincidence! She took her candle and looked closely at the cabinet. It was not absolutely ebony and gold; but it was Japan, black and yellow Japan of the handsomest kind: and as she held her candle, the yellow had very much the effect of gold. The key was in the door, and she had a strange fancy to look into it; not, however, with the smallest expectation of finding any thing, but it was so very odd, after what Henry had said. In short, she could not sleep till she had examined it. So, placing the candle with great caution on a chair, she seized the key with a very tremulous hand, and tried to turn it; but it resisted her utmost strength. Alarmed, but not discouraged, she tried it another way; a bolt flew, and she believed herself successful; but how strangely mysterious!—the door was still immoveable. She paused a moment in breathless wonder. The wind roared down the chimney, the rain beat in torrents against the windows, and every thing seemed to speak the awfulness of her situation. To retire to bed, however, unsatisfied on such a point, would be vain, since sleep must be impossible with the consciousness of a cabinet so mysteriously closed in her immediate vicinity. Again, therefore, she applied herself to the key, and after moving it every possible way for some instants with the determined celerity of hope's last effort, the door suddenly yielded to her hand: her heart leaped with exultation at such a victory, and having thrown open each folding door, the second being secured only by bolts of less wonderful construction than the lock, though in that her eye could not discern any thing unusual, a double range of small drawers appeared in view, with some larger drawers above and below them; and in the centre, a small door, closed also with a lock and key, secured in all probability a cavity of importance.

Catherine's heart beat quickly, but her courage did not fail her. With a cheek flushed by hope, and an eye straining with curiosity, her fingers grasped the handle of a drawer and drew it forth. It was entirely empty. With less alarm and greater eagerness she seized a second, a third, a fourth; each was equally empty. Not one was left unsearched, and in not one was any thing found. Well read in the art of concealing a treasure, the possibility of false linings to the drawers did not escape her, and she felt round each with anxious acuteness in vain. The place in the middle alone remained now unexplored; and though she had "never from the first had the smallest idea of finding any thing in any part of the cabinet, and was not in the least disappointed at her ill success thus far, it would be foolish not to examine it thoroughly while she was about it." It was some time, however, before she could unfasten the door, the same difficulty occurring in the management of this inner lock as of the outer; but at length it did open; and not in vain, as hitherto, was her search; her quick eyes directly fell on a roll of paper pushed back into the farther part of the cavity, apparently for concealment, and her feelings at that moment were indescribable. Her heart fluttered, her knees trembled, and her cheeks grew pale. She seized, with an unsteady hand, the precious manuscript, for half a glance sufficed to ascertain written characters; and while she acknowledged with awful sensations this striking exemplification of what Henry had foretold, resolved instantly to peruse every line before she attempted to rest.

The dimness of the light her candle emitted made her turn to it with alarm; but there was no danger of its sudden extinction, it had yet some hours to burn; and that she might not have any greater difficulty in distinguishing the writing than what its ancient date might occasion, she hastily snuffed it. Alas! it was snuffed and extinguished in one. A lamp could not have expired with more awful effect. Catherine, for a few moments, was motionless with horror. It was done completely; not a remnant of light in the wick could give hope to the rekindling breath. Darkness impenetrable and immovable filled the room. A violent gust of wind, rising with sudden fury, added fresh horror to the moment. Catherine trembled from head to foot. In the pause which succeeded, a sound like receding foot-steps and the closing of a distant door struck on her affrighted ear. Human nature could support no more. A cold sweat stood on her forehead, the manuscript fell from her hand, and groping her way to the bed, she jumped hastily in, and sought some suspension of agony by creeping far underneath the clothes. To close her eyes in sleep that night, she felt must be entirely out of the question. With a curiosity so justly awakened, and feeling in every way so agitated, repose must be absolutely impossible. The storm, too, abroad, so dreadful! She had not been used to feel alarm from wind, but now every blast seemed fraught with awful intelligence. The manuscript so wonderfully found, so wonderfully accomplishing the morning's prediction, how was it to be accounted for? What could it contain?—to whom could it relate?—by what means could it have been so long concealed?—and how singularly strange that it should fall to her lot to discover it! Till she had made herself mistress of its contents, however, she could have neither repose nor comfort; and with the sun's first rays she was determined to peruse it. But many were the tedious hours which must yet intervene. She shuddered, tossed about in her bed, and envied every quiet sleeper. The storm still raged, and various were the noises, more terrific even than the wind, which struck at intervals on her startled ear. The very curtains of her bed seemed at one moment in motion, and at another the lock of her door was agitated, as if by the attempt of somebody to enter. Hollow murmurs seemed to creep along the gallery, and more than once her blood was chilled by the sound of distant moans. Hour after hour passed away, and the wearied Catherine had heard three proclaimed by all the clocks in the house, before the tempest subsided, or she unknowingly fell fast asleep.

The housemaid's folding back her window-shutters at eight o'clock the next day, was the sound which first roused Catherine; and she opened her eyes, wondering that they could ever have been closed on objects of cheerfulness; her fire was already burning, and a bright morning had succeeded the tempest of the night. Instantaneously, with the consciousness of existence, returned her recollection of the manuscript; and, springing from the bed in the very moment of the maid's going away, she eagerly collected every scattered sheet which had burst from the roll on its falling to the ground, and flew back to enjoy the luxury of their perusal on her pillow. She now plainly saw that she must not expect a manuscript of equal length with the generality of what she had shuddered over in books; for the roll, seeming to consist entirely of small disjointed sheets, was altogether but of trifling size, and much less than she had supposed it to be at first.

Her greedy eye glanced rapidly over a page. She started at its import. Could it be possible, or did not her senses play her false? An inventory of linen, in coarse and modern characters, seemed all that was before her. If the evidence of sight might be trusted, she held a washing-bill in her hand. She seized another sheet, and saw the same articles with little variation; a third, a fourth, and a fifth presented nothing new. Shirts, stockings, cravats, and waistcoats faced her in each. Two others, penned by the same hand, marked an expenditure scarcely more interesting, in letters, hair-powder, shoe-string, and breeches-ball. And the larger sheet, which had enclosed the rest, seemed by its first cramp line, "To poultice chesnut mare,"—a farrier's bill! Such was the collection of papers, (left, perhaps, as she could then suppose, by the negligence of a servant in the place whence she had taken them,) which had filled her with expectation and alarm, and robbed her of half her night's rest. She felt humbled to the dust. Could not the adventure of the chest have taught her wisdom? A corner of it catching her eye as she lay, seemed to rise up in judgment against her. Nothing could now be clearer than the absurdity of her recent fancies. To suppose that a manuscript of many generations back could have remained undiscovered in a room such as that, so modern, so habitable; or that she should be the first to possess the skill of unlocking a cabinet, the key of which was open to all!

How could she have so imposed upon herself? Heaven forbid that Henry Tilney should ever know her folly! And it was, in a great measure, his own doing, for had not the cabinet appeared so exactly to agree with his description of her adventures, she should never have felt the smallest curiosity about it. This was the only comfort that occurred. Impatient to get rid of those hateful evidences of her folly, those detestable papers then scattered over the bed, she rose directly, and folding them up as nearly as possible in the same shape as before, returned them to the same spot within the cabinet, with a very hearty wish that no untoward accident might ever bring them forward again to disgrace her even with herself.

Why the locks should have been so difficult to open, however, was still something remarkable, for she could now manage them with perfect ease. In this there was surely something mysterious, and she indulged in the flattering suggestion for half a minute, till the possibility of the door's having been at first unlocked, and of being herself its fastener, darted into her head, and cost her another blush.

She got away as soon as she could from a room in which her conduct produced such unpleasant reflections, and found her way with all speed to the breakfast parlour, as it had been pointed out to her by Miss Tilney the evening before. Henry was alone in it; and his immediate hope of her having been undisturbed by the tempest, with an arch reference to the character of the building they inhabited, was rather distressing. For the world would she not have her weakness suspected; and yet, unequal to an absolute falsehood, was constrained to acknowledge that the wind had kept her awake a little. "But we have a charming morning after it," she added, desiring to get rid of the subject, "and storms and sleeplessness are nothing when they are over. What beautiful hyacinths! I have just learned to love a hyacinth."

"And how might you learn? By accident or argument?"

"Your sister taught me; I cannot tell how. Mrs. Allen used to take pains, year after year, to make me like them; but I never could till I saw them the other day in Milsom-street; I am naturally indifferent about flowers."

"But now you love a hyacinth. So much the better. You have gained a new source of enjoyment, and it is well to have as many holds upon happiness as possible. Besides, a taste for flowers is always desirable in your sex, as a means of getting you out of doors and tempting you to more frequent exercise than you would otherwise take. And though the love of a hyacinth may be rather domestic, who can tell, the sentiment once raised, but you may in time come to love a rose?"

"But I do not want any such pursuit to get me out of doors. The pleasure of walking and breathing fresh air is enough for me, and in fine weather I am out more than half my time. Mamma says, I am never within."

"At any rate, however, I am pleased that you have learnt to love a hyacinth. The mere habit of learning to love is the thing; and a teachableness of disposition in a young lady is a great blessing."

AYSA,

A MOORISH female, taken prisoner by the Spaniards under Charles V., at the siege of Tunis, lived in the sixteenth century. She rejected with indignation the offer of Muley-Haseen, who wished to redeem her from captivity, saying that she disdained to owe her liberty to so great a coward.

AZZI DE FORTI, FAUSTINA,

A NATIVE of Arezzo, distinguished for her poetical talents, and admitted into the academy of Arcadia under the name of Eurinomia. She published a volume of Italian poems, and died in 1724.

BABOIS, MADAME VICTOIRE,

A FRENCH poetess, was born in 1759 or 1760, and died in 1839. She was the niece of Ducis, the celebrated French dramatist and translator of Shakespeare. This lady spent her whole life at Versailles, in the midst of her family and friends; and having but a slight acquaintance with men of letters, she was never taught the rules of style and composition, but wrote as nature dictated. Her poetry is very popular in France, and she is also the author of several little prose works. Her elegies were particularly appropriate, for she had much true feeling, and always sympathized with the sorrows she described. The following was written the evening of her own decease, addressed to her friend Madame Waldon :

“ La mort enfin m'ordonne de la suivre,
Et dans sa froide nuit je me sens enfermer ;
Mais mon cœur semble me survivre :
Vos chants si doux savent le ranimer ;
Je n'ai plus le pouvoir de vivre :
Je sens encor celui d'aimer

BACCIOCCHI, MARIE ANNE ELISE,

SISTER of Napoleon Bonaparte, formerly princess of Lucca and Piombino, was born at Ajaccio, January 8th, 1777, and educated at the royal institution for noble ladies at St. Cyr. She lived at Marseilles, with her mother, during the revolution. In 1797, with her mother's consent, but against her brother's wish, she married Felix Pascal Bacciocchi, a captain in Napoleon's army in Italy. In 1799, she went to Paris, and resided with her brother Lucien, where she collected around her the most accomplished men of the capital. Generous, as she ever was towards distinguished talents, she conferred particular favours on Châteaubriand and Fontanes. Conscious of her intellectual superiority, she kept her husband in a very subordinate position. It was she, in fact, who governed the principalities of Lucca and Piombino. When she reviewed the troops of the duchy of Tuscany, her husband acted as aide-de-camp. She introduced many improvements.

In 1817 she retired to Bologna, but the following year she was obliged to go to Austria. Here she lived, at first, with her sister Caroline ; afterwards with her own family at Trieste, where she called herself the countess Compignano. She died August 7th, 1820, at her country-seat, Villa Vicentina, near Trieste. In that city she was distinguished for her benevolence. She left a daughter, Napoleona Elise, born June 3d, 1806, and a son, who remained under the guardianship of their father, although she requested that her brother Jerome might have the charge of them.

This princess was endowed with superior abilities, but she sullied them by great faults. Subjugated by imperious passions, and surrounded by unworthy flatterers, she has been accused of many immoralities, and her conduct was certainly deserving of great censure. But had she belonged to the old régime her character would have suffered less from public scandal. The family of Napoleon had to share with him in the obloquy of being parvenus.

BACHE, SARAH,

THE only daughter of Benjamin Franklin, was born at Philadelphia, September 1744. But little is known of her early years, yet as her father knew well the advantages of education, it is probable that hers was not neglected. In 1767, Miss Franklin was married to Richard Bache, a merchant of Philadelphia, but a native of Yorkshire, England. In the troublous times which preceded the American Revolutionary War, Dr. Franklin had acted a conspicuous part ; his only daughter was thus trained in the duty of patriotism, and she was prepared to do or to suffer in the cause of her country. Mrs. Bache took an active part in providing clothing for the American soldiers, during the severe winter of 1780. The marquis de Chastellux thus notices a visit he made to her about this time. After detailing the preliminaries of the visit, he goes on :—"Mrs. Bache merited all the anxiety we had to see her, for she is the daughter of Mr. Franklin. Simple in her manners, like her respected father, she possesses his benevolence. She conducted us into a room filled with work, lately finished by the ladies of Philadelphia. This work consisted neither of embroidered tambour waistcoats, nor of net-work edging, nor of gold and silver brocade. It was a quantity of shirts for the soldiers of Pennsylvania. The ladies bought the linen from their own private purses, and took a pleasure in cutting them out and sewing themselves. On each shirt was the name of the lady who made it, and they amounted to twenty-two hundred."

A letter of M. de Marbois to Dr. Franklin, the succeeding year—thus speaks of his daughter : "If there are in Europe any women who need a model of attachment to domestic duties and love for their country, Mrs. Bache may be pointed out to them as such. She passed a part of the last year in exertions to rouse the zeal of the Pennsylvania ladies, and she made on this occasion such a happy use of the eloquence which you know she possesses, that a large part of the American army was provided with shirts, bought with their money, or made by their hands. In her applications for this purpose, she showed the most indefatigable zeal, the most unwearied perseverance, and a courage in asking, which surpassed even the obstinate reluctance of the Quakers in refusing."

Such were the women of America during the long and fearful struggle which preceded the Independence of the United States. Few, indeed, had the talents and opportunities to perform so many benevolent deeds as Mrs. Bache ; her patriotism has made her an example for her countrywomen. She died in 1808, aged sixty-four years.

BACON, ANNE,

A LADY distinguished by her piety, virtue, and learning, was the second daughter of Sir Anthony Cook, preceptor to king Edward VI., and was born about the year 1528. She had a very liberal education, and became eminent for her skill in the Greek, Latin, and Italian languages. She was married to Sir Nicholas Bacon, by whom she had two sons, Anthony and Francis, whose distinguished abilities were greatly improved by the tender care of so accomplished a mother. Her task was, however, rendered very easy, because her daughter, Lady Bacon, displayed, at an early age, her capacity, application, and industry, by translating from the Italian of Bernardine Octine, twenty-five sermons, on the abstruse doctrines of predestination and election. This performance was published about the year 1550. A circumstance took place soon after her marriage, which again called forth her talents and zeal. The Catholics of that period, alarmed at the progress of the Reformation, exerted, in attacking it and throwing an odium upon the Reformers, all their learning and activity. The Council of Trent was called by pope Pius IV., to which queen Elizabeth was invited. The princes of Christendom pressed her, by their letters, to receive and entertain the nuncio, urging her, at the same time, to submit to the Council. Bishop Jewell was employed, on this occasion, to give an account of the measures taken in the preceding parliament, and to retort upon the Romanists, in 'An Apology for the Church of England,' the charges brought against the reformers. The work of the bishop obtained great reputation, but, being written in Latin, was confined to the learned. A translation was loudly called for by the common people, who justly considered their own rights and interests in the controversy. Lady Bacon undertook to translate the bishop's 'Apology,' a task which she accomplished with fidelity and elegance. She sent a copy of her work to the primate, whom she considered as most interested in the safety of the church; a second copy she presented to the author, lest, inadvertently, she had in any respect done injustice to his sentiments. Her copy was accompanied by an epistle in Greek, to which the bishop replied in the same language. The translation was carefully examined, both by the primate and author, who found it so chastely and correctly given, as to stand in no need of the slightest emendation. The translator received, on this occasion, a letter from the primate, full of high and just compliments to her talents and erudition.

Lady Bacon survived her husband, and died about the beginning of the reign of James I., at Gerhamburg, near St. Albans, in Hertfordshire.

BANDETTINI, THERESA,

AN improvisatrice, was born at Lucca, about 1756; she was carefully educated, but was obliged, from loss of property, to go on the stage. She made her first appearance in Florence, and was unsuccessful. Some time after this, while listening to an improvisatore of Verona, she broke forth into a splendid poetical panegyric on the poet. Encouraged by him, she devoted herself entirely to this art. Her originality, fervid imagination, and the truth and harmony of her expressions, soon gained for her great celebrity. In 1789, she married Pietro Landucci, upon whose persuasions she abandoned the stage, travelled through Italy, and was chosen a member of several academies. One of her most celebrated poems was an impromptu, delivered in 1794, before prince Lambertini, at Bologna, on the death of Marie Antoinette of France. In 1813, she returned to Lucca, where she lived retired on her small property. She published Ode tre, or Three Odes; of which the first celebrates Nelson's victory at Aboukir, the second, Suwarroff's victories in Italy, and the third, the victories of the arch-duke Charles in Germany. She also published, under the name of Cimarilli Etrusca, Saggio di Versi Estemporanei, among which the poem on Petrarch's interview with Laura, in the church, is especially celebrated. She also wrote a tragedy called "Polidoro," which obtained great success at Milan, and an epic poem, "La Deseide." She was an excellent classic scholar, and made many translations from the Latin and Greek. Nor were the qualities of her heart surpassed by these mental advantages. She was beloved by all around her for her amiable, benevolent character, and a piety sincere and cheerful while it regulated her in the most brilliant part of her career—brought comfort, resignation, and tranquillity to her death-bed. She expired in 1837.

BARBAULD, ANNA LETITIA.

To whom the cause of rational education is much indebted, was the eldest child, and only daughter, of the Rev. John Aiken, D. D. She was born on the 20th of June, 1743, at Kibworth Harcourt, in Leicestershire, England, where her father was at that time master of a boys' school. From her childhood, she manifested great quickness of intellect, and her education was conducted with much care by her parents. In 1773, she was induced to publish a volume of her poems, and within the year four editions of the work were called for. And in the same year she published, in conjunction with her brother, Dr. Aiken, a volume called "Miscellaneous Pieces in Prose." In 1774, Miss Aiken married the Rev. Rochemont Barbauld, a dissenting minister, descended from a family of French Protestants. He had charge, at that time, of a congregation at Palgrave, in Suffolk, where he also opened a boarding-school for boys, the success of which is, in a great measure, to be attributed to Mrs. Barbauld's exertions. She also took several very young boys as her own entire charge, among whom were, Lord Denman, afterwards Chief Justice of England, and Sir William Gell. It was for these boys that she composed her "Hymns in Prose for Children." In 1775, she published a volume entitled "Devotional Pieces, compiled from the Psalms of David," with "Thoughts on the Devotional Taste, and on Sects and Establishments;" and also her "Early Lessons," which still stands unrivalled among children's books.

In 1786, after a tour to the continent, Mr. and Mrs. Barbauld established themselves at Hampstead, and there several tracts proceeded from the pen of our authoress on the topics of the day, in all which she espoused the principles of the Whigs. She also assisted her father in preparing a series of tales for children, entitled 'Evenings at Home,' and she wrote critical essays on Akenside and Collins, prefixed to editions of their works. In 1802, Mr. Barbauld became pastor of the congregation (formerly Dr. Price's) at Newington Green, also in the vicinity of London; and, quitting Hampstead, they took up their abode in the village of Stoke Newington. In 1803, Mrs. Barbauld compiled a selection of essays from the 'Spectator,' 'Tatler,' and 'Guardian,' to which she prefixed a preliminary essay; and, in the following year, she edited the correspondence of Richardson, and wrote an interesting and elegant life of the novelist. Her husband died in 1808, and Mrs. Barbauld has recorded her feelings on this melancholy event in a poetical dirge to his memory, and also in her poem of "Eighteen Hundred and Eleven." Seeking relief in literary occupation, she also edited a collection of the British novelists, published in 1810, with an introductory essay, and biographical and critical notices. After a gradual decay, this accomplished and excellent woman died on the 9th of March, 1825. Some of the lyrical pieces of Mrs. Barbauld are flowing and harmonious, and her "Ode to Spring" is a happy imitation of Collins. She wrote also several poems in blank verse, characterized by a serious tenderness and elevation of thought. "Her earliest pieces," says her niece, Miss Lucy Aiken, "as well as her more recent ones, exhibit, in their imagery and allusions, the fruits of extensive and varied reading. In youth, the power of her imagination was counterbalanced by the activity of her intellect, which exercised itself in rapid but not unprofitable excursions over almost every field of knowledge. In age, when this activity abated, imagination appeared to exert over her an undiminished sway." Charles James Fox is said to have been a great admirer of Mrs. Barbauld's songs, but they are by no means the best of her compositions, being generally artificial, and unimpassioned in their character.

Her works show great powers of mind, an ardent love of civil and religious liberty, and that genuine and practical piety which ever distinguished her character.

In many a bosom has Mrs. Barbauld, "by deep, strong, and permanent association, laid a foundation for practical devotion" in after life. In her highly poetical language, only inferior to that of Holy Writ, when "the winter is over and gone, and buds come out on the trees, the crimson blossoms of the peach and the nectarine are seen, and the green leaves sprout," what heart can be so insensible as not to join in the grand chorus of nature, and "on every hill, and in every green field, to offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving and the incense of praise."

With each revolving year, the simple lessons of infancy are recalled to our minds, when we watch the beautiful succession of nature, and think, "How doth every plant know its season to put forth? They are marshalled in order; each one knoweth his place, and standeth up in his own rank."

"The snowdrop and the primrose make haste to lift their heads above the ground. When the spring cometh they say, here we are! The carnation waiteth for the full strength of the year; and the hardy laurustinus cheereth the winter months."

Who can observe all this, and not exclaim with her, "Every field is like an open book; every painted flower hath a lesson written on its leaves.

"Every murmuring brook hath a tongue; a voice is in every whispering wind.

"They all speak of him who made them; they all tell us he is very good."

Such sentiments, instilled into the hearts of children, have power, with the blessing of God, to preserve the moral feelings pure and holy; and also to keep the love of nature and the memories of early life among the sweetest pleasures of mature life.

In a memoir written by Miss Lucy Aiken, the niece of Mrs. Barbauld, and kindred in genius as well as in blood, we find this beautiful and just description of the subject of our sketch:

"To claim for Mrs. Barbauld the praise of purity and elevation of mind may well appear superfluous. Her education and connections, the course of her life, the whole tenour of her writings, bear abundant testimony to this part of her character. It is a higher, or at least a rarer commendation to add, that no one ever better loved "a sister's praise," even that of such sisters as might have been peculiarly regarded in the light of rivals. She was acquainted with almost all the principal female writers of her time; and there was not one of the number whom she failed frequently to mention in terms of admiration, esteem or affection, whether in conversation, in letters to her friends, or in print. To humbler aspirants in the career of letters, who often applied to her for advice or assistance, she was invariably courteous, and in many instances essentially serviceable. The sight of youth and beauty was peculiarly gratifying to her fancy and her feelings; and children and young persons, especially females, were accordingly large sharers in her benevolence: she loved their society, and would often invite them to pass weeks or months in her house, when she spared no pains to amuse and instruct them; and she seldom failed, after they had quitted her, to recall herself from time to time to their recollection, by affectionate and playful letters, or welcome presents.

In the conjugal relation, her conduct was guided by the highest principles of love and duty. As a sister, the uninterrupted flow of her affection, manifested by numberless tokens of love,—not alone to her brother, but to every member of his family,—will ever be recalled by them with emotions of tenderness, respect, and gratitude. She passed through a long life without having dropped, it is said, a single friend."

Since the decease of Mrs. Barbauld, her productions have been collected, published in three volumes, and circulated widely both in England and the United States. Some of the prose articles are of extraordinary merit; the one which we here insert, has rarely been excelled for originality of thought and vigour of expression. Its sentiments will never become obsolete, nor its truths lose their value.

ON EDUCATION.

"The other day I paid a visit to a gentleman with whom, though greatly my superior in fortune, I have long been in habits of an easy intimacy. He rose in the world by honourable industry, and married, rather late in life, a lady to whom he had been long attached, and in whom centered the wealth of several expiring families. Their earnest wish for children was not immediately gratified. At length they were made happy by a son, who, from the moment he was born, engrossed all their care and attention. My friend received me in his library, where I found him busied in turning over books of education, of which he had collected all that were worthy notice, from Xenophon to Locke, and from Locke to Catharine Macauley. As he knows I have been engaged in the business of instruction, he did me the honour to consult me on the subject of his researches, hoping, he said, that, out of all the systems before him, we should be able to form a plan equally complete and comprehensive; it being the determination of both himself and his lady to choose the best that could be had, and to spare neither pains nor expense in making their child all that was great and good. I gave him my thoughts with the utmost freedom, and after I returned home, threw upon paper the observations which had occurred to me.

The first thing to be considered, with respect to education, is the object of it. This appears to me to have been generally misunderstood. Education, in its largest sense, is a thing of great scope and extent. It includes the whole process by which a human being is formed to be what he is, in habits, principles, and cultivation of every kind. But of this, a very small part is in the power even of the parent himself; a smaller still can be directed by purchased tuition of any kind. You engage for your child masters and tutors at large salaries; and you do well, for they are competent to instruct him: they will give him the means, at least, of acquiring science and accomplishments; but in the business of education, properly so called, they can do little for you. Do you ask, then, what will educate your son? Your example will educate him; your conversation with your friends; the business he sees you transact; the likings and dislikings you express; these will educate him;—the society you live in will educate him; your domestics will educate him; above all, your rank and situation in life, your house, your table, your pleasure-grounds, your hounds and your stables will educate him. It is not in your power to withdraw him from the continual influence of these things, except you were to withdraw yourself from them also. You speak of beginning the education of your son. The moment he was able to form an idea his education was already begun; the education of circumstances—insensible education—which, like insensible perspiration, is of more constant and powerful effect, and of infinitely more consequence to the habit, than that which is direct and apparent. This education goes on at every instant of time; it goes on like time; you can neither stop it nor turn its course. What these have a tendency to make your child, that he will be. Maxims and documents are good precisely till they are tried, and no longer; they will teach him to talk, and nothing more. The circumstances in which your son is placed will be even more prevalent than your example; and you have no right to expect him to become what you yourself are, but by the same means. You, that have toiled during youth, to set your son upon higher ground, and to enable him to begin where you left off, do not expect that son to be what you were,—diligent, modest, active, simple in his tastes, fertile in resources. You have put him under quite a different master. Poverty educated you; wealth will educate him. You cannot suppose the result will be the same. You must not even expect that he will be what you now are; for though relaxed perhaps from the severity of your frugal habits, you still derive advantage from having formed them; and, in your heart, you like plain dinners, and early hours, and old friends, whenever your fortune will permit you to enjoy them. But it will not be so with your son: his tastes will be formed by your present situation, and in no degree by your former one. But I take great care, you will say, to counteract these tendencies, and to bring him up in hardy and simple manners; I know their value, and am resolved that he shall acquire no other. Yes, you make him hardy; that is to say, you take a counting-house in a good air, and make him run, well clothed and carefully attended, for, it may be, an hour in a clear frosty winter's day upon your gravelled terrace; or perhaps you take the puny shivering infant from his warm bed, and dip him in an icy cold bath,—and you think you have done great matters. And so you have; you have done all you can. But you were suffered to run abroad half the day on a bleak heath, in weather fit and unfit, wading bare-foot through dirty ponds, sometimes losing your way benighted, scrambling over hedges, climbing trees, in perils every hour both of life and limb. Your life was of very little consequence to any one; even your parents, encumbered with a numerous family, had little time to indulge the softnesses of affection, or the solicitude of anxiety; and to every one else it was of no consequence at all. It is not possible for you, it would not even be right for you, in your present situation, to pay no more attention to your child than was paid to you. In these mimic experiments of education, there is always something which distinguishes them from reality; some weak part left unfortified, for the arrows of misfortune to find their way into. Achilles was a young nobleman, dios Achilleus, and therefore, though he had Chiron for his tutor, there was one foot left undipped. You may throw by Rousseau; your parents practised without having read it; you may read, but imperious circumstances forbid you the practice of it.

You are sensible of the advantages of simplicity of diet; and you make a point of restricting that of your child to the plainest food, for you are resolved that he shall not be nice. But this plain food is of the choicest quality, prepared by your own cook; his fruit is ripened from your walls; his cloth, his glasses, all the accompaniments of the table, are such as are only met with in families of opulence: the very servants who attend him are neat, well dressed, and have a certain air of fashion. You may call this simplicity; but I say he will be nice,—for it is a kind of simplicity which only wealth can attain to, and which will subject him to be disgusted at all common tables. Besides, he will from time to time partake of those delicacies which your table abounds with; you yourself will give him of them occasionally; you would be unkind if you did not: your servants, if good-natured, will do the same. Do you think you can keep the full stream of luxury running by his lips, and he not taste of it? Vain imagination!

I would not be understood to inveigh against wealth, or against the enjoyments of it; they are real enjoyments, and allied to many elegancies in manners and in taste;—I only wish to prevent unprofitable pains and inconsistent expectations.

You are sensible of the benefit of early rising; and you may, if you please, make it a point that your daughter shall retire with her governess, and your son with his tutor, at the hour when you are preparing to see company. But their sleep, in the first place, will not be so sweet and undisturbed amidst the rattle of carriages, and the glare of tapers glancing through the rooms, as that of the village child in his quiet cottage, protected by silence and darkness; and moreover, you may depend upon it, that as the coercive power of education is laid aside, they will in a few months slide into the habitudes of the rest of the family, whose hours are determined by their company and situation in life. You have, however, done good, as far as it goes; it is something gained, to defer pernicious habits, if we cannot prevent them.

There is nothing which has so little share in education as direct precept. To be convinced of this, we need only reflect that there is no one point we labour more to establish with children, than that of their speaking truth; and there is not any in which we succeed worse. And why? Because children readily see we have an interest in it. Their speaking truth is used by us as an engine of government—“Tell me, my dear child, when you have broken anything, and I will not be angry with you.” “Thank you for nothing,” says the child; “if I prevent you from finding it out, I am sure you will not be angry:” and nine times out of ten he can prevent it. He knows that, in the common intercourses of life, you tell a thousand falsehoods. But these are necessary lies on important occasions.

Your child is the best judge how much occasion he has to tell a lie: he may have as great occasion for it, as you have to conceal a bad piece of news from a sick friend, or to hide your vexation from an unwelcome visitor. That authority which extends its claims over every action, and even every thought, which insists upon an answer to every interrogation, however indiscreet or oppressive to the feelings, will, in young or old, produce falsehood; or, if in some few instances the deeply imbibed fear of future and unknown punishment should restrain from direct falsehood, it will produce a habit of dissimulation, which is still worse. The child, the slave, or the subject, who, on proper occasions, may not say, “I do not choose to tell,” will certainly, by the circumstances in which you place him, be driven to have recourse to deceit, even should he not be countenanced by your example.

I do not mean to assert, that sentiments inculcated in education have no influence;—they have much, though not the most: but it is the sentiments we let drop occasionally, the conversation they overhear when playing unnoticed in a corner of the room, which has an effect upon children; and not what is addressed directly to them in the tone of exhortation. If you would know precisely the effect these set discourses have upon your child, be pleased to reflect upon that which a discourse from the pulpit, which you have reason to think merely professional, has upon you. Children have almost an intuitive discernment between the maxims you bring forward for their use, and those by which you direct your own conduct. Be as cunning as you will, they are always more cunning than you. Every child knows whom his father and mother love and see with pleasure, and whom they dislike; for whom they think themselves obliged to set out their best plate and china: whom they think it an honour to visit, and upon whom they confer honour by admitting them to their company. “Respect nothing so much as virtue,” says Eugenio to his son; “virtue and talents are the only grounds of distinction.” The child presently has occasion to inquire why his father pulls off his hat to some people and not to others; he is told, that outward respect must be proportioned to different stations in life. This is a little difficult of comprehension: however, by dint of explanation, he gets over it tolerably well. But he sees his father’s house in the bustle and hurry of preparation; common business laid aside, everybody in movement, an unusual anxiety to please and to shine. Nobody is at leisure to receive his caresses or attend to his questions; his lessons are interrupted, his hours deranged. At length a guest arrives: it is my Lord —, whom he has heard you speak of twenty times as one of the most worthless characters upon earth. Your child, Eugenio, has received a lesson of education. Resume, if you will, your systems of morality on the morrow, you will in vain attempt to eradicate it. "You expect company, mamma: must I be dressed to-day?" "No, it is only good Mrs. Such-a-one." Your child has received a lesson of education, one which he well understands, and will long remember. You have sent your child to a public school; but to secure his morals against the vice which you too justly apprehend abounds there, you have given him a private tutor, a man of strict morals and religion. He may help him to prepare his tasks; but do you imagine it will be in his power to form his mind? His schoolfellows, the allowance you give him, the manners of the age and of the place, will do that; and not the lectures which he is obliged to hear. If these are different from what you yourself experienced, you must not be surprised to see him gradually recede from the principles, civil and religious, which you hold, and break off from your connexions, and adopt manners different from your own. This is remarkably exemplified amongst those of the Dissenters who have risen to wealth and consequence. I believe it would be difficult to find an instance of families, who for three generations have kept their carriage and continued Dissenters.

Education, it is often observed, is an expensive thing. It is so; but the paying for lessons is the smallest part of the cost. If you would go to the price of having your son a worthy man, you must be so yourself; your friends, your servants, your company must be all of that stamp. Suppose this to be the case, much is done: but there will remain circumstances which perhaps you cannot alter, that will still have their effect. Do you wish him to love simplicity? Would you be content to lay down your coach, to drop your title? Where is the parent who would do this to educate his son? You carry him to the workshops of artisans, and show him different machines and fabrics, to awaken his ingenuity. The necessity of getting his bread would awaken it much more effectually. The single circumstance of having a fortune to get, or a fortune to spend, will probably operate more strongly upon his mind, not only than your precepts, but even than your example. You wish your child to be modest and unassuming; you are so, perhaps, yourself,—and you pay liberally a preceptor for giving him lessons of humility. You do not perceive, that the very circumstance of having a man of letters and accomplishments retained about his person, for his sole advantage, tends more forcibly to inspire him with an idea of self-consequence, than all the lessons he can give him to repress it. "Why do not you look sad, you rascal?" says the undertaker to his man in the play of The Funeral; "I give you I know not how much money for looking sad, and the more I give you, the gladder I think you are." So will it be with the wealthy heir. The lectures that are given him on condescension and affability, only prove to him upon how much higher ground he stands than those about him; and the very pains that are taken with his moral character will make him proud, by showing him how much he is the object of attention. You cannot help these things. Your servants, out of respect to you, will bear with his petulance; your company, out of respect to you, will forbear to check his impatience; and you yourself, if he is clever, will repeat his observations.

In the exploded doctrine of sympathies, you are directed, if you have cut your finger, to let that alone, and put your plaster upon the knife. This is very bad doctrine, I must confess, in philosophy; but very good in morals. Is a man luxurious, self-indulgent? do not apply your physic of the soul to him, but cure his fortune. Is he haughty? cure his rank, his title. Is he vulgar? cure his company. Is he diffident or mean-spirited? cure his poverty, give him consequence—but these prescriptions go far beyond the family recipes of education.

What then is the result? In the first place, that we should contract our ideas of education, and expect no more from it than it is able to perform. It can give instruction. There will always be an essential difference between a human being cultivated and uncultivated. Education can provide proper instructors in the various arts and sciences, and portion out to the best advantage those precious hours of youth which never will return. It can likewise give, in a great degree, personal habits; and even if these should afterwards give way under the influence of contrary circumstances, your child will feel the good effects of them, for the later and the less will he go into what is wrong. Let us also be assured, that the business of education, properly so called, is not transferable. You may engage masters to instruct your child in this or the other accomplishment, but you must educate him yourself. You not only ought to do it, but you must do it, whether you intend it or no. As education is a thing necessary for all; for the poor and for the rich, for the illiterate as well as for the learned; Providence has not made it dependent upon systems uncertain, operose, and difficult of investigation. It is not necessary, with Rousseau or Madame Genlis, to devote to the education of one child the talents and the time of a number of grown men; to surround him with an artificial world; and to counteract, by maxims, the natural tendencies of the situation he is placed in in society. Every one has time to educate his child: the poor man educates him while working in his cottage—the man of business, while employed in his counting-house.

Do we see a father who is diligent in his profession, domestic in his habits, whose house is the resort of well-informed intelligent people—a mother whose time is usefully filled, whose attention to her duties secures esteem, and whose amiable manners attract affection? Do not be solicitous, respectable couple, about the moral education of your offspring! do not be uneasy because you cannot surround them with the apparatus of books and systems; or fancy that you must retire from the world to devote yourselves to their improvement. In your world, they are brought up much better than they could be under any plan of factitious education which you could provide for them: they will imbibe affection from your caresses; taste from your conversation; urbanity from the commerce of your society; and mutual love from your example. Do not regret that you are not rich enough to provide tutors and governors, to watch his steps with sedulous and servile anxiety, and furnish him with maxims it is morally impossible he should act upon when grown up. Do not you see how seldom this over-culture produces its effect, and how many shining and excellent characters start up every day, from the bosom of obscurity, with scarcely any care at all?

Are children then to be neglected? Surely not: but having given them the instruction and accomplishments which their situation in life requires, let us reject superfluous solicitude, and trust that their characters will form themselves from the spontaneous influence of good examples, and circumstances which impel them to useful action.

But the education of your house, important as it is, is only a part of a more comprehensive system. Providence takes your child where you leave him. Providence continues his education upon a larger scale, and by a process which includes means far more efficacious. Has your son entered the world at eighteen, opinionated, haughty, rash, inclined to dissipation? Do not despair; he may yet be cured of these faults, if it pleases Heaven. There are remedies which you could not persuade yourself to use, if they were in your power, and which are specific in cases of this kind. How often do we see the presumptuous, giddy youth, changed into the wise counsellor, the considerate, steady friend! How often the thoughtless, gay girl, into the sober wife, the affectionate mother! Faded beauty, humbled self-consequence, disappointed ambition, loss of fortune,—this is the rough physic provided by Providence to meliorate the temper, to correct the offensive petulancies of youth, and bring out all the energies of the finished character. Afflictions soften the proud; difficulties push forward the ingenious; successful industry gives consequence and credit, and develops a thousand latent good qualities. There is no malady of the mind so inveterate, which this education of events is not calculated to cure, if life were long enough; and shall we not hope, that He, in whose hand are all the remedial processes of nature, will renew the discipline in another state, and finish the imperfect man?

States are educated as individuals—by circumstances: the prophet may cry aloud, and spare not; the philosopher may descant on morals; eloquence may exhaust itself in invective against the vices of the age: these vices will certainly follow certain states of poverty or riches, ignorance or high civilization. But what these gentle alternatives fail of doing, may be accomplished by an unsuccessful war, a loss of trade, or any of those great calamities ties by which it pleases Providence to speak to a nation in such language as will be heard. If, as a nation, we would be cured of pride, it must be by mortification; if of luxury, by a national bankruptcy, perhaps; if of injustice, or the spirit of domination, by a loss of national consequence. In comparison of these strong remedies, a fast, or a sermon, are prescriptions of very little efficacy."

A short extract from another excellent Essay we will here introduce, for its good sense, and striking application to the present times.

ON INCONSISTENCY IN OUR EXPECTATIONS.

"But is it not some reproach upon the economy of Providence that such a one, who is a mean dirty fellow, should have amassed wealth enough to buy half a nation?" Not in the least. He made himself a mean dirty fellow for that very end. He has paid his health, his conscience, his liberty, for it; and will you envy him his bargain? Will you hang your head and blush in his presence, because he outshines you in equipage and show? Lift up your brow with a noble confidence, and say to yourself, I have not these things, it is true; but it is because I have not sought, because I have not desired them; it is because I possess something better. I have chosen my lot. I am content and satisfied.

You are a modest man—You love quiet and independence, and have a delicacy and reserve in your temper which renders it impossible for you to elbow your way in the world, and be the herald of your own merits. Be content then with a modest retirement, with the esteem of your intimate friends, with the praises of a blameless heart, and a delicate, ingenuous spirit; but resign the splendid distinctions of the world to those who can better scramble for them.

The man whose tender sensibility of conscience and strict regard to the rules of morality makes him scrupulous and fearful of offending, is often heard to complain of the disadvantages he lies under in every path of honour and profit. "Could I but get over some nice points, and conform to the practice and opinion of those about me. I might stand as fair a chance as others for dignities and preferment." And why can you not? What hinders you from discarding this troublesome scrupulosity of yours, which stands so grievously in your way? If it be a small thing to enjoy a healthful mind, sound at the very core, that does not shrink from the keenest inspection; inward freedom from remorse and perturbation; unsullied whiteness and simplicity of manners; a genuine integrity

"Pure in the last recesses of the mind;"

if you think these advantages an inadequate recompense for what you resign, dismiss your scruples this instant, and be a slave-merchant, a parasite, or—what you please.

"If these be motives weak, break off betimes;"

and as you have not spirit to assert the dignity of virtue, be wise enough not to forego the emoluments of vice.

I much admire the spirit of the ancient philosophers, in that they never attempted, as our moralists often do, to lower the tone of philosophy, and make it consistent with all the indulgences of indolence and sensuality. They never thought of having the bulk of mankind for their disciples; but kept themselves as distinct as possible from a worldly life. They plainly told men what sacrifices were required, and what advantages they were which might be expected.

'Si virtus hoc una potest dare, fortis omisces
Hoc age deliciis'

If you would be a philosopher, these are the terms. You must do thus and thus: there is no other way. If not, go and be one of the vulgar.

There is no one quality gives so much dignity to a character as consistency of conduct. Even if a man's pursuits be wrong and unjustifiable, yet if they are prosecuted with steadiness and vigour, we cannot withhold our admiration. The most characteristic mark of a great mind is to choose some one important object, and pursue it through life. It was this made Cæsar a great man. His object was ambition; he pursued it steadily, and was always ready to sacrifice to it every interfering passion or inclination.

* * * * *

There is a different air and complexion in characters as well as in faces, though perhaps each equally beautiful; and the excellencies of one cannot be transferred to the other. Thus if one man possesses a stoical apathy of soul, acts independent of the opinion of the world, and fulfils every duty with mathematical exactness, you must not expect that man to be greatly influenced by the weakness of pity, or the partialities of friendship: you must not be offended that he does not fly to meet you after a short absence; or require from him the convivial spirit and honest effusions of a warm, open, susceptible heart. If another is remarkable for a lively active zeal, inflexible integrity, a strong indignation against vice, and freedom in reproving it, he will probably have some little bluntness in his address not altogether suitable to polished life; he will want the winning arts of conversation; he will disgust by a kind of haughtiness and negligence in his manner, and often hurt the delicacy of his acquaintance with harsh and disagreeable truths."

We do not consider the poetry of Mrs. Barbauld equal to her prose writings;—but there is a benignity, mingled with vivacity, in some of her poetical productions which make them always pleasant, as the face of a cheerful friend.

WASHING-DAY.

THE Muses are turn'd gossips; they have lost
The buskin'd step, and clear high-sounding phrase,
Language of gods. Come then, domestic Muse,
In slipshod measure loosely prattling on
Of farm or orchard, pleasant curds and cream,
Or drowning flies, or shoe lost in the mire
By little whimpering boy, with rueful face;
Come, Muse, and sing the dreaded Washing-Day.
Ye who beneath the yoke of wedlock bend,
With bowed soul, full well ye ken the day

Which week, smooth sliding after week, brings on Too soon;—for to that day nor peace belongs
Nor comfort;—ere the first grey streak of dawn,
The red-arm'd washers come and chase repose.
Nor pleasant smile, nor quaint device of mirth,
E'er visited that day: the very cat,
From the wet kitchen scared and reeking hearth,
Visits the parlour,—an unwonted guest.
The silent breakfast-meal is soon despatch'd;
Uninterrupted, save by anxious looks
Cast at the lowering sky, if sky should lower
From that last evil, O preserve us, heavens!
For should the skies pour down, adieu to all
Remains of quiet: then expect to hear
Of sad disasters,—dirt and gravel stains
Hard to efface, and loaded lines at once
Snapped short,—and linen-horse by dog thrown down
And all the petty miseries of life.
Saints have been calm while stretch'd upon the rack,
And Guatimozin smiled on burning coils;
But never yet did housewife notable
Greet with a smile a rainy washing-day.
—But grant the welkin fair, require not thou
Who call'st thyself perchance the master there,
Or study swept, or nicely dusted coat,
Or usual 'tendance;—ask not, indiscreet,
Thy stockings mended, though the yawning rents
Gape wide as Erebus; nor hope to find
Some snug recess impervious: should'st thou try
The 'custom'd garden walks, thine eye shall rue
The budding fragrance of thy tender shrubs,
Myrtle or rose, all crush'd beneath the weight
Of coarse check'd apron,—with impatient hand
Twich'd off when showers impend: or crossing lines
Shall mar thy musings, as the wet cold sheet
Flaps in thy face abrupt. Woe to the friend
Whose evil stars have urged him forth to claim
On such a day the hospitable rites!
Looks, blank at best, and stinted courtesy,
Shall he receive. Vainly he feeds his hopes
With dinner of roast chicken, savoury pie,
Or tart or pudding:—pudding he nor tart
That day shall eat; nor, though the husband try,
Mending what can't be help'd, to kindle mirth
From cheer deficient, shall his consort's brow
Clear up propitious:—the unlucky guest
In silence dines, and early slinks away.
I well remember, when a child, the awe
This day struck into me; for then the maids
I scarce knew why, look'd cross, and drove me from them
Nor soft caress could I obtain, nor hope
Usual indulgences; jelly or creams,
Relief of costly suppers, and set by
For me their petted one; or butter'd toast,
When butter was forbid; or thrilling tale
Of ghost or witch, or murder—so I went
And shelter'd me beside the parlour fire.
There my dear grandmother, eldest of forms,
Tended the little ones, and watch'd from harm,
Anxiously fond, though oft her spectacles
With elfin cunning hid, and oft the pins
Drawn from her ravell'd stocking, might have sour'd
One less indulgent.—

At intervals, my mother's voice was heard,
Urging despatch: briskly the work went on,
All hands employ'd to wash, to rinse, to wring,
To fold, and starch, and clap, and iron, and plait.
Then would I sit me down, and ponder much
Why washings were. Sometimes through hollow bow
Of pipe amused we blew, and sent aloft
The floating bubbles; little dreaming then
To see, Mongolfier, thy silken ball
Ride buoyant through the clouds—so near approach
The sports of children and the toils of men.
Earth, air, and sky, and ocean, hath its bubbles,
And verse is one of them—this most of all.

* * * * *

PAINTED FLOWERS.

FLOWERS to the fair: To you these flowers I bring
And strive to greet you with an earlier spring,
Flowers, sweet and gay and delicate like you,
Emblems of innocence and beauty too.

With flowers the Graces bind their yellow hair,
And flowery wreaths consenting lovers wear.
Flowers, the sole luxury which Nature knew,
In Eden's pure and guiltless garden grew.
'To loftier forms are rougher tasks assign'd;
The sheltering oak resists the stormy wind,
The tougher yew repels invading foes,
And the tall pine for future navies grows;
But this soft family, to cares unknown,
Were born for pleasure and delight alone:
Gay without toil, and lovely without art,
They spring to cheer the sense, and glad the heart.
Nor blush, my fair, to own you copy these,
Your best, your sweetest empire is—to please.

BARBIER, MARY ANN,

BORN at Orleans, cultivated literature and poetry with much success. She settled at Paris, where she published several tragedies and some operas. It has been said that her name was only borrowed by the Abbé Pellegrin; but it is a mistake. Mademoiselle Barbier had talents and learning; and the Abbé Pellegrin was never anything more to her than her friend and adviser. She died in 1745. The conduct of the tragedies of Mademoiselle Barbier is tolerably regular, and the scenes well connected. The subjects are in general judiciously chosen; but nothing can be more commonplace than the manner in which she treats them. In endeavouring to render the heroines of her plays generous and noble, she degrades all her heroes. We perceive the weakness of a timid pencil, which, incapable of painting objects in large, strives to exaggerate the virtues of her sex; and these monstrous pictures produce an interest that never rises above mediocrity. Nevertheless, we meet with some affecting situations, and a natural and easy versification; but too much facility renders it negligent, diffuse and prosaic. Her tragedies are entitled, "Arria and Poetus;" "Cornelia, Mother of the Gracchi;" "Tomyris, Queen of the Massagetes;" "The Death of Cæsar;" and a comedy, called "The Falcon." She also wrote three operas, which were successful.

BARNARD, LADY ANNE,

DAUGHTER of James Lindsay, fifth earl of Balcarres, of Fifeshire, Scotland, was born December 8th, 1750; and married in 1793 to Sir Andrew Barnard, librarian to George III. She died without children in 1825. She wrote "Auld Robin Gray," one of the most perfect, tender, and affecting of all the ballads of humble life. The authorship of this song was unknown for a long time. Lady Anne Barnard wrote very little, and never anything equal in true pathos or poetry to this first ballad.

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

When the sheep are in the fauld, and the kye at hame,
And a' the world to sleep are gane;
The waes o' my heart fa' in showers frae my ee,
When my gudeman lies sound by me.

Young Jamie loo'd me weel, and socht me for his bride;
But saving a crown, he had naething else beside:
To mak that crown a pund, young Jamie gaed to sea;
And the crown and the pund were baith for me.

He hadna been awa a week but only twa,
When my mother she fell sick, and the cow was stown awa;

My father brak his arm, and young Jamie at the sea,
And auld Robin Gray cam' a courtin' me.

My father couldna work, and my mother couldna spin;
I toiled day and nicht, but their bread I couldna win;
Auld Rob maintained them baith, and wi' tears in his ee
Said, Jeanie, for their sakes, Oh, marry me!

My heart it said nay, for I looked for Jamie back;
But the wind it blew high, and the ship it was a wreck:
The ship it was a wreck—why didna Jamie dee?
Or why do I live to say, Wae's me?

My father argued sair: my mother didna speak;
But she lookit in my face till my heart was like to break:
Sae they gied him my hand, though my heart was in the sea,
And auld Robin Gray was gudeman to me.

I hadna been a wife a week but only four,
When, sitting sae mournfully at the door,
I saw my Jamie's wraith, for I couldna think it he,
Till he said, I'm come back for to marry thee.

Oh, sair did we greet, and muckle did we say,
We took but ae kiss, and we tore ourselves away:
I wish I were dead! but I'm no like to dee;
And why do I live to say, Wae's me?

I gang like a ghaist, and I carena to spin;
I daurna think on Jamie, for that wad be a sin,
But I'll do my best a gude wife to be,
For auld Robin Gray is kind unto me.

BARONI, ADRIANNE BASILE,

A NATIVE of Mantua, Italy, sister of the poet Basile. She was so much admired for her beauty, wit, and accomplishments, that volumes were written in her praise. Her daughter Leonora possessed equal charms, and met with equal admiration; and in 1639 a collection of poems in Latin, Greek, Spanish, Italian, and French, was published, in which her beauty and perfections were portrayed. She resided long at Rome, where she appeared occasionally as a singer. She also wrote some poetical trifles. She was celebrated for her vocal powers.

BARRY, MARIE JEANNE VAUBENIER,

COUNTESS du, was born at Vancouleurs, near the native place of Joan d'Arc, in 1744. Her reputed father was an exciseman of the name of Vaubenier. After his death her mother went with her to Paris, where she was placed in a convent, but soon left it to work at a fashionable milliner's. When she was about sixteen she became mistress to Count Jean du Barry; and soon after was presented to Louis XV. of France, who was immediately fascinated by her beauty. In order that she might appear at court, Guillaume du Barry, brother of Count Jean, consented to the king's desire, and married her, after which she was introduced to the court as Countess du Barry. Her influence over the king was excessive and of long duration, and she often used it to lead him to commit acts of injustice and imprudence. After the death of Louis XV., Madame du Barry was shut up in a convent; but Louis XVI. allowed her to come out, and restored to her the pension and residence left her by the late king. She showed herself grateful for this kindness when Louis XVI. and his family were imprisoned; for she went, regardless of her own danger, to England to sell her jewels for the use of the queen and her children. On her return she was imprisoned.

soned and condemned, on the charge of "being a conspirator, and of having worn mourning in London for the death of the tyrant." She was guillotined on the 6th of November, 1793. She wept much when going to the scaffold.

BARTON, ELIZABETH,

A RELIGIOUS fanatic, who lived in the reign of Henry VIII. of England. She was generally called the Holy Maid of Kent, and was originally a servant at Allington; but was taught by designing persons to throw her face and limbs into contortions, to pretend to prophetic powers, and to denounce divine vengeance upon heretics. Venturing, however, to aim her predictions against the king, by announcing that if he should proceed in his attempt to obtain a divorce from Catharine of Arragon, and marry another woman, he would not be king seven months after; she was apprehended and tried, together with her accomplices, for high treason, and executed at Tyburn, in 1534.

John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, a man of great learning and piety, was so deceived by her pretended sanctity and visions, as to become implicated with her, and to suffer the following year the same fate.

BASSEPORTE, MADELEINE FRANCES,

A FRENCH lady, celebrated for her talent in painting plants and animals, especially birds, in water-colours. She was born in 1701, and received instructions from the celebrated Robert. In 1732, she succeeded Obriette, the painter of natural history in the royal gardens, with a salary of one hundred pistoles a year. She died in 1780. Madame Basseporte also produced some good engravings.

BASSI, LAURA MARIA CATHERINE,

By marriage Veratti, a learned Italian lady, was born at Bologna, in 1711. She was placed in that happy mediocrity of condition equally removed from poverty and riches, where neither the sordid cares of living, nor the futile toys of grandeur absorb the leisure for intellectual improvement. The first person who noticed Laura's extraordinary talents, was the priest Don Lorenzo Stregani, who visited familiarly at the house. He amused himself with teaching the little girl Latin and French. He did not confine himself to what is usual,—simply the power of translating and understanding the Latin authors,—but he urged her to so thorough a knowledge of the language, that she spoke and wrote it with the utmost fluency.

Another man of learning, a professor in the college of medicine, Dr. Gaetano Tacconi, was a friend of the Bassi family; he was so struck with the amazing progress of Laura in the languages, that he prevailed upon her parents, though not without much discussion and delay, to let her abandon household and feminine occupations, and devote herself to a learned education. After having exercised her in logic, he carried her on to metaphysics and natural philosophy. The master's knowledge on these subjects was limited to what was taught in the schools; but the penetrating genius of the pupil was not to be confined to these limits; her scientific studies, and even discoveries, left the faculty of Bologna far behind her in the career of knowledge. The gentlemen who had taken pleasure in cultivating this rare mind, began to feel desirous of surprising the public by a display; but they determined that, as a preparation, some unprejudiced and nice-judging scholars should examine the little damsel, certain of their sanction for presenting her to any trial. For this purpose the abbe Giovanni Trombelli and Dr. Zanotti, were selected. They termed the young person a prodigy; urgently advised her appearing in public, to manifest to the world her wonderful acquirements.

Her natural modesty was great, and she felt very averse to such a step; but when she found the self-love of her masters was most eager, gratitude to them put aside all personal feelings, and it was determined that on the 17th of April, of that year, (1732,) she would, according to the customs of those days, hold a public dispute on philosophy. The palace of Anziani was selected for the assembly. The singularity of the case brought a great concourse: all the learned men, and dignified ecclesiastics from distant towns, besides the noblemen and ladies of rank, crowded to listen to so unusual an orator. Fortunately her powers were equal to the occasion. Her knowledge seemed vast and various, and the elegance and delicacy of her Latin speech was truly wonderful. The applause, the admiration, was unbounded. The cardinal archbishop Lambertini waited upon her the next day, with the warmest congratulations upon her success. At that period, and particularly at Bologna, nobody was recognised truly learned without the degree of doctor. To reach this goal it was necessary that the young girl should enter the lists again, and submit herself to the trial before the college of philosophy. This examination took place the 12th of the following May. The candidate was accompanied by many ladies of distinguished rank. She acquitted herself admirably, and obtained the most complete success. Her brow was encircled by a silver crown, ornamented with laurel leaves, which was offered by Dr. Bazzani in the name of the faculty. In investing her with the gown which was the ensign of her degree, he addressed her with a Latin oration; to which she made a most elegant extemporaneous reply in the same language. A dinner was given the next day, at the request of the cardinal de Polignac, when all the men of eminent ability were confronted with Laura, and every effort was made to sound her depths; but it was found that not one of these illustrious personages could compete with, or meet her at all points, so various were her acquirements, so subtle her wit, and so solid her understanding.

The highest honours were, after this, bestowed upon her; and the senate, considering that she reflected honours upon the city, settled a pension on her, to enable her to continue her studies without anxiety. The attentions she received brought her into the world, and obliged her to make many visits, and go to assemblies. Mingling in society, she was destined to give up her life of solitary study. She formed an attachment for Dr. Veratti, a celebrated physician, and professor of the institute; this ended in a marriage, when she shone as a wife and mother with admirable domestic qualities, equalling her scholastic ones.

It may here be remarked, that women, who possess some trivial accomplishments, some little skill in music, or futile propensity to write ephemeral verses, assume that these occupations place them above household duties, which are therefore neglected; and that, on the other hand, which is perhaps a more general error, many women declare that the attention due to their families' physical comforts, condemns their own minds to intellectual barrenness, and so clips the wings of their immortal souls that they can reach no flight beyond the consideration of domestic matters. They trust the education and training of their children to hired teachers; while the higher duty of stitching seams, and superintending joints of meats, must be reserved for their own superior intelligence and personal vigilance.

The life of Laura Bassi offers a lesson to both of these classes. She was mother of a numerous offspring, all of whom were most carefully attended to; as a wife, she was a model of tenderness. Mistress of a household, her frugality, and, at the same time, generous hospitality were remarkable; in fine, her abode was a scene of domestic comfort and happiness. But these essential occupations did by no means interfere with her scientific pursuits. Not only did she keep up with the other professors, but it was conceded that not a man in the university could read and speculate to the extent she manifested, by her experiments in natural philosophy, and her treatises on logical subjects. Besides this, for twenty-eight years, she carried on in her own house a course of experimental philosophy; until the senate selected her to give public lectures on the subject, in the university, as professor of this science. It is a great pity that the pedantic custom of using the Latin language for scientific and literary purposes still held sway in Bologna. Had Laura written in Italian, her writings would have been more extensively known, and would not be buried, as they now are, in classic dust. Her Latin style is peculiarly excellent.

She was modest and unaffected; her memory was very great, her understanding strong, and her conversation enlivened by sallies of wit. She died in 1778, of a disease of the lungs.

Her mortal remains were interred with solemn obsequies. She was buried with the doctor's gown, and silver laurel. Her works remaining are:—An epic poem in manuscript; some poems published by Gobbi; “De problemate quodam Hydrometico, De problemate quodam Mecnico,” published by the institute;” some experiments and discoveries on the compression of the air.

BAYNARD, ANNE,

ONLY daughter of Edward Baynard, an eminent physician, was born at Preston, Lancashire, England, 1672. She was well instructed in the classics and sciences, and wrote Latin with ease and correctness. At the age of twenty-three, she had the knowledge of a profound philosopher. She often said “that it was a sin to be content with a little knowledge.”

To the endowments of mind, she added the virtues of the heart; she was pious, benevolent, and simple in her manners; retired, and perhaps too rigid in her habits. She always put aside a portion of her small income for charitable purposes; and to this she added an ardent desire and strenuous efforts for the mental and moral improvement of all within her influence.

About two years previous to her death, her spirits seem to have been impressed with an idea of her early dissolution; a sentiment which first suggested itself to her mind while walking alone, among the tombs, in a church-yard; and which she indulged with a kind of superstitious complacency. On her death-bed, she earnestly entreated the minister who attended her, that he would exhort all the young people of his congregation to the study of wisdom and knowledge, as the means of moral improvement, and real happiness. “I could wish,” says she, “that all young persons might be exhorted to the practice of virtue, and to increase their knowledge by the study of philosophy; and more especially to read the great book of nature, wherein they may see the wisdom and power of the Creator, in the order of the universe, and in the production and preservation of all things.” “That women are capable of such improvements, which will better their judgments and understandings, is past all doubt, would they but set about it in earnest, and spend but half of that time in study and thinking, which they do in visits, vanity, and folly. It would introduce a composure of mind, and lay a solid basis for wisdom and knowledge, by which they would be better enabled to serve God, and to help their neighbours.”

The following character is given of this lady in Mr. Collier's Historical Dictionary. “Anne Baynard, for her prudence, piety, and learning, de serves to have her memory perpetuated: she was not only skilled in the learned languages, but in all manner of literature and philosophy, without vanity or affectation. Her words were few, well chosen and expressive. She was seldom seen to smile, being rather of a reserved and stoical disposition; their doctrine, in most parts, seeming agreeable to her natural temper, for she never read or spake of the stoics but with a kind of delight. She had a contempt of the world, especially of the finery and gaiety of life. She had a great regard and veneration of the sacred name of God, and made it the whole business of her life to promote his honour and glory; and the great end of her study was to encounter atheists and libertines, as may appear from some severe satires written in the Latin tongue, in which language she had great readiness and fluency of expression; which made a gentleman of no small parts and learning say of her,

"*Annam gens Solymaa, Annam gens Belgica jactat,
At superas Annas, Anna Baynarda, duas.*"

'Fam'd Solyma her Anna boasts,
In sacred writ renown'd;
Another Anna's high deserts,
Through Belgia's coasts resound:
But Britain can an Anna show,
That shines more bright than they,
Wisdom and piety in her
Sheds each its noblest ray.'

Anne Baynard died at Barnes, in the county of Surrey, in 1697.

BEALE, MARY,

An English portrait-painter, was born in Suffolk, in 1632, and died in 1697. She was the daughter of the Rev. Mr. Cradock, minister of Walton-upon-Thames, and was instructed in her art by Sir Peter Lely, whose works, and those of Vandyck, she studied with the greatest care. Her style was formed on the best models of the Italian school, and her colouring was clear, strong and natural.

She also paraphrased some of the Psalms of David.

BEAUHARNAIS, FANNY, COUNTESS DE,

THE aunt of Josephine's first husband, was born at Paris, in 1738. Her father was receiver-general of finances, and he gave her a brilliant education. From her earliest youth, she showed a great taste for poetry. At the age of seventeen, she was married to count de Beauharnais, whom she did not love, and she soon separated from him by taking up her residence in the convent of the Visitation. Here she assembled around her the most distinguished literary and scientific men; but she was criticised as well as flattered; and though Buffon called her his daughter, Le Brun wrote epigrams against her.

In 1773, Madame de Beauharnais published a little work entitled "A Tous les penseurs Salut," in which she undertook the defence of female authorship. But this was considered a strange instance of audacity, though the women of France then ruled everything from state affairs down to fashionable trifles. Le Brun, a bitter and satirical poet, answered Madame de Beauharnais in a strain of keen invective. "Ink," said he, "ill becomes rosy fingers."

Madame de Beauharnais published a volume of fugitive poems; also "Lettres de Stephanie," an historical romance, several other romances, and a comedy entitled "La Fausse inconstance ou le triomphe de l'honnêteté." She died in 1813. We insert a specimen of her poetry.

ÉPIÎTRE AUX FEMMES.

(Written in 1773.)

Mon sexe parfois est injuste:
Mais j'absous ce sexe charmant,
Il fut ainsi du temps d'Auguste,
C'est tenir à son sentiment.
Je voudrais le fléchir, sans doute;
Pour des titres, j'en ai plus d'un;
Mes traits n'ont rien que de commun:
Je me tais, et même j'écoute....
N'importe, il me faut renoncer
A l'espoir flatteur du lui plaire;
Après de lui j'aurois beau faire:
Tout en moi paroît l'offenser,
Et mes juges, dans leur colère,
M'ôtent jusqu'au droit de penser.
Un jour que j'étois bien sincère,
J'exerçai ma plume à tracer
Les charmes de leur caractère
Par-là, j'ai su les courroucer.
Cependant j'exalte ces dames;
J'encourage leurs défenseurs;
Je leur donne à toutes des ames:
Je chante leurs graces, leurs mœurs,
Et leurs combats, et leur victoire;
Je les compare aux belles fleurs
Qui des campagnes font la gloire:
Elles rejettent mon encens,
Et, ce qu'on aura peine à croire,
Me traitent, dans leur humeur noire,
Presque aussi mal que leurs amans.
Mes vers sont pillés, disent-elles;
Non, Chloé n'en est pas l'auteur,
Elle fut d'une pesanteur....
Le temps ne donne pas des ailes.
Mon Dieu! reprend avec aigreur,
A coup sûr l'une des moins belles,
Jadis je la voyois le soir;
Alors elle écrivait en prose;
Peut-être, hélas! sans le savoir,
Et hasardoit fort peu de chose.
Mesdames, à ne point mentir,
Je prise fort de tels suffrages:
Mais craignez de m'enorgueillir
En me disputant mes ouvrages;
Ne me donnez point le plaisir
De me croire un objet d'envie;
Je triomphe quand vous doutez,
Rendez-moi vite vos bontés,
Et je reprends ma modestie

BEAUMONT, MADAME LE PRINCE DE,

An able and lively French writer, whose works, in the form of romances, letters, memoirs, &c., were written for the improvement of youth in morals and religion. She was born at Rouen, April 26th, 1711, and died at Anneci, 1780.

BECTOR, CLAUDE DE,

DESCENDED from an illustrious house in Dauphiny, abbess of St. Honoré de Tarascon, was eminent for her knowledge of Latin, and her fine style of writing. She was honoured by her admirers with the name of Scholastica. She gave early such indications of genius, that a monk, Denis Fauchier, undertook the care of her education. In a little time she made so great a progress, that she equalled the most learned men of the age. Her Latin and French poems, letters, and treatises, for acuteness and solidity, have been classed with the ancient philosophers. She maintained a correspondence with many learned men in France and Italy. Francis I. of France was so charmed with the letters of this abbess, that he carried them about him, and showed them as models worthy of imitation. He went with his sister, Margaret of Navarre, to Tarascon on purpose to see this celebrated lady. She died in 1547.

BEHN, APHRA,

A CELEBRATED English poetess, was descended from a good family in the city of Canterbury. She was born in the reign of Charles I., but in what year is uncertain. Her father's name was Johnson. He was related to lord Willoughby, and by his interest was appointed lieutenant-general of Surinam and thirty-six islands, and embarked for the West Indies when Aphra was very young. Mr. Johnson died on the passage, but his family arrived at Surinam, where Aphra became acquainted with the American prince Oroonoko, whose story she has given in her celebrated novel of that name. She relates that "she had often seen and conversed with that great man, and been a witness to many of his mighty actions; and that at one time, he and Imoinda his wife, were scarce an hour in a day from her lodgings." The intimacy between Oroonoko and the poetess occasioned some reflections on her conduct, from which she was subsequently cleared.

The afflictions she met with at Surinam, in the death of her parents and relations, obliged her to return to England, where, soon after her arrival, she married Mr. Behn, an eminent merchant in London, of Dutch extraction. King Charles II., whom she highly pleased by the entertaining and accurate account she gave him of the colony of Surinam, thought her a proper person to be entrusted with the management of some affairs during the Dutch war, which was the cause of her going to Antwerp. Here she discovered the design formed by the Dutch, of sailing up the Thames, in order to burn the English ships; she made this discovery through her lover, Vander Albert, a Dutchman. This man, who had been in love with her in England, no sooner heard of her arrival at Antwerp, than he paid her a visit; and after a repetition of all his former professions, pressed her extremely to allow him by some signal means to give undeniable proofs of his passion. She accepted this proposal, and employed him in such a manner as made her very serviceable to king Charles I.

The latter end of the year 1666, Albert sent her word by a special messenger that he would be with her at an appointed time, when he revealed to her that Cornelius de Witt and De Ruyter had proposed the abovementioned expedition. Mrs. Behn could not doubt the truth of this communication, and sent information of it immediately by express to England. But her intelligence (though well grounded, as the event showed) being disregarded and ridiculed, she renounced all state affairs, and amused herself during her stay at Antwerp, with the pleasures of the city.

After some time she embarked at Dunkirk for England, and in the passage was near being lost: the ship was driven on the coast for four days, but by the assistance of boats the crew were all saved.

Mrs. Behn published three volumes of poems; the first in 1684, the second in 1685, the third in 1688. They consist of songs and other little pieces, by the earl of Rochester, sir George Etherege, Mr. Henry Crisp, and others, with some pieces of her own. To the second volume is annexed a translation of the duke de Rochefoucault's moral reflections, under the title of "Seneca Unmasked." She wrote also seventeen plays, some histories and novels. She translated Fontenelle's History of Oracles, and Plurality of Worlds, to which last she annexed an essay on translation and translated prose. The Paraphrase of Ænone's Epistle to Paris, in the English translation of Ovid's Epistles, is Mrs. Behn's; and Mr. Dryden, in the preface to that work, pays her the following compliment:—"I was desired to say, that the author, who is of the fair sex, understood not Latin; but if she do not, I am afraid she has given us who do, occasion to be ashamed." She was also the authoress of the celebrated Letters between "A Nobleman and his Sister," printed in 1684; and of eight love-letters to a gentleman whom she passionately loved, and with whom she corresponded under the name of Lycidas. She died, after a long indisposition, April 16th, 1689, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey.

BEKKER, ELIZABETH,

AN ornament of Dutch literature, was born at Flushing, in 1738, and died at the Hague, in 1804. Few female authors have united to so great talents such dignity and purity of morals. Several of her numerous works are considered classics in Dutch literature; especially her romances of "William Leevend;" "Letters of A. Blankhart to C. Wildschut;" and the "History of Sara Bürgerhart." She wrote her most important works in conjunction with her friend Agatha Deken, and the share of each of them in the composition is unknown. Agatha Deken survived her friend only nine days.

BELLAMY, GEORGIANA,

AN actress of some celebrity, was born in 1733. Her mother was a Miss Searle, the mistress of lord Trelawny, who afterwards married captain Bellamy. He separated from her on discovering her infidelity. Miss Bellamy was brought out by Mr. Garrick at the Covent-Garden theatre at the age of fourteen, and met with much success for some years. She died at Edinburgh, in deep distress, in 1788. Her life was a series of errors and misfortunes. She wrote her own memoirs in six volumes.

BELLINI, GUISEPA, COUNTESS,

WAS born at Novara in 1776, of one of the most noble families of Italy. She was endowed with a good understanding and great benevolence of character, which a strong sentiment of piety guided and maintained. She was married in the bloom of youth to the count Marco Bellini, whose character and disposition entirely assimilated with hers. Crowned with all worldly advantages, they were doomed to the affliction of losing their only son. This blow was sensibly felt by the bereaved parents, who thenceforth, unable to enjoy the pleasures of society and idle diversions, resolved to seek alleviation by devoting themselves to works of beneficent utility. Already extremely opulent, a large accession of fortune enabled them to mature an idea they had planned for the public utility; when, in 1831, death removed from the poor their friend and benefactor, the count Bellini.

The widowed countess, remembering her husband's maxim that the "best way of assisting the poor population was by giving them the abilities to maintain themselves," took counsel with the most intelligent and experienced of her fellow-citizens, and, with the assistance of able and practical heads, planned and founded a gratuitous school for arts and trades, for the benefit of the children of both sexes of the Novarese poor. This foundation she endowed with the sum of 100,000 francs. This good work was regularly established by royal permission and concurrence of the municipal authorities, February 9th, 1833.

The countess Bellini died in 1837.

BENDISH, BRIDGET,

WIFE of Thomas Bendish, Esq., was the daughter of General Ireton, and grand-daughter of Oliver Cromwell; whom she resembled in piety, dissimulation, personal arrogance, and love of display. After managing her salt-works at Southtown, in Norfolk, with all the labour and exertion of the most menial servant, she would sometimes spend an evening at the public assembly at Yarmouth, where her princely behaviour and dignified manners ensured her the respect of her neighbours. This remarkable woman, who, in public life, would have become famous by her great mental powers and self-command, died in retirement in 1727.

BENGER, ELIZABETH OGILVY,

WAS born at Welles in England, in 1778, and had to struggle with many difficulties in early life. So few books could she procure, that she used to read the open pages of the new publications in the window of the only bookseller's shop in the little town in Wiltshire in which she lived, and return, day after day, in the hope of finding another page turned over. She, nevertheless, acquired a respectable portion of learning. On her removal to London, she obtained kind literary friends and patronage, and was generally esteemed for her virtues, manners, and talents. She died January the 9th, 1827. Besides a drama, two novels, and poems, she wrote "Memoirs of Mrs. Hamilton;" "Lobin and Klopstock;" and "Lives of Anne Boleyn; Mary, Queen of Scots; the Queen of Bohemia; and Henry IV. of France."

BENWELL, MARY,

WAS an English portrait-painter. Her principal works were in crayons, oil, and miniature, and were exhibited to the public in the Artists' and Royal Academy Exhibitions from 1622 till 1783.

BERNARD, CATHARINE,

Of the academy of the Ricovrate of Padua, was born at Rouen, and died at Paris in 1712. Her works were several times crowned by the French academy, and by that of the Jeux-Floraux. Two of her tragedies were represented at the French theatre, "Brutus," in 1691, and "Laodamia." It is thought she composed these pieces conjointly with Fontenelle, her friend and countryman. She wrote several other works in verse, showing ease and sometimes delicacy. She acquired some celebrity by her placet to Louis XIV., to petition for the two hundred crowns given to her annually by that prince; it is to be seen in the "Recueil de vers Choisis du père Bonhors." She discontinued writing for the theatre at the advice of Madame la Chancelière de Pont-Chartrain, who gave her a pension; even suppressing several little pieces, which might have given wrong impressions of her manners and religion. Two romances are likewise ascribed to her; "The Count d'Amboise," and "Ines of Cordova." Some of the journalists attributed to her, others to Fontenelle, the account of the "Island of Borneo."

BETHMANN, FREDERICA,

ONE of the first ornaments of the Berlin National Theatre, was born in 1760, at Gotha, where her father, whose name was Flittner, had an income by a respectable office. After his death, her mother married the well-known director Grossmann. He visited, with his family, the cities on the Rhine, Cologne, Bonn, Mentz, &c., where Frederica was married to Mr. Unselmann, who enjoyed great popularity for his rich comic talent, and she then made her first appearance on the stage. Her agreeable voice induced her to appear first at the opera. She soon acquired by her singing and acting, in naïf as well as in sentimental parts, the undivided approbation of the public; and was called, with her husband, to Berlin, where she became one of the first actresses that Germany has produced, both in tragedy and comedy. In 1803 she was divorced from her husband to marry the renowned Mr. Bethmann. She died in 1814. A truly creative fancy, deep and tender feeling, and an acute understanding, were united in her with a graceful, slender figure, an expressive countenance, and a voice, which, from its flexibility and melodiousness, was fit to touch the deepest chords of the heart, and to mark with rare perfection the nicest shades of thought and feeling.

BERTANA, LUCIA.

In the sixteenth century the literary annals of Italy shone with illustrious names, and among these may be found many women assiduously cultivating poetry and science, and attaining no mean proficiency in these elevated pursuits. Naples boasted Vittoria Colonna, and a few years afterwards, Laura Terracini. Padua possessed Gaspara Stampa; Brescia, Veronica Gambara; and Modena, Tarquenia Molza. At Bologna, among many poetesses at that time, we find Ippolita Paleotti writing elegant verses in Greek and in Latin; the nun Febronia Pannolini, remarkable for her choice prose, and flowing hymns, as well in Latin as in Italian; and Valeria Miani, who achieved that difficulty some male sceptics arrogantly refuse to feminine capacity—a successful tragedy. But among all the Bolognese women, the crown must be yielded to Lucia Bertana. Not only contemporary authorities award her this praise, but Maffei, in his “History of Italian literature,” gives her the third place among the most admirable poetesses of the sixteenth century, preferring only Vittoria Colonna and Veronica Gambara. She was born at Bologna, of the family Dall’Oro, in 1521; and became the wife of Gerone

Bertana, a gentleman of Modena, where she resided after her marriage. She was not only celebrated for her poetry, but possessed a vigorous and polished prose style. She cultivated music and painting, and turned her attention to what was at that time a respectable and sensible object of study, astrology. Besides these accomplishments, Lucia was gifted with all the virtues of her sex. She was amiable and gentle, and her excellent disposition was manifested in an attempt she most earnestly made to effect a reconciliation between two rival men of letters, Caro and Castelvetro. She conducted the matter with the utmost delicacy and good sense—appealed to the better feelings of each—and tried to show how unworthy of their superior abilities, and solid reputation, was this unmeaning bickering.

She died in Rome in 1567. Her remains were interred in the church of St. Sabina, where her husband elevated a superb monument to her memory. The estimation of various learned societies endeavoured to immortalize her by other means—medals were struck to her fame, which may yet be found in Italian Museums. The following from her pen has been much admired:

SONNET.

Or musa mia lieta e sicura andrai
Per folti boschi e per ameni colli,
Cogli occhi asciutti che già furon molli
Al chiaro fonte ove mercè trovai.

Quivi con le sorelle canterai
I miei pensieri per letizia folli,
Piochè i desiri miei fatti ha satolli
Questo Aristarco e me tratta di guai.

Ed al gran Castelvetro in atto umile,
Dirai, se il ceil mi dà tanto valore
Degno di voi, ed al gran merto eguale,

Che posta avrai mai sempre e lingua e stile
In celebrar questo chiaro splendore
Onde mi farai forse anche immortale.

BLAKE, KATHARINE,

WIFE of William Blake, the artist, was born in humble life, and first noticed by the young painter for the whiteness of her hand and the sylph-like beauty of her form. Her maiden name was Boucher, not a pretty name to set in rhyme, but her lover inscribed his lyrics to the “dark-eyed Kate.” He also drew her picture; and finding she had good domestic qualities, he married her. They lived long and happily together. A writer, who knew them intimately, thus describes her:—

“She seemed to have been created on purpose for Blake: she believed him to be the finest genius on earth; she believed in his verse; she believed in his designs; and to the wildest flights of his imagination she bowed the knee, and was a worshipper. She set his house in good order, prepared his frugal meal, learned to think as he thought, and, indulging him in his harmless absurdities, became as it were bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh. She learned—what a young and handsome woman is seldom apt to learn—to despise gaudy dresses, costly meals, pleasant company, and agreeable invitations—she found out the way of being happy at home, living on the simplest of food, and contented in the homeliest of clothing. It was no ordinary mind which could do all this; and she whom Blake emphatically called his 'beloved,' was no ordinary woman. She wrought off in the press the impressions of his plates—she coloured them with a light and neat hand—made drawings much in the spirit of his compositions, and almost rivalled him in all things, save in the power which he possessed of seeing visions of any individual living or dead, whenever he chose to see them."

William Blake died in 1828, without any visible pain, his faithful wife watching over him to the last. She died a few years afterwards.

BLACK, MRS.,

AN English portrait-painter, flourished about the year 1760, and was a member of the Academy in St. Martin's-lane.

BLACK, ———,

DAUGHTER of the preceding, was a portrait-painter in oils and crayons. She acquired much reputation in teaching painting.

BLACKWELL, ELIZABETH,

AN English woman of considerable talent, who, to provide subsistence for her husband, who was in prison for debt, published, in two folio volumes, in 1737 and 1739, an Herbal, containing five hundred plates, drawn, engraved, and coloured by herself. The first volume was published in 1737, and the second appeared in 1739. The complete work bore the following title: "A curious Herbal, containing five hundred of the most useful plants which are now used in the practice of physic, engraved on folio copper-plates, after drawings taken from the life. To which is added a short description of the plants, and their common uses in Physic."

While Mrs. Blackwell was completing this laborious undertaking, she resided at Chelsea, near the Garden of Medicinal Plants; where she was frequently visited, and much patronized, by people of distinguished rank and learning. The College of Physicians gave the book a public testimonial of their approbation, and made the author a present. Dr. Pulteney, speaking of this work, says, "For the most complete set of drawings of medicinal plants, we are indebted to the genius and industry of a lady, exerted on an occasion that redounded highly to her praise."

Her husband, Alexander, was born at Aberdeen, brought up as a physician, and went to Sweden about 1740, where he was beheaded, on a charge of being concerned in count Tessin's plot.

BLAMIRE, SUSANNA,

WAS born of a respectable family in Cumberland, England, at Cardem Hall, near Carlisle, where she resided till her twentieth year, when her sister marrying a gentleman from Scotland, she accompanied them to that country, where she remained some years. She was distinguished for the excellence of her Scottish poetry. She died unmarried at Carlisle, in 1794, at the age of forty-six. Her lyrics have been greatly admired for their harmonious versification, and their truth and tenderness of feeling. Among these, "The Nabob," "The Waefu' Heart," and "Auld Robin Forbes," are selected as most beautiful. Her poetical works were collected in 1842, and published in one volume, with a memoir, by Patrick Maxwell

THE NABOB.

WHEN silent time, wi' lightly foot,
Had trod on thirty years,
I sought again my native land
Wi' mony hopes and fears.
Wha kens gin the dear friends I left
May still continue mine?
Or gin I e'er again shall taste
The joys I left langsyne?

As I drew near my ancient pile,
My heart beat a' the way;
Ilk place I passed seemed yet to speak
O' some dear former day;
Those days that followed me afar,
Those happy days o' mine,
Whilk made me think the present joys
A' naething to langsyne!

The ivied tower now met my eye,
Where minstrels used to blaw;
Nae friend stepped forth wi' open hand,
Nae weel-kenned face I saw;
Till Donald tottered to the door,
Wham I left in his prime,
And grat to see the lad return
He bore about langsyne.

I ran to ilka dear friend's room,
As if to find them there,
I knew where ilk ane used to sit,
And hang o'er mony a chair;
Till soft remembrance threw a veil
Across these een o' mine,
I closed the door, and sobbed aloud,
To think on auld langsyne!

Some pensy chiefls, a new sprung race,
Wad next their welcome pay,
Wha shuddered at my Gothic wa's,
And wished my groves away.
"Cut, cut," they cried, "those aged elms,
Lay low yon mournfu' pine."
Na! na! our fathers' names grow there,
Memorials o' langsyne.

To wean me frae these waefu' thoughts,
They took me to the town;
But sair on ilka weel-kenned face
I missed the youthfu' bloom.
At balls they pointed to a nymph
Wham a' declared divine:
But sure her mother's blushing cheeks
Were fairer far langsyne!

In vain I sought in music's sound
To find that magic art,
Which oft in Scotland's ancient lays
Has thrilled through a' my heart.
The sang had mony an artfu' turn;
My ear confessed 'twas fine;
But missed the simple melody
I listened to langsyne.

Ye sons to comrades o' my youth,
Forgie an auld man's spleen,
Wha 'midst your gayest scenes still mourns
The days he ance has seen.
When time has passed and seasons fled,
Your hearts will feel like mine;
And aye the sang will maist delight
That minds ye o' langsyne!

THE WAEFU' HEART.

Gin living worth could win my heart,
Ye would nae speak in vain;
But in the darksome grave it's laid,
Never to rise again.

My wae-fu' heart lies low wi' his,
Whose heart was only mine;
And O! what a heart was that to love!
But I maun na repine.

Yet O! gin heaven in mercy soon
Would grant the boon I crave,
And take the life, now naething worth,
Since Jamie's in the grave.

And, see, his gentle spirit comes
To speed me on my way,
Surprised, nae doubt, I still am here—
Sair wondering at my stay.

I come, I come, my Jamie dear;
And O! wi' what good will
I follow wheresoe'er ye lead!
Ye canna lead to ill.

--She said; and soon a deadly pale
Her faded cheek possessed;
Her wae-fu' heart forgot to beat,—
Her sorrows soon to rest.

AULD ROBIN FORBES.

(In the Cumberland dialect.)

And auld Robin Forbes hes gien tem a dance,
I pat on my speckets to see them aw prance;
I thout o' the days when I was but fifteen,
And skipp'd wi' the best upon Forbes's green.
Of aw things that is I think thout is meast queer,
It brings that that's by-past and sets it down here;
I see Willy as plain as I dui this bit leace,
When he tuik his cwoat lappet and deeghted his face.

The lasses aw wondered what Willy cud see
In yen that was dark and hard-featured leyke me;
And they wondered ay mair when they talked o' my wit,
And sliely telt Willy that cud'nt be it.
But Willy he laughed, and he meade me his weyfe,
And whea was mair happy thro' aw his long leyfe?
It's e'en my great comfort, now Willy is geane,
That he often said—nea pleace was leyke his awn heame!

I mind when I carried my wark to yon steyle,
Where Willy was deyk, the time to beguile,
He wad fling me a daisy to put i' my breast,
And I hammered my noddle to mek out a jest.
But merry or grave, Willy often wad tell
There was none o' the leave that was leyke my awn sel;
And he spak what he thout, for I'd hardly a plack
When we married, and nobbet ae gown to my back.

When the clock had struck eight I expected him heame,
And wheyles went to meet him as far as Dumleane;
Of aw hours it telt, eight was dearest to me,
But now when it streykes there's a tear i' my ee.
O Willy! dear Willy! it never can be
That age, time, or death, can divide thee and me!
For that spot on earth that's aye dearest to me,
Is the turf that has covered my Willie frae me.

BLANCA, N. LE,

A YOUNG woman who was found wild at Ligny, near Chalons, in France, in 1731, when about ten years of age. She was placed in a convent, and died a nun, in 1760.

BLANCHARD, MADAME,

WAS the wife of François Blanchard, one of the first aeronauts, a Frenchman by birth, who died in 1809. After his death Madame Blanchard continued to make aerial voyages. In 1811, she ascended in Rome, and after going sixty miles, she rose again to proceed to Naples. In June, 1819, having ascended from Tivoli, in Paris, her balloon took fire from some fireworks she had with her, the gondola fell from a considerable height into the street de Provence, and Madame Blanchard was instantly killed.

BLAND, ELIZABETH.

THIS lady was remarkable for her knowledge of the Hebrew language, and for her peculiar skill in writing it.

She was born about the period of the restoration of Charles II., and was daughter and heir of Mr. Robert Fisher, of Long-Acre. She married Mr. Nathaniel Bland, April 26th, 1681, who was then a linen-draper in London, and afterwards lord of the manor of Beeston, in Yorkshire. She had six children, who all died in infancy, excepting one son, named Joseph, and a daughter, Martha, who was married to Mr. George Moore, of Beeston. Mrs. Bland was taught Hebrew by Lord Van Helmont, which she understood so thoroughly as to be competent to the instruction in it of her son and daughter.

Among the curiosities of the Royal Society is preserved a phylactery in Hebrew, written by her, of which Dr. Grew has given a description in his account of rarities preserved at Gresham college. "It is a single scroll of parchment, fifteen inches long, three quarters of an inch in breadth, with four sentences of the law most curiously written upon it in Hebrew; viz. Exod. xiii. from verse 7 to 11, and from 13 to 17; Deut. vi. from verse 3 to 10, and xi. from 13 to 19. Scriverius, from the rabbies, saith, that they were written severally upon so many scrolls, and that the Jews do to this day wear them over their foreheads in their manner. So that they are of several sorts or modes, whereof this is one." Mrs. Bland having written the phylactery described by Dr. Grew, at the request of Mr. Thoresby, presented it to the Royal Society.

By the two pedigrees of the family, printed in Mr. Thoresby's Ducatus Leodiensis, pages 209 and 587, it seems she was living in 1712.

BLEECKER, ANNE ELIZA,

ONE of the early poetesses of America, was born in New York, in 1752. Her father was Brandt Schuyler, of that city. In 1769, she married John J. Bleecker, and afterwards lived chiefly at Tomhanick, a little village not far from Albany. 1. was in this seclusion that most of her poems were written. The death of one of her children, and the capture of her husband, who was taken prisoner by a party of Tories, in 1781, caused a depression of spirits and melancholy from which she never recovered. She died in 1783. Several years after her death, her poems were collected by her daughter, Mrs. Faugeres, and published in one volume. There are no wonderful traces of genius in these poems; but they show a refined taste, and talents which might have been cultivated to higher efforts, if the circumstances surrounding the author had been propitious. There is a pure current of conjugal and maternal feeling to be traced in all her effusions. In her descriptive poetry she seems to have observed nature with the loving eye of a woman, rather than the searching glance of the artist; and she appropriates the scenery, so to speak, to her own affections. The following was written to commemorate her return to her home:

RETURN TO TOMANICK.

Hail, happy shades! though clad with heavy snows,
At sight of you with joy my bosom glows.
Ye arching pines, that bow with every breeze,
Ye poplars, elms, all hail my well known trees!
And now my peaceful mansion strikes my eye,
And now the tinkling rivulet I spy;
My little garden, Flora, hast thou kept,
And watch'd my pinks and lilies while I wept?
Or has the grubbing swine, by furies led,
The enclosure broke, and on my flowerets fed?

Ah me! that spot with blooms so lately graced,
With storms and driving snows is now defaced;
Sharp icicles from every bush depend,
And frosts all dazzling o'er the beds extend:
Yet soon fair spring shall give another scene,
And yellow cowslips gild the level green;
My little orchard sprouting at each bough,
Fragrant with clustering blossoms deep shall glow:
Ah! then 't is sweet the tufted grass to tread,
But sweeter slumbering in the balmy shade;
The rapid humming-bird, with ruby breast,
Seeks the parterre with early blue-bells drest,
Drinks deep the honeysuckle dew, or drives
The labouring bee to her domestic hives:
Then shines the lupine bright with morning gems,
And sleepy poppies nod upon their stems;
The humble violet and the dulcet rose,
The stately lily then, and tulip blows.

Farewell, my Plutarch! farewell, pen and muse!
Nature exults—shall I her call refuse?
Apollo fervid glitters in my face,
And threatens with his beam each feeble grace:
Yet still around the lovely plants I toil,
And draw obnoxious herbage from the soil;
Or with the lime-twigs little birds surprise,
Or angle for the trout of many dyes.

But when the vernal breezes pass away,
And loftier Phœbus darts a fiercer ray,
The spiky corn then rattles all around,
And dashing cascades give a pleasing sound;
Shrill sings the locust with prolonged note,
The cricket chirps familiar in each cot.
The village children rambling o'er yon hill,
With berries all their painted baskets fill.
They rob the squirrel's little walnut store,
And climb the half exhausted tree for more;
Or else to fields of maize nocturnal hie,
Where hid, the elusive water-melons lie;
Sportive, they make incisions in the rind,
The riper from the immature to find;
Then load their tender shoulders with the prey,
And laughing bear the bulky fruit away.

BLESSINGTON, COUNTESS OF,

Was born in Ireland, Sept. 1st, 1789. Her maiden name was Marguerite Power; she was the second daughter of Edmund Power, Esq., of Carrabeen, in the county of Waterford. Marguerite Power was very beautiful, and married, at the early age of fifteen, Captain Farmer, of the forty-seventh regiment. He died in 1817; and, in the following year, Mrs. Farmer married her second husband, Charles John Gardner, earl of Blessington. During the lifetime of the earl he resided with Lady Blessington chiefly in Italy and France; and he died in Paris, in 1829. Lady Blessington returned soon afterwards to London, and devoted herself to literature. She was so prominent in the circle her rank, talents, accomplishments and beauty drew around her, that her biography is familiar to all. She resided in London, till the troubles in Ireland had so embarrassed her estates in that ill-governed country, that she was compelled to dispose of her house and all her property —her most cherished “household gods”—at public sale. In the spring of 1849, she removed to Paris, where she intended to fix her residence, and died there, early in June, before she had fully established herself in her new home. Among the many testimonials to the natural generosity of her disposition, and the truth of her zeal in the service of her friends, we quote from a notice in the Art-Journal:

“She was largely indebted to Nature for surpassing loveliness of person and graceful and ready wit. Circumstances connected with the earlier years of her life (to which it is needless to refer) ‘told’ against her through the whole of her career; but we entirely believe that the Nature which gave her beauty, gave her also those desires to be good which constitute true virtue. Those who speak lightly of this accomplished woman, might have better means to do her justice if they knew but a tithe of the cases that might be quoted of her generous sympathy, her ready and liberal aid, and her persevering sustenance whenever a good cause was to be helped, or a virtuous principle was to be promulgated.”

She wrote with great facility and elegance of language, but her style is too diffuse, particularly in her novels. Her “Idler in Italy,” and “Conversations with Lord Byron,” are her best works; the last is very interesting, the subjects owing, probably, much to the spirit with which the hero of the book discourses. The list of Lady Blessington’s works is large, comprising the following:—“The Magic Lantern,” “Sketches and Fragments,” “Tour in the Netherlands,” “Conversations with Lord Byron,” “The Repealers,” “The Two Friends,” “The Victims of Society,” “The Idler in France,” “The Idler in Italy,” “The Governess,” “Confessions of an Elderly Lady,” “Confessions of an Elderly Gentleman,” “Desul” tory Thoughts," "The Belle of a Season," "Lottery of Life," "Meredith," "Strathern," "Memoirs of a Femme de Chambre." She wrote also several illustrated books of poetry. The following is from the "Conversations," &c.:

LORD BYRON IN 1823.

"Saw Lord Byron for the first time. The impression of the first few moments disappointed me, as I had, both from the portraits and descriptions given, conceived a different idea of him. I had fancied him taller, with a more dignified and commanding air, and I looked in vain for the hero looking sort of person with whom I had so long identified him in imagination. His appearance is highly prepossessing; his head is finely shaped, and the forehead open, high, and noble; his eyes are grey and full of expression, but one is visibly larger than the other; the nose is large and well shaped, but, from being a little too thick, it looks better in profile than in front face; his mouth is the most remarkable feature in his face, the upper lip of Grecian shortness, the corners descending, the lips full and finely cut. In speaking, he shows his teeth very much, and they are white and even, but I observed that even in his frequent smiles there is a scornful expression, that is evidently natural, and not, as many suppose, affected. His chin is large and well shaped, and finishes well the oval of his face. He is extremely thin, indeed so much so, that his figure has almost a boyish air; his face is pale, but not the paleness of ill health, but the fairness of a dark-haired person, and his hair, which is getting rapidly grey, is of a dark brown and curls naturally; he uses a good deal of oil in it, which makes it look still darker. His countenance is full of expression, it gains on the beholder the more it is seen, and leaves an agreeable impression. I should say that melancholy was its prevailing character, as I observed that when any observation elicited a smile, it appeared to linger but for a moment on his lip, which instantly resumed its former expression of seriousness. His whole appearance is remarkably gentlemanlike, and he owes nothing of this to his toilet, as his coat appears to have been many years made, is much too large—and all his garments convey the idea of having been purchased ready-made, so ill do they fit him. There is a gaucherie in his movements, which evidently proceeds from the perpetual consciousness of his lameness, that appears to haunt him, for he tries to conceal his foot when seated, and when walking has a nervous rapidity in his manner. He is very slightly lame, and the deformity of his foot is so little remarkable, that I am not now aware which foot it is. His voice and accents are peculiarly agreeable, but effeminate, clear, harmonious, and so distinct, that though his general tone in speaking is rather low than high, not a word is lost. His manners are as unlike my preconceived notions of them as his appearance. I had expected to find him a dignified, cold, reserved, and haughty person, resembling those mysterious personages he so loves to paint in his works, and with whom he has been so often identified by the good-natured world: but nothing can be more different; for were I to point out the prominent defect of Lord Byron, I should say it was flippancy, and a total want of that natural self-possession and dignity which ought to characterize a man of birth and education.

LORD BYRON'S ILL-TEMPER.

Lord Byron dined with us to-day; we all observed that he was evidently discomposed: the dinner and servants had no sooner disappeared, than he quoted an attack against himself, in some newspaper, as the cause. He was very much irritated—much more so than the subject merited—and showed how keenly alive he is to censure, though he takes so little pains to avoid exciting it. This is a strange anomaly that I have observed in Byron—an extreme susceptibility to censorious observations, and a want of tact in not knowing how to steer clear of giving cause to them, that is extraordinary. He winces under castigation, and writhes in agony under the infliction of ridicule, yet gives rise to attack every day.

Ridicule is, however, the weapon he most dreads, perhaps because it is the one he wields with most power; and I observe he is sensitively alive to its slightest approach. It is also the weapon with which he assails all; friend and foe alike come under its cutting point; and the laugh which accompanies each sally, as a deadly incision is made in some vulnerable quarter, so little accords with the wound inflicted, that it is as though one were struck down by summer lightning while admiring its brilliant play.

Byron likes not contradiction: he waxed wroth to-day, because I defended a friend of mine whom he attacked, but ended by taking my hand and saying he honoured me for the warmth with which I defended an absent friend, adding with irony, "Moreover, when he is not a poet, or even a prose writer, by whom you can hope to be repaid by being handed down to posterity as his defender."

"I often think," said Byron, "that I inherit my violence and bad temper from my poor mother, not that my father, from all I could ever learn, had a much better; so that it is no wonder I have such a very bad one. As long as I can remember anything, I recollect being subject to violent paroxysms of rage, so disproportioned to the cause as to surprise me when they were over; and this still continues. I cannot coolly view anything that excites my feelings; and once the lurking devil within me is roused, I lose all command of myself. I do not recover a good fit of rage for days after: mind, I do not by this mean that the ill humour continues, as, on the contrary, that quickly subsides, exhausted by its own violence; but it shakes me terribly—and leaves me low and nervous after. Depend on it, people's tempers must be corrected while they are children; for not all the good resolutions in the world can enable a man to conquer habits of ill humour or rage, however he may regret having given way to them. My poor mother was generally in a rage every day, and used to render me sometimes almost frantic; particularly, when, in her passion, she reproached me with my personal deformity, I have left her presence to rush into solitude, when, unseen, I could vent the rage and mortification I endured, and curse the deformity that I now began to consider as a signal mark of the injustice of Providence. Those were bitter moments; even now, the impression of them is vivid in my mind; and they cankered a heart that I believe was naturally affectionate, and destroyed a temper always disposed to be violent. It was my feelings at this period that suggested the idea of 'The Deformed Transformed.' I often look back on the days of my childhood, and am astonished at the recollection of the intensity of my feelings at that period: first impressions are indelible. My poor mother, and after her my school-fellows, by their taunts, led me to consider my lameness as the greatest misfortune, and I have never been able to conquer this feeling. It requires great natural goodness, of disposition as well as reflection, to conquer the corroding bitterness that deformity engenders in the mind, and which, while preying on itself, sours one towards all the world. I have read, that where personal deformity exists, it may be always traced in the face, however handsome the face may be. I am sure that what is meant by this is, that the consciousness of it gives to the countenance an habitual expression of discontent, which I believe is the case; yet it is too bad (added Byron with bitterness,) that, because one has a defective foot, one cannot have a perfect face."

LORD BYRON'S REGARD FOR HIS WIFE.

I do not recollect ever having met Byron that he did not, in some way or other, introduce the subject of lady Byron. The impression left on my mind was, that she continually occupied his thoughts, and that he most anxiously desired a reconciliation with her. He declared that his marriage was free from every interested motive; and if not founded on love, as love is generally viewed, a wild, engrossing and ungovernable passion, there was quite sufficient liking in it to have insured happiness had his temper been better. He said that lady Byron's appearance had pleased him from the first moment, and had always continued to please him; and that, had his pecuniary affairs been in a less ruinous state, his temper would not have been excited, as it daily, hourly was, during the brief period of their union, by the demands of insolent creditors, whom he was unable to satisfy, and who drove him nearly out of his senses, until he lost all command of himself, and so forfeited lady Byron's affection. "I must admit," said he, "that I could not have left a very agreeable impression on her mind. With my irascible temper, worked upon by the constant attacks of duns, no wonder that I became gloomy, violent, and I fear often personally uncivil, if no worse, and so disgusted her; though, had she really loved me, she would have borne with my infirmities, and made allowance for my provocations. I have written to her repeatedly, and am still in the habit of writing long letters to her, many of which I have sent, but without ever receiving an answer, and others that I did not send, because I despaired of their doing any good. I will show you some of them, as they may serve to throw a light on my feelings." The next day Byron sent me the letter addressed to lady Byron, which has already appeared in "Moore's Life." He never could divest himself of the idea that she took a deep interest in him; he said that their child must always be a bond of union between them, whatever lapse of years or distance might separate them; and this idea seemed to comfort him.

From the "Tour in Italy."

A BIRTHDAY.

I could be triste, and sentimental, were I to give way to the reflections which particular recollections awaken. In England I should experience these doleful feelings, but at Paris tristesse, and sentimentality would be misplaced; so I must look couleur de rose, and receive the congratulations of my friends, on adding another year to my age; a subject far from meriting congratulations, when one has passed thirty. Youth is like health, we never value the possession of either, until we have begun to decline.

A NEW YEAR.

There is something that excites grave and solemn reflections in this new page, opened in the book of life. I never could understand how people can dance out the old year, and welcome in the new with gaiety and rejoicings. If the departed year has brought us sorrow, (and over how few does it revolve without bringing it!) we look on its departure with chastened feelings; and if its circle has been marked by bright days, how can we see it die without indulging a tender melancholy? I felt all this last night, when the ghosts of departed joys stood before my mind's eye; and I breathed a heartfelt aspiration that the coming year may pass as free from heavy trials as the last. What a merciful arrangement of Divine Providence is the impenetrable veil which covers our destinies! And yet there are mortals who have desired to pierce it; who have thirsted for that knowledge which, if obtained, might empoison the present. How worse than vain is this desire of prying into futurity! Do we not know that our lives, and those of all dear to us, hang on so frail a thread, that a moment may see it cut by inexorable fate!—that it is the condition of our being to behold our friends (the links that bind us to existence,) snap widely! And yet we would wish to lift the dread veil that hides the yawning graves, to be filled, perhaps in a few days, by some one whose death will render earth a desert. Far, far from me be this unenviable prescience; and let me not tremble for the future by foreseeing what it contains.

OF DANCING AND DRESS IN FRANCE.

All we have heard in praise of French dancing is borne out by what I have seen even in this provincial town. Nothing can be more graceful, or unaffected; no attempt at display is visible; no entre-chats, that alarm people with tender feet for their safety; and no exhibition of vigour likely to bring its practisers to the melting mood; a mood never sufficiently to be reprobated in refined society. The waltz in France loses its objectionable familiarity, by the manner in which it is performed. The gentleman does not clasp his fair partner round the waist with a freedom repugnant to the modesty and destructive to the ceinture of the lady; but so arranges it, that he assists her movements, without incommoding her delicacy or her drapery. In short, they manage these matters better in France than with us; and though no advocate for this exotic dance, I must admit that, executed as I have seen it, it could not offend the most fastidious eye.

The French toilette, too, even at this distance from the capital, is successfully attended to; an elegant simplicity distinguishes that of the young ladies, whose robes of organdé or tulle, of a snowy whiteness, well buckled ceinture, bouquet of flowers, well-cut shoes, and delicately white gloves, defy criticism, and convey the impression of having been selected by the Graces to be worn for that night only. No robe of materials too expensive to be quickly laid aside, or chiffonnée and fanée by use, here meets the sight; no ceinture that betrays the pressure it inflicts; and no gloves that indicate the warmth of the wearer's feelings, or those of her partner, are to be seen. The result is, that the young ladies are simply and tastefully attired, with an extreme attention to the freshness of their toilette, and a total avoidance of finery. A much greater degree of prudery, if it may be so called, is exercised in France than in England, with regard to dress; the robes of ladies of all ages conceal much more of the bust and shoulders. They claim some merit for this delicacy, though ill-natured people are not wanting who declare that prudence has more to say to the concealment than modesty; the French busts and shoulders being very inferior to the English. Of the former I have had no means of judging, because they are so covered by the dress; but of the latter, all must pronounce that they are charming. Great reserve is maintained by the French ladies in society; shaking hands with gentlemen is deemed indecorous; but to touch a lady's hand with the lips, while bowing over it, is considered respectful. The conversation of young ladies with their partners in the dance, is nearly confined to monosyllables; and when ended, they resume their seats by the side of their respective mothers, or chaperons, only speaking when spoken to, and always with an air of reserve, which is never laid aside in public.

BLOMBERG, BARBARA,

A young lady of noble birth in Ratisbon, mistress of Charles V., emperor of Germany. She was the reputed mother of the natural son of Charles, Don John of Austria, who, dying in 1578, recommended her, and her son, Pyramus Conrad, whom she afterwards had by her husband, to the protection of Philip II. Accordingly, Philip sent for Barbara into Spain, and settled her with a handsome equipage at Mazote.

BIBI JAND,

QUEEN of Dekan in Hindostan in the sixteenth century, was a wise and able princess. She maintained her dominions in peace and prosperity, and repulsed with success the attacks of the Moguls, who wished to subjugate them.

BILDERJIK, KATHARINE WILHELMINA,

WIFE of the celebrated poet of Holland, died at Haarlaem, in 1831. She was herself distinguished for her poetic abilities; and, in 1816, obtained a prize offered at Ghent for the best poem on the battle of Waterloo.

BILLINGTON, ELIZABETH,

THE most celebrated English singer of her day, was born in England, in 1770. She was the daughter of Mr. Weichsell, a German. At the age of fourteen she made her first appearance as a singer, at Oxford; and two years afterwards married Mr. Billington, whom she accompanied to Dublin. Here she made her début in the opera of "Orpheus and Eurydice." On returning to London, she appeared at Covent Garden with great success, and rapidly acquired a high reputation. She afterwards visited the continent to avail herself of the instructions of the masters of the art in Paris and Italy. In 1796, she appeared at Venice and at Rome, receiving everywhere the loudest expressions of applause. In 1801, she returned to the London stage, and astonished the whole world by her Mandane, a performance that has hardly ever been equalled in English opera. The last exhibition of her powers was for the benefit of a charity at Whitehall chapel; the queen, the prince-regent, and most of the branches of the royal family, being present. She left England in 1817, and died soon after at an estate she had purchased in the Venetian territories. Her character as a private individual was very bad.

BILLIONI, N. BUSSA,

A CELEBRATED actress at the theatres of France and Brussels, died in 1783.

BOCCAGE, MARIE ANNE DU,

A CELEBRATED French poetess, member of the academies of Rome, Bologna, Padua, Lyons, and Rouen, was born in Rouen in 1710, and died in 1802. She was educated in Paris in a nunnery, where she evinced a love of poetry. She became the wife of a receiver of taxes in Dieppe, who died soon after the marriage, leaving her a youthful widow. She concealed her talents, however, till the charms of youth were past, and first published her productions in 1746. The first was a poem "On the Mutual Influence of the Fine Arts and Sciences." This gained the prize from the academy of Rouen. She next attempted an imitation of Paradise Lost, in six cantos; then of the "Death of Abel;" next a tragedy, the "Amazons;" and a poem in ten cantos, called "The Columbiad." Madame du Boccage was praised by her contemporaries with an extravagance, for which only her sex and the charms of her person can account. Forma Venus arte Minerva, was the motto of her admirers, among whom were Voltaire, Fontenelle, and Clairaut. She was always surrounded by distinguished men, and extolled in a multitude of poems, which, if collected, would fill several volumes. There is a great deal of entertaining matter in the letters which she wrote on her travels in England and Holland, and in which one may plainly see the impression she made upon her contemporaries. Her works have been translated into English, Spanish, German and Italian.

The following is a specimen of the versification of Madame Boccage. These effusions may well be styled the poetry of polite life, and therefore we insert them in the language of the writer. The piquancy and grace, which give effect to the original, would be nearly lost in a translation of these pretty, sparkling French compliments into plain common sense, and unsentimental English rhyme.

A. M. BAILLY,

De l'Académie des Sciences,

Sur son Histoire de l'Astronomie Ancienne et Moderne.

O toi dont le savoir étonne,
Mais qui sais, en l'ornant de fleurs,
Instruire et charmer tes lecteurs,
Bailly, que la gloire environne;
Ton style enchanteur et profond,
Des lauriers qui couvrent ton front,
Te promet la triple couronne.
Le public déjà te la donne.
Du Musée où brillaient jadis
Mairan, Voltaire et les Corneilles,
La palme est due à tes merveilles.
Le Lycée, où nos érudits
Du vieux tems vantent les écrits,
Garde un prix pour tes doctes veilles.
Dès long-tems tes noms sont inscrits
Dans la savante Académie.
Là, ton œil, que guide Uranie,
Des fastes primitifs instruit,
Lit dans l'oubli du tems qui fuit;
Et si ta sublime magie
A voir l'avenir te conduit,
Sous tes crayons, malgré l'envie,
Les traits peints au regard séduit,
Y prendront la forme et la vie;
Une Sibylle le prédit,
La prédiction est accomplie,
Tout est possible à ton génie.

BOIS DE LA PIERRE, LOUISE MARIE,

A LADY of Normandy, who possessed some poetical merit, and wrote memoirs for the history of Normandy, &c. She died Sept. 14th, 1730, aged sixty-seven.

BONAPARTE, RAMOLINA MARIE LETITIA,

Was born at Ajaccio in the island of Corsica, in 1748. The family of Ramolini is of noble origin, and is derived from the counts of Colatto. The founder of the Corsican branch had married the daughter of a doge of Genoa, and had received from that republic great and honourable distinctions. The mother of Madame Letitia married a second time a Swiss named Fesch, whose family was from Basle. He was a Protestant, but was proselyted by his wife, and entered the Catholic church. From this second marriage was born the cardinal Fesch, half-brother of Madame Bonaparte. Letitia was one of the most beautiful girls of Corsica. She married Charles Bonaparte in 1766; he was a friend of Paoli, and a man of untarnished honour. It is idle to insist on the nobility of the Bonaparte family, since nobody can deny that the deeds of Napoleon were at least equal to those of the founders of any of the most splendid genealogies in Europe; but as no less a person than Chateaubriand has condescended to second the useless falsehoods of those who represented the emperor as springing from a low and vulgar race, it may here be stated, that from Nicolao Bonaparte, exiled as a Ghibellin from Florence, in 1268, to Charles, the Bonapartes can count seven generations of nobility.

Letitia Ramolini espoused Charles Bonaparte in the midst of civil discords and wars; through every vicissitude she followed her husband, and as few persons have been placed in more difficult conjunctures, few have exhibited such strength of mind, courage, fortitude, and equanimity. The most unexampled prosperity, and most unlooked-for adversity have found her equal to the difficulties of each. Her eight children who lived to maturity were the following: Joseph, king of Naples, and afterwards of Spain; Napoleon; Eliza, grand-duchess of Tuscany; Lucien; Pauline, princess Borghese; Louis, king of Holland; Caroline, queen of Naples; and Jerome, king of Westphalia.

In 1785 Charles Bonaparte being sent to France as a deputy from the Corsican nobility, was seized with a cancer of the stomach, and died at Montpellier in the arms of his son Joseph. He left a widow with eight children, and no fortune. Two of the family were educated at the expense of the government—Napoleon at Brienne, and Eliza at St. Cyr—while the others found their mother an instructress capable and energetic. Hers was a character that displayed its resources in difficulties; and she always managed to maintain her children in the position to which they were naturally entitled. She was fond of saying of Napoleon, "That he had never given her a moment's pain, not even at the time which is almost universally woman's hour of suffering." The 15th of August, Madame Bonaparte was coming out of church, when she was attacked with symptoms of an approaching event; she had barely time to enter her own house—a piece of tapestry hangings was hastily thrown on the marble pavement of the hall, and there Napoleon was born. The tapestry represented a scene from the Iliad.

Madame Bonaparte was always kind and generous; in trouble she was the advocate and protectress of the unfortunate. When Jerome incurred his brother's displeasure for his American marriage, his mother restored him to favour; and when Lucien, for a fault of the same sort, was exiled to Rome, Madame Letitia accompanied him. When Napoleon became sovereign, he allotted her a suitable income, upon which she maintained a decorous court. After the disasters of 1816, she retired to Rome, where she lived in a quiet and dignified manner, seeing nobody but her own connections, and sometimes strangers of high rank, who were very desirous of being presented to her. She never laid aside her black, after the death of Napoleon. She died February 2d, 1836, at the age of eighty-six. For several of the last years of her life she was deprived of her sight, and was bedridden. Madame Letitia was always honoured and respected by those who were able to appreciate her rare qualities.

BONTEMS, MADAME,

BORN at Paris in 1718, died in the same city, April 18th, 1768; had received from nature a good understanding, and an excellent taste, which were cultivated by a careful education. She was acquainted with the foreign languages, and it is to her that the French are indebted for the accurate and elegant translation of "Thomson's Seasons." She was the centre of an amiable and select society that frequented her house. Though she was naturally very witty, she only made use of this talent for displaying that of others. She was not less esteemed for the qualities of her heart than of her mind.

BORGHESE, MARIE PAULINE,

PRINCESS, originally Bonaparte, sister of Napoleon, born at Ajaccio, October 20th, 1780; went when the English occupied Corsica in 1793, to Marseilles, where she was on the point of marrying Fréron, a member of the Convention, and son of that critic whom Voltaire made famous, when another lady laid claim to his hand. The beautiful Pauline was then intended for general Duphot, who was afterwards murdered at Rome in December, 1797; but she bestowed her hand from choice on General Leclerc, then at Milan, who had been in 1795 chief of the general staff of a division at Marseilles, and had then fallen in love with her. When he was sent to St. Domingo with the rank of captain-general, Napoleon ordered her to accompany her husband with her son. She embarked in December, 1801, at Brest, and was called by the poets of the fleet the Galatea of the Greeks, the Venus marina. Her statue in marble has since been made by Canova at Rome, a successful image of the goddess of beauty. She was no less courageous than beautiful, for when the negroes under Christophe stormed Cape François, where she resided, and Leclerc, who could no longer resist the assailants, ordered his lady and child to be carried on shipboard, she yielded only to force.

After the death of her husband, November 23d, 1802, she married at Morfontaine, November 6, 1803, the prince Camillo Borghese. Her son died at Rome soon after. With Napoleon, who loved her tenderly, she had many disputes and as many reconciliations; for she would not always follow the caprices of his policy. Yet even the proud style in which she demanded what her brothers begged, made her the more attractive to Napoleon. Once, however, when she forgot herself towards the empress, whom she never liked, she was obliged to leave the court. She was yet in disgrace at Nice, when Napoleon resigned his crown in 1814; upon which occasion she immediately appeared a tender sister. Instead of remaining at her palace in Rome, she set out for Elba to join her brother, and acted the part of mediator between him and the other members of his family. When Napoleon landed in France, she went to Naples to see her sister Caroline, and afterwards returned to Rome. Before the battle of Waterloo she placed all her diamonds, which were of great value, at the disposal of her brother. They were in his carriage, which was taken in that battle, and was shown publicly in London. He intended to have returned them to her.

She lived afterwards separated from her husband at Rome, where she occupied part of the palace Borghese, and where she possessed, from 1816, the villa Sciarra. Her house, in which taste and love of the fine arts prevailed, was the centre of the most splendid society at Rome. She often saw her mother, her brothers Lucien and Louis, and her uncle Fesch. When she heard of the sickness of her brother Napoleon, she repeatedly requested permission to go to him at St. Helena. She finally obtained her request, but the news of his death arrived immediately after. She died June 9th, 1825, at Florence. She left many legacies, and a donation, by the interest of which two young men of Ajaccio will be enabled to study medicine and surgery. The rest of her property she left to her brothers, the count of St. Leu and the prince of Montfort. Her whole property amounted to 2,000,000 francs.

Pauline was very fond of Italian poetry, and took great pleasure in listening to the melancholy verses of Petrarch. Among her accomplishments, the most remarkable certainly was her dramatic talent, which she displayed in private theatricals. Her marriage with the prince Borghese had never given anything like domestic happiness; they had long been separated, when, shortly before her death, in 1825, a reconciliation was effected, and they established their residence at Florence. She was then forty-five years old, but already felt the undermining effects of her fatal malady. Pauline had led a life of pleasure and folly, but her death-bed presented a scene that is sometimes wanting at the close of better-ordered lives. She exhibited the utmost tranquillity, resignation, and courage. Calling her husband, she begged his pardon for the causes of displeasure she had given him. She wrote, with her own hands, a will in which nobody was forgotten—even mere acquaintances were mentioned with appropriate bequests. She fulfilled all those duties the Roman Catholic church enjoins with every mark of the sincerest repentance, and warmest devotion. She spoke with the tenderest affection of her family, only one of whom, Jerome, was with her; she died clasping a picture of the emperor, and her last worldly thought seemed to be with him. Let us hope that this altered frame of mind proceeded from real penitence for the serious errors that stained her early days; for the truth of history compels the acknowledgment that this princess, beautiful, accomplished, high-minded, spirited, and generous, had deserved, by her ill conduct, the repugnance with which prince Camillo Borghese, for many years, regarded her. He appears to have entirely forgiven her, as he manifested a deep affliction at her death.

BOUGNET, MADAME,

Is celebrated for her humanity during the French revolution of 1793, in concealing some of the proscribed deputies, though death was the consequence of this mark of friendship. After supporting these unfortunate men for some time, and seeing them escape from her abode only to perish on the scaffold, she was herself dragged before the tribunal of Bordeaux, and suffered death with Christian resignation.

BOURETTE, CHARLOTTE,

Whose first husband was M. Curé, was a French poetess and lemonade-seller, called la Muse limonadière. She was born at Paris in 1714, and died there in 1784. Madame Bourette kept the Café Allemand, and was celebrated for her numerous productions in prose and verse. Her writings introduced her to the notice of several sovereigns, princes and princesses of the blood royal, and many of the most celebrated men of her time. Her poetry is careless and prosaic, but her prose compositions poetic and brilliant. She also wrote a comedy, "The Coquette Punished," which was acted with success in the Théâtre Français.

M. de Fontenelle, visiting Madame Bourette, addressed to her these two lines,

"Si les dames ont droit d'introduire des modes,
En prose disonnais on doit faire les odes."

To this, the lady replied as follows:—

TO M. DE FONTENELLE.

Cher Anacréon de Neustrie,
Dont la rare et sage folie
Joint Epicure avec Zénon,
Votre visite en ma maison,
Malgré le poison de l'Envie,
En tout tems, en toute saison,
Fera le plaisir de ma vie.
Mais en ce saint tems de pardon
Que nous accorde le Saint-Père,
Quel compliment puis-je vous faire
Qui n'ait un fumet d'oraison?
L'on ne parle que de prière,
De conférence et de sermon.
Vous le sçavez, fils d'Apollon,
Je peux le dire sans mystère,
Nous parlons tout autre jargon.
Il faut donc sagement me taire,
Ou vous dire avec onction:
Vous m'avez fait faveur insigne;
Ah! seigneur, je n'étois pas digne
Que vous vinssiez dans ma maison!

BOULLOUGNE, MAGDELAINE DE,

Was born at Paris in 1644. She painted historical pieces, but excelled in flowers and fruits. She died 1710. Her sister, Genevieve, painted in the same style, and with equal merit. She died 1708, aged sixty-three.

BOURGAÏN, THÉRÈSE,

ENGAGED at the Théâtre Français, in Paris, acted the parts of heroines in tragedy, and the young artless girls in comedy. She was a native of Paris. Palissot encouraged her, and the celebrated Dumesnil, then eighty years old, gave her instructions. "Pamela," (by F. de Neufchateau), "Melanie," (by la Harpe), and "Monime," (a character in "Mithridat," by Voltaire), were her most successful parts in tragedy; but in comedy she was greater. She avoided the common fault of most actresses who wish to excel in both kinds, namely, the transferring of the tragic diction to that of comedy, which latter requires, in dialogue, an easy, free, and well-supported style. If she did not reach the accomplished Mlle. Mars, her graceful vivacity, sufficiently aided by study and art, had peculiar charms. She acted also male parts, and her triumph in this kind was the "Page," in the "Marriage of Figaro." She was one of the members of the Théâtre Français, whom Napoleon had selected to entertain the congress of kings at Erfurt; at the demand of Alexander I., she went, 1809, to St. Petersburg, where she was much applauded as Eugenia; in Königsberg, she gave recitations before the late queen Louisa of Prussia, who rewarded her liberally; and in the same year she returned to Paris, where justice has always been done to her eminent talents.

BOURGET, CLEMENCE DE,

A LADY born of respectable parents at Lyons. She possessed so much merit as a writer, a musician, and a poetess, that she was presented to two monarchs, who passed through Lyons, as the greatest ornament of her native city. She died of a broken heart, in consequence of the loss of her lover, John de Peyrat, who fell at the siege of Beaurepaire, in 1561. She was the contemporary of Louise Labbé, la belle Cordière, and was very much attached to her, but the conduct of Louise at length compelled her more exemplary friend to withdraw her friendship.

BOURIGNON, ANTOINETTE,

Was a celebrated religious enthusiast, and founder of a sect which acquired so much importance that, under the name of the Bourignian doctrine, it is to this day one of the heresies renounced by candidates for holy orders in the Church of Scotland. She was the daughter of a Lille merchant, and was born in 1616; she was so singularly deformed at her birth, that a family consultation was held on the propriety of destroying the infant, as a monster. This fate she escaped, but remained an object of dislike to her mother, in consequence of which her childhood was passed in solitude and neglect; and the first books she got hold of chancing to be "Lives of the Early Christians" and mystical tracts, her ardent imagination acquired the visionary turn that marked her life. It has been asserted that her religious zeal displayed itself so early, that at four years of age she entreated to be removed to a more Christian country than Lille, where the unevangelical lives of the towns-people shocked her.

As Antoinette grew up, her appearance improved in a measure, and, being a considerable heiress, her deformity did not prevent her from being sought in marriage; and when she reached her twentieth year, one of her suitors was accepted by her parents. But the enthusiast had made a vow of virginity; and on the day appointed for celebrating her nuptials, Easter-day, in 1630, she fled, disguised as a hermit. She soon after obtained admittance into a convent, where she first began to make proselytes, and gained over so many of the nuns, that the confessor of the sisterhood procured her expulsion not only from the convent but from the town. Antoinette now wandered about France, the Netherlands, Holland and Denmark, everywhere making converts, and supporting herself by the labour of her hands, till 1648, when she inherited her father's property. She was then appointed governess of an hospital at Lille, but soon after was expelled the town by the police, on account of the disorders that her doctrines occasioned. She then resumed her wanderings. About this time, she was again persecuted with suitors, two of whom were so violent, each threatening to kill her if she would not marry him, that she was forced to apply to the police for protection, and two men were sent to guard her house. She died in 1680, and left all her property to the Lille hospital of which she had been governess.

She believed that she had visions and ecstatic trances, in which God commanded her to restore the true evangelical church which was extinct. She allowed no Liturgy, worship being properly internal. Her doctrines were highly mystical, and she required an impossible degree of perfection from her disciples. She is said to have been extraordinarily eloquent, and was at least equally diligent, for she wrote twenty-two large volumes, most of which were printed at a private press she carried about with her for that purpose. After her death, Poirét, a mystical, Protestant divine, and a disciple of the Cartesian philosophy, wrote her life, and reduced her doctrines into a regular system. She made numerous proselytes, among whom were many men of ability.

Though wealthy, she was by no means benevolent, or even commonly charitable; and she is said to have exercised over her family and servants, "a government as cruel as that of the Sicilian court," and to have justified herself, by maintaining that anger was the love of justice and true virtue, and alleging the severities used by the prophets and apostles.

BOVETTE DE BLEMUR, JACQUELINE,

Embraced early a religious life, and died at Chatillon, in 1696, aged seventy-eight. She wrote several theological works.

BOVEY, CATHARINE,

MARRIED, at fifteen, William Bovey, an English gentleman of opulence and respectability in Gloucestershire. To great beauty, she added the highest degree of benevolence, and all the gentle virtues of private life; so that she is deservedly extolled by Sir Richard Steele, in his dedication of the two volumes of his "Ladies' Library." She was left a widow at the age of twenty-two, and died at Haxley, in 1728, aged fifty-seven. Her maiden name was Riches.

BRACHMAN, LOUISE,

BORN in 1778, at Rochlitz. She was an intimate friend of Schiller and Novalis, and contributed, in 1799, over the signature of Louise, a number of poems to the Musen-Almenach (Calendar of the Muses), a periodical edited by those two authors. She was of a very uneven temperament, and subject to long-continued fits of melancholy. Disappointed in two different affairs of the heart, and afterwards in some other expectations of minor importance, she committed suicide, in 1822, while on a visit to some friends in Italy, by drowning herself in the river Saale. She has written, "Poems," published in Dessau and Leipzig, 1800; "Blossoms of Romance," Vienna, 1816; "The Ordeal," "Novelettes," "Scenes from Reality," and "Errors."

BRADSTREET, ANNE,

DAUGHTER of Thomas Dudley, governor of Massachusetts from 1634 to 1650, and wife of Simon Bradstreet, is entitled to remembrance as the author of the first volume of poetry published in America. Her work was dedicated to her father, and published in 1642. The title is, "Several Poems, compiled with great variety of wit and learning, full of delight; wherein especially is contained a complete discourse and description of the four elements, constitutions, ages of man, seasons of the year, together with an exact epitome of the three first monarchies, viz: the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman Commonwealth, from the beginning to the end of their last king, with divers other pleasant and serious poems. By a Gentlewoman of New England." She received for her poetical talents the title of the Tenth Muse, and the most distinguished men of the day were her friends, and the admirers of her genius. When we examine the poetry of that period, and see the miserable attempts at rhyme, made by the male writers, we must believe Mrs. Bradstreet was "as learned as her coadjutors, and vastly more poetical." The preface to the third edition, printed in 1658, thus sketches her character: "It is the work of a woman honoured and esteemed where she lives for her gracious demeanour, her eminent parts, her pious conversation, her courteous disposition, her exact diligence in her place, and discreet management of her family occasions; and more so, these poems are the fruits of a few hours curtailed from her sleep, and other refreshments."

When Mrs. Bradstreet wrote her poems, she could have had no models, save Chaucer and Spenser. Milton had not become known as a writer when her work was published, and Shakespeare was not read by the Puritans of New England. On the whole, we think Anne Bradstreet fairly entitled to the place assigned her by one of her biographers, "at the head of the American poets of that time." She died in 1672, aged sixty. Mrs. Bradstreet was mother of eight children, whom she trained with great discretion.

EXTRACTS FROM "LINES," ADDRESSED TO HER HUSBAND.

If ever two were one, then surely we;
If ever man were loved by wife, then thee;
If ever wife were happy in a man,
Compare with me, ye women, if ye can.

* * * * *
Phœbus, make haste—the day's too long—begone!
The silent night's the fittest time for moan.
But stay, this once—unto my suit give ear—
And tell my griefs in either hemisphere:
If in thy swift career thou canst make stay,
I crave this boon, this errand by the way:
Commend me to the man, more loved than life:
Show him the sorrows of his widowed wife;
And if he love, how can he there abide?
My interest's more than all the world beside. . .
Tell him the countless steps that thou dost trace
That once a day thy spouse thou mayst embrace,
And when thou canst not meet by loving mouth,
Thy rays afar salute her from the south;
But for one month, I see no day, poor soul!
Like those far situate beneath the pole,
Which day by day long wait for thy arise—
O how they joy when thou dost light the skies!
Tell him I would say more, but can not well;
Oppressed minds abruptest tales do tell.
Now part with double speed, mark what I say,
By all our loves conjure him not to stay!

* * * * *
How soon, my dear, death may my steps attend,
How soon't may be thy lot to lose thy friend,
We both are ignorant; yet love bids me
These farewell lines to recommend to thee.
That when that knot's untied that made us one,
I may seem thine, who in effect am none.
And if I see not half my days that's due,
What Nature would, God grant to yours and you;
The many faults that well you know I have
Let be interred in my oblivious grave;

If any worth or virtue is in me,
Let that live freshly in thy memory;
And when thou feel'st no grief, as I no harms,
Yet love thy dead, who long lay in thine arms:
And when thy loss shall be repaid, with gains,
Look to my little babes, my dear remains.

EXTRACTS FROM "CONTEMPLATIONS."

Then higher on the glistening sun I gaz'd,
Whose beams were shaded by the leavie tree,
The more I look'd, the more I grew amaz'd,
And softly said, what glory's like to thee?
Soul of this world, this Universe's eye,
No wonder, some made thee a deity;
Had I not better known, (alas) the same had I.

Thou as a bridegroom from thy chamber rushest,
And as a strong man, joyes to run a race,
The morn doth usher thee, with smiles and blushes,
The earth reflects her glances in thy face.
Birds, insects, animals with vegetive,
Thy heart from death and dulness doth revive:
And in the darksome womb of fruitful nature dive.

Thy swift annual, and diurnal course,
Thy daily straight, and yearly oblique path,
Thy pleasing fervour, and thy scorching force,
All mortals here the feeling knowledge hath.
Thy presence makes it day, thy absence night,
Quaternal seasons caused by thy might:
Hail creature, full of sweetness, beauty and delight

Art thou so full of glory, that no eye
Hath strength, thy shining rayes once to behold?
And is thy splendid throne erect so high?
As to approach it, can no earthly mould.
How full of glory then must thy Creator be,
Who gave this bright light lustre unto thee!
Admir'd, ador'd for ever, be that Majesty.

Silent alone, where none or saw, or heard,
In pathless paths I lead my wandering feet,
My humble eyes to lofty skyes I rear'd
To sing some song, my mazed Muse thought meet.
My great Creator I would magnifie,
That nature had, thus decked liberally:
But Ah, and Ah, again, my imbecility!

I heard the merry grasshopper then sing,
The black clad cricket, bear a second part.
They kept one tune and plaid on the same string,
Seeming to glory in their little art.
Shall creatures abject, thus their voices raise?
And in their kind resound their Maker's praise:
Whilst I as mute, can warble forth no higher laye

When present times look back to ages past,
And men in being fancy those are dead,
It makes things gone perpetually to last,
And calls back months and years that long since fled.
It makes a man more aged in conceit,
Than was Methuselah, or's grand-sire great:
While of their persons and their acts his mind doth treat,

* * * * *
When I behold the heavens as in their prime,
And then the earth (though old) still clad in green,
The stones and trees, insensible of time,
Nor age nor wrinkle on their front are seen;
If winter come, and greenness then do fade,
A Spring returns, and they more youthful made;
But man grows old, lies down, remains where once he's laid

By birth more noble than those creatures all,
Yet seems by nature and by custom cursed,
No sooner born, but grief and care make fall
That state obliterate he had at first.
Nor youth, nor strength, nor wisdom spring again,
Nor habitations long their names retain,
But in oblivion to the final day remain.

Shall I then praise the heavens, the trees, the earth,
Because their beauty and their strength last longer
Shall I wish their, or never to had birth,
Because they're bigger, and their bodies stronger?

Nay, they shall darken, perish, fade and dye,
And when unmade, soever shall they lye,
But man was made for endless immortality.

"ELEGY" ON THE DEATH OF A GRANDCHILD WHO DIED IN 1665.

Farewell, dear child, my heart 's too much content,
Farewell, sweet babe, the pleasure of mine eye,
Farewell, fair flower, that for a space was lent,
Then ta'en away into eternity.
Blest babe, why should I once bewail thy fate,
Or sigh, the days so soon were terminate,
Sith thou art settled in an everlasting state?

By nature, trees do rot when they are grown,
And plums and apples thoroughly ripe do fall,
And corn and grass are in their season mown,
And time brings down what is both strong and tall.
But plants new set, to be eradicate,
And buds new blown, to have so short a date,
Is by His hand alone, that nature guides, and fate.

BRAMBATI, EMILIA,

OF Bergamo, was the wife of Ezechiello Solza, distinguished for her poetic talent, and for her eloquence. She became the pleader for the life of her brother, condemned to death by the Tribunal of Venice, and drew tears from the eyes of all the bystanders. Some of her poems remain.

BRAMBATI, ISOTTA,

OF Bergamo, was a good classical scholar, and understood all the polite languages of Europe. She wrote poetry with great elegance; and is said to have managed several law-suits, pleading them herself, in the Senate of Milan, with consummate ability, and, what is more extraordinary, without being thought ridiculous. She was the wife of Girolamo Grumelli. She died in 1586. Some of her letters and poems were published by Comir Ventura, in Bergamo, in 1587.

BRATTON, MARTHA,

A NATIVE of Rowan county, N. Carolina, married William Bratton, of South Carolina, and, during the Revolution, a colonel in the American army. While her husband was engaged with his troops away from home, Mrs. Bratton was often left to defend herself and the stores entrusted to her charge. At one time, she blew up the ammunition left under her care, when she saw that otherwise it would fall into the hands of the enemy, and boldly avowed the deed, that no one else might suffer for her act. When threatened with instant death by a British soldier, if she persisted in refusing to give information concerning her husband's retreat, she continued firm in her resolution. Being rescued by the intervention of an officer, she repaid the obligation by saving him from death, when taken prisoner by the American party, and by entertaining him at her house till he was exchanged. She died in 1816.

BREESE, MARY,

A SINGULAR character, was born at Lynn, in Norfolk, England, in 1721. She regularly took out a shooting license, kept hounds, and was a sure shot. She died in 1799. By her desire, her dogs and favourite mare were killed at her death and buried in the grave with her.

BREGY, CHARLOTTE SAUMAISE DE
CHAZAN, COMTESSE DE,

NIECE of the learned Saumaise (Salmasius), was one of the ladies of honour to queen Anne of Austria. She was distinguished for her beauty and wit, both of which she preserved to an advanced age; she died at Paris, April 13th, 1693, aged seventy-four. She wrote a collection of letters and verses in 1688, in which we meet with many ingenious thoughts; her poems turn almost entirely on metaphysical love, which employed her mind more than her heart. But there are several pieces on other subjects. In one of them, she gives the following portrait of herself: "I am fond of praise; and therefore return it with interest to those from whom I receive it. I have a proud and scornful heart; but this does not prevent me from being gentle and civil. I never oppose the opinions of any; but I must own that I never adopt them to the prejudice of my own. I may say with truth that I am naturally modest and discreet, and that pride always takes care to preserve these qualities in me. I am indolent; I never seek pleasure and diversions, but when my friends take more pains than I do to procure them for me, I feel myself obliged to appear very gay at them, though I am not so in fact. I am not much given to intrigue; but if I were involved in one, I think I should certainly conduct myself off with prudence and discretion. I am constant, even to obstinacy, and secret to excess. In order to form a friendship with me, all advances must be made by the other party; but I amply compensate this trouble in the end; for I serve my friends with all the warmth usually employed in selfish interests. I praise and defend them, without once consenting to what I may hear against them. I have not virtue enough to be free from all desire of the goods of fortune and honours; but I have too much for pursuing any of the ways that commonly lead to them. I act in the world conformably to what it ought to be, and too little according to what it is." Her personal appearance she also describes as attractive; which all contemporary writers confirm, and therefore she might mention it without vanity. She corresponded with Henrietta, queen of England; with Christina of Sweden; and with most of the illustrious characters of Europe.

BRENTANO, SOPHIA,

(HER maiden name was Schubart,) was born in the year 1770, at Altenburg. She married, when quite a young girl, F. E. K. Thereau, professor at the University of Jena; in 1804, she was divorced from him, and married, in 1805, the author Clem. Brentano, with whom she lived in Frankford, and afterwards in Heidelberg, where she died in 1806. As a poetess, she evinced a lively and highly cultivated imagination, great harmony in versification, combined with a high polish in her compositions. She published two volumes of poetry, at Berlin, 1800, "Amanda and Edward," at Frankfort, 1803, Spanish and Italian novellettes, in 1804, and various other minor tales.

BRINVILLIERS, MARIE MARGUÉ-
RITE, MARCHIONESS DE,

WAS a woman whose singular atrocity gives her a species of infamous claim to notice in this collection. She was born at Paris in 1651, being the daughter of D'Aubrai, lieutenant-civil, of Paris, who married her to N. Gobelin, marquis of Brinvilliers. Although possessed of attractions to captivate lovers, she was for some time much attached to her husband, but at length became madly in love with a Gascon officer, named Goden St. Croix. This young man had been introduced to her by the marquis himself, who was adjutant of the regiment of Normandy. Her father, being informed of the affair, imprisoned the officer, who was a mere adventurer, in the Bastille, where he was detained a year. This punishment of her lover made the marchioness, apparently, more circumspect; but she nourished in her heart the most implacable hatred towards her father, and her whole family.

While St. Croix was in the Bastille, he learned, from an Italian named Exili, the art of composing the most subtle and mortal poisons; and the result, on his release, was the destruction, by this means, in concurrence with the marchioness, of her father, sister, and two brothers, all of whom were poisoned in the same year, 1670. During the whole time, the marchioness was visiting the hospitals, outwardly as a devotee, but, as was afterwards strongly suspected, really in order to try on the prisoners the effect of the poisons produced by her paramour.

The discovery of these monstrous criminals happened in a very extraordinary manner. St. Croix, while at work distilling poison, accidentally dropped the glass mask which he wore to prevent inhaling the noxious vapour; the consequence was his instantaneous death. As no one appeared to claim his effects, they fell into the hands of government, and the marchioness imprudently laid claim to a casket. She seemed so very anxious to obtain it, that the authorities ordered it to be opened, when it was found to be filled with packets of poison, with ticketed descriptions of the effects these would produce.

When this wicked woman was informed of the opening of the casket, she fled to England; from thence she went to Liege, where she was arrested and brought back to Paris. She was tried for the murder of her father, sister, and brothers, convicted, and condemned to be beheaded and then burned. In this dreadful condition she evinced remarkable courage, or rather insensibility. When she entered the chamber where she was to be put to the question by the torture of swallowing water, she observed three buckets-full provided, and exclaimed—"It is surely intended to drown me; for it is absurd to suppose one of my size can swallow all that."

She listened to her sentence without exhibiting either weakness or alarm, and showed no other emotion on her way to execution, than to request that she might be so placed as to see the officer who had apprehended her. She ascended the ladder, unaided and barefoot, and stood boldly up on the scaffold. What adds to the atrocity of this wretched woman's character, she was proved to have had connections with several persons suspected of the same crimes, and to have provided poisons for the use of others. Many persons of rank and power died suddenly about this period; and the investigation appeared likely to unveil so much guilt in high places, that it was from policy, though most unjustly and disgracefully, abandoned.

The marchioness of Brinvilliers seems to have been by nature inclined to wickedness. She acknowledged in her last confession, that at the age of seven she set fire to a house, urged by an inexplicable desire to commit a crime. Yet she made pretension to religion, went regularly to confession, and when arrested at Leige, a sort of general form was found in her possession, which sufficiently alluded to her criminality to form a strong presumption against her. She probably had more respect for the ceremonies of her faith than for the law of God.

BROOKE, FRANCES,

WHOSE maiden name was Moore, was the daughter of an English clergyman, and the wife of the Rev. John Brooke, rector of Colny in Norfolk, of St. Augustine in the city of Norwich, and chaplain to the garrison of Quebec. She was as remarkable for her gentleness and suavity of manners as for her literary talents. Her husband died on the 21st of January, 1789, and she herself expired on the 26th of the same month, at Sleaford, England, where she had retired to the house of her son, who had a rectorship in that country. Her first literary performance was "The Old Maid," a periodical work, begun in November, 1755, and continued every Saturday until about the end of July, 1756. In the same year she published "Virginia," a tragedy, with odes, pastorals, and translations. In the preface to this publication she assigns as a reason for its appearance, "that she was precluded from all hopes of ever seeing the tragedy brought upon the stage, by there having been two so lately on the same subject." Prefixed to this publication were proposals for printing by subscription a poetical translation, with notes, of "Il Pastor Fido," a work which was probably never completed.

In 1763, she published a novel called "The History of Lady Julia Mandeville," concerning the plan of which there were various opinions, though there seems to have been but one of the execution. It was read with much avidity and approbation. In the same year she published "Letters from Juliet, Lady Catesby, to her Friend Lady Henrietta Campley, translated from the French." She soon afterwards went to Canada with her husband, who was chaplain to the garrison at Quebec; and there saw those romantic scenes, so admirably painted in her next work, entitled "Emily Montague," a novel in four volumes, written in 1769. The next year she published "Memoirs of the Marquis de St. Folaix," in four volumes. On her return to England, accident brought her acquainted with Mrs. Yates, and an intimacy was formed that lasted as long as that lady lived; and when she died, Mrs. Brooke published an eulogy to her memory in the "Gentleman's Magazine." If we are not mistaken, Mrs. Brooke had, with Mrs. Yates, some share in the opera-house. She certainly had some share of the libellous abuse which the management of that theatre at that time produced. Her first play, Virginia, was refused by Garrick. After several years she tried her fortune once more at the theatre; but the tragedy she wrote had not the good fortune to please Mr. Garrick, whose rejection of it excited the authoress's resentment so much that she took a severe revenge on him, in a novel published in 1777, in two volumes, called "The Excursion." This invective she afterwards regretted and retracted. In 1771, she translated "Elements of the History of England, from the invasion of the Romans to the reign of George II., from the abbé Millot," in four volumes. In 1781, she wrote a tragedy called "The Siege of Sinope," which was acted at Covent Garden, but added little to her reputation; it wanted energy and originality. Her next and most popular piece was "Rosina," acted at Covent Garden in 1782. Few pieces have been equally successful. The simplicity of the story, the elegance of the language, and the excellence of the music, caused it to be admired for a long time. Her last work was "Marian," acted in 1788, at Covent Garden, with some success, but very much inferior to Rosina.

BROOKS, MARIA,

Known as a poetess under the name (given to her by Mr. Southey) of Maria del Occidente, was descended from a Welsh family, settled at Medford, in Massachusetts. Her maiden name was Gowen. She was born about 1795, and early displayed uncommon powers of mind. She had rather favourable opportunities of education, yet her own genius was her best teacher. When quite young, Maria Gowen married Mr. Brooks, a merchant of Boston. A few years after their marriage he lost the greater part of his property, and Mrs. Brooks resorted to poetry for occupation and amusement. In 1820, she published "Judith, Esther, and other Poems," which show considerable genius. Mr. Brooks dying in 1823, his widow went to reside with her relations in Cuba, where she wrote her principal work, "Zophiel, or the Bride of Seven," which was published by her at London, during a visit that she made to England, in 1833. Part of the time that she spent in England was passed by her at the residence of Robert Southey, at Keswick, who appreciated her genius very highly. In 1834 Mrs. Brooks returned to the United States. In 1843, she wrote for private circulation, "Idomea, or the Vale of the Yumari," being simply her own history under a different name. In the same year Mrs. Brooks returned to Cuba, to take charge of the estates left her by her uncle. She died at Matanzas, in November, 1845.

The plot of "Zophiel, or the Bride of Seven," was undoubtedly borrowed from the Book of Tobit, in the Apocrypha, and may be fully understood by reading that curious story. Sara, the heroine in Tobit, is married to seven husbands, successively, who all die on entering the bridal chamber, each one "being killed by Asmodeus, an evil spirit." At last Tobias, son of Tobit, is taken under the care of "Raphael that was an angel," and instructed how to overcome the evil spirit. Tobias marries Sara, and drives off Asmodeus by means of "a smoke" made of the liver and heart of a fish—"The which smell when the evil spirit had smelled, he fled into the utmost parts of Egypt, and the angel bound him."

Mrs. Brooks has, however, displayed much artistic skill, as well as poetical talent, cultivated taste, and literary research, in managing these materials of her poem. "The Bride of Seven" has many beautiful passages; the descriptions are gorgeous and glowing; there is thrilling incident and burning passion; but it lacks nature, simplicity, and true feeling. It excites the fancy, leaving the heart unmoved, comparatively; therefore the poem is deficient in that kind of interest which insures popularity: though praised by critics, it will never be read by the people. The minor poems of Mrs. Brooks are finished with much care; some of these evince the deep affections of woman's heart with great pathos and beauty. The "Ode to the Departed" is one of the last of her poems.

ODE TO THE DEPARTED.

"Con Vistas del Cielo."

THE dearth is sore: the orange leaf is curled,
There's dust upon the marble o'er thy tomb,
My Edgar, fair and dear;
Though the fifth sorrowing year
Hath past, since first I knew thine early doom,
I see thee still, though death thy being hence hath hurled

I could not bear my lot, now thou art gone —
With heart o'er-softened by the many tears
Remorse and grief have drawn —
Save that a gleam, a dawn,
(Haply, of that which lights thee now,) appears,
To unveil a few fair scenes of life's next coming morn.

What—where is heaven? (earth's sweetest lips exclaim;)
 In all the holiest seers have writ or said,
 Blurred are the pictures given:
 We know not what is heaven,
 Save by those views, mysteriously spread,
 When the soul looks afar by light of her own flame.

Yet all our spirits, while on earth so faint,
 By glimpses dim, discern, conceive, or know,
 The Eternal Power can mould
 Real as fruits or gold—
 Bid the celestial, roseate matter glow,
 And forms more perfect smile than artists carve or paint.

To realize every creed, conceived
 In mortal brain, by love and beauty charmed,
 Even like the ivory maid
 Who, as Pygmalion prayed,
 Oped her white arms, to life and feeling warmed,
 Would lightly task the power of life's great Chief believed.

If Grecian Phidias, in stone like this,
 Thy tomb, could do so much, what can not he
 Who from the cold, coarse clod,
 By reckless labourer trod,
 Can call such tints as meeting seraphs see, [kiss?
 And give them breath and warmth like true love's soulfelt

Wild fears of dark annihilation, go!
 Be warm, ye veins, now blackening with despair!
 Years o'er thee have revolved,
 My first-born—thou'rt dissolved—
 All—every tint—save a few ringlets fair—
 Still, if thou didst not live, how could I love thee so?

Quick as the warmth which darts from breast to breast,
 When lovers, from afar, each other see,
 Haply, thy spirit went,
 Where mine would fain be sent,
 To take a heavenly form, designed to be
 Meet dwelling for the soul thine azure eye exprest.

Thy deep-blue eye! say, can heaven's bliss exceed
 The joy of some brief moments tasted here?
 Ah! could I taste again—
 Is there a mode of pain
 Which, for such guerdon, could be deemed severe?
 Be ours the forms of heaven, and let me bend and bleed!

If one be lost, another serves as well;
 Another mantle, or another fair,
 As well may be his own
 If one dies his—alone
 He sighs not long;—enter his home, and there,
 When past one little year, another fair will dwell.

Or see yon smiling Creole—her black hair
 Braided and glittering, with one lover's gold:
 Ere the quick flower has grown
 O'er where he sleeps alone,
 Already to some other lover sold,
 Or given, what both call love, and he's content to share.

Better for those who love this world, to be Even as such: a pure, pure flame, intense,
 Edgar, as thine, consumes
 The cheek its light illumines;
 And he whose heart enshrines such flame, must hence,
 And join with it, betimes, its own eternity.

For masculine or feminine gave naught
 Of fuel to the hallowed fire, that burned
 And urged thee on, of life.
 Reckless, amid the strife
 For worldly wealth, that better had been spurned:
 Thy happiness and love, alas! were all I sought.

How could I kneel and kiss the hand of Fate,
 Were it but mine to decorate some hall—
 Here, where the soil I tread
 Colours my feet with red—
 Far down these isles, to hear your voices call,
 Then haste to hear and tell what happ'd while separate!

Beautiful isles! beneath the sunset skies
 Tall silver-shafted palm trees rise between Full orange trees that shade
 The living colonnade;
 Alas! how sad, how sickening is the scene
 That were ye at my side would be a paradise!

E'en one of those cool caves which, light and dry,
 In many a leafy hill-side, near this spot,
 Seem as by Nature made
 For shelter and for shade
 To such as bear a homeless wanderer's lot,
 Were home enough for me, could those I mourn be nigh

Palace or cave (where 'neath the blossom and lime Winter lies hid with wreaths) alike may be,
 If love and taste unite,
 A dwelling for delight,
 And kings might leave their silken courts, to see
 O'er such wild, garnished grot, the grandiflora climb.

Thus, thus, doth quick-eyed Fancy fondly wait
 The pauses of my deep remorse between;
 Before my anxious eyes
 'Tis thus her pictures rise;
 They show what is not, yet what might have been;
 Angels, why came I not?—why have I come too late?

The cooling beverage—strengthening draught—as craved
 The needs of both, could but these hands have given;
 Could I have watched the glow—
 The pulse, too quick, or slow—
 My earnest, fond, reiterate prayers to Heaven,
 Some angel might have come, besought, returned, and saved.

To stay was imbecility—nay, more—
 'T was crime—how yearned my panting heart to see
 When, by mere words delayed,
 'Gainst the strong wish, I stayed,
 (Trifling with that which inly spoke to me.)
 And longed, and hoped, and feared, till all I feared was o'er!

Mild, pitying George, when maple-leaves were red
 O'er Ladaüanna* in his much-loved north,
 Breathed here his last farewell—
 And when the tears that fell
 From April, called Mohecan† violets forth,
 Edgar, as following his, thy friendly spirit fled.

Now, side by side, 'neath cross and tablet white
 Is laid, sweet brothers, all of you that's left;
 Yet, all the tropic dew
 Can damp, would seem not you:
 Your finer particles from earth are left,
 Haply, (and so I'll hope,) for lovelier forms of light.

Myriads of beings, (for the whole that's known
 In all this world's combined philosophy.)
 The eternal will obeyed,
 To finish what was made,
 When, warm with new-breathed life, new earth and sea,
 Returned the smile of him who blessed them from his throne.

Such beings, haply, hovering near us now,
 When flesh or flowers in beauty fade or fall.
 Gather each precious tint
 Once seen to glow and glint,
 With fond economy to gladden all:
 Heaven's hands, howe'er profuse, no atom's loss allow.

Yet, brothers, spirits, loiter if ye may
 A little while, and look on all I do—
 Oh! loiter for my sake,
 Ere other tasks ye take,
 Toward all I should do influence my view,
 Then haste, to hear the spheres chime with heaven's favourite lay.

* Ladaüanna, the aboriginal name of the St. Lawrence.
 † Mohecan, the aboriginal name of the Hudson.

Go, hand in hand, to regions new and fair,
In shapes and colours for the scene arrayed —
With looks as bland and dear
As charms, by glimpses, here.
Receive divine commissions; follow — aid
Those legions formed in heaven for many a guardian care.

By every sigh, and throb, and painful throe,
Remembered but to heighten the delight
That crowns the advancing state
Of souls emancipate —
Oh! as I think of you, at lonely night,
Say to my heart, ye're blest, and I can bear my wo.

HYMN.

SIRE, Maker, Spirit, who alone canst know
My soul, and all the deep remorse that's there —
Ask no mitigation of my wo;
Yet pity me, and give me strength to bear!

Remorse?—ah! not for ill designedly done:
To look on pain, to me is pain severe;
Yet, yet, dear forms which Death from me hath won,
Had Love been Wisdom, haply were ye here!

Much have I suffered; yet this form, unscathed,
Declares thy kind protection, by its thrift:
With secret dew the wounded plant is bathed;
My ills are my desert, my good thy gift.

Three years are flown since my sore heart bereft
Hath mourned for two, ta'en by the powers on high,
Nor tith nor atom that is fair is left
Beneath the marble where their relics lie.

Yet no oblivious veil is o'er them cast:
Blent with my blood, the sympathetic glow
Burns brighter now their mortal lives are past,
Than when, on earth, I felt their joy and wo.

Oh! may their spirits, disembodied, come,
And strong though secret influence dispense—
Pitying the sorrows of an earthly doom,
And smoothing pain with sweet beneficence.

Oh! cover them with forms so made to meet
The models of their souls, that, when they see,
They cast themselves in beauty at thy feet,
In all the heaven of grateful ecstasy

Methinks I see them, side by side, in love,
Like brothers of the zodiac, all around
Diffusing light and fragrance, as they move
Harmonious as the spheric music's sound.

And may these forms in warm and rosy sleep,
(In some fair dwelling for such forms assigned,)
Lie, while o'er air, earth, sea, their spirits sweep,
Quick as the changeful glance of thought and mind

This fond ideal which my grief relieves,
Father, beneath thy throne may live, may be:
For more than all my feeble sense conceives,
Thy hand can give in blest reality.

Sire, Maker, Spirit! source of all that's fair!
Howe'er my poor words be unworthy thee,
Oh! be not weary of the imperfect prayer
Breathed from the fervor of a wretch like me!

THE MOON OF FLOWERS.

Oh, moon of flowers! sweet moon of flowers!*
Why dost thou mind me of the hours
Which flew so softly on that night
When last I saw and felt thy light?

Oh, moon of flowers! thou moon of flowers!
Would thou couldst give me back those hours
Since which a dull, cold year has fled,
Or show me those with whom they sped!

Oh, moon of flowers! oh, moon of flowers!
In scenes afar were passed those hours,
Which still with fond regret I see,
And wish my heart could change like thee!

* The savages of the northern part of America sometimes count by moons. May they call the moon of flowers.

TO NIAGARA.

SPIRIT of Homer! thou whose song has rung
From thine own Greece to this supreme abode
Of Nature — this great fane of Nature's God —
Breathe on my brain! oh, touch the fervid tongue
Of a fond votaress kneeling on the sod!

Sublime and Beautiful! your chapel's here—
Here, 'neath the azure dome of heaven, ye're wed;
Here, on this rock, which trembles as I tread,
Your blended sorcery claims both pulse and tear,
Controls life's source, and reigns o'er heart and head.

Terrific, but, oh, beautiful abyss!
If I should trust my fascinated eye,
Or hearken to thy maddening melody,
Sense, form, would spring to meet thy white foam's kiss
Be lapped in thy soft rainbows once, and die!

Colour, depth, height, extension — all unite
To chain the spirit by a look intense!
The dolphin in his clearest seas, or thence Ta'en, for some queen, to deck of ivory white,
Dies not in changeful tints more delicately bright.

Look, look! there comes, o'er yon pale green expanse,
Beyond the curtain of this altar vast,
A glad young swan; the smiling beams that cast
Light from her plumes, have lured her soft advance;
She nears the fatal brink: her graceful life has past!

Look up! nor her fond, foolish fate disdain:
An eagle rests upon the wind's sweet breath;
Feels he the charm? woos he the scene beneath?
He eyes the sun; nerves his dark wing again;
Remembers clouds and storms, yet flies the lovely death

"Niagara! wonder of this western world,
And half the world beside! hail, beauteous queen
Of cataracts!" — an angel, who had been
O'er heaven and earth, spoke thus, his bright wings furled
And knelt to Nature first, — on this wild cliff unseen.

SONG.

Day, in melting purple dying,
Blossoms, all around me sighing,
Fragrance, from the lilies straying,
Zephyr, with my ringlets playing,
Ye but waken my distress;
I am sick of loneliness.

Thou, to whom I love to hearken,
Come, ere night around me darken;
Though thy softness but deceive me,
Say thou'rt true, and I'll believe thee;
Veil, if ill, thy soul's intent—
Let me think it innocent!

Save thy toiling, spare thy treasure:
All I ask is friendship's pleasure;
Let the shining ore lie darkling,
Bring no gem in lustre sparkling:
Gifts and gold are naught to me,
I would only look on thee!

Tell to thee the high-wrought feeling,
Ecstasy but in revealing;
Paint to thee the deep sensation,
Rapture in participation,
Yet but torture, if compest
In a lone, unfriended breast.

Absent still! Ah! come and bless me!
Let these eyes again caress thee;
Once, in caution, I could fly thee:
Now, I nothing could deny thee;
In a look if death there be,
Come, and I will gaze on thee!

FRIENDSHIP.

To meet a friendship such as mine,
Such feelings must thy soul refine
As are not oft of mortal birth:
'Tis love without a stain of earth,
Fratello del mio cor.

Looks are its food, its nectar signs,
Its couch the lips, its throne the eyes,
The soul its breath: and so possess,
Heaven's raptures reign in mortal breast,
Fratello del mio cor.

Though Friendship be its earthly name,
Purely from highest heaven it came;
'Tis seldom felt for more than one,
And scorns to dwell with Venus' son,
Fratello del mio cor.

Him let it view not, or it dies
Like tender hues of morning skies,
Or morn's sweet flower of purple glow,
When sunny beams too ardent grow,
Fratello del mio cor.

A charm o'er every object plays;
All looks so lovely, while it stays,
So softly forth in rosier tides
The vital flood extatic glides,
Fratello del mio cor.

That, wrung by grief to see it part
A very life-drop leaves the heart:
Such drop, I need not tell thee, fell,
While bidding it, for thee, farewell!
Fratello del mio cor.

PRAYER.

SIRE of the universe—and me—
Dost thou reject my midnight prayer!
Dost thou withhold me even from thee,
Thus writhing, struggling 'gainst despair
Thou knowest the source of feeling's gush,
Thou knowest the end for which it flows
Then, if thou bid'st the tempest rush,
Ah! heed the fragile bark it throws!

Pain would my heaving heart be still—
But Pain and Tumult mock at rest:
Fain would I meekly meet thy will,
And kiss the barb that tears my breast.
Weak I am formed, I can no more—
Weary I strive, but find not aid;
Prone on thy threshold I deplore,
But ah! thy succour is delayed.

The burning, beauteous orb of day,
Amid its circling host upborne,
Smiles, as life quickens in its ray;
What would it, were thy hand withdrawn!—
Scorch!—devastate the teeming whole
Now glowing with its warmth divine,
Spirit, whose powers of peace control
Great Nature's heart, oh! pity mine!

Extracts from Zophiel.

DESCRIPTION OF EGLA.

With unassured yet graceful step advancing,
The light vermilion of her cheek more warm
For doubtful modesty; while all were glancing
Over the strange attire that well became such form.
To lend her space, the admiring band gave way;
The sandals on her silvery feet were blue;
Of saffron tint her robe, as when young day
Spreads softly o'er the heavens, and tints the trembling dew.
Light was that robe as mist; and not a gem
Or ornament impedes its wavy fold,
Long and profuse, save that, above its hem,
'Twas broider'd with pomegranate wreath, in gold.
And, by a silken cincture, broad and blue,
In shapely guise about the waist confined,
Blent with the curls that, of a lighter hue,
Half floated, waving in their length behind;
The other half, in braided tresses twined,
Was deck'd with rows of pearls, and sapphire's azure too.
Arranged with curious skill to imitate
The sweet acacia's blossoms; just as live
And droop those tender flowers in natural state;
And so the trembling gems seem'd sensitive,

And pendent, sometimes touch'd her neck; and there
Seem'd shrinking from its softness as alive.
And round her arms, flour-white and round and fair,
Slight bandelets were twined of colours five,
Like little rainbows seemly on those arms;
None of that court had seen the like before,
Soft, fragrant, bright—so much like heaven her charms,
It scarce could seem idolatry to adore.
He who beheld her hand forgot her face;
Yet in that face was all beside forgot;
And he who, as she went, beheld her pace,
And locks profuse, had said, "Nay, turn thee not."
Placed on a banquet couch beside the king,
'Mid many a sparkling guest no eye forbore;
But, like their darts, the warrior princes fling
Such looks as seem'd to pierce, and scan her o'er and o'er
Nor met alone the glare of lip and eye—
Charms, but not rare: the gazer stern and cool,
Who sought but faults, nor fault or spot could spy;
In every limb, joint, vein, the maid was beautiful,
Save that her lip, like some bud-bursting flower,
Just scorn'd the bounds of symmetry, perchance,
But by its rashness gain'd an added power,
Heightening perfection to luxuriance.
But that was only when she smiled, and when Dissolved the intense expression of her eye;
And had her spirit love first seen her then,
He had not doubted her mortality.

MELES AND EGLA CONTRASTED.

She meekly stood. He fasten'd round her arms
Rings of refulgent ore; low and apart
Murmuring, "So, beauteous captive, shall thy charms
For ever thrall and clasp thy captive's heart."
The air's light touch seem'd softer as she moved,
In languid resignation; his quick eye
Spoke in black glances how she was approved,
Who shrank reluctant from its ardency.
'Twas sweet to look upon the goodly pair
In their contrasted loveliness: her height
Might almost vie with his, but heavenly fair,
Of soft proportion she, and sunny hair;
He, cast in manliest mould, with ringlets murk as night
And oft her drooping and resigned blue eye
She'd wistful raise to read his radiant face;
But then, why shrunk her heart?—a secret sigh
Told her it most required what there it could not trace.

ZOPHIEL LISTENING WHILE EGLA SINGS.

His wings were folded o'er his eyes; severe
As was the pain he'd borne from wave and wind,
The dubious warning of that being dear,
Who met him in the lightning, to his mind
Was torture worse; a dark presentiment
Came o'er his soul with paralyzing chill,
As when Fate vaguely whispers her intent
To poison mortal joy with sense of coming ill.
He search'd about the grove with all the care
Of trembling jealousy, as if to trace,
By track or wounded flower, some rival there;
And scarcely dared to look upon the face
Of her he loved, lest it some tale might tell
To make the only hope that soothed him vain:
He hears her notes in numbers die and swell,
But almost fears to listen to the strain
Himself had taught her, lest some hated name
Had been with that dear gentle air enwreathed,
While he was far; she sighed—he, nearer came—
Oh, transport! Zophiel was the name she breathed,

MORNING.

How beauteous art thou, O thou morning sun!—
The old man, feebly tottering forth, admires
As much thy beauty, now life's dream is done,
As when he moved exulting in his fires.
The infant strains his little arms to catch
The rays that glance about his silken hair;
And Luxury hangs her amber lamps, to match
Thy face, when turn'd away from bower and palace fair
Sweet to the lip the draught, the blushing fruit:
Music and perfumes mingle with the soul;
How thrills the kiss, when feeling's voice is mute!
And light and beauty's tints enhance the whole.

Yet each keen sense were dulness but for thee :
 Thy ray to joy, love, virtue, genius, warns;
 Thou never weariest ; no inconstancy
 But comes to pay new homage to thy charms.
 How many lips have sung thy praise, how long !
 Yet, when his slumbering harp he feels thee woo,
 The pleased bard pours forth another song,
 And finds in thee, like love, a theme for ever new.
 Thy dark-eyed daughters come in beauty forth,
 In thy near realms ; and, like their snow-wreaths fair,
 The bright-hair'd youths and maidens of the north
 Smile in thy colours when thou art not there.
 'Tis there thou bid'st a deeper ardor glow,
 And higher, purer reveries complete ;
 As drops that farthest from the ocean flow,
 Refining all the way, from springs the sweetest.
 Haply, sometimes, spent with the sleepless night,
 Some wretch, impassion'd, from sweet morning's breath,
 Turns his hot brow, and sickens at thy light ;
 But Nature, ever kind, soon heals or gives him death

AMBITION.

Wo to thee, wild Ambition ! I employ
 Despair's low notes thy dread effects to tell.
 Born in high heaven, her peace thou could'st destroy,
 And, but for thee, there had not been a hell.
 Through the celestial domes thy clarion peal'd ;
 Angels, entranced, beneath thy banners ranged,
 And straight were fiends ; hurld from the shrinking field,
 They waked in agony to wait the change.
 Darting through all her veins, the subtle fire,
 The world's fair mistress first inhaled thy breath ;
 To lot of higher beings learn'd to aspire ;
 Dared to attempt, and doom'd the world to death.
 The thousand wild desires, that still torment
 The fiercely-struggling soul where peace once dwelt,
 But perish'd ; feverish hope ; drear discontent,
 Impoisoning all possess'd—oh ! I have felt
 As spirits feel—yet not for man we moan :
 Scarce o'er the silly bird in state were he,
 That builds his nest, loves, sings the morn's return,
 And sleeps at evening, save by aid of thee.
 Fame ne'er had roused, nor Song her records kept,
 The gem, the ore, the marble breathing life,
 The pencil's colours, all in earth had slept,
 Now see them mark with death his victim's strife.
 Man found thee, Death : but Death and dull Decay
 Baffling, by aid of thee, his mastery prove ;
 By mighty works he swells his narrow day,
 And reigns, for ages, on the world he loves.
 Yet what the price ? With stings that never cease,
 Thou goad'st him on ; and, when too keen the smart,
 His highest dole he'd barter but for peace—
 Food thou wilt have, or feast upon his heart.

VIRTUE.

Virtue ! how many, as a lowly thing,
 Born of weak folly, scorn thee ! but thy name
 Alone they know ; upon thy soaring wing
 They'd fear to mount ; nor could thy sacred flame
 Burn in their baser hearts : the biting thorn,
 The flinty crag, flowers hiding, strew thy field ;
 Yet blest is he whose daring bides the scorn
 Of the frail, easy herd, and buckles on thy shield.
 Who says thy ways are bliss, trolls but a lay
 To lure the infant : if thy paths, to view,
 Were always pleasant, Crime's worst sons would lay
 Their daggers at thy feet, and, from mere sloth, pursue.

BROSSIER, MARTHA,

A VERY remarkable woman, who pretended to be possessed by the devil, and came near causing great disorders in France, about the end of the sixteenth century. Her father was a weaver at Romozantin ; but as Martha had the art of making a thousand distortions, he found it more profitable to ramble about with her, than to stay at home and mind his trade. Going from town to town, and showing his daughter, as a woman possessed by the devil, and needing the exorcism of the church, a great number of people resorted to him. The cheat was discovered at Orleans, in 1598, and all the priests of that diocese were forbidden to proceed to exorcisms on pain of excommunication. Nor was the bishop of Angiers more easily imposed on ; for, having invited Martha to dinner, he caused holy water to be brought to her instead of common water, and common water instead of holy water. Martha was not at all affected when she drank the holy water, but made a great many distortions when the common water was handed to her. Upon this the prelate called for the book of Exorcisms, and read the beginning of the Æneid. Martha, supposing the Latin verses to be the exorcism, put herself into violent postures, as though she were tormented by the devil. The bishop, convinced that she was an imposter, reproved her father in private, and advised him to go back with her to Romozantin. But Brossier, on the contrary, carried Martha to Paris, as a better theatre for her to act on, where he hoped to be supported by the credulous, and those whom the edict of Nantes had lately exasperated against the king. He pitched upon the church of St. Genevieve to act his farce in, and it succeeded wonderfully. The capuchins took up the business, and the contortions she made while the exorcists were performing their office, easily persuaded the people that she was a real demoniac. The thing was quickly noised all over the city, and the bishop appointed five of the most famous physicians in Paris to examine into it ; who unanimously reported, "that the devil had no hand in the matter, but that there was a great deal of imposture and some distemper in it."

Two days after, two of the physicians seemed to waver ; and before they answered the bishop, desired that the three others might be sent for, and time granted them till the next day. The trial came on, on the first of April, 1599, when father Seraphin renewed his exorcisms, and Martha her convulsions. She rolled her eyes, lolled out her tongue, and her whole body trembled ; and when the priest uttered the words, "Et homo factus est" (and was made man), she fell down, and tossed herself from the altar to the door of the chapel. Upon this, the exorcist cried out, "That if any one persisted in his incredulity, he needed only to fight that devil, and try to conquer him, if he durst venture his life." Marescot, one of the five physicians, accepted the challenge, took Martha by the throat, and bade her stop. She obeyed, saying that the evil spirit had left her, which father Seraphin confirmed ; but Marescot insisted that he had frightened the devil away. People were divided in their opinions about this woman, many believing her to be really a demoniac. At length, there being fears that she might cause a sedition, under pretence of the edict granted to the Protestants, Henry IV. enjoined the parliament of Paris to use their authority ; upon which the parliament ordered her to be confined. She was kept in prison for forty days ; during which time the best physicians examined her, and asserted that there was nothing supernatural in her case. In the mean time, the priests protested against this proceeding, saying that it was an encroachment on the privileges of the church, suggested by the heretics, and they were not silenced without much difficulty. On the 27th of May, Brossier was sent with his daughter to Romozantin, and forbidden to allow her to go abroad, without consent of the judge, under pain of corporal punishment. However, the father and daughter went, under the sanction and protection of Alexander de la Rochefoucauld, abbot of St. Martin's, into Auvergne, and to Avignon. The parliament of Paris summoned the abbot twice, and at last ordered that the revenues of his benefice should be seized for contempt of court; nevertheless, these people went to Rome. The bishop of Clermont, brother to the abbot, was suspected of having suggested this foolish undertaking to his brother, and was also deprived of his ecclesiastical revenues.

Henry IV. countermined them at Rome, so that the pope did nothing contrary to the sentence given by the parliament of Paris against the pretended demoniac. Not long after, the abbot died, it is said, of grief, for having undertaken so long a journey to make himself despised; and Martha and her father, forsaken by everybody, took refuge in the hospitals.

BROWN, CATHERINE,

Was a half-blooded Cherokee, born at Willis Valley, in the state of Alabama, about the year 1800. Her father's name, in the Indian language, was Yau-nu-gung-yah-ski, which is, "drowned by a bear." His English name, from his father, was John Brown. Her mother's name was Tsa-luh, in the Cherokee. Her English name was Sarah. They were people of property, and far above the level of their race, but still had no education—they could not speak a word of English. In 1816, the American Board of Foreign Missions sent the Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury to the Cherokee nation, for permission to establish a school in their territory. This was granted, and a school opened at Chickamaughah, within the territory of Tennessee. Catherine had heard of the school, although living at the distance of a hundred miles. She had learned to speak English, by residing at the house of a Cherokee friend, and could read in words of one syllable. She was now seventeen years of age, possessing very fine features, and of roseate complexion. She was decidedly the first of Cherokee beauties. She was modest, gentle and virtuous, with a sweet and affectionate disposition. From her wealth and beauty, she had been indulged as the pride of her parents; but she was the most docile of all the missionary pupils. Her progress was wonderfully rapid. In three months, she learned to read and write. This exceeds the progress of any one on record, in this or any other country. She soon became serious, and then religious; and was baptized in January, 1818. In June, 1820, she undertook to teach a school at Creek-path, near her father's house. She showed the greatest zeal in the cause of enlightening her countrywomen; for those of all ages came to learn something of her. She established religious exercises in her father's house, and brought many to Christianity. She was not contented with the measure of information she had acquired, but intended to push her studies into higher branches of knowledge, which she knew to exist; but while she was contemplating great things for herself and her nation, her health began to decline. She had probably injured herself by too close application to her studies. The change from flying through the groves and paddling the canoe to such a sedentary life, which she must have severely felt, and with her anxiety for the conversion of her family, particularly of a brother, who had died the preceding year, aggravated her disease. She bore her sickness with great resignation, and her piety made a deep impression on the hearts of all who knew and loved her. She died July 18th, 1823, and was buried at Creek-path, beside her dear brother John, whom she had been instrumental in converting to Christianity.

BROWNE, MARY ANNE,

Was born in 1812, at Maiden Head, Berkshire, England. She began to publish at the age of fifteen, and her poems even then showed great genius. Her father removed to Liverpool in 1830; and in 1842, Miss Browne was married to James Gray, a Scotch gentleman, and a nephew of James Hogg, the shepherd-poet. She died at Cork, in 1844. Her first work was "Mont-Blanc;" her others were, "Ada," "Repentance," "The Coronal," "Birth-Day Gift," "Ignatia," volume of "Sacred Poetry," and a great number of fugitive pieces, in prose as well as verse. She was as well known by those among whom she lived for her active benevolence, as for her poetical talents, being eminently pious, gentle, and benevolent. There is very little display of that sort of tender and flowery description, which may be termed sentimentalism, in the poetry of Miss Browne. She is reflective, serious, and, at times, sublime. Human nature, as its passions and changes, hopes, fears and joys, are displayed in books and in social life, seems to have been her study, rather than "running brooks" or "flowery meads." Hence, her style is modelled on the manner of the old bards; and though her poetry never reaches the height she evidently sought to attain, it is excellent for its pure taste and just sentiment; while a few instances of bold imagination show vividly the ardour of a fancy, which prudence and delicacy always controlled.

THE HEART AND LYRE.

She left her lyre within the hall,
When last she parted with her loved;
And still it hangs upon the wall—
He will not let it be removed.
Around that lyre of sweetest tone
She twined a wreath of roses fair;
And, though their lovely hue is gone,
The withered blossoms still are there.

No hand hath touched its silver string
Since last she waked a parting lay;
To sweep its chords would only bring
A tuneless tale of its decay.
And there it hangs, slow mouldering,
Its sweetness gone, its passion quelled;
And round it those dead roses cling,
Like withered hopes still fondly held.

And his sad mourning heart is such—
No happy feeling it affords;
It cannot bear the lightest touch
Of mirth upon its ruined chords.
Her name to him they ne'er repeat,
It would but waken thoughts of wo;
And though 't was once so very sweet,
He could not brook to hear it now.

He fixes on that lyre his eye
For hours, but never, never speaks;
Unmoved he gazes, silently,
And only starts when some chord breaks
It hath an echo in his heart,
Both mutely their bereavement bear:
In her affections both had part,
And both are left to perish there.

MAN'S LOVE.

When woman's eye grows dull,
And her cheek paleth,
When fades the beautiful,
Then man's love faileth;
He sits not beside her chair,
Clasps not her fingers,
Twines not the damp hair,
That o'er her brow lingers.

He comes but a moment in,
Though her eye lightens,
Though her cheek, pale and thin,
Feverishly brightens:
He stays but a moment near,
When that flash fadeth,
Though true affection's tear
Her soft eyelid shadeth.

He goes from her chamber straight
Into life's jostle,
He meets at the very gate
Business and bustle;
He thinks not of her within,
Silently sighing,
He forgets, in that noisy din,
That she is dying!

And when her young heart is still,
What though he mourneth,
Soon from his sorrow chill
Wearied he turneth,
Soon o'er her buried head
Memory's light setteth,
And the true-hearted dead
Thus man forgetteth!

WOMAN'S LOVE.

When man is waxing frail,
And his hand is thin and weak,
And his lips are parched and pale,
And wan and white his cheek,—
Oh, then doth woman prove
Her constancy and love!

She sitteth by his chair,
And holds his feeble hand;
She watcheth ever there,
His wants to understand;
His yet unspoken will
She hasteneth to fulfil.

She leads him, when the noon
Is bright o'er dale or hill,
And all things, save the tune
Of the honey bees, are still,
Into the garden bowers,
To sit 'midst herbs and flowers.

And when he goes not there,
To feast on breath and bloom,
She brings the posy rare
Into his darkened room;
And 'neath his weary head
The pillow smooth doth spread.

Until the hour when death
His lamp of life doth dim,
She never wearieth,
She never leaveth him;
Still near him night and day,
She meets his eye alway.

And when his trial 's o'er,
And the turf is on his breast,
Deep in her bosom's core
Lie sorrows unexpressed;
Her tears, her sighs, are weak.
Her settled grief to speak.

And though there may arise
Balm for her spirit's pain,
And though her quiet eyes
May sometimes smile again;
Still, still she must regret,—
She never can forget!

SHE WAS NOT MADE FOR HAPPINESS.

She was not made for happiness; her eyes
Were all too soft and deep,
Shade 'midst their radiance—as in lovely skies
Of April when they weep.
Yet when she spake with earnest eloquence,
The soul beneath them burned
As if her thoughts, concentrated and intense
Them into stars had turned.

She was not made for happiness; her brow
Had lines of early thought,
Traced e'en in childhood's sunny time, and now
Still daily deeper wrought.
And her sweet lips! they were not chiselled forms
Such as the sculptor knows,
The quivering smile, that saddens while it warms
Hung o'er their rose.

She was not made for happiness; too much
She felt for others' woe,
What to another's heart was but a touch,
Hers felt a cruel blow.
No tale of suffering, sorrow, or disease,
But found an echo there—
A wounded bird—a broken flower—e'en these
Her sympathy might share.

She was not made for happiness; and yet
Too much of ours she made.
With what unmingled anguish and regret
We saw her droop and fade!
Suffering had seemed her birthright dower,
Years of sad pain went o'er,
And yet we loved our frail and feeble flower
Even for this the more.

But standing by her dying bed, we felt
A better prospect dawn;
A mist around her spirit seemed to melt,
A curtain seemed withdrawn.
Bright happy glances from her eyes were sent
Up through the summer sky—
Ah! now she knew her own true element,
The better world on high.

And hopefully she spake, and happily
Of communings with God—
Of light and glory, that we could not see,
Upon the path she trod.
A setting sunbeam from her cloudy lot
At length broke brightly forth—
Oh! she was made for happiness—but not
The happiness of earth.

MEMORY.

"Rather than have one bliss forgot,
Be all my pains remembered too."

Moore.

And wouldst thou advise me to mix with the crowd,
And strive to efface the remembrance of years:
When, though mists and misfortune too often might shroud,
One smile hath repaid me for long hours of tears?

And say'st thou that memory only can feed
The fever that preys on the desolate heart?
Oh! thou knowest not, unless thou hast felt it indeed,
What joy the remembrance of joy can impart!

There are things that are past, which I would not forget
For the brightest of pleasures that earth can now give;
Their bliss had a mixture of sorrow, and yet
Like stars in the night of my bosom they live.
As on scenes we have passed, when by distance made soft,
We gaze the more fondly the further we go,
So, when years of our prime have gone over, how oft
We turn with delight to past pleasure and wo.

I once felt affections, more gentle and fond,
That shone o'er my soul, like the stars o'er the seas;
And think'st thou my spirit can ever despond,
While memory revives such emotions as these?
Oh! how many a smile and affectionate word
Remain through long years on the wo-blighted mind,
When joy hath shot over its wastes, like a bird
That hath left a bright gift from its plumage behind!

And what though the vision of happiness flies
From the heart that had cherished it fondly before?
Its flowers may be withered, but memory supplies
Their vigour, and fragrance, and beauty once more.
Oh! may my remembrances never depart!
May I still feel a bliss in beholding the past—
While memory over the gems of the heart
Shall, sentinel-like, keep her watch to the last.

KINDRED SPIRITS.

Drops from the ocean of eternity,
Rays from the centre of unfailing light,
Things that the human eye can never see,
Are spirits,—yet they dwell near human sight!
But as the shattered magnet's fragments still,
Though far apart, will to each other turn,—
So, in the breast imprisoned, spirits will
To meet their fellow spirits vainly burn;—
And yet not vainly. If the drop shall pass
Through streams of human sorrow undefiled,—
If the eternal ray that heavenly was,
To no false earthly fire be reconciled,—
The drop shall mingle with its native main,
The ray shall meet its kindred ray again!

JACQUES BALMOT.

(B was the first guide who ever reached the highest summit n M nt Blanc.)

The mountain reared a lofty brow,
Where never footstep trod,
It stood supreme o'er all below,
And seemed alone with God.
The lightnings played around its crest,
Nor touched its stainless snow;
The glaciers bound its mighty breast,
Seas where no currents flow!

And ever and anon the blast
Blew sternly round its head,
The clouds across its bosom vast
A changeful curtain spread;
But, changeless in its majesty,
The mountain was alone,
No voice might tell what there might be
Its secrets were its own.

He should have worshipped poetry
Who trod its summit first;
He should have had a painter's eye,
On whom the vision burst;
The vision of the lower world
Seen from that mountain's crown,
Where storms midst humbler rocks were curled,
To molehills dwindled down.

Yet 't was a lowly peasant's lot
To find the upward road.
He earliest trod that lofty spot
Where solitude abode

Methinks, if naught be felt beside,
There must have been delight,
And the strong gush of natural pride
When he had gained that height.

Thus truth sits throned in lonely power
For ages long and lone.
Till opens in some happy hour
A pathway towards her throne.
And let this thought the humble sway,
And hope their bosoms fill.
"The lowly often lead the way
Up to her sacred hill!"

BRUN, FREDERIKE CHRISTIANA,

A GERMAN poetess, whose maiden name was Münster, was born at Graefentoma, in the principality of Gatha, June 3d, 1765, and died at Copenhagen, March 26th, 1835. She was sister to the celebrated and learned bishop Münster, of Iceland, and wife of the Danish conference counsellor Brun. Encouraged by the example of her husband and her brother, she became an author, and obtained considerable fame as a writer of lyrics. Her prose writings, though not of the first order, are yet far above mediocrity. She is best known as the author of songs of liberty, written when Philhellenic enthusiasm prevailed all over Germany. Almost all her poetic productions are tinged with a sad and melancholy feeling.

BRUN, MADAME LE,

Was a French artiste or painter, who gained considerable reputation at Paris. Her paintings, historical pieces as well as portraits, were exhibited in the Louvre. Madame de Genlis speaks of the talents of Madame le Brun with much warmth of praise, and complains that the men sought to depreciate her paintings because she was a woman.

BRUNTON, MARY,

AUTHORESS of "Self-Control" and "Discipline," two novels of superior merit, was born on the 1st of November, 1778. She was a native of Burrey, in Orkney, a small island of about five hundred inhabitants, destitute of tree or shrub. Her father was colonel Balfour, of Elwick, and her mother was niece of field-marshal lord Ligonier, in whose house she had resided before her marriage. Mary was carefully educated, and taught French and Italian by her mother. She was also sent to Edinburgh; but when she was sixteen her mother died, and the whole care of the family devolved on her. At the age of twenty she married the Rev. Mr. Brunton, minister of Bolton, in Haddingtonshire. In 1803, Mr. Brunton was called to Edinburgh, and there his wife had an opportunity of meeting literary persons, and of cultivating her mind. "Self-Control," her first novel, was published anonymously in 1811. The first edition was sold in a month, and a second and third called for. Her next work was "Discipline," a novel of the religious class, to which "Self-Control" belonged. She died in 1818, leaving an unfinished novel called "Emeline," afterwards published with a memoir of the authoress, by her husband.

Her private character was in harmony with her writings; she taught all within the circle of her influence, by her amiable deportment, how beautiful are the characteristics of the true Christian lady, as she now teaches the readers of her excellent works the theory of the loveliness of virtue. We give a few selections from her best novel—“Self-Control.”

SKETCH OF THE HEROINE.

It is the fashion of the age to account for every striking feature of a character, from education or external circumstance. Those who are fond of such speculations may trace, if they can, the self-denying habits of Laura, to the eagerness with which her enthusiastic mind imbibed the stories of self-devoting patriots and martyrs, and may find, in one lesson of her preceptress, the tint which coloured her future days. The child had been reading a narrative of the triumphant death of one of the first reformers; and, full of the emulation which the tale of heroic virtue inspires, exclaimed, her eyes flashing through their tears, her little form erect with noble daring,—“Let them persecute me, and I will be a martyr.” “You may be so now, to-day, every day,” returned Mrs. Douglas. “It was not at the stake that these holy men began their self-denial. They had before taken up their cross daily; and whenever, from a regard to duty, you resign anything that is pleasing or valuable to you, you are for the time a little martyr.”

In a solitary village, remote from her equals in age and rank, Laura necessarily lived much alone; and in solitude she acquired a grave and contemplative turn of mind. Far from the scenes of dissipation and frivolity, conversant with the grand and the sublime in nature, her sentiments assumed a corresponding elevation. She had heard that there was vice in the world; she knew that there was virtue in it; and little acquainted with other minds, deeply studious of her own, she concluded that all mankind were like herself engaged in a constant endeavour after excellence; that success in this struggle was at once virtue and happiness, while failure included misery as well as guilt. The habit of self-examination, early formed, and steadily maintained, made even venial trespass appear the worst of evils; while, in the labours of duty and the pleasures of devotion, she found joys which sometimes rose to rapture.

THE LOVER AND HIS DECLARATION.

For the first time since her mother's funeral, captain Montreville prevailed on his daughter to take a solitary walk. Slowly she ascended the hill that overlooked the village, and stopping near its brow, looked back towards the church-yard, to observe a brown hillock that marked the spot where her mother slept. Tears filled her eyes, as passing over long intervals of unkindness, she recollected some casual proof of love; and they fell fast as she remembered, that for that love she could now make no return. She turned to proceed; and the moist eye sparkled with pleasure, the faded cheek glowed with more than the flush of health, when she beheld springing towards her the elegant, the accomplished, colonel Hargrave. Forgotten was languor, forgotten was sorrow; for

Laura was just seventeen, and colonel Hargrave was the most ardent, the most favoured of lovers. His person was symmetry itself; his manners had all the fascination that vivacity and intelligence, joined to the highest polish, can bestow. His love for Laura suited with the impetuosity of his character; and for more than a year he had laboured with assiduity and success to inspire a passion corresponding to his own. Yet it was not Hargrave whom Laura loved; for the being on whom she doted had no resemblance to him, except in externals. It was a creature of her imagination, pure as her own heart, yet impassioned as the wildest dreams of fiction, intensely susceptible of pleasure, and keenly alive to pain, yet ever ready to sacrifice the one and to despise the other. This ideal being, clothed with the fine form, and adorned with the insinuating manners, and animated with the infectious love of Hargrave, what heart of woman could resist? Laura's was completely captivated.

Hargrave, charmed with her consummate loveliness, pleased with her cheerful good sense, and fascinated with her matchless simplicity, at first sought her society without thought but of present gratification, till he was no longer master of himself. He possessed an ample fortune, besides the near prospect of a title; and nothing was further from his thoughts than to make the poor unknown Laura a sharer in these advantages. But Hargrave was not yet a villain, and he shuddered at the thought of seduction. “I will see her only once more,” said he, “and then tear myself from her forever.” “Only this once,” said he, while day after day he continued to visit her,—to watch with delight, and to cherish with eager solicitude the tenderness which, amidst her daily increasing reserve, his practised eye could distinguish. The passion which we do not conquer will, in time, reconcile us to any means that can aid its gratification. “To leave her now would be dishonourable—it would be barbarous,” was his answer to his remonstrating conscience, as he marked the glow of her complexion at his approach, the tremor of her hand at his pressure. “I cannot indeed make her my wife. The woman whom I marry must assist in supporting the rank which she is to fill. But Laura is not made for high life. Short commerce with the world would destroy half her witchery. Love will compensate to us for every privation—I will hide her and myself from a censorious world: she loves solitude; and, with her, solitude will be delightful.” He forgot that solitude is delightful to the innocent alone.

Meantime the artless Laura saw, in his highly-coloured pictures of happy love, only scenes of domestic peace and literary leisure; and, judging of his feelings by her own, dreamed not of aught that would have disgraced the love of angels. Tedious weeks of absence had intervened since their last meeting; and Hargrave's resolution was taken. To live without her was impossible, and he was determined to try whether he had overrated the strength of her affection, when he ventured to hope that to it she would sacrifice her all. To meet her thus unexpectedly filled him with joy; and the heart of Laura throbbed quick as he expressed his rapture. Never had his professions been so ardent; and softened by sorrow and by absence, never had Laura felt such seducing tenderness as now stole upon her. Unable to speak, and unconscious of her path, she listened with silent rapture to the glowing language of her lover, till his entreaties wrung from her a reluctant confession of her preference. Unmindful of the feeling of humiliation that makes the moment of such a confession, of all others, the least favourable to a lover's boldness, Hargrave poured forth the most vehement expressions of passion; while, shrinking into herself, Laura now first observed that the shades of evening were closing fast, while their lonely path led through a wood that climbed the rocky hill.

She stopped. "I must return," said she; "my father will be anxious for me at this hour."

"Talk not now of returning," cried Hargrave impetuously; "trust yourself to a heart that adores you. Reward all my lingering pains, and let this happy hour begin a life of love and rapture."

Laura, wholly unconscious of his meaning, looked up in his face with an innocent smile: "I have often taxed you with raving," said she; "now, I am sure, you must admit the charge."

"Do not sport with me, loveliest," cried Hargrave, "nor waste these precious moments in cold delay. Leave forms to the frozen hearts that wait them, and be from this hour mine, wholly and forever."

Laura threw a tearful glance at her mourning habit. "Is this like bridal attire?" said she: "would you bring your nuptial festivities into the house of death, and mingle the sound of your marriage vow with my mother's dying groans?"

"Can this simplicity be affected?" thought Hargrave. "Is it that she will not understand me?" He examined her countenance. All there was candor and unsuspecting love. Her arm rested on his with confiding pressure; and, for a moment, Hargrave faltered in his purpose. The next, he imagined that he had gone too far to recede; and, clasping her to his breast with all the vehemence of passion, he urged his suit in language yet more unequivocal. No words can express her feelings, when, the veil thus rudely torn from her eyes, she saw her pure, her magnanimous Hargrave—the god of her idolatry—degraded to a sensualist, a seducer. Casting on him a look of mingled horror, dismay, and anguish, she exclaimed, "Are you so base?" and, freeing herself, with convulsive struggle, from his grasp, sunk without sense or motion to the ground.

LAURA REFUSES COLONEL HARGRAVE.

Though the understanding of Laura was above her years, she had not escaped a mistake common to the youth of both sexes, when smarting under a recent disappointment in love—the mistake of supposing that all the interest of life is, with respect to them, at an end, and that their days must thenceforth bring only a dull routine of duties without excitement, and of toils without hope.

But the leading principle of Laura's life was capable of giving usefulness even to her errors; and the gloom of the wilderness through which her path seemed to lie, only brightened, by contrast, the splendour that lay beyond. "The world," thought she, "has now nothing to offer that I covet, and little to threaten that I fear. What then remains but to do my duty, unawed by its threatenings, unbribed by its joys? Ere this cloud darkened all my earthly prospects, I was not untaught, though I had too much forgotten the lesson, that it was not for pastime I was sent hither. I am here as a soldier who strives in an enemy's land; as one who must run—must wrestle—must strain every nerve, exert every power, nor once shrink from the struggle, till the prize is my own. Nor do I live for myself alone. I have a friend to gratify—the poor to relieve—the sorrowful to console—a father's age to comfort—a God to serve. And shall selfish feelings disincense me to such duties as these? No; with more than seeming cheerfulness, I will perform them all. I will thank Heaven for exempting me from the far heavier task of honouring and obeying a profligate."

A profligate! Must she apply such a name to Hargrave! The enthusiasm of the moment expired at the word, and the glow of virtuous resolution faded to the paleness of despondence and pain.

From a long and melancholy reverie, Laura was awakened by the sound of the garden gate; and she perceived that it was entered by Colonel Hargrave. Instinctively she was retreating from the window, when she saw him joined by her father; and, trembling lest candour was about to confess, or inadvertence to betray, what she so much wished to conceal, she continued with breathless anxiety to watch their conference.

Though Colonel Hargrave was certainly one of the best bred men in the kingdom, and, of consequence, entirely free from the awkwardness of mauvaise honte, it must be confessed that he entered the presence of the father of Laura with rather less than his accustomed ease; but the cordial salutation of Captain Montreville banishing all fear that the lady had been too communicative, our lover proceeded, without any remaining embarrassment, to unfold the purpose of his visit.

Captain Montreville listened with undisguised satisfaction to proposals apparently so advantageous to his beloved child; but, while he expressed his entire approbation of the colonel's suit, regard to feminine decorum made him add, "that he was determined to put no constraint on the inclinations of his daughter." The colonel felt a strong conviction that no constraint would be necessary; nevertheless, turning a neat period, importing his willingness to resign his love rather than interfere with the happiness of Miss Montreville, he closed the conference by entreating that the captain would give him an immediate opportunity of learning his fate from the lips of the fair Laura herself.

Laura had continued to follow them with her eyes, till they entered the house together: and the next minute Captain Montreville knocked at her door.

"If your headache is not quite gone," said he, with a significant smile, "I will venture to recommend a physician. Colonel Hargrave is waiting to prescribe for you; and you may repay in kind, for he tells me he has a case for your consideration."

Laura was on the point of protesting against any communication with Colonel Hargrave; but, instantly recollecting the explanation which would be necessary, "I will go to him this instant," she exclaimed, with an eagerness that astonished her father.

"Surely you will first smooth these reddish locks of yours," said he, fondly stroking her dark auburn hair. "I fear so much haste may make the colonel vain."

Laura coloured violently; for, amidst all her fears of a discovery, she found place for a strong feeling of resentment at the easy security of forgiveness that seemed intimidated by a visit so immediately succeeding the offence. Having employed the few moments she passed at her toilet in collecting her thoughts, she descended to the parlour, fully resolved to give no countenance to the hopes her lover might have built on her supposed weakness.

The colonel was alone; and as she opened the door, eagerly advanced towards her. "My adored Laura," cried he, "this condescension—" Had he stayed to read the pale but resolute countenance of his "adored" Laura, he would have spared his thanks for her condescension.

She interrupted him. "Colonel Hargrave," said she, with imposing seriousness, "I have a request to make to you. Perhaps the peace of my life depends upon your compliance."

"Ah, Laura! what request can I refuse, where I have so much to ask?"

"Promise me that you will never make known to my father—that you will take every means to conceal from him the—" she hesitated, "the—our meeting last night," she added, rejoiced to have found a palliative expression for her meaning.

"Oh! dearest Laura! forget it—think of it no more."

"Promise—promise solemnly. If, indeed," added she, shuddering, while an expression of sudden anguish crossed her features, "if, indeed, promises can weigh with such a one as you."

"For pity's sake, speak not such cutting words as those."

"Colonel Hargrave, will you give me your promise?"

"I do promise—solemnly promise. Say but that you forgive me."

"I thank you, sir, for so far insuring the safety of my dear father, since he might have risked his life to avenge the wrongs of his child. You cannot be surprised if I now wish to close our acquaintance as speedily as may be consistent with the concealment so unfortunately necessary."

Impatient to close an interview which tasked her fortitude to the utmost, Laura was about to retire. Hargrave seized her hand. "Surely,

Laura, you will not leave me thus. You cannot refuse forgiveness to a fault caused by intemperate passion alone. The only atonement in my power, I now come to offer; my hand, my fortune—my future rank."

The native spirit and wounded delicacy of Laura flashed from her eyes, while she replied, "I fear, sir, I shall not be suitably grateful for your generosity, while I recollect the alternative you would have preferred."

This was the first time that Laura had ever appeared to her lover other than the tender, the timid girl. From this character she seemed to have started at once into the high-spirited, the dignified woman; and, with a truly masculine passion for variety, Hargrave thought he had never seen her half so fascinating. "My angelic Laura!" cried he, as he knelt before her, "lover-lie in your cruelty, suffer me to prove to you my repentance—my reverence, my adoration;—suffer me to prove them to the world, by uniting our fates for ever."

"It is fit the guilty should kneel," said Laura, turning away, "but not to their fellow-mortals. Rise, sir; this homage to me is but mockery."

"Say, then, that you forgive me; say that you will accept the tenderness, the duty of my future life."

"What! rather than control your passions, will you now stoop to receive, as your wife, her whom so lately you thought vile enough for the lowest degradation? Impossible! yours I can never be. Our views, our principles are opposite as light and darkness. How shall I call Heaven to witness the prostitution of its own ordinances? How shall I ask the blessing of my Maker on my union with a being at enmity with him?"

"Good heavens, Laura! will you sacrifice to a punctilio—to a fit of Calvinistic enthusiasm, the peace of my life, the peace of your own? You have owned that you love me—I have seen it, delighted seen it, a thousand times—and will you now desert me for ever?"

"I do not act upon punctilio," returned Laura, calmly; "I believe I am no enthusiast. What have been my sentiments is now of no importance; to unite myself with vice would be deliberate wickedness—to hope for happiness from such a union would be desperate folly."

"Dearest Laura, bound by your charms, allured by your example, my reformation would be certain, my virtue secure."

"Oh, hope it not! Familiar with my form, my only hold on your regard, you would neglect, forsake, despise me; and who should say that my punishment was not just?"

"And will you, then," cried Hargrave, in an agony, "will you, then, cast me off for ever? Will you drive me for ever from your heart?"

"I have no choice—leave me—forget me—seek some woman less fastidious; or rather endeavour, by your virtue, to deserve one superior far. Then honoured, beloved, as a husband, as a father—" The fortitude of Laura failed before the picture of her fancy, and she was unable to proceed. Determined to conceal her weakness from Hargrave, she broke from him, and hurried towards the door; but, melting into tenderness at the thought that this interview was perhaps the last, she turned. "Oh Hargrave," she cried, clasping her hands in supplication, "have pity on yourself—have pity on me—forsake the fatal path on which you have entered, that though for ever torn from you here, I may meet you in a better world!"

BUCHAN, ELSPETH,

Was the daughter of John Simpson, the keeper of an inn at Fitmy Can, which is the half-way house between Banff and Portsoy in the north of Scotland; where he was still living in 1787 at the age of ninety. His daughter Elspeth or Elizabeth was born in 1738; and when she was twenty-one was sent to Glasgow to find herself a place. She there entered into the service of Mr. Martin, one of the principal proprietors of the delft-work manufactory. She was not long in this situation before she married Robert Buchan, one of the workmen in the service of the same Mr. Martin. Robert and Elspeth Buchan seem to have lived happily together, and had many children, whom they educated in a manner suitable to their station. At the time of her marriage Mrs. Buchan was an episcopalian, but her husband being a burgher-seceder, she adopted his principles. She had always been a constant reader of the scriptures, and taking many passages in a strictly literal sense, she changed her opinions greatly, and, about 1778, she became the promulgator of many singular doctrines, and soon brought over to her notions Mr. Hugh White, who was the settled relief minister at Irvine. She continued to make new converts till April, 1790, when the populace in Irvine rose, assembled round Mr. White's house, and broke the windows; and Mrs. Buchan with all her converts, to the number of forty-six persons, left Irvine. The Buchanites (for so they were called) went through Mauchlin, old and new Cumnock, halted three days at Kircconnel, passed through Sangahar and Thornhill, and then settled at a farm-house, the out-houses of which they had all along possessed, paying for them, and for whatever they wanted. This farm-house is two miles south of Thornhill, and about thirteen miles from Dumfries.

The Buchanites paid great attention to the Bible, always reading it or carrying it about them. They read, sang hymns, preached, and conversed much about religion; declaring the last day to be near, and that no one of their company should ever die or be buried, but soon should hear the sound of the last trumpet, when all the wicked would be struck dead, and remain so one thousand years. At the same time the Buchanites would undergo an agreeable change, be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, from whence they should return to this earth, and with the Lord Jesus as their king, possess it one thousand years, during which time the devil should be chained. At the end of that period, the devil would be loosed, the wicked restored to life, and both would assail their camp, but be repulsed by the Buchanites, fighting manfully with Christ for their leader.

The Buchanites neither marry, nor consider themselves bound by conjugal duties, nor care for carnal enjoyments. But having one purse, they live like brothers and sisters a holy life as the angels of God. They follow no employment, being commanded to take no thought of the morrow, but, observing how the young ravens are fed, and the lilies grow, they assure themselves God will much more feed and clothe them. They, indeed, sometimes worked for people in their neighbourhood, but they refused all kind of payment, and declared that their whole object in working, was to mix with the world and inculcate their important doctrines.

Mr. Buchan remained in the burgher-secession communion, and had no intercourse with his wife. Mrs. Buchan died in May, 1791; and before her death her followers were greatly reduced in number.

BURE, CATHARINE,

A LEARNED Swedish lady, whose correspondence with another Swedish lady, Vandela Skylte, has been printed. It is characterized by elegance of language, correctness of style, and delicacy of expression. She died in 1679, aged seventy-seven.

BUFFET, MARGARET,

A PARISIAN lady, who wrote an interesting eulogy on learned women, besides observations on the French language.

BURLEIGH, LADY MILDRED,

ELDEST daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, and sister of Anne Bacon, was born at Milton, England, in 1526. Her education was carefully superintended by her father, and she learned to read and write the Greek and Latin languages with ease and elegance. On presenting the Bible, in Hebrew and other languages, to the university of Cambridge, she sent with it an epistle in Greek of her own composition.

In 1546 she married Sir William Cecil, afterwards Lord Burleigh, lord high-treasurer of England, privy-counsellor to queen Elizabeth, and Knight of the Garter.

Lady Burleigh was very happy in her long marriage of forty-two years; she died, April 4th, 1589, deeply regretted by her husband, who lost in her not only an amiable wife, but a friend whom he had been accustomed to consult on the most important occasions, and whose judgment and knowledge in state affairs was little inferior to his own. She was buried in Westminster Abbey.

After her decease, Lord Burleigh diverted his sorrow by composing "Meditations" on his irreparable loss, in which, after expressing his high sense of the admirable virtues of his wife, he enumerates her acts of beneficence and liberality, many of which had, during her life, been carefully concealed from himself. In these "Meditations," after describing many of her wise charities, such as loans to poor mechanics, and gifts of meat and bread to suffering families, he says:

"Four times in the year she sent, secretly, to all the prisons in London, money to buy bread, cheese, and beer, for four hundred persons: she also frequently distributed shirts and linen among the poor, both at Cheshant and in London. To the master of St. John's College she gave a sum of money, to have fires in the hall of the college upon all Sundays and holidays, between the feasts of All Saints and Candlemas, when there were no fires at the charge of the college. She gave money, secretly, towards a building, "for a new waye at Cambridge to the common scolles." She procured a number of books, some of which she bestowed on the university of Cambridge, the Bible in Hebrew, &c.: she also gave to the college of St. John many Greek books in divinity, physics, and the sciences. She gave similar presents to Christ Church and St. John's college, Oxford, and to the college of Westminster. She provided annually wool and flax, which were distributed to women in Cheshunt parish, to work into yarn, which was overlooked by their benefactress, and frequently presented to them as a reward of their labour. At other times she caused it to be wrought into cloth, and gave it to the poor, paying for the spinning an extraordinary price. A short time before her death, she purchased, in secret, a quantity of wheat and rye, to be given to the indigent in a time of scarcity: these stores remained unexhausted at her death, but were afterwards employed according to the original purpose."

BURNET, ELIZABETH,

THIRD wife of bishop Burnet, and daughter of Sir Richard Blake, knight, was born in London, in 1661. At the age of eighteen, she married Robert Berkeley, Esq., of Spetchley, with whom she went to Holland to reside till the revolution in England, when they returned to Spetchley, where her husband died. After being a widow seven years, she, in 1700, married Gilbert Burnet, bishop of Salisbury. She was benevolent, and exemplary in her conduct. She published a book of devotion, which showed great religious knowledge. It was called, "A Method of Devotion; or, Rules for Holy and Devout Living; with Prayers on several occasions, and Advices and Devotions for the Holy Sacrament: written by Mrs. Burnet." She died in 1709, and was buried at Spetchley, near her first husband, according to a promise made to him during his life.

A constant journal was kept by Mrs. Burnet of her life; every evening she devoted some time to the recollection of the past day, with a view of avoiding in future any errors into which she might have fallen. Though without learning, she possessed an acute and active mind; theology continued to be her favourite study, to which, by the circumstances of the times and of her own situation, she had been more particularly led. She also made some progress in geometry and philosophy: but she valued knowledge as a means rather than as an end, as it had a tendency to enlarge and purify the mind. By the austerities of her piety, which was exalted to enthusiasm, she injured her constitution; but, in her zeal for speculative opinions, she never lost sight of candour and benevolence; she considered the regulation of her conduct, and the purity of her life, as the best evidence of the sincerity of her faith. Her general manners were unaffected, cheerful, and conciliating; severe to herself and candid to others. Without external pretence or ostentation, humility, modesty, and kindness, were her peculiar characteristics. In what was indifferent, she avoided singularity, and conformed with moderation and simplicity to the customs suited to her station and rank.

BURY, ELIZABETH,

DAUGHTER of Captain Lawrence, was born at Linton, Cambridgeshire, England, and married Mr. Lloyd, of Huntingdonshire; and after his death, Samuel Bury, a dissenting minister of Bristol. She excelled in her knowledge of divinity, mathematics, and the learned languages, and was noted for her piety. She particularly applied herself to the study of Hebrew, in which, by unwearied application and practice, she became proficient. She wrote critical remarks upon the idioms and peculiarities of the Hebrew language, which were found among her papers after her decease. She was a good musician, and spoke French with ease and fluency. She took great interest in the study of anatomy and medicine, which she frequently made useful among those by whom she was surrounded.

Her beneficence and generosity were habitual and persevering, and often exerted on an extensive scale, so that at one time she seriously impaired her fortune. She died at Bristol, in 1720, aged seventy-six.

Mrs. Bury often regretted the disadvantages of her sex, who, by their habits of education, and the customs of society, were illiberally excluded from the means of acquiring knowledge. She contended that mind was of no sex, and that man was no less an enemy to himself than to woman, in confining her attention to frivolous attainments. She often spoke with pleasure and gratitude of her own obligations to her father and her preceptors, for having risen superior to these unworthy prejudices, and opened to her the sources of intellectual enjoyment.

C.

CALAGE, DE PECH DE,

WAS a native of Toulouse, in France. She seems to have lived in the reign of Louis XIII. She obtained the prize for poetry, at the Floral Games of Toulouse, several times.

CALAVRESE, MARIA,

WAS born at Rome in 1486, and was thought a good historical painter, as well in oil as in fresco. She worked for some time at Naples, but died at Rome in 1542.

CALLCETT, LADY,

WIFE of Sir Augustus Calcectt, R. A., was the daughter of Rear-Admiral George Dundas. She was born in 1788, and in 1809 married Captain Thomas Graham of the British navy, and went with him to India. She returned to England, after having travelled over a great part of India, and published her travels in 1812. She went afterwards to Italy, and in 1820 published a work called "Three Months in the Environs of Rome;" and also "The Memoirs of the Life of Poussin." In 1822, Mrs. Graham accompanied her husband to South America; during the voyage, Captain Graham died and was buried at Valparaiso. While in South America, Mrs. Graham became the instructress of Donna Maria, now queen of Portugal. Some years after, she married Mr. Calcott. She died in England, 1843. Her other published works were "History of Spain;" "Essays towards the History of Painting;" "Scripture Herbal;" and some books for children.

CAMARGO, MARIE ANNE CUPI DE,

A CELEBRATED stage-dancer, born at Brussels, 1710. She appeared on the theatres in Paris and Brussels, and maintained a respectable character. She died April 1770.

CAMPBELL, DOROTHEA PRIMROSE,

WAS a native of Lenwick, in the Shetland Islands. In 1816, she published a volume of poems.

CAMPAN, JANE LOUISA HENRIETTA,

WAS born at Paris, 1752. She was the daughter of M. Genet, first clerk in the office of the Minister of Foreign Affairs. He was fond of literature, and communicated a taste for it to his daughter, who early displayed considerable talents. She acquired a knowledge of foreign languages, particularly the Italian and English, and was distinguished for her skill in reading and recitation. These acquisitions procured for her the place of reader to the French princesses, daughters of Louis XV. On the marriage of Maria Antoinette to the Dauphin, afterwards Louis XVI., Mademoiselle Genet was attached to her suite, and continued, during twenty years, to occupy a situation about her person.

Her general intelligence and talent for observation enabled Madame Campan, in the course of her service, to collect the materials for her "Memoirs of the Private Life of the Queen of France," first published in Paris, and translated and printed in London, 1823, in two volumes. This work is not only interesting for the information it affords, but is also very creditable to the literary talents of the authoress. Soon after the appointment at court, Mademoiselle Genet was married to M. Campan, son of the Secretary of the queen's closet. When Maria Antoinette was made a prisoner, Madame Campan begged to be permitted to accompany her royal mistress and share her imprisonment, which was refused. Madame Campan was with the queen at the storming of the Tuilleries, on the 10th of August, when she narrowly escaped with her life: and under the rule of Robespierre, she came near being sent to the guillotine. After the fall of that tyrant, she retired to the country and opened a private seminary for young ladies, which she conducted with great success. Josephine Beauharnais sent her daughter, Hortense, to the seminary of Madame Campan. She had also the sisters of the Emperor under her care. In 1806, Napoleon founded the school of Ecouen, for the daughters and sisters of the officers of the Legion of Honour, and appointed Madame Campan to superintend it. This institution was suppressed at the restoration of the Bourbons, and Madame Campan retired to Nantes, where she partly prepared her "Memoirs," and other works. She died in 1822, aged seventy. After her decease, her "Private Journal" was published; also, "Familiar Letters to her Friends," and a work, which she considered her most important one, entitled "Thoughts on Education." We will give extracts from these works.

From the "Private Journal."

MESMER AND HIS MAGNETISM.

At the time when Mesmer made so much noise in Paris with his magnetism, M. Campan, my husband, was his partizan, like almost every person who moved in high life. To be magnetized was then a fashion; nay, it was more, it was absolutely a rage. In the drawing-rooms, nothing was talked of but the brilliant discovery. There was to be no more dying; people's heads were turned, and their imaginations heated in the highest degree. To accomplish this object, it was necessary to bewilder the understanding; and Mesmer, with his singular language, produced that effect. To put a stop to the fit of public insanity was the grand difficulty; and it was proposed to have the secret purchased by the court. Mesmer fixed his claims at a very extravagant rate. However, he was offered fifty thousand crowns. By a singular chance, I was one day led into the midst of the somnambulists. Such was the enthusiasm of the spectators, that, in most of them, I could observe a wild rolling of the eye, and a convulsed movement of the countenance. A stranger might have fancied himself amidst the unfortunate patients of Charenton. Surprised and shocked at seeing so many people almost in a state of delirium, I withdrew, full of reflections on the scene which I had just witnessed.

It happened that about this time my husband was attacked with a pulmonary disorder, and he desired that he might be conveyed to Mesmer's house. Being introduced into the apartment occupied by M. Campan, I asked the worker of miracles what treatment he proposed to adopt; he very coolly replied, that to ensure a speedy and perfect cure, it would be necessary to lay in the bed of the invalid, at his left side, one of three things, namely, a young woman of brown complexion; a black hen; or an empty bottle.

"Sir," said I, "if the choice be a matter of indifference, pray try the empty bottle."

M. Campan's side grew worse; he experienced a difficulty of breathing and a pain in his chest. All magnetic remedies that were employed produced no effect. Perceiving his failure, Mesmer took advantage of the periods of my absence to bleed and blister the patient. I was not informed of what had been done until after M. Campan's recovery. Mesmer was asked for a certificate, to prove that the patient had been cured by means of magnetism only; and he gave it. Here was a trait of enthusiasm! Truth was no longer respected. When I next presented myself to the queen (Marie-Antoinette), their majesties asked what I thought of Mesmer's discovery. I informed them of what had taken place, earnestly expressing my indignation at the conduct of the barefaced quack. It was immediately determined to have nothing more to do with him.

THE EMPEROR ALEXANDER'S VISIT TO MADAME CAMPAN'S SCHOOL.

The emperor enquired into the most minute particulars respecting the establishment at Ecouen; and I felt great pleasure in answering his questions. I recollect having dwelt on several points which appeared to me very important, and which were in their spirit hostile to aristocratical principles. For example, I informed his majesty that the daughters of distinguished and wealthy individuals, and those of the humble and obscure, were indiscriminately mingled together in the establishment. If, said I, I were to observe the least pretension on account of the rank or fortune of parents, I should immediately put an end to it. The most perfect equality is preserved; distinction is awarded only to merit and industry. The pupils are obliged to cut and make all their own clothes. They are taught to clean and mend lace; and two at a time, they by turns, three times a week, cook and distribute victuals to the poor of the village. The young ladies who have been brought up in my boarding-school are thoroughly acquainted with everything relating to household business; and they are grateful to me for having made it a part of their education. In my conversations with them, I have always taught them that on domestic management depends the preservation or dissipation of their fortunes. I impress on their minds the necessity of regulating with attention the most trifling daily expenses; but at the same time I recommend them to avoid making domestic details the subject of conversation in the drawing-room; for that is a most decided mark of ill-breeding. It is proper that all should know how to do and to direct; but it is only for ill-educated women to talk about their carriages, servants, washing, and cooking.

These are the reasons, sire, why my pupils are generally superior to those brought up in other establishments. All is conducted on the most simple plan; the young ladies are taught everything of which they can possibly stand in need; and they are consequently as much at their ease in the brilliant circles of fashion, as in the most humble condition of life. Fortune confers rank, but education teaches how to support it properly.

From the "Letters," &c.
TO HER ONLY SON.

You are now, my dear Henry, removed from my fond care and instruction; and young as you are, you have entered upon the vast theatre of the world. Some years hence, when time shall have matured your ideas, and enabled you to take a clear, retrospective view of your steps in life, you will be able to enter into my feelings, and to judge of the anxiety which at this moment agitates my heart.

When first a beloved child, releasing itself from its nurse's arms, ventures its little tottering steps on the soft carpet, or the smoothest grass-plot, the poor mother scarcely breathes; she imagines that these first efforts of nature are attended with every danger to the object most dear to her. Fond mother, calm your anxious fears! Your infant son can, at the worst, only receive a slight hurt, which, under your tender care, will speedily be healed. Reserve your alarms, your heart-beatings, your prayers to providence, for the moment when your son enters upon the scene of the world to select a character, which, if sustained with dignity, judgment and feeling, will render him universally esteemed and approved; or to degrade himself by filling one of those low, contemptible parts, fit only for the vilest actors in the drama of life. Tremble at the moment when your child has to choose between the rugged road of industry and integrity, leading straight to honour and happiness; and the smooth and flowery path which descends, through indolence and pleasure, to the gulf of vice and misery. It is then that the voice of a parent, or of some faithful friend, must direct the right course.

* * * * *

Surrounded as you doubtless are, by thoughtless and trifling companions, let your mother be the rallying point of your mind and heart; the confidant of all your plans.

* * * * *

Learn to know the value of money. This is a most essential point. The want of economy leads to the decay of powerful empires, as well as private families. Louis XVI. perished on the scaffold for a deficit of fifty millions. There would have been no debt, no assemblies of the people, no revolution, no loss of the sovereign authority, no tragical death, but for this fatal deficit. States are ruined through the mismanagement of millions, and private persons become bankrupts and end their lives in misery through the mismanagement of crowns worth six livres. It is very important, my dear son, that I lay down to you these first principles of right conduct, and impress upon your mind the necessity of adhering to them. Render me an account of the expenditure of your money, not viewing me in the light of a rigid preceptress, but as a friend who wishes to accustom you to the habit of accounting to yourself.

* * * * *

Happy is the woman who, in old age, can say—"I am the mother of a worthy man, a useful member of society;" and he, in his turn, will be the parent of a line of offspring who will never disgrace the honourable name they inherit.

* * * * *

A man should seek to gain information by travelling; he must encounter and endure misfortune, contend against danger and temptation, and finally temper his mind so as to give it the strength and solidity of the hardest metal.

* * * * *

Let me impress upon you the importance of attentive application to business; for that affords certain consolation, and is a security against lassitude, and the vices which idleness creates.

* * * * *

Be cautious how you form connexions; and hesitate not to break them off on the first proposition to adopt any course which your affectionate mother warns you to avoid, as fatal to your real happiness, and to the attainment of that respect and esteem which it should be your ambition to enjoy.

* * * * *

Never neglect to appropriate a certain portion of your time to useful reading; and do not imagine that even half an hour a day, devoted to that object, will be unprofitable. The best way of arranging and employing one's time is by calculation; and I have often reflected that half an hour's reading every day, will be one hundred and eighty hours' reading in the course of the year. Great fortunes are amassed by little savings; and poverty as well as ignorance are occasioned by the extravagant waste of money and time.

* * * * *

My affection for you, my dear Henry, is still as actively alive as when, in your infancy, I removed, patiently, every little stone from a certain space in my garden, lest, when you first ran alone, you might fall and hurt your face on the pebbles. But the snares now spread beneath your steps are far more dangerous. They are strengthened by seductive appearances, and the ardour of youth would hurry you forward to the allurements; but that my watchful care, and the confidence you repose in me, serve to counteract the influence of this twofold power. Your bark is gliding near a rapid current; but your mother stands on the shore, and with her eyes fixed on her dear navigator, anxiously exclaims, in the moment of danger, "Reef your sails; mind your helm." Oh! may you never forget, or cease to be guided by these warnings, which come from my inmost heart.

From "Thoughts on Education."

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE.

As mothers, as wives, as sisters, women have the greatest influence on the destiny of men. The heroes of chivalry made the approbation of women the stimulus and aim of their high feats of arms. Under absolute monarchies their charms even extended over the fate of empires; and too often the boudoir of a favourite became the council-chamber of kings. In a constitutional government, in which the wisdom of the sovereign, and the understanding of the people, promulgate laws and cause them to be executed, the education of women should be directed to a useful and praiseworthy object. The enlightened understanding of the present age deprives them of the power of governing by the sole attraction of beauty; a solid education must now render them capable of appreciating the talents and virtues of their husbands, of preserving their fortune by a wise economy, of partaking of their elevation without ridiculous ostentation, of consoling them in disgrace, of bringing up their girls in all the virtues which ought to be inseparable from their sex, and directing the early years of their boys. The names of women will figure less in history: and, for their happiness, they will supply still fewer subjects for romances! A sentiment truly national will lead them to regard their own homes as the only theatre of their glory, and public morals will then soon show the immense steps made by social order towards a better state of society.

THE CULTIVATION OF THE ARTS.

For myself, I should make a powerful objection to the cultivation of the arts in female education. I have remarked, that they destroy the development of thought; the prodigious length of time which they demand to acquire is doubtless the cause. The enthusiasm which they inspire, also, often exalts a young imagination, and in females this is very injurious.

CAMPIGLIA, MADDALENA,

Was a native of Vicenza, and born in 1550. She was educated in a nunnery, and celebrated for her literary talents. She dedicated one of her works to Torquato Tasso, with whom she corresponded. She wrote, among other works, "Azione Dramatica," published in 1588. Her death occurred in 1595.

CANTARINI, CHIARA,

Was born in Lucca, where she always resided. She was well versed in history and philosophy, and held an extensive correspondence with the learned men of her time. A collection of her "Poems," and a volume of her "Letters," have been published. She died in 1597.

CANTOFOLI, GENEVRA,

A FEMALE artist of Bologna, pupil of Elizabeth Sirani. She practised historical painting with success; and in the church of St. Procolo, in Bologna, is a picture by her of the Lord's Supper, of which good judges speak favourably, as they do of some of her other altar-pieces; particularly of St. Tommaso di Villanuovo, in St. Giacomo Maggiore. Her personal history is unknown. She lived in the seventeenth century.

CAPELLO, BIANCA,

DESCENDED from the noble house of the Capelli at Venice, and daughter of Bartolomeo Capello, was born about 1545. Opposite to her father's house, the Salviati, a great mercantile family of Florence, had established a bank, and entrusted the care of it to Pietro Buonaventuri, a Florentine youth of obscure extraction, whom they had engaged as clerk. Buonaventuri, handsome, adventurous, and addicted to intrigue, gained the affections of Bianca, whom he deceived by representing himself as one of the principals in the bank. After their intercourse had been carried on for some time in secrecy, the effects of it became such as could not be concealed, and to avoid the terrors of a life-long imprisonment in a cloister, Bianca resolved to elope with her lover. Taking a casket of jewels that belonged to her father, she left Venice by night, and at length, safely arrived with Buonaventuri at Florence, and was lodged in his father's house, where she gave birth to a daughter. She had been married to Buonaventuri on the road, at a village near Bologna. She lived for some time with her husband in obscurity, continually under apprehensions of being discovered by emissaries from Venice, where her elopement had excited great indignation, not only in her family, but among all the aristocracy. The uncle of her husband, who was accused of having been aware of his nephew's presumption, was thrown into a dungeon, where he died; and Bianca's attendant and confidant, whom they had neglected to take with them, met with a fate equally severe.

At length accident, or contrivance, introduced her to the notice of Francis, son of Francis, grand-duke of Tuscany, on whom his father had devolved all the powers and dignity of the sovereignty. The wonderful beauty and engaging manners of Bianca made such an impression on Francis, that he offered to protect her, negotiated in her favour with her friends at Venice, and on failure of success, drew her from her obscure situation, settled her in a splendid palace, and spent the greatest part of his time in her company. He created Buonaventuri his chamberlain, and consulted him on all the affairs of the state. This greatly offended the Florentines, whom he treated with the tyranny and haughtiness usual in foreign favourites of low origin.

In 1566, soon after the marriage of Francis to Donna Joanna of Austria, a marriage of expediency, Bianca was introduced at court, and became the centre of general admiration; and the captivated Francis solemnly promised to make her his wife, in case they should mutually be freed from their present engagements.

Buonaventuri, having formed an intrigue with a lady of high rank, which he openly proclaimed, while he behaved with the greatest insolence to her family, was assassinated in the streets one night, in 1569. Francis, who had connived at his fate, allowed the murderers to escape, notwithstanding the entreaties of Bianca, who seems to have retained through all some affection for her first husband.

Bianca was now openly proclaimed the mistress of Francis, who could hardly separate himself from her to perform the necessary duties imposed on him by his station. She exerted all her art in gaining over to her interest the principal persons in the Medici family, particularly the cardinal Ferdinand, Francis's next brother; and she succeeded. As the want of a male heir by his duchess, had been a great disappointment to Francis, and even a natural son was passionately desired by him, Bianca, who had borne no child since her first daughter, determined to introduce a supposititious child to him, as her own. This scheme she effected in 1576, and presenting to her lover the new-born male infant of a poor woman, he joyfully received it as his own, and named it Antonio. Bianca is charged with several secret assassinations, perpetrated for the purpose of removing all those who were privy to this fraudulent transaction. Francis, however, had a legitimate son born to him the ensuing year, and this event appeared to reconcile the grand-duchess to him, who had been greatly disturbed by Bianca's influence over him. Bianca, for a time, retired from court, but her intercourse with Francis was still carried on, though more secretly.

At length the death of the grand-duchess, supposed to have been caused by the grief she experienced at finding herself again neglected, placed the ducal crown within Bianca's grasp; and notwithstanding the hatred of the Florentines, who were attached to the memory of the grand-duchess, and the opposition of his relations and counsellors, she persuaded Francis to fulfil his promise of marriage. On June 5th, 1579, the ceremony was performed privately; but her ambition was to share publicly with him the ducal throne, and she persuaded him to comply with her wishes.

He sent a solemn embassy to Venice, to inform the senate of his marriage with Bianca, and to request them to confer on her the title of daughter of the Republic, which would give her precedence of the other princesses of Italy. That crafty government gladly received the proposal, as a means of extending the authority of the Republic; and in one of the most magnificent embassies ever sent from Venice, Bianca was solemnly crowned daughter of the state which had banished and persecuted her, proclaimed grand-duchess of Tuscany, and installed in all the honours and dignity of sovereignty. This event occurred Oct. 13th, 1579.

Her conduct in this high station was directed to securing herself by obtaining the good-will of the different members of the Medici family, and reconciling their differences; in this her persuasive manners, and great prudence and judgment, rendered her successful. But she never conciliated the affections of her subjects, who had always hated her as the seducer of their prince, and regarded her as an abandoned woman, capable of every crime. A thousand absurd stories of her cruelty and propensity to magical arts were propagated, some of which are still part of the popular traditions of Florence. In return, she employed a number of spies, who, by their information, enabled her to defeat all machinations against herself and the duke.

In 1582, the son of Francis by his former grand-duchess died, and soon after the grand-duke declared Antonio his lawful heir. Yet it is said Bianca had confessed to Francis that he was only a supposititious child, and this strange contradiction throws a mystery upon the real parentage of Antonio. Ferdinand, brother, and next heir to Francis, was rendered jealous of his brother by this report; but Bianca effected an apparent reconciliation between them, and Ferdinand came to Florence, in October, 1587. He had been there but a short time, when Francis fell ill at his hunting villa of Poggio de Cajano, whither he had been accompanied by his brother and Bianca; and two days after, Bianca was seized with the same complaint, a kind of fever. They both died after a week's illness, Francis being forty and Bianca forty-four years of age. Ferdinand has been accused, but in all probability unjustly, of having poisoned them. Their remains were carried to Florence, where Ferdinand would not allow the body of Bianca to be interred in the family vault, and treated her memory otherwise with indignity; he also had the illegitimacy of Antonio publicly recognised. This behaviour was probably caused by the accusations the enemies of Bianca poured into his ear. His subsequent conduct proves the different feelings that came when time for reflection had been allowed him. He solemnly adopted Antonio as his nephew, gave him an establishment suited to a prince of the house of Medici, settled a liberal annuity on Bianca's father, and made presents to the officers of her household.

On a survey of the life of Bianca Capello, whatever may be thought of the qualities of her heart, which it must be confessed are doubtful, it is impossible not to be struck with the powers of her mind, by which, amidst innumerable obstacles, she maintained, undiminished, through life, that ascendancy which her personal charms had first given her over the affections of a capricious prince.

The determination and perseverance with which she prosecuted her plans, sufficiently testify her energy and talents; if, in effecting the end proposed, she was little scrupulous respecting the means, the Italian character, the circumstances of the times, the disadvantages attending her entrance into the world, subjected to artifice and entangled in fraud, must not be forgotten. Brought up in retirement and obscurity, thrown at once into the most trying situations, her prudence, her policy, her self-government, her knowledge of the human mind, and the means of subjecting it, are not less rare than admirable. She possessed singular penetration in discerning characters, and the weaknesses of those with whom she conversed, which she skilfully adapted to her purposes. By an eloquence, soft, insinuating, and powerful, she prevailed over her friends; while, by ensnaring them in their own devices, she made her enemies subservient to her views. Such was the fascination of her manners, that the prejudices of those by whom she was hated, yielded, in her presence, to admiration and delight: nothing seemed too arduous for her talents; inexhaustible in resource, whatever she undertook she found means to accomplish.

If she was an impassioned character, she was uniformly animated by ambition. In her first engagement with Buonaventuri, she seems to have been influenced by a restless, enterprising temper, disgusted with inactivity, rather than by love: through every scene of her connection with the duke, her motives are sufficiently obvious. With a disposition like that of Bianca, sensibility and tenderness, the appropriate virtues of the sex, are not to be expected. Real greatness has in it a character of simplicity, with which subtlety and craft are wholly incompatible: the genius of Bianca was such as fitted her to take a part in political intrigues, to succeed in courts, and rise to the pinnacle of power; but, stained with cruelty, and debased by falsehood, if her talents excite admiration, they produce no esteem; and while accomplishments dazzle the mind, they fail to interest the heart.

Majestic, beautiful, animated, eloquent, and insinuating, Bianca Capello commanded all hearts; a power of which the coldness and tranquillity of her own enabled her to avail herself to the utmost. Though she early lost that beauty which had gained her the heart of the capricious Francis, the powers of her mind enabled her to retain to the last an undiminished ascendancy over him.

We learn from this example of perverted female influence the great need of judicious education for the sex. Had Bianca Capello been, in early youth, blessed with such opportunities of acquiring knowledge, and receiving the appreciation her genius deserved, as were the happy lot of Laura Bassi, what a difference would have been wrought in the character and history of the brilliant Venetian lady!

CARLEMIGELLI, ASPASIE,

Was born in Paris, in 1775, and was the daughter of one of the Prince de Conde's footmen. Her childhood was rendered so miserable, by the bad treatment she received from her mother, that she never spoke of it afterwards without the utmost horror. Obligated very early to labour for her own support, and left unprotected by her parents, she fell so violently in love, that she became dangerously ill, was thought deranged, and was sent to an asylum for the insane. But in her strongest paroxysms she never lost her judgment; and the physicians were accustomed to entrust her with the care of the other insane persons. She was released, but imprisoned again in 1793, for having spoken against the revolution. She was soon set free again; but they had taken from her all she possessed, and, tired of her miserable life, she cried aloud in the streets, "God save the king!" But though she was again tried, she was acquitted.

Aspasie then endeavoured to obtain the condemnation of her mother, but in vain. She next turned her fury against the deputies who had caused so much bloodshed, and attempted the life of two. She was tried for this, and boldly avowed her intention. She would allow no one to defend her, and heard her condemnation with the greatest impassibility. She was guillotined, in 1798, at the age of twenty-three.

CARLISLE, ANNE,

AN ingenious lady, who lived in the reign of Charles II., and is said, by Walpole, to have obtained great credit by her copies of the works of eminent Italian masters, as well as by her portraits, taken from life. She died about the year 1680.

CAROLINE WILHELMINA DOROTHEA,

WIFE of George II. of England, was the daughter of John Frederic, marquis of Brandenburg-Anspach, and was born March 1st, 1683. She was sought in marriage by Charles III. of Spain, afterwards emperor of Germany, whom the fame of her beauty had attracted; but she refused to change her religion, which she would have to do if she accepted this splendid alliance; and so the offer was rejected. Her resolution on this occasion procured her the esteem of the elector of Hanover, afterwards George I., and induced him to select her as the wife of his son, to whom she was married, at Hanover, August 22d, 1705.

Caroline was crowned (with her husband) queen consort of Great Britain, on the 11th of October, 1727. Four sons and five daughters were the fruit of this union. She took a great interest in the political affairs of the kingdom, and her interposition was often beneficial for the country. She was well acquainted with the English constitution; and often prevailed upon the king to consent to measures which he had at first opposed. Notwithstanding the infidelity of the king towards her, he seems to have loved her as much as he was capable of loving any one; a distinction she well merited, for she united much feminine gentleness with a masculine strength of understanding, which often came in aid of the king's feeble intellect, and quietly indicated the right course, without assuming any merit for the service. She had also the rare good sense to see and acknowledge her errors, without feeling any irritation towards those who opposed them. She once formed a design of shutting up St. James' Park, and asked Sir Robert Walpole what it would cost to do it. "Only a crown, madam," was the reply; and she instantly owned her imprudence with a smile. When, during the king's absence on the continent, she found her authority as regent insulted, by the outrageous proceedings of the Edinburgh mob, who had violently put Captain Porteus to death, she expressed herself with great indignation. "Sooner," said she to the duke of Argyll, "than submit to such an insult, I would make Scotland a hunting-field!" "In that case, madam," answered the high-spirited nobleman, "I will take leave of your majesty, and go down to my own country to get my hounds ready." Such a reply would have irritated a weak mind, but it calmed that of the queen. She disclaimed the influence she really possessed over her husband, always affecting, if any one were present, to act the humble and ignorant wife. Even when the prime minister, Walpole, came on business which had previously been settled between him and the queen, she would rise and offer to retire. "There, you see," the king would exclaim, "how much I am governed by my wife, as they say I am." To this the queen would reply, "Oh! sir, I must be vain indeed to pretend to govern your majesty."

She was not only the king's political adviser, but his confidant in all his love affairs, of which she openly approved; and by thus consenting to his ruling vice, she preserved her influence over him undiminished, and made herself the mistress of his mistresses. He always preferred her, however, to any other woman; and during his absences on the continent, though she often wrote him letters of nineteen pages, yet he would complain of their brevity.

Queen Caroline died November 20th, 1737, at the age of fifty-five, of an illness brought on by imprudence and over-exertion. She made it an invariable rule never to refuse a desire of the king, who was very fond of long walks; so that more than once, when she had the gout in her foot, she would plunge her whole leg in cold water to drive it away, so as to be ready to attend him. The king showed the greatest sorrow at her death, and often dwelt on the assistance he had found in her noble and calm disposition, in governing so inconstant a people as the English.

CAROLINE MATILDA,

BORN 1751, daughter of Frederic Lewis, prince of Wales, married, 1766, Christian VII., king of Denmark, and became mother of Frederic, afterwards Frederic VII. of Denmark, in 1768. Though young, beautiful, and beloved by the nation, she was treated with neglect and hatred by the grandmother and the step-mother of her husband, who for some time influenced him against her. Struensee, a physician, and the favourite of the king, became her friend, together with Brandt, and they endeavoured to gain the king from the influence of the party opposed to the queen. The reins of government came into the hands of Struensee; but, in 1722, the party of the king's step-mother, and her son, prince Frederic, procured the imprisonment of the queen and all her friends. Count Struensee and Brandt were tried, and executed for high treason. Even the queen was at first in danger of death. She was accused of too great an intimacy with Struensee, was separated from her husband, and confined in Alborg, but was released by the interference of her brother, George III. of England. She died May 10th, 1775, at Zell, in Hanover, in consequence of her grief. The interesting letter in which she took leave of her brother, George III., is to be found in a small work, "Die letzten Stunden der Königin von Dänemark." She was mild and gentle, and much beloved; and though not always prudent, yet there is no doubt that she was perfectly innocent.

CAROLINE MARIA,

WIFE of Ferdinand I., king of the two Sicilies, daughter of the emperor Francis I., and of Maria Theresa, born 13th August, 1752; an ambitious and intelligent woman, but, unfortunately, without firmness of character. According to the terms of her marriage contract, the young queen, after the birth of a male heir, was to have a seat in the council of state; but her impatience to participate in the government would not allow her to wait for this event, previous to which she procured the removal of the old minister, Sanucci, who possessed the confidence of the king and of the nation, and raised a Frenchman named Acton to the post of prime minister, who ruined the finances of the state by his profusion, and excited the hatred of all ranks by the introduction of a political inquisition. The queen, too, drew upon herself the dislike of the oppressed nation by co-operating in the measures of the minister; and banishment and executions were found insufficient to repress the general excitement. The declaration by Naples against France (1768) was intended to give another turn to popular feeling; but the sudden invasion of the French drove the reigning family to Sicily. The revolution of cardinal Ruffo in Calabria, and the republican party in the capital, restored the former rulers in 1799. The famous Lady Hamilton now exerted the greatest influence on the unhappy queen, on her husband, on the English ambassador and admiral Nelson, and sacrificed more victims than Acton and Vanini had formerly done. After the battle of Marengo, 12,000 Russians could not prevent the conquest of Naples by the French, and the formation of a kingdom out of the Neapolitan dominions for Joseph (Bonaparte), who was afterwards succeeded in the same by Joachino (Murat). The queen was not satisfied with the efforts which the English made for the restitution of the old dynasty, and thereupon quarrelled with the lord Bentinck, the British general in Sicily, who wished to exclude her from all influence in the government. She died in 1814, without having seen the restoration of her family to the throne of Naples.

CAROLINE AMELIA ELIZABETH,

WIFE of George IV. of England, was the daughter of Charles William Ferdinand, prince of Brunswick Wolfenbüttele, and was born May 17th, 1768. She married the prince of Wales on the 8th of April, 1795, and her daughter, the princess Charlotte, was born on the 7th of January, 1796. Dissensions soon arose between her and her husband, and in the following May they were separated, after which she resided at Blackheath. In 1806, being accused of some irregularities of conduct, the king instituted an inquiry into the matter by a ministerial committee. They examined a great number of witnesses, and acquitted the princess of the charge, declaring, at the same time, that she was guilty of some imprudences, which had given rise to unfounded suspicions. The king confirmed this declaration of her innocence, and paid her a visit of ceremony. She afterwards received equal marks of esteem from the princes, her brothers-in-law. The duke of Cumberland attended the princess to court and to the opera. The reports above-mentioned were caused by the adherents of the prince of Wales and the court of the reigning queen, who was very unfavourably disposed towards her daughter-in-law. On this occasion, as on many others, the nation manifested the most enthusiastic attachment to the princess. In 1813, the public contest was renewed between the two parties; the princess of Wales complaining, as a mother, of the difficulties opposed to her seeing her daughter. The prince of Wales, then regent, disregarded these complaints. Upon this, in July, 1814, the princess obtained permission to go to Brunswick, and, afterwards, to make the tour of Italy and Greece. She now began her celebrated journey through Germany, Italy, Greece, the Archipelago, and Syria, to Jerusalem, in which the Italian Bergami was her confidant and attendant. Many infamous reports were afterwards circulated, relating to the connexion between the princess and Bergami. On her journey, she received grateful acknowledgments for her liberality, her kindness, and her generous efforts for the relief of the distressed. She afterwards lived in Italy a great part of the time, at a country-seat on lake Como. When the prince of Wales ascended the British throne, Jan. 29th, 1820, lord Hutchinson offered her an income of £50,000 sterling, the name of queen of England, and every title appertaining to that dignity, on the condition that she would never return to England. She refused the proposal, and asserted her claims more firmly than ever to the rights of a British queen, complained of the ill-treatment shown to her, and exposed the conspiracies against her, which had been continued by a secret agent, the baron de Ompteda, of Milan. Attempts at a reconciliation produced no favourable result. She at length adopted the bold resolution to return to England, where she was neither expected nor wished for by the ministry, and, amidst the loudest expressions of the public joy, arrived from Calais, June 5th, and, the next day, entered London in triumph. The minister, lord Liverpool, now accused the queen, before the parliament, for the purpose of exposing her to universal contempt as an adulteress. Whatever the investigation of the parliament may have brought to light, the public voice was louder than ever in favour of the queen; and, after a protracted investigation, the bill of pains and penalties was passed to a third reading, only by a majority of 123 to 95; and the ministers deemed it prudent to delay proceeding with the bill for six months, which was equivalent to withdrawing it. Thus ended this revolting process, which was, throughout, a flagrant outrage on public decency. In this trial, Mr. Brougham acted as the queen's attorney-general, Mr. Denman as her solicitor, and Drs. Lushington, Williams, and Wilde, as her counsel. Though banished from the court of the king, her husband, the queen still lived at Brandenburg House, in a manner suitable to her rank, under the protection of the nation. In July, 1821, at the coronation of George IV., she first requested to be crowned, then to be present at the ceremony. But, by an order of the privy-council, both requests were denied, and, notwithstanding the assistance of the opposition, she suffered the personal humiliation of being repeatedly refused admission into Westminster Abbey. She then published, in the public papers, her protest against the order of the privy-council. Soon after her husband's departure to Ireland, July 30th, in consequence of the violent agitation of her mind, she was suddenly taken sick in Drury-lane theatre. An inflammation of the bowels (enteritis) succeeded, and she foretold her own death before the physicians apprehended such an event. She died Aug. 7th, 1821. The corpse, according to her last will, was removed to Brunswick, where it rests among the remains of her ancestors. Her tombstone has a very short inscription, in which she is called the unhappy queen of England. The removing and the entombing of her mortal remains gave rise to many disturbances, first in London, and afterwards in Brunswick. These were founded more in opposition to the arbitrary measures of the ministry than in respect for the memory of the queen. Two causes operated much in favour of the queen—the unpopularity of the ministry, and the general feeling that the king was perhaps the last man in the whole kingdom who had a right to complain of the inconvinencies of his wife, which many, even of her friends, undoubtedly believed.

CAREW, LADY ELIZABETH,

AUTHOR of a dramatic piece entitled "Mariam, the fair Queen of Jewry," which was published in 1613, lived in the reign of James I. of England. Lady Carew is supposed to have been the wife of Sir Henry Carew: and the works of several of her contemporaries are dedicated to her. The following chorus, in the tragedy of "Mariam," is noble in sentiment, and possesses beautiful simplicity. It is in Act the Fourth,

REVENGE OF INJURIES.

The fairest action of our human life
Is scorning to revenge an injury;
For who forgives without a further strife,
His adversary's heart to him doth tie.
And 'tis a firmer conquest truly said,
To win the heart, than overthrow the head.

If we a worthy enemy do find,
To yield to worth it must be nobly done;
But if of baser metal be his mind,
In base revenge there is no honour won.
Who would a worthy courage overthrow,
And who would wrestle with a worthless foe?

We say our hearts are great, and cannot yield;
Because they cannot yield, it proves them poor.
Great hearts are task'd beyond their power, but self
The weakest lion will the loudest roar.
Truth's school for certain doth this same allow,
High-heartedness doth sometimes teach to bow.

A noble heart doth teach a virtuous scorn
To scorn to owe a duty over long;
To scorn to be for benefits forborne;
To scorn to lie, to scorn to do a wrong.
To scorn to bear an injury in mind;
To scorn a free-born heart slave-like to bind.

But if for wrongs we needs revenge must have,
Then be our vengeance of the noblest kind;
Do we his body from our fury save,
And let our hate prevail against our mind? —
What can 'gainst him a greater vengeance be,
Than make his foe more worthy far than he?

Had Mariam scorn'd to leave a due unpaid,
She would to Herod then have paid her love,
And not have been by sullen passion sway'd.
To fix her thoughts all injury above
Is virtuous pride. Had Mariam thus been proud,
Long famous life to her had been allow'd.

CARTER, ELIZABETH,

Was the daughter of Dr. Nicholas Carter, an eminent Latin, Greek, and Hebrew scholar, one of the six preachers in Canterbury cathedral, and perpetual curate of Deal, in Kent, where Elizabeth was born, December 16th, 1717. She was educated by her father, who made no distinction between her and her brothers. She became very well acquainted with the learned languages, and also Italian, German, Spanish, and French. She was also a proficient in needle-work, music, and other feminine accomplishments. Her first productions appeared in the "Gentlemen's Magazine" under the signature of Eliza. In 1738 she published some poems, and a translation from the Italian of Algarotti, "An Explanation of Newton's Philosophy, for the use of Ladies, in Six Dialogues on Sight and Colours." These publications appearing when Miss Carter was only twenty-one, gave her immediate celebrity, and brought her into correspondence with most of the learned of her day. Among others, Bishop Butler, author of the "Analogy," Archbishop Locker, Dr. Johnson, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and Burke. Dr. Johnson said, when speaking of an eminent scholar, that "he understood Greek better than any one he had ever known except Elizabeth Carter."

Among the numerous friends who appreciated the talents of this amiable lady, was one friend of her own sex, Miss Catharine Talbot, who was kindred in feeling, as well as gifted with genius to sympathize in the pursuits of Miss Carter. A correspondence by letter was soon established between these two ladies, which continued for nearly thirty years, and was only terminated by the death of Miss Talbot in 1770. A portion of these letters has been published, in four volumes, forming a work of much interest, and teaching by its spirit of Christian philosophy many valuable lessons to their own sex, especially to young ladies. In one of her letters, Miss Carter thus pleasantly describes her general mode of spending her time:

LETTER FROM MISS CARTER TO MISS TALBOT.

"As you desire a full and particular account of my whole life and conversation, it is necessary, in the first place, you should be made acquainted with the singular contrivance by which I am called in the morning. There is a bell placed at the head of my bed, and to this is fastened a packthread and a piece of lead, which, when I am not "Lulled by soft Zephyrs through the broken pane," is conveyed through a crevice of my window into a garden below, pertaining to the sexton, who gets up between four and five, and pulls the said packthread with as much heart and good will as if he were ringing my knell. By this most curious contrivance, I make a shift to get up, which I am too stupid to do without calling. Some evil-minded people of my acquaintance have most wickedly threatened to cut my bell-rope, which would be the utter undoing of me; for I should infallibly sleep out the whole summer.

And now I am up, you may belike enquire to what purpose. I sit down to my several lessons as regularly as a school-boy, and lay in a stock of learning to make a figure with at breakfast; but for this I am not ready. My general practice about six is, take up my stick and walk, sometimes alone, and sometimes with a companion, whom I call on in my way, and draw out half asleep, and consequently incapable of reflecting on the danger of such an undertaking; for to be sure she might just as well trust herself to the guidance of a jack-a-lantern. However, she has the extreme consolation of grumbling as much as she pleases without the least interruption, which she does with such a variety of comical phrases, that I generally laugh from the beginning to the end of my journey.

When I have made myself fit to appear among human creatures, we go to breakfast, and are, as you imagined, extremely chatty; and this, and tea in the afternoon, are the most sociable and delightful parts of the day. * * * We have a great variety of topics, in which everybody bears a part, till we get insensibly to books; and whenever we get beyond Latin and French, my sister and the rest walk off, and leave my father and me to finish the discourse and the tea-kettle by ourselves, which we should infallibly do, if it held as much as Solomon's molten sea. I fancy I have a privilege in talking a great deal over the tea-table, as I am tolerably silent the rest of the day.

After breakfast every one follows their several employments. My first care is to water the pinks and roses, which are stuck in above twenty parts of my room, and when the task is finished, I sit down to a spinnet, which, in its best state, might have cost about twenty shillings, with as much importance as if I knew how to play. After deafening myself for about half an hour with all manner of noises, I proceed to some other amusement, that employs me about the same time; for longer I seldom apply to any thing; and thus, between reading, working, writing, twirling the globes, and running up and down stairs, to see where everybody is, and how they do, which furnishes me with little intervals of talk, I seldom want either business or entertainment.

Of an afternoon I sometimes go out, not so often, however, as in civility I ought to do, for it is always some mortification to me not to drink tea at home. It is the fashion here for people to make such unreasonably long visits, that before they are half over I grow so restless and corky, that I am ready to fly out of the window. About eight o'clock I visit a very agreeable family, where I have spent every evening for these fourteen years. I always return precisely at ten, beyond which hour, I do not desire to see the face of any living wight; and thus I finish my day, and this tedious description of it, which you have so unfortunately drawn upon yourself."

The letter was dated in 1746, when Miss Carter was not quite twenty-nine. She was never married, and, after becoming matronly in years, she assumed the title of a married lady, and was styled Mrs. Elizabeth Carter. There are in her familiar letters many particulars of her daily habits of life, and also expressions of her opinion on subjects connected with which every person is more or less interested. Among other things she often remarked that varying her occupations prevented her from ever being tired of them; and accordingly she hardly ever read or worked for more than half an hour at a time, and then she would visit, for a few minutes, any of her relations who were staying in her house, in their respective apartments, or go into her garden to water her flowers. Before this period she had, however, studied very assiduously.

Her regular rule was, when in health, to read two chapters in the Bible before breakfast, a sermon, some Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and after breakfast something in every language with which she was acquainted; thus never allowing herself to forget what she had once attained. These occupations were of course varied according to circumstances, and when she took exercise before breakfast her course of reading was necessarily deferred till later in the day.

Her constitution must have been strong to have enabled her to take the very long walks to which she accustomed herself; but she suffered greatly from headaches, not improbably arising from her over-exertion of body and mind in early youth, and the not allowing herself sufficient repose to recruit her over-worked strength. At one time of her life she was wont to sit up very late, and as she soon became drowsy, and would sleep soundly in her chair, many were the expedients she adopted to keep herself awake, such as pouring cold water down her dress, tying a wet bandage round her head, &c. She was a great snuff-taker, though she endeavoured to break herself of the habit to please her father. She suffered so much, however, in the attempt, that he kindly withdrew his prohibition.

Mrs. Carter was not much more than thirty when she undertook to finish the education of her youngest brother Henry, which had been commenced by her father. She completed her task so well, that he entered Bennet College, Cambridge, in 1756, and passed through the University with reputation. He had afterwards the living of Little Wittenham, in Berkshire.

In order to devote herself more exclusively to this occupation, she, for some years previous to the completion of his education, resisted all temptations to leave Deal, and refused all invitations to spend a portion of the winter with her friends in town, as had been her general practice. Part of this retirement was devoted to the translation of "Epictetus," her greatest work, by which her reputation was much increased, and her fame spread among the literati of the day. This work was commenced in the summer of 1749, at the desire of Miss Talbot, enforced by the bishop of Oxford, to whom the sheets were transmitted for emendations as soon as finished. It was not originally intended for publication, and was therefore not completed till 1756, when it was published with notes and an introduction by herself, by subscription, in 1758. Mrs. Carter, besides fame and reputation, obtained for this performance more than one thousand pounds. A poem, by her friend, Mrs. Chapone, was prefixed to it.

After the publication of "Epictetus," Mrs. Carter became, for one of her prudent habits, quite easy in her circumstances, and usually passed her winters in London. In 1767, lady Pulteney settled an annuity of a hundred pounds on Mrs. Carter; and some years afterwards our authoress visited Paris for a few days.

In 1762, she purchased a house in Deal, her native town. Her father had always rented a house; but he removed to hers, and they resided together till his death in 1774. They had each a separate library and apartments, and meeting seldom but at meals, though living together with much comfort and affection. Her brothers and sisters were married, and gone from their father's house; Elizabeth, the studious daughter, only remained to watch over and supply all the wants of her aged father. She attended assiduously to every household duty, and never complained of the trouble or confinement. To a friend who lamented that Mrs. Carter was thus obliged to be careful and troubled about many things, she thus answers:

"It is proper I should be rather more confined at home, and I cannot be so much at the disposal of my friends as when my sister supplied my place at home. As to anything of this kind hurting the dignity of my head, I have no idea of it, even if the head were of much more consequence than I feel it to be. The true post of honour consists in the discharge of those duties, whatever they happen to be, which arise from that situation in which Providence has fixed us, and which we may be assured is the very situation best calculated for our virtue and happiness."

About nine years before her death, she experienced an alarming illness, of which she never recovered the effects in bodily strength; but the faculties of her mind remained unimpaired. In the summer of 1805, her weakness evidently increased. From that time until February, 1806, her strength gradually ebbed away; and on the morning of the 19th, she expired without a groan.

The portrait of Mrs. Carter, which her nephew and biographer, the Rev. Mr. Pennington, has taken, is very captivating. The wisdom of age, without its coldness; the cool head, with the affectionate heart; a sobriety which chastened conversation without destroying it; a cheerfulness which enlivened piety without wounding it; a steady effort to maintain a conscience void of offence, and to let religion suffer nothing in her exhibition of it to the world. Nor is her religion to be searched for only in the humility with which she received, and the thankfulness with which she avowed, the doctrines of the Bible, but in the sincerity with which she followed out those principles to their practical consequences, and lived as she believed. Very wide, indeed, from the line which they have taken, will the cold, formal, and speculative professors of the present day, find the conduct of Mrs. Carter. We hear her in one place charging upon her friend Mrs. Montague, the necessity to enlist her fine talents in the cause of religion, instead of wasting them upon literary vanities. In another, we hear her exposing the pretensions of that religion, which does not follow men into the circle in which they live; and loudly questioning, whether piety can at once be seated in the heart, and yet seldom force its way to the lips.

We see her scrupulously intent on turning the conversation of dinner-tables into such channels as might, at least, benefit the servants in attendance. This delicacy of moral sentiment, which feels a stain in religion like a wound, which deems nothing trifling that has to do with the soul, which sets God at our right hand, not only in the temple but in the drawing-room, is, doubtless, an indication of a heart visited of God, and consecrated to his service. Among her studies there was one which she never neglected; one which was always dear to her, from her earliest infancy to the latest period of her life, and in which she made a continual improvement. This was that of religion, which was her constant care and greatest delight. Her acquaintance with the Bible, some part of which she never failed to read every day, was as complete, as her belief in it was sincere. And no person ever endeavoured more, and few with greater success, to regulate the whole of their conduct by that unerring guide. She assisted her devotion also, by assiduously reading the best sermons, and other works, upon that most interesting subject. Her piety was never varying; constant, fervent, but not enthusiastic.

Mrs. Carter is an eminent example of what may be done by industry and application. Endowed by nature with no very brilliant talents, yet by perseverance she acquired a degree of learning which must be considered as surprising. The daughter of a respectable country clergyman, with a large family and limited income, by her unaffected piety, moral excellence, and literary attainments, she secured to herself the friendship and esteem of the great and the wealthy, the learned and the good. In early youth her society was sought by many who were elevated above her in a worldly point of view; and instead of the cheerless, neglected old maid, we view her in declining life surrounded by

"That which should accompany old age,
As honour, love, obedience, troops of friends."

Her friends were numerous, distinguished for wealth and rank, as well as talents and learning. She was particularly happy in her female friends. Mrs. Montague, Mrs. Vesey, Miss Talbot, the first and dearest, and Mrs. Chapone, were among her most intimate associates. We will give some extracts from the great work which was the making of her fortune, namely, her translation of "Epictetus." These will serve to show the sentiments which were her study during the best years of her life. Those ladies who wish to obtain fame will see how severe was the task Mrs. Carter performed to secure it.

EXTRACTS FROM "EPICTETUS."

That we are not to be angry with Mankind.

1.

What is the cause of assent to any thing?

Its appearing to be true.

It is not possible, therefore, to assent to what appears to be not true.

Why?

Because it is the very nature of the understanding to agree to truth; to be dissatisfied with falsehood; and to suspend its belief in doubtful cases.

What is the proof of this?

Persuade yourself, if you can, that it is now night.

Impossible.

Unpersuade yourself that it is day.

Impossible.

Persuade yourself that the stars are, or are not even.

Impossible.

When any one, then, assents to what is false, be assured that he doth not wilfully assent to it as false, (for as Plato affirms, the soul is never voluntarily deprived of truth): but what is false appears to him to be true. Well, then: Have we, in actions, any thing correspondent to true and false, in propositions?

Duty, and contrary to duty; advantageous, and disadvantageous; suitable, and unsuitable: and the like.

A person then, cannot think a thing advantageous to him, and not choose it.

He cannot. But how says Medea?

"I know what evils wait my dreadful purpose;
But vanquish'd reason yields to powerful rage."

Because she thought that very indulgence of her rage, and the punishing her husband, more advantageous than the preservation of her children.

Yes: but she is deceived.

Show clearly to her that she is deceived, and she will forbear: but, till you have shown it, what is she to follow but what appears to herself?

Nothing.

Why then are you angry with her, that the unhappy woman is deceived in the most important points; and instead of a human creature, becomes a viper? Why do you not rather, as we pity the blind and lame, so likewise pity those who are blinded and lamed in their superior faculties?

2.

Every habit and faculty is preserved and increased by correspondent actions; as the habit of walking, by walking; of running, by running. If you would be a reader, read; if a writer, write. But if you do not read for a month together, but do somewhat else, you will see what will be the consequence. So, after sitting still for ten days, get up and attempt to take a long walk; and you will find how your legs are weakened. Upon the whole then, whatever you would make habitual, practise it: and if you would not make a thing habitual, do not practise it; but habituate yourself to something else.

It is the same with regard to the operations of the soul. Whenever you are angry, be assured that it is not only a present evil, but that you have increased a habit, and added fuel to the fire.

From the "Enchiridion."

1.

Remember that you are an actor in a drama, of such kind as the author pleases to make it. If short, of a short one; if long, of a long one. If it be his pleasure you should act a poor man, a cripple, a governor, or a private person, see that you act it naturally. For this is your business, to act well the character assigned you: to choose it, is another's.

2.

If you have an earnest desire of attaining to philosophy, prepare yourself from the very first, to be laughed at; to be sneered at by the multitude; to hear them say, "He is returned to us a philosopher all at once;" and "whence this supercilious look?" Now for your part, do not have a supercilious look indeed; but keep steadily to those things which appear best to you, as one appointed by God to this station. For remember, that if you adhere to the same point, those very persons who at first ridiculed, will afterwards admire you. But if you are conquered by them, you will incur a double ridicule.

3.

Women from fourteen years old are flattered with the title of mistresses, by the men. Therefore perceiving that they are regarded only as qualified to give the men pleasure, they begin to adorn themselves; and in that to place all their hopes. It is worth while, therefore, to fix our attention on making them sensible that they are esteemed for nothing else but the appearance of a decent, and modest, and discreet behaviour.

4.

No one who is a lover of money, a lover of pleasure, or a lover of glory, is likewise a lover of mankind; but only he who is a lover of virtue.

5.

As you would not wish to sail in a large, and finely decorated, and gilded ship, and sink; so neither is it eligible to inhabit a grand and sumptuous house, and be in a storm [of passions and cares.]

6.

When we are invited to an entertainment, we take what we find: and if any one should bid the master of the house to set fish, or tarts, before him, he would be thought absurd. Yet, in the world, we ask the gods for what they do not give us; and that though they have given us so many things.

7.

Patients are displeased with a physician who doth not prescribe for them; and think he gives them over. And why are none so affected towards a philosopher, as to conclude he despairs of their recovery to a right way of thinking, if he tells them nothing which may be for their good?

8.

Examine yourself, whether you had rather be rich, or happy: and if rich, be assured that this is neither a good, nor altogether in your own power: but if happy, that this is both a good, and in your own power: since the one is a temporary loan of fortune, and the other depends on choice.

9.

As it is better to lie straitened for room upon a little couch in health, than to toss upon a wide bed in sickness; so it is better to contract yourself within the compass of a small fortune, and be happy, than to have a great one, and be wretched.

10.

It is better, by yielding to truth, to conquer opinion; than by yielding to opinion, to be defeated by truth.

11.

If you seek truth, you will not seek to conquer by all possible means: and, when you have found truth, you will have a security against being conquered.

12.

Truth conquers by itself; opinion, by foreign aids.

13.

In prosperity, it is very easy to find a friend. in adversity, nothing is so difficult.

14.

Time delivers fools from grief: and reason, wise men.

15.

He is a man of sense who doth not grieve for what he hath not; but rejoiceth in what he hath.

16.

Epictetus being asked, how a person might grieve his enemy, answered, "By doing as well as possible himself."

CASALINA, LUCIA,

WAS a celebrated Italian portrait-painter, a disciple of Guiseppe dal Sole.

CASSANA, MARIA VITTORIA,

AN Italian painter, was the sister of the two Venetian artists, Nicolo and Giovanni Agostino Cassana. She died in the beginning of the 18th century. She painted chiefly devotional pieces for private families.

CASTELNAU, HENRIETTE JULIE DE,

DAUGHTER of the Marquis de Castelnau, governor of Brest, was born in 1670. She married count de Murat, colonel of infantry, brigadier of the armies of the king. Her levity and love of pleasure injured her reputation. After her husband's death, the king exiled her to Auch; but when the duke of Orleans became regent, she was recalled. She died the following year, 1716. She wrote several prose works; among others, "La Comtesse de Châteaubriand, or the Effects of Jealousy," and "The Sprites of the Castle of Kernosi." She also wrote fairy tales, and several poems.

CASTRO, ANNE DE,

A SPANISH lady, author of many ingenious works; amongst others, one entitled "Eterniel ad del Rei Filippi III.," printed at Madrid, 1629. The famous Lopez de Vega has celebrated this lady in his writings.

CATALANI, ANGELICA,

By marriage Valabrèque, a celebrated singer, was born in 1784, at Sinigaglia, in the Ecclesiastical States, and educated at the convent of St. Lucia, near Rome. Angelica displayed, in her seventh year, such wonderful musical talents, and such multitudes came to hear her, that the magistrates prohibited her singing longer in the convent. But the favour of a cardinal, and the love of the celebrated Bosello, enabled her to cultivate her talents. When fourteen, she appeared in the theatres at Venice and other Italian cities. She was afterwards for five years at Lisbon. Her first concert at Madrid gained her more than 15,000 dollars; and from her concerts in Paris her fame spread all over Europe. In London, she received the first year a salary of 72,000 francs, and the next, 96,000 francs; besides the immense sums she obtained from her journeys through the country towns. In 1817, she undertook the direction of the Italian opera in Paris, but left it on the return of Napoleon, and resumed it on the restoration of the king. In 1816, she visited the chief cities of Germany and Italy. She passed the most of her time in travelling and singing throughout Europe, till about 1830, when she retired to an estate in Italy, where she lived very much secluded. She was married to M. Valabrègue, formerly a captain in the French service, by whom she had several children. She was a handsome woman, and a good actress. Her voice was wonderful from its flexibility and brilliancy. She died in June, 1849.

CATELLAN, MARIE CLAIRE PRISCILLE MARGUERITE DE,

A LADY of Narbonne, who died at Toulouse, 1745, aged eighty-three. Her odes were admired by the French, and were crowned by the Toulouse academicians.

CATHARINE DE MEDICIS,

QUEEN of France, was the only daughter of Lorenzo de Medicis, duke d'Urbino, by Magdalen de la Tour, and was born at Florence in 1519. Being early left an orphan, she was brought up by her great-uncle cardinal Giulio de Medici, afterwards Pope Clement VI. In 1534, she was married to Henry, duke d'Orleans, son of Francis I. of France. Catharine was one of the chief ornaments of the splendid court of her father-in-law, where the graces of her person and her mental accomplishments shone with inimitable lustre. At the same time, though so young, she practised all those arts of dissimulation and complaisance which were necessary to ingratiate her with so many persons of opposite characters and interests. She even lived upon terms of intimacy with Diana de Poitiers, her husband's mistress. In 1547, Henry became king, under the title of Henry II. Though childless the first ten years of her marriage, Catharine subsequently bore her husband ten children. Three of her sons became kings of France, and one daughter, Margaret, married Henry of Navarre. During her husband's life, she possessed but little influence in public affairs, and was chiefly employed in instructing her children, and acquiring that ascendancy over them, by which she so long preserved the supreme authority.

She was left a widow in 1559, and her son, Francis II., a weak youth of sixteen, succeeded to the crown. He had married Mary, queen of Scotland, and her uncles, the Guises, had the chief management of affairs during this reign, which was rendered turbulent and bloody by the violent persecutions of the Huguenots. Catharine could only preserve a degree of authority by acting with the Guises; yet, that their furious policy did not agree with her inclinations, may be inferred from her raising the virtuous Michael de l'Hospitai to the chancellorship.

Francis II. died in 1560, and was succeeded by his brother, Charles IX., then eleven years of age. Catharine possessed the authority, though not the title, of regent; and, in order to counterbalance the power of the Guises, she inclined to the party of the king of Navarre, a Protestant, and the associated princes. A civil war ensued, which was excited by the duke de Guise, who thereby became the favourite of the Catholics; but he being killed in 1562, a peace was made between the two parties. Catharine was now decidedly at the head of affairs, and began to display all the extent of her dark and dissembling politics. She paid her court to the Catholics, and, by repeated acts of injustice and oppression, she forced the Huguenots into another civil war. A truce succeeded, and to this a third war, which terminated in a peace favourable to the Huguenots, which was thought sincere and lasting. But the queen had resolved to destroy by treachery those whom she could not subdue by force of arms. A series of falsehoods and dissimulations, almost unparalleled in history, was practised by Catharine and her son, whom she had initiated in every art of disguise, in order to lull the fears and suspicions of the Protestants, and prepare the way for the massacre of St. Bartholomew's day, 1571. Many of the leaders of the Protestants were attracted to Paris by the kindness and attention shown them by the king and his mother; indeed, so far did they carry their duplicity, that several of the Catholics were alarmed. When the fatal day drew nigh, Charles, who had been constantly urged on by his mother, appeared to recoil from the atrocity of the plot, and hesitated; Catharine exerted all her powers to stifle his compunction, and at length succeeded.

"Well," said he, "since it must be so, I will not let one remain to reproach me;" and immediately gave orders for the commencement of the carnage. The destruction of the Calvinists was everywhere decreed, and, though many escaped, more than forty-five thousand persons are said to have been massacred in Paris and the provinces.

Charles, recovering from the frenzy which his mother had excited, fell into a profound melancholy, from which he never recovered. He died in 1574, and Catharine was made regent till her favourite son, Henry III., returned from Poland, of which country he had been elected king. At this juncture, she displayed great vigour and ability in preventing those disturbances which the violent state of parties was calculated to produce, and she delivered the kingdom to her son in a ceciditor, which, had he been wise and virtuous, might have secured him a happy reign. But a son and pupil of Catharine could only have the semblance of good qualities, and her own character must have prevented any confidence in measures which she directed.

The party of the Guises rose again; the league was formed, war was renewed with the Protestants; and all things tended to greater disorder than before. The attachment of Henry to his minions, and the popularity of the Guises, destroyed the authority of Catharine, and she had henceforth little more than the sad employment of looking on and lamenting her son's misgovernment, and the wretched conclusion of her system of crooked and treacherous policy. She died in January, 1589, at the age of seventy, loaded with the hatred of all parties. On her deathbed, she gave her son some excellent advice, very different from her former precepts and example; urging him to attach to himself Henry of Navarre and the other princes of the blood, by regard and kind usage, and to grant liberty of conscience for the good of the state.

Catharine was affable, courteous, and magnificent; she liberally encouraged learning and the polite arts; she also possessed extraordinary courage and presence of mind, strength of judgment and fertility of genius. But by her extreme duplicity, and by her alternately joining every party, she lost the confidence of all. Scarcely preserving the decorum of her sex, she was loose and voluptuous in her own conduct, and was constantly attended by a train of beauties, whose complaisant charms she employed in gaining over those whom she could not influence by the common allurements of interest. Nearly indifferent to the modes of religion, she was very superstitious, and believed in magic and astrology.

The depth of her dissimulation, and the savage pleasure or indifference with which she viewed the cruelties she had dictated, have been shown in this sketch of her life. Perhaps the heaviest charge against her is, the detestable principles in which she brought up her children, whom she early inured to blood and perfidy, while she weakened their minds by debauchery, that she might the longer retain her power over them. She, however, lived long enough to witness the sorrowful consequences of this conduct, and to learn that the distrust and hatred of all parties attended her. Catharine resembled no one so much as her own countryman, Cæsar Borgia, in her wonderful powers of mind, and talents of gaining ascendancy over the minds of others. She resembled him also in the detestable purposes to which she applied her great genius. Had she been as good as she was gifted, no other individual of her sex could have effected so much for the happiness of France.

CATHARINE PARR,

SIXTH and last wife of Henry VIII., was the eldest daughter of Sir Thomas Parr of Kendal, and was at an early age distinguished for her learning and good sense. She was first married to Edward Burgh, and secondly to John Neville lord Latimer; and after his death attracted the notice and admiration of Henry VIII., whose queen she became in 1543. Her zealous encouragement of the reformed religion excited the anger and jealousy of Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, the chancellor Wriothesley, and others of the popish faction, who conspired to ruin her with the king. Taking advantage of one of his moments of irritation, they accused her of heresy and treason, and prevailed upon the king to sign a warrant for her committal to the Tower. This being accidentally discovered to her, she repaired to the king, who purposely turned the conversation to religious subjects, and began to sound her opinions. Aware of his purpose, she humbly replied, "that on such topics she always, as became her sex and station, referred herself to his majesty; as he, under God, was her only supreme head and governor here on earth."

"Not so, by St. Mary, Kate," replied Henry, "you are, as we take it, become a doctor, to instruct, and not to be instructed by us."

Catharine judiciously replied, that she only objected in order to be benefited by his superior learning and knowledge.

"Is it so, sweetheart?" said the king; "and tended your arguments to no worse end? Then we are perfect friends again."

On the day appointed for sending her to the Tower, while walking in the garden, and conversing pleasantly together, the chancellor, who was ignorant of the reconciliation, advanced with the guards. The king drew him aside, and after some conversation, exclaimed in a rage: "Knave, aye: avaunt knave, a fool and a beast."

Catharine, ignorant of his errand, entreated his pardon for her sake.

"Ah! poor soul!" said Henry, "thou little knowest how ill he deserves this at thy hands. On my word, sweetheart, he hath been toward thee an arrant knave, so let him go."

On the death of the king, he left her a legacy of four thousand pounds, besides her jointure, "for her great love, obedience, chasteness of life, and wisdom."

She afterwards espoused the lord admiral sir Thomas Seymour, uncle to Edward VI.; but these nuptials proved unhappy, and involved her in troubles and difficulties. She died in childbirth in 1548, not without suspicion of poison.

She was a zealous promoter of the Reformation, and with several other ladies of the court secretly patronized Anne Askew, who was tortured, but in vain, to discover the names of her court friends. With the view of putting the Scriptures into the hands of the people, Catharine employed persons of learning to translate into English the paraphrase of Erasmus on the New Testament, and engaged the lady Mary, afterwards queen, to translate the paraphrase on St. John, and wrote a Latin epistle to her on the subject. Among her papers after her death was found a composition, entitled "Queen Catharine Parr's Lamentations of a Sinner, bewailing the ignorance of her blind Life," and was a contrite meditation on the years she had passed in popish fasts and pilgrimages. It was published with a preface by the great lord Burleigh in 1548. In her lifetime she published a volume of "Prayers or Meditations, wherein the mind is stirred patiently to suffer all afflictions here, and to set at nought the vaine prosperitie of this worlde, and also to long for the everlasting felicitie." Many of her letters have been printed.

CATHARINE OF BRAGANZA,

WIFE of Charles II., king of England, and daughter of John IV. of Portugal, was born in 1638. In 1661, she was married to Charles II., in whose court she long endured all the neglect and mortification his dissolute conduct was calculated to inflict on her. This endurance was rendered more difficult by her having no children; but she supported her situation with great equanimity.

Lord Clarendon says of Catharine—"The queen had beauty and wit enough to make herself agreeable to the king; yet she had been, according to the mode and discipline of her country, bred in a monastery, where she had seen only the women who attended her, and conversed with the religious who resided there; and, without doubt, in her inclinations, was enough disposed to have been one of the number. And from this restraint she was called out to be a great queen, and to a free conversation in a court that was to be upon the matter new formed, and reduced from the manners of a licentious age, to the old rules and limits which had been observed in better times; to which regular and decent conformity the present disposition of men and women was not enough inclined to submit, nor the king to exact. After some struggle she submitted to the king's licentious conduct, and from that time lived on easy terms with him till his death." After Charles died, Catharine was treated with much respect.

In 1693, she returned to Portugal, where, in 1704, she was made regent by her brother, Don Pedro, whose increasing infirmities rendered retirement necessary. In this situation, Catharine showed considerable abilities, carrying on the war with Spain with great firmness and success. She died in 1705.

CATHARINE ALEXIEONA,

A COUNTRY girl of the name of Martha, which was changed to Catharine when she embraced the Greek religion and became empress of Russia, was born of very indigent parents, who lived at Ringen, a small village not far from Dorpt, on lake Viteherve, in Livonia. When only three years old she lost her father, who left her with no other support than the scanty maintenance produced by the labours of an infirm and sickly mother. She grew up handsome, well formed, and possessed of a good understanding. Her mother taught her to read, and an old Lutheran clergyman, named Gluck, instructed her in the principles of that persuasion. Scarcely had she attained her fifteenth year when she lost her mother, and the good pastor took her home, and employed her in attending his children. Catharine availed herself of the lessons in music and dancing given them by their masters; but the death of her benefactor, which happened not long after her reception into his family, plunged her once more into the extremity of poverty; and her country being now the seat of the war between Sweden and Russia, she went to seek an asylum at Marienburg.

In 1701, she married a dragoon of the Swedish garrison of that fortress, and, if we may believe some authors, the very day of their marriage, Marienburg was besieged by the Russians, and the lover, while assisting to repel the attack, was killed. Marienburg was at last carried by assault; when General Bauer, seeing Catharine among the prisoners, and being smitten with her youth and beauty, took her to his house, where she superintended his domestic affairs. Soon afterwards she was removed into the family of Prince Menzhikoff, who was no less struck with the attractions of the fair captive, and she lived with him till 1704; when, in the seventeenth year of her age, she became the mistress of Peter the Great, and won so much on his affections, that he married her on the 29th of May, 1712. The ceremony was secretly performed at Yaverhof, in Poland, in the presence of General Brure; and on the 20th of February, 1724, it was publicly solemnized with great pomp at St. Petersburg, on which occasion she received the diadem and sceptre from the hands of her husband. Peter died the following year, and she was proclaimed sovereign empress of all the Russias. She showed herself worthy of this high station by completing the grand designs which the czar had begun. The first thing she did on her accession was to cause every gallows to be taken down, and all instruments of torture destroyed. She instituted a new order of knighthood, in honour of St. Alexander Nefski; and performed many actions worthy of a great mind. She died the 17th of May, 1727, at the age of thirty-eight.

She was a princess of excellent qualities of mind and heart. She attended Peter the Great in his expeditions, and rendered him essential services in the unfortunate affair of Pruth: it was she who advised the czar to tempt the vizier with presents, which he did with success. It cannot be denied, however, that she had an attachment which excited the jealousy of the czar. The favoured object was M. de la Croix, a chamberlain of the court, originally from France. The czar caused him to be decapitated on pretence of treason, and had his head stuck on a pike and put in one of the public places of St. Petersburg. In order that his empire might contemplate this at her leisure, he drove her across the place in all directions, and even to the foot of the scaffold, but she had address or firmness enough to restrain her tears. Catharine has been suspected of not being favourably disposed towards the czarovitch Alexius, who died under the displeasure of his father. As the eldest born, and by a former marriage, he excluded the children of Catharine from the succession; and this is perhaps the sole foundation for that report.

She was much beloved for her great humanity; she saved the lives of many, whom Peter, in the first impulse of his naturally cruel temper, had resolved to have executed. When fully determined on the death of any one, he would give orders for the execution during her absence. The czar was also subject to depression and horror of spirits sometimes amounting to frenzy. In these moments, Catharine alone dared to approach him; her presence, the sound of her voice, had an immediate effect upon him, and calmed the agony of his mind. Her temper was very gay and cheerful, and her manners winning. Her habits were somewhat intemperate, which is supposed to have hastened her end; but we must not forget in judging her for this gross appetite, that drunkenness was then the common habit of the nobles of Russia.

CATHARINE II., ALEXIEONA,

EMRESS of Russia, born May 2d, 1729, was the daughter of the prince of Anhalt-Zerbst, govornor of Stettin in Prussian Pomeania. Her name was Sophia Augusta von Anhalt. She married in 1745 her cousin Charles Frederic, duke of Holstein Gottorp, whom his aunt, the Empress Elizabeth of Russia, had chosen for her successor. In adopting the Greek communion, the religion of the Russians, he took the name of Peter, afterwards Peter III., and his consort that of Catharine Alexieona. It was an ill-assorted and unhappy match. Catharine was handsome, fond of pleasure, clever, ambitious, and bold. Her husband, greatly her inferior in abilities, was irresolute and imprudent. Catharine soon became disgusted with his weakness, and bestowed her affections upon Soltikoff, chamberlain to the grand-duke. This intrigue was discovered, but Catharine contrived to blind the Empress Elizabeth to her frailty. Soltikoff was, however, sent to Hamburg, as minister-plenipotentiary from Russia. Stanislaus Poniatowski, afterwards king of Poland, succeeded the chamberlain in the favour of the grand-duchess; and Elizabeth, who became daily more openly devoted to pleasure herself, only interfered when the scandal became so public that she felt herself obliged to do so, and Catharine was forbidden to see Poniatowski. Although jealously watched by Peter, the grand-duchess contrived to evade these orders, and Poniatowski often visited her in disguise.

In consequence of the many disagreements between them, as soon as Peter ascended the throne, rendered vacant by the death of Elizabeth on the 25th of December, 1761, he talked of repudiating Catharine, then residing in retirement at Peterhof, near St. Petersburg, and marrying his mistress, the Countess Woronzoff. Catharine determined to anticipate him by a bolder movement.

Although on his first accession Peter had shown, in many of his acts, true greatness and generosity of mind, yet he soon relapsed into his old habits of idleness and dissipation. While he was shut up with his favourites and mistress, the empress kept her court with mingled dignity and sweetness, studying especially to attract every man distinguished for his talents and courage. Hearing that the emperor was about to declare her son illegitimate, and adopt as his heir the unfortunate prince Ivan, whom Elizabeth had supplanted and kept in confinement since his infancy, she formed a confederacy, in which several noblemen, officers and ladies, joined; among others, her new favourite, Gregory Orloff, and the princess Daschkoff, sister to the countess Woronzoff, a young widow of eighteen, celebrated for her abilities, courage, and warlike disposition; the regiments of the garrison were gained by bribes and promises; the emperor was arrested, and Catharine was proclaimed sole empress of all the Russias, under the title of Catharine II. In July, 1762, after having reigned only six months, Peter signed an act of abdication. Six days afterwards, the conspirators, fearing a reaction in the army, went to Ropscha, where Peter was confined, and while drinking with him, fell suddenly upon him and strangled him. It does not appear that Catharine actually ordered the murder, but she showed no sorrow for it, and continued her favour to the murderers. She was solemnly crowned at Moscow, in 1762.

The first effort of the new empress was to establish peace with the foreign powers; her next was to secure the internal tranquillity of the empire. Although the nobles, incensed at the arrogance of the favourite, Alexis Orloff, raised a very serious rebellion, in which, but for Catharine's indomitable courage and presence of mind, she would have shared the fate of her husband, yet she contrived to suppress it, without even summoning a council. Combining policy with firmness, she found means to soothe the clergy, whom her ingratitude had incensed, and to restore quiet to her dominions. Though fond of pleasure, she never suffered amusement to interfere with business, or the pursuits of ambition. Her firmness was remarkable. "We should be constant in our plans," said she; "it is better to do amiss, than to change our purposes. None but fools are irresolute." Her fame was soon spread all over Europe.

Catharine abolished the secret-inquisition chancery, a court which had exercised the most dreadful power, and the use of torture. And, during her long reign, she avoided as much as possible capital punishment. She also, by a manifesto, published in August, 1763, declared that colonists should find welcome and support in Russia; she founded several hospitals, and a medical college at St. Petersburg; and though often harassed by plots, that were incessantly formed against her, she constantly occupied herself with the improvement and aggrandizement of her empire. A resolution she had taken to marry Orloff, nearly proved fatal to them both, and she was obliged to renounce it.

In 1764, Poniatowski, a former favourite of Catharine's, was, by her exertions and the army she sent into Poland, elected king of that country, under the name of Stanislaus Augustus. In the same year, occurred the murder of Ivan, grandson of Peter the Great, and rightful heir to the throne of Russia. He was twenty-three years of age; and although his constant captivity is said to have somewhat impaired his faculties, yet his existence caused so many disturbances, that it was clearly for Catharine's interest to have him assassinated. Catharine's instrumentality in this murder was not proved; but the assassins were protected, and advanced in the Russian service.

The beneficial consequences of the regulations of Catharine, became daily more apparent through all the empire. The government, more simply organized and animated with a new energy, displayed a spirit of independence worthy a great nation. Mistress of her own passions, Catharine knew how, by mingled mildness and firmness, to control those of others; and, whatever might be her own irregularities, she strictly discountenanced violations of decorum.

The perplexed and uncertain jurisprudence of Russia more particularly engaged her attention; and she drew up herself a code of laws, founded in truth and justice, which was submitted to deputies from all the Russian provinces. But the clause that proposed liberty to the boors, or serfs, met with so much opposition from the nobles, that the assembly had to be dismissed. In 1767, the empress sent learned men throughout her immense territories, to examine and report their soil, productions and wealth, and the manners and habits of the people. About the same time, the small-pox was raging in St. Petersburg, and Catharine submitted herself and her son to inoculation, as an example to the people.

In 1768, she engaged in a war with Turkey, which terminated successfully in 1774, and by which several new provinces were added to the Russian empire. But, during this period, the plague raged throughout the eastern countries of Europe to a great extent, and this disease is said to have carried off more than 100,000 of Catharine's subjects. While the war with Turkey was going on, the empress concluded with the king of Prussia and emperor of Austria, the infamous partition treaty, by which the first blow was given to the existence of Poland.

Orloff, who had been of the greatest assistance to Catharine during the war with Turkey, and the disturbances caused by the plague, again aspired to share with her the throne. Catharine bore with his caprices for some time, through her fondness for their child, a boy, who was privately reared in the suburbs of the city, but at length resolved to subdue an attachment become so dangerous to her peace; and having proposed to Orloff a clandestine marriage, which he disdainfully declined, she saw him leave her court without any apparent grief, and raised Vassiltschkoff, a young and handsome lieutenant, to his place in her affections. She loaded Orloff with magnificent presents in money and lands, and sent him to travel in Europe.

In 1773, Catharine married her son to the eldest daughter of the landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt. And in the following year, the advantageous peace with Turkey, and the great reputation she had acquired throughout Europe, placed her apparently at the summit of prosperity. But she was, nevertheless, kept in continual dread of losing her throne and her life. Threats of assassination were constantly thrown out against her; but she appeared in public, as usual, with a calm and composed demeanour.

Vassiltschkoff had, for nearly two years, filled the place of favourite with great success, but suddenly he was ordered to Moscow. He obeyed the mandate, and costly presents rewarded his docility. Orloff returned as suddenly, was received into favour, and reinstated in his former posts. Catharine, however, refused to banish, at the request of Orloff, Panin, her minister of foreign affairs, in whose ability and integrity she could entirely confide.

In 1773, a man resembling Peter III. was persuaded to personate him; the priests, opposed to Catharine's liberal policy, circulated everywhere the report that the murdered emperor was still living. The spirit of rebellion spread over the whole country, and it was only by the greatest firmness and energy that it was quelled. Soon after this, Orloff was superseded by Potemkin, an officer in the Russian army, who accompanied Catharine to Moscow. Here he attempted, but in vain, to induce her to marry him. She spent the next few years in carrying on the internal improvements of her country, and perfecting the government. The Poles, once conquered, she treated with a generosity and justice which put Austria and Prussia to shame. At this time Potemkin exercised an unlimited influence on the empress. In 1784, he succeeded in conquering the Crimea, to which he gave its ancient name of Tauris, and extended the confines of Russia to the Caucasus. Catharine, upon this, traversed the provinces which had revolted under Pugatscheff, and navigated the Wolga and Borysthenes, taking great interest in the expedition, as it was connected with some danger. She was desirous, likewise, of seeing Tauris; and Potemkin turned this journey into a triumphal march. Two sovereigns visited Catharine on her journey—the king of Poland, Stanislaus Augustus, and Joseph II., emperor of Austria. Throughout this royal progress of nearly one thousand leagues, nothing but feasts and spectacles of various kinds were to be seen.

Still pursuing her scheme of expelling the Turks from Europe, and reigning at Constantinople, Catharine, in 1783, seized on the Crimea, and annexed it to her empire. In 1787, the Porte declared war against her, and hostilities were continued till the treaty of Jassy was signed, January 9th, 1792, which restored peace. She indemnified herself by sharing in the dismemberment of Poland, which kingdom became extinct in 1795. She was on the point of turning her arms against republican France, when she died of apoplexy, November 9th, 1796.

Though as a woman the licentiousness of her character is inexcusable, yet as a sovereign she is well entitled to the appellation of great. After Peter I., she was the chief regenerator of Russia, but with a more enlightened mind, and under more favourable circumstances. She established schools, ameliorated the condition of the serfs, promoted commerce, founded towns, arsenals, banks, and manufactories, and encouraged art and literature. She corresponded with learned men in all countries, and wrote, herself, "Instructions for a Code of Laws," besides several dramatic pieces, and "Moral Tales," for her grandchildren. Her son Paul succeeded her.

She was very handsome and dignified in her person. Her eyes were blue and piercing, her hair auburn, and though not tall, her manner of carrying her head made her appear so. She seems to have obtained the love as well as reverence of her subjects, which, setting aside her mode of acquiring the throne, is not wonderful, seeing that her vices as a ruler were those deemed conventional among sovereigns, namely, ambition and a thirst for aggrandizement, unshackled by humanity or principle.

CATHARINE PAULOWNA,

QUEEN of Würtemberg, grand-princess of Russia, was born May 21st, 1788. She was the younger sister of Alexander, emperor of Russia, and married, in 1809, George, prince of Holstein-

Oldenburg, and thus avoided compliance with a proposal of marriage made her by Napoleon. She had two sons by this marriage; her husband died in Russia, in 1812. Catharine was distinguished for her beauty, talents, resolution, and her attachment to her brother Alexander. After 1812, she was frequently his companion in his campaigns, as well as during his residence in France and Vienna, and evidently had an important influence on several of his measures. January 24th, 1816, Catharine married, from motives of affection, William, crown-prince of Würtemberg; and after the death of his father, in October, 1816, they ascended the throne of Würtemberg. She was a generous benefactor to her subjects during the famine of 1816. She formed female associations, established an agricultural society, laboured to promote the education of the people, and founded valuable institutions for the poor. She instituted a school for females of the higher classes, and savings banks for the lower classes. She was inclined to be arbitrary, and had but little taste for the fine arts. She had two daughters by her second marriage; and she died January 9th, 1819.

CENCI, BEATRICE.

COUNT Nicola Cenci was the chief of one of the most ancient patrician families of the Roman States. In early life he embraced the ecclesiastic vocation, but finding himself the last of his noble race, he obtained a dispensation, and married. Being treasurer of the apostolic chamber under the pontificate of Pius V., he became immensely rich, and at his death left his only son in possession of a most splendid fortune. This son, to whom he left his titles and estates—this son, the only hope of his old age—stained his name with a foul blot of incest and murder;—this son was Francesco Cenci, the father of Beatrice. Stamped from his birth with a mark of reprobation, he seemed to bring death and disgrace upon all who approached him. He married, when he was scarcely twenty, a beautiful and noble lady, who bore him seven children, and, while yet young, perished by a violent and mysterious death. He speedily formed a second marriage with Lucrezia

Strozzi, by whom he had no children. Francesco, who appears to have been devoid of even the instinctive good feelings that actuate the brute creation, and whose life, according to Musatori, was a tissue of low and disgusting profligacy, detested all his children. He sent his sons to a distant college; but leaving them in want of the common necessities of life, they were obliged to return to Rome. Here they threw themselves at the feet of the pope, who constrained Cenci to make them an allowance suitable to their birth and their wants. The eldest daughter also appealed to the holy father, and was permitted to retire into a convent. Francesco became terribly enraged to see his victims escape him; there, however, remained his daughter Beatrice, and Bernardino, his youngest child. To prevent Beatrice from following the example of her sister, he imprisoned her in a remote apartment of his palace, where her mournful solitude was only broken by the noise of his impure orgies. While Beatrice was a child he treated her with the utmost cruelty; beat her frequently, and delighted in hearing her ask tearfully why she received such brutal chastisement? But as she advanced towards womanhood in growing beauty, his passion towards her underwent a fatal change.

In the mean time, two of the sons of Cenci—Cristoforo and Vocio—were assassinated by bandits in the neighbourhood of Rome. Nobody doubted as to who had employed the murderers. Very soon the cause of the count's perfidious tenderness towards his daughter manifested itself—an abominable passion, accompanied by every extremity of cruelty and violence! The unhappy girl appears to have been naturally gentle, pious, and amiable, till she was goaded to a horrible crime by her wish to escape from the vilest contamination. Her step-mother, who entirely sympathized with her, imparted the state of things to her elder brother, Giacomo. The family had borne so much of cruelty and oppression from their tyrant, that it seemed as if the last outrage absolved them in their own eyes from all ordinary laws of duty.

"He must die," said Beatrice, and not one offered an objection. Two assassins were introduced into the sleeping apartment of Francesco by these miserable women, who, after the fatal deed was accomplished, themselves undertook to efface its traces. But a short time elapsed, however, before one of the bravoës, being taken for some other crime, confessed the plot by which count Cenci had died. The whole family were at once imprisoned, and, though the most distinguished persons of Rome solicited their pardon, they were put to death, after tortures the most unnecessary and shocking. This happened in the year 1599, under the Pontificate of Clement VIII., whose treasury had been at different times enriched by the old Cenci, who had frequently purchased his pardon for capital crimes of the most enormous kind, by sums as large as 100,000 crowns. We see by this, that it was no abstract love of justice which rendered Clement inexorable towards these unfortunate criminals. The little boy Bernadino—being supposed, from his tender years, incapable of an active part in the parricide—had his life granted, but upon what terms! He was carried to the scaffold, and made to witness the agonies and bloody death of his brothers and sisters, to whom he was fervently attached. When they brought him back to his prison, he was a maniac.

There is a portrait of Beatrice in the Colonna palace, painted by Guido, while she was in prison. The extreme loveliness of the face has caused it to be copied in every form of art, and few, it is supposed, have not seen some representation of this most wretched of women. Shelley has chosen this story for a tragedy, which, though full of power and poetry, is, from its subject, precluded from ever becoming a favourite.

CENTLIVRE, SUSANNAH,

A CELEBRATED comic writer, was the daughter of a Mr. Freeman, of Holbeach, in Lincolnshire. Being left an orphan, she went, when about fourteen, to London, where she took much pains to cultivate her mind and person. She is the author of fifteen plays, and several little poems, for some of which she received considerable presents from very great personages; among others, a handsome gold snuff-box from prince Eugene, for a poem inscribed to him, and another from the duke d'Aumont, the French ambassador, for a masquerade she addressed to him. Her talent was comedy; especially the contrivance of plots and incidents. She corresponded, for many years, with gentlemen of wit and eminence, particularly with Steele, Rowe, Budgell, Sewell, and others. Mrs. Centlivre lived in a very careful and economical manner, and died in Spring-garden, December 1st, 1723, at the house of her husband, Joseph Centlivre, who had been one of queen Anne's cooks; she was buried at the church of St. Martin in the fields. She was three times married; the first time, when she was about sixteen, to Mr. Fox, nephew of Sir Stephen Fox. He dying two years afterwards, she married an officer, named Carrol, who was killed in a duel not long after. It was during this second widowhood that, compelled by necessity, she began to write, and also appeared on the stage. After her marriage with her third husband, she lived a more retired life. She was handsome in person, very agreeable and sprightly in conversation, and seems to have been also kind and benevolent in her disposition. Her faults were those of the age in which she lived.

CEZELLI, CONSTANCE,

A HEROINE of the 16th century, was a native of Montpellier. In 1590, her husband, Barri de St. Annez, who was governor of Leucate, for Henry IV. of France, fell into the hands of the Spaniards. They threatened Constance that they would put him to death, if she did not surrender the fortress. She refused, but offered all her property to ransom him. After having been foiled in two assaults, the Spaniards raised the siege, but barbarously murdered their prisoner. Constance magnanimously prevented her garrison from retreating.

liating on a Spanish officer of rank. As a reward for her patriotism, Henry IV. allowed her to retain the government of Leucate till her son came of age.

CHAMBERS, MARY,

OF Nottingham, England, who died in 1848, in her seventy-first year, is an instance of the power of perseverance to overcome great natural disadvantages. Deprived of sight from the age of two years, she, nevertheless, acquired a thorough knowledge of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, and was very familiar with classical literature.

CHAMPMESLE, MARIE DESMARES DE,

A FRENCH actress, born at Rouen. From the obscurity of a strolling company, she rose to be a popular actress at Paris, and gained the friendship of Racine. She married an actor, and died greatly regretted in 1698, aged fifty-four.

CHANDLER, MARY,

AN English lady, who distinguished herself by her poetical talent, was born at Malmesbury, in Wiltshire, in 1689. Her father was a dissenting minister at Bath, whose circumstances made it necessary that she should be brought up to business, and she became a milliner.

She was observed from childhood to have a turn for poetry, often entertaining her companions with riddles in verse; and she was, at that time of life, very fond of Herbert's poems. In her riper years she studied the best modern poets, and the ancient ones too as far as translations could assist her. Her poem upon the Bath was very popular, and she was particularly complimented for it by Pope, with whom she was acquainted. She had the misfortune to be deformed, which determined her to live single; though she had a sweet countenance, and was solicited to marry. She died Sept. 11th, 1745, aged 57. We can find nothing worth quoting in her poetry.

CHANDLER, ELIZABETH MARGARET,

WAS born near Wilmington, Delaware, in 1807. She was of Quaker extraction. Miss Chandler was first brought into notice by a poem entitled "The Slave Ship," written when she was eighteen, and for which she obtained a prize. She resided then, and till 1830, in Philadelphia. At that time she went to Lenawee county, Michigan, where she died in 1834. Her memoirs and writings have been published since her death. One poem we will give:—

THE DEVOTED.

Stern faces were around her bent,
And eyes of vengeful ire,
And fearful were the words they spake,
Of torture, stake, and fire:
Yet calmly in the midst she stood,
With eye undim'd and clear,
And though her lip and cheek were white,
She wore no signs of fear.

"Where is thy traitor spouse?" they said;—
A half-form'd smile of scorn,
That curl'd upon her haughty lip,
Was back for answer borne;—

"Where is thy traitor spouse?" again,
In fiercer tones, they said,
And sternly pointed to the rack,
All rusted o'er with red!

Her heart and pulse beat firm and free—
But in a crimson flood,
O'er pallid lip, and cheek, and brow,
Rush'd up the burning blood;
She spake, but proudly rose her tones,
As when in hall or bower,
The haughtiest chief that round her stood
Had meekly own'd their power.

"My noble lord is placed within
A safe and sure retreat"—
"Now tell us where, thou lady bright,
As thou wouldst mercy meet,
Nor deem thy life can purchase his;
He cannot 'scape our wrath,
For many a warrior's watchful eye
Is placed o'er every path.

"But thou mayst win his broad estates,
To grace thine infant heir,
And life and honour to thyself,
So thou his haunts declare."
She laid her hand upon her heart;
Her eye flash'd proud and clear,
And firmer grew her haughty tread—
"My lord is hidden here!

"And if ye seek to view his form,
Ye first must tear away,
From round his secret dwelling-place,
These walls of living clay!"
They quail'd beneath her haughty glance,
They silent turn'd aside,
And left her all unharmed amidst
Her loveliness and pride!

CHAPONE, HESTER,

WAS the daughter of a Mr. Mulso, of Twywell, in Northamptonshire, and was born at that place in 1727. When only nine years old, she is said to have written a romance. Her mother, who seems to have been jealous of her daughter's talents, endeavoured to obstruct her studies. Hester Mulso, nevertheless, succeeded in making herself mistress of Italian and French. The story of "Fidelia" in the Adventurer, an "Ode to Peace," and some verses prefixed to her friend Miss Carter's Epictetus, were among her earliest printed efforts. In 1760 she married Mr. Chapone, who died in less than ten months afterwards. In 1770 she accompanied Mrs. Montague on a tour in Scotland; in 1773 she published her "Letters on the Improvement of the Mind," and in 1775 her "Miscellanies in Prose and Verse." After having lived tranquilly for many years, in the society of her devoted friends, her latter days were clouded by the loss of those friends and nearly all her relations; she was also a sufferer from impaired intellect and bodily debility. She died at Hadley, near Barnet, December 25th, 1801. Her verses are elegant, and her prose writings pure in style, and fraught with good sense and sound morality. With neither beauty, rank, nor fortune, this excellent lady, nevertheless, secured to herself the love and esteem of all with whom she became acquainted, and also the general admiration of those who read her works. Mrs. Elwood thus closes an interesting tribute to the memory of Mrs. Chapone:—
"The solitary widow, living at one time in obscure and humble lodgings, was an object of interest even to royalty itself; and from her friends and connexions she constantly met with the disinterested affection and courteous attention due to her merits. By application and exertion in early life, she improved the abilities bestowed upon her by Providence, and she had the satisfaction of gaining for herself, through their influence, a respectable station among the pious and moral writers of England, and of transmitting to posterity a standard work on female education. Although more than sixty years have elapsed since this work was first published, its advice does not even yet appear antiquated, and is as well calculated to improve the rising generation, as it was to instruct the youth of their grandmothers."

Of the selections we make, the first three are from the "Miscellanies" of Mrs. Chapone, the last from her "Letters on the Improvement of the Mind."

AFFECTATION.

Affectation is so universally acknowledged to be disgusting, that it is among the faults which the most intimate friends cannot venture gravely to reprove in each other; for to tell your friends that they are habitually affected, is to tell them that they are habitually disagreeable; which nobody can bear to hear. I beg leave, therefore, as a general friend, without offending any one, to whisper to all those whose hearts confess that vanity has inspired them with any sort of affectation, that it never does, nor ever can succeed as a means of pleasing.

I have a thousand times wished to tell Flirtilla, that the efforts she makes to be constantly in motion, and perpetually giggling, do not pass upon me for the vivacity of youth: I see they cost her a great deal of trouble, and it gives me an irritation of nerves to look at her; so that it would have been much for her ease and mine, could I have ventured to beg that she would always in my presence give way to her natural languor and dullness, which would be far more agreeable to me.

Gloriosa, whenever a remarkable instance of generosity or goodness is mentioned, takes infinite pains, with the most pompous eloquence, to convince me that the action seems poor to the greatness of her soul—that she would think half her fortune a trifling gift to a worthy friend—that she would rather suffer the most exquisite pain herself, than see a fellow-creature, though a stranger, endure it—and that it is a nobler effort in her to refrain from the most generous actions, than it would be in the greatest miser to perform them. I long to let her know, that the only effect these declarations produce in my mind is a doubt, which I should otherwise never have entertained, whether she really possesses even the common portion of good-nature and benevolence.

SCANDAL.

Nothing to me is more disgusting than that air of mildness and benevolence with which some ill-natured observation on the person or dress of our absent acquaintance, or some sly sarcasm, designed to obscure the brightest part of their character, is usually introduced. If the defects of a lady's person are to be held forth to ridicule, it is first remarked, that "she is certainly the best kind of woman in the world." If one of distinguished talents is to be the victim, those talents are magnified and exalted in the strongest terms, and then in a lower voice you are called upon to take notice of the conscious superiority of her manner, the ostentatious display of her knowledge, or the pointed affectation of her wit. Some absurd saying, which envy had invented for her, is produced as a sample of her bons mots, and some trait of impertinence, though perhaps the most contrary to her character, related as a specimen of her behaviour. When the lady * * * s have been extolled for their charity and goodness, I have heard it added, "that it is impossible to pass through their hall without terrible consequences, 'tis so full of company from Broad St. Giles's."—"Mrs. * * * s is confessedly the most pious creature upon earth!—poor soul! she was carried to church in an ague-fit last Sunday; for she thinks there is no getting to heaven without hearing Mr. Sucha-one preach once a week." Thus by the help of exaggeration, you may possibly succeed in raising a sneer against a plain person, or a bright understanding—against Christian beneficence, or rational piety; but as you profess the highest esteem for the characters you ridicule, nobody must say that you are censorious or unfriendly.

A TIMELY WORD.

A young gentleman of my acquaintance has assured me, that he never received so much benefit from any sermon he ever heard, as from a reproof which he once received from a lady, who, when he had been talking on some subject rather licentiously, said, "It is a sign that you did not overhear what Lord L—— said of you yesterday, or you would never utter such sentiments." The gentleman, when he told it to me, added, "Whoever could be insensible to the keenness of this reproof, and the flattering politeness with which it was tempered, must be flayed (as they say of a Russian) before he could be made to feel." Its influence on him has probably continued to this day; for I have never known him to give occasion for another reproof of the same nature.

The great and irresistible influence which the choice of our company, as well as the mode of our own conversation, has on our habits of thinking and acting, and on the whole form and colour of our minds, is a subject too common to be much enlarged upon; it cannot, however, be too deeply considered, as it seems the leading circumstance of our lives, and that which may chiefly determine our character and condition to all eternity.

THE TWO COMMANDMENTS.

Every word that fell from our Saviour's lips is more precious than all the treasures of the earth; for his "are the words of eternal life!" They must therefore be laid up in your heart, and constantly referred to, on all occasions, as the rule and direction of all your actions; particularly those very comprehensive moral precepts he has graciously left with us, which can never fail to direct us aright, if fairly and honestly applied: such as, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do unto them." There is no occasion, great or small, on which you may not safely apply this rule for the direction of your conduct; and whilst your heart honestly adheres to it, you can never be guilty of any sort of injustice or unkindness. The two great commandments which contain the summary of our duty to God and man, are no less easily retained, and made a standard by which to judge our own hearts. "To love the Lord our God with all our hearts, with all our minds, with all our strength; and our neighbour (or fellow-creature) as ourselves." "Love worketh no ill to his neighbour;" therefore, if you have true benevolence, you will never do any thing injurious to individuals, or to society. Now, all crimes whatever are (in their remoter consequences at least, if not immediately and apparently) injurious to the society in which we live. It is impossible to love God, without desiring to please him, and, as far as we are able, to resemble him; therefore the love of God must lead to every virtue in the highest degree; and we may be sure we do not truly love him, if we content ourselves with avoiding flagrant sins, and do not strive, in good earnest, to reach the greatest degree of perfection we are capable of. Thus do those few words direct us to the highest Christian virtue. Indeed, the whole tenor of the gospel is to offer us every help, direction and motive, that can enable us to attain that degree of perfection on which depends our eternal good.

CHARKE, CHARLOTTE,

WAS youngest daughter of Colley Cibber, the player, and afterwards poet-laureate. Her education was more suited to a boy than a girl, she being more frequently in the stable than the parlour, and mistress of the curry-comb, though ignorant of the needle. Shooting, hunting, riding races, and digging in a garden, were her favourite exercises. She relates an act of her prowess when a mere child, in protecting the house from thieves by firing pistols and blunderbusses out of the window. She married, when very young, Mr. Richard Charke, an eminent performer on the violin, who soon gave her such cause for jealousy as to occasion a separation.

She then went on the stage, apparently as much from inclination as necessity, and met with such success as to be engaged at a good salary, and for very considerable parts, at the Haymarket, and afterwards at Drury-Lane. But her ungovernable impetuosity induced her to quarrel with the manager, whom she left suddenly, and ridiculed in a farce, called "The Art of Management."

She became a member of a strolling company of actors, and the remainder of her life is only one variegated scene of distress. In 1755, she came to London, where she published the "Narrative of her own Life." She died in 1759.

CHARLOTTE, PRINCESS OF WALES,

DAUGHTER of George IV. of England, and heir-apparent to the throne of Great Britain and Ireland. was born in 1795, and died November 6th, 1817, aged twenty-two. She was married to Leopold, prince of Saxe-Cobourg. The untimely death of the princess and her infant, clothed the nation in mourning, and changed the succession of the throne. When informed of her child's death, shortly before her own, she said, "I feel it as a mother naturally should"—adding, "It is the will of God! praise to him in all things!" She was a pious, intelligent, energetic, and benevolent princess, often visiting and relieving, herself, the poor; and her loss was deeply felt. Robert Hall preached a most eloquent sermon on her death.

CHATEAUBRIAND, FRANCES DE FOIX,

WIFE of the count of Chateaubriand, became mistress of Francis I. of France, who left her for the duchess d'Etampes. She was a woman of great courage and commanding aspect. She died in 1537, aged sixty-two.

CHATEAUROUX, MARIE ANNE, DUCHESS DE,

WAS one of four sisters, daughters of the Marquis de Nesle, who became successively mistresses of Louis XV. She was married at the age of seventeen to the Marquis de la Tournelle, who left her a widow at twenty-three. She far surpassed all her sisters in personal charms, and was an accomplished musician.

Madame de Chateauroux displayed a character of great energy and ambition. Her sense of virtue always remained sufficiently strong to cause her to feel humbled by the splendid degradation she had sought and won; but though she had not sufficient principle to recede from the path she had taken, she resolved as an atonement to arouse her royal lover from his disgraceful lethargy. Madame de Tencin spared no efforts to make her her tool; her aim being to govern the king through his mistress, by means of her brother, cardinal Tencin. But Madame de Chateauroux had not acquired her power to yield it up to a woman, and especially to so clever and intriguing a woman. Far seeing, like Madame de Tencin, she was convinced of the necessity for some radical change in the government. Of the confusion by which it was characterized, she said, "I could not have believed all that I now see; if no remedy is administered to this state of things, there will sooner or later be a great bouleversement."

Though the aim of Madame de Chateauroux was good, the means she took to effect it were not equally praiseworthy. Reckless of the real interests of the country, and looking only to the personal glory of the king, she partly precipitated France into a fatal war. While absent with the army, the king was seized with a dangerous illness. Urged by the religious party attached to the queen, Louis, through fear of dying without the last sacraments of the church, was induced publicly to discard his mistress. Scarcely had this been done when he recovered. His repentance had never been heartfelt, and he soon was mortified and humiliated at the part he had acted. Grieved at the loss of Mad. de Chateauroux, he sought an interview with her, and she consented to receive his apology, provided it was made in a public manner, which, by her arrangement, was done by Maurepas, whom she wished to humble, in the presence of a large assembly. He requested forgiveness in the name of the king, and begged her return to court. But to that station which she had purchased at the cost of peace and honour, she was never destined to return. She became alarmingly ill, and died a few days after this public atonement. It would be unjust to deny to Madame de Chateauroux the merit of having sought to rouse Louis XV. from the state of apathetic indolence into which he had fallen. The means she took were injudicious, but they were noble. Experience would have taught her better; and, had her power continued, Louis XV. might have been a different man.

Madame de Chateauroux was one of those far-seeing women, who, with that instinctive foresight which arises from keenness of perception, had predicted the breaking out of the storm already gathering over France.

CHATELET, GABRIELLE EMILIE DE BRE- TRUILL MARQUISE DU,

ONE of the most remarkable women of her time, is chiefly known through her connexion with Voltaire. Her parents married her in her nineteenth year to the Marquis du Chatelet, an honest but common-place man considerably her senior. The young marchioness made her appearance in the world with great éclat. She was graceful, handsome, and fond of pleasure; and her great talents long remained unsuspected. Madame du Chatelet's ideas of morality were those of her time, and she early exhibited them by an intrigue with the duke of Richelieu, then celebrated for his gallantry. This connexion, however, was brief, and resulted in a sincere and lasting friendship. Madame du Chatelet's mind was superior to a life of mere worldly pleasure. Wearied of dissipation, she entered with ardour into the study of the exact sciences. Maupertius was her instructor in geometry, and the works of Newton and Leibnitz became her constant study. Geometry was then the rage, but Madame du Chatelet brought to the study of this science a mind strikingly adapted to its pursuit; and it was while thus devoting herself that she became acquainted with Voltaire. Madame du Chatelet was in her twenty-eighth year, and Voltaire twelve years her senior, when their liason commenced. The loose maxims of the period justified this connexion in the opinion of the world and in their own; and the husband either did not suspect the truth, or if he did, felt indifferent to it. As he passed the greater part of his time with his regiment, he proved little or no restraint to the lovers, raising no objection to the sojourn of Voltaire beneath his roof, but rather appearing flattered at being considered the host and patron of a man already enjoying European fame. Voltaire passed fifteen years at Cizey, the splendid chateau of M. du Chatelet, in Lorraine. His life in this delightful retreat was one of study, varied by elegant pleasures, embellished and exalted by the devotion of this gifted woman.

With Madame du Chatelet study was a passion. She slept but three hours in the twenty-four, and her whole time was devoted to her beloved pursuits. During the day she remained closeted in her apartments, seldom appearing till the hour of supper. Every year they visited Paris, where Madame du Chatelet entered into the pursuit of pleasure with the same passionate eagerness with which she studied Newton's "Principia" in her learned retirement; losing large sums at play, and committing many extravagances in her love of dress.

Madame du Chatelet was remarkable for great simplicity of manner, as well as for the solidity of her judgment. Few women of her time were so free from that intriguing spirit and thirst for distinction which almost all then possessed. Science she loved for its own sake; for the pure and exquisite delight it yielded her enquiring mind, and not for the paltry gratification of being considered learned. On the other hand, she was deficient in gentleness, and in many of the most winning qualities of woman. Proud of her rank and birth, haughty to her inferiors, and violent and imperious in her temper, she ruled despotically over her lover, and left him very little personal freedom.

Long as the love of Voltaire and Madame du Chatelet had lasted, it was not destined to resist time and habit. The change first came from Voltaire, whose declining years he made the excuse for increasing coldness. After many stormy explanations, Madame du Chatelet submitted to this change in his feelings, which caused none in their mode of life, and accepted friendship for love.

Soon after this change in their relations, Madame du Chatelet became acquainted with St. Lambert, known then merely as a handsome young nobleman of elegant address. Vanity induced St. Lambert to pay her attentions which Madame du Chatelet attributed to a deeper feeling, and which she was frail enough to return by a very sincere affection. Voltaire was both grieved and indignant on discovering that he had a rival, but Madame du Chatelet's assurances of unabated friendship, though she concealed nothing from him, reconciled and induced him to remain near her.

There is little to excuse this part of Madame du Chatelet's life. Her age and self-respect ought to have preserved her from this last error, with which were connected many disgraceful circumstances, and which was destined to prove fatal to her. She died in childbed on the 10th of August, 1749, her last days being devoted to the translation of Newton's Principia, her great work.

CHEMIN, CATHARINE DU,

Was a French artist, who died at Paris, 1698. She principally excelled in painting flowers. Her husband erected a noble monument to her memory in the church of St. Landry.

CHERON, ELIZABETH SOPHIA,

DAUGHTER of a painter in enamel, of the town of Meaux, was born at Paris in 1678, and studied under her father. At the age of fourteen, her name was already famous. The celebrated Le Brun, in 1672, presented her to the academy of painting and sculpture, which complimented her by admitting her to the title of academician. She apportioned her time between painting, the learned languages, poetry, and music. She drew, on a large scale, a great number of gems, which were remarkable for showing taste, a singular command of pencil, a fine style of colouring, and a superior judgment in the chiaro-oscuro. The various styles of painting were familiar to her. She excelled in historical painting, oil-colours, miniature enamels, portrait-painting, and especially those of females. It is said that she frequently executed, from memory, the portraits of absent friends, to which she gave as strong a likeness as if they had sat to her. The academy of Ricovrati, at Padua, honoured her with the surname of Erato, and gave her a place in their society. She died at Paris, September 3d, 1711, at the age of 63.

CHEZY, WILHELMINE CHRISTINE VON,

A GERMAN poetess, whose maiden name was Von Klenke, was born at Berlin, Jan. 26th, 1783. She married Mr. Von Haslfer, but they had lived only a short time together, when they applied for and obtained a divorce. She was afterwards married to the celebrated French orientalist, Von Chezy; but this second marriage proved no more happy in its results than the first; and, according to a mutual agreement between her and her husband, she was a second time divorced. She then devoted herself to the education of her two sons by her second husband; and they did honour to their instructor, and have since obtained considerable literary fame.

Frau Von Chezy lived alternately in Munich, Vienna, and Paris. She was, on her mother's side, a grandchild of the celebrated poetess Frau Karsch, whose talents seem to have descended to her. As a writer, she is best known by the name of Helmina, under which she has written tales and romances in verse. Her writings are characterized by a fertile imagination, a pleasing style, and warm feeling; though they cannot always bear the test of a critical examination. She has also written a few spirited prose works, and the opera Euryanthe, which was set to music by Von Weber. The best of her works are "The Martin-birds," the "Six noble Employments," and "Recollections of Vienna." She died in 1849. A writer, supposed to be Sapin, made the following epigram on her:—

"Helmine Von Chezy,
Geborne Klenke,
Ich bitte Si' geh' Sie,
Mit Ihrer poësie
Sonst kriegt sie die Kränke!

The meaning of the wit and pun is, that the lady must not write poetry if she wishes to be thought agreeable. A true German idea.

CHOIN, MARIE EMILIE JOLY DE,

A LADY descended from a noble Savoy family. She was employed about the person of the duchess of Conti, where she was sought by the dauphin of France; but no solicitations could induce her to forfeit her honour; and it is said that the prince at last married her privately, and, by her influence, was reformed and regained the affections of the king. After his death, in 1711, she retired to obscurity, and died in 1744, universally respected.

CHRISTINA, QUEEN OF SWEDEN,

DAUGHTER of the great Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, and of Maria Eleonora of Brandenburg, was born December 18th, 1626. Her father was very fond of her, and carried her about with him in all his journeys. When she was about two years old, she was taken to Calmar, the governor of which hesitated, on her account, whether to give the king the usual salute, but Gustavus exclaimed, "Fire! the girl is a soldier's daughter, and should be accustomed to it betimes." The noise delighted the princess, who clapped her hands, and, in her infantile language, cried, "More, more!" showing thus early her peculiarly bold and masculine turn of mind.

Her father died in 1633, and Christina, a girl of seven years old, was placed upon the throne, and even at that early age she appeared to be conscious of her high destiny, and in all trying circumstances conducted herself with great firmness and dignity.

The queen-mother was a woman of weak judgment and capricious temper, and her injudicious management of the young Christina was doubtless the first cause of her dislike for her own sex, which was farther increased by the manner of her education. She early displayed an "antipathy," to use her own words, "to all that women do and say;" but she was an excellent classical scholar, admired the Greeks and Romans and all the heroes of antiquity, particularly Homer and Alexander the Great. At the age of fourteen, she read Thucydides in the original; she rode and hunted, and harangued the senate, and dictated to her ministers. But in the gentler graces and virtues of her own sex she was deficient. She grew up self-willed, arrogant, and impatient; and yet was flattered because she was a queen. She understood this, and observes that "Princes are flattered even in their cradles; men fear their memory as well as their power; they handle them timidly, as they do young lions, who can only scratch now, but may hereafter bite and devour."

Her character, at the time she assumed the reins of government, promised extraordinary excellence. Mrs. Jameson, in her elegant work, "Memoirs of Celebrated Female Sovereigns," thus sketches, with singular felicity, the portrait of this youthful sovereign:

"Christina had been born to the throne; cradled, as she says, amid laurels and trophies of victory, assumed a sceptre which was hers by the double right of hereditary claims and the free consent of the states-general. She was in the bloom of youth, full of health, vigour, and activity; the natural cheerfulness of her spirits had been preserved by constant exercise of body and mind; and although she was proud, passionate, and capricious, she was also gay, frank, and generous. She entertained, at this time, a lofty and even sublime idea of the high destiny to which she was called, and of the multiplied duties and tremendous responsibility it imposed on her. All her resolutions and intentions appear to have been right and just; and to put the intentions into practice, she had youthful enthusiasm, surpassing talents, a strong constitution, and the prospect of a long life and reign before her. Though learned beyond most of her sex, the vanity of learning had not yet seized her, and literature was to her what it ought always to have been, an amusement, not a pursuit. She understood most of the languages of Europe; Latin, French, German, Italian, she wrote and spoke as fluently as her native tongue; her proficiency in Greek has already been mentioned. At this time she seems to have preferred the French language, and it was spoken almost habitually in her court. She would have no prime minister, and from the very commencement of her reign, (dating it from the dissolution of the regency), she received and read all the despatches, dictated the replies to her secretaries, which she afterwards looked over and corrected herself; and while the regal power had all the gloss of novelty, she certainly wore it with dignity and grace. Her indefatigable attention to the business of state excited the astonishment of the foreign ministers, and the admiration of her people; she constantly attended all the deliberations of her council, and by the force of her character and her resolute temper she exercised the most unbounded influence over the senate, who yielded to her more than they would have accorded to a monarch of their own sex. It is asserted that she was at this time more despotic than any Swedish sovereign from the time of Eric XIV. to the change of the constitution under Gustavus III.

"In person she was not handsome; her figure was below the middle size, but well formed, with the exception of a slight deformity in one of her shoulders, caused by a fall in her infancy; it was, however, scarcely perceptible, and her deportment and all her movements were remarkable for dignity, ease, and freedom. Her features were rather large and striking in proportion to her figure, and her whole countenance, unless controlled for especial purposes, was singular for its mobility and vivacity. Her eyes were of a brilliant hazel, quick and penetrating; her nose aquiline, her mouth too wide, and when at rest, not agreeable in its expression; her smile, however, was bright and pleasing, and her teeth fine, though she took little care of them. She had a profusion of light brown hair, which she seldom combed; and a man's fur cap or a knot of riband was in general her only coiffure, till later in life she exchanged these for a periwig. She was extremely negligent in her dress, and never allowed herself more than a quarter of an hour at her morning toilet. Except upon state occasions, her attire was very simple and uniform; it consisted of a suit of plain grey stuff or cloth, shorter than was usually worn, for the convenience of walking and riding, with a black scarf round her neck, and rarely a single ornament. She was temperate, and even abstemious in eating, apparently quite indifferent as to what was placed before her, and was never heard to praise or dispraise any dish at table."

When Christina had assumed the reins of government, in 1644, many of the most distinguished kings and princes of Europe aspired to her hand; but she uniformly rejected all their proposals, and caused one of her suitors, her cousin Charles Gustavus, to be appointed her successor. Her love of independence and impatience of control had exhibited themselves from childhood in a distaste to marriage. "Do not," said she to the states, "compel me to make a choice: should I bear a son, it is equally probable that he might prove a Nero as an Augustus."

Christina had an opportunity to display her magnanimity in the early part of her reign. While she was engaged in her devotions in the chapel of the castle at Stockholm, a lunatic rushed through the crowd, and attempted to stab her with a knife. He was seized, and Christina calmly continued her devotions. Learning that the man was insane, she merely had him put under restraint.

One of the most important events of Christina's reign was the peace of Westphalia, to which her influence greatly contributed. It was settled October, 1648, and by this treaty Sweden was confirmed in the possession of many important countries. The services of Salvius, one of her plenipotentiaries on this occasion, were rewarded by the dignity of senator; a prerogative which had till then belonged to birth, but to which the queen thought merit had a better claim.

During the remainder of her reign, a wise administration and a profound peace, reflect upon Christina a higher praise than can be derived from subtle negotiations or successful wars; she enjoyed the entire confidence and love of her people. All persons distinguished for their genius or talents, were attracted by her liberality to the Swedish court; and although her favour was sometimes controlled by her partialities or prejudices, and withheld from the deserving while it was lavished on those who flattered her foibles, yet she soon discovered and repaired such mistakes.

She, at length, began to feel her rank, and the duties it devolved upon her, a burden, and to sigh for freedom and leisure. In 1652, she communicated to the senate her resolution of abdicating the throne; but the remonstrances of the whole people, in which Charles Gustavus, her successor, joined, induced her to wear the crown for two years longer; when she resumed her purpose and carried it into effect, to the great grief of the whole nation.

In leaving the scene of her regal power, she appeared to rejoice as though she had escaped from imprisonment. Having arrived at a small brook which separated Sweden from Denmark, she alighted from her carriage, and leaping over it, exclaimed, "At length I am free, and out of Sweden, whither I hope never to return." Dismissing with her women the habit of her sex, she assumed male attire. "I would become a man," said she; "but it is not that I love men because they are men, but merely that they are not women."

On her arrival at Brussels she publicly and solemnly abjured the Lutheran faith, in which she was educated, and joined the Roman Catholic communion. From Brussels she went to Rome, which she entered with great pomp. She was received with splendid hospitality by the pope, and the Jesuits affirmed that she ought to be placed by the church among the saints: "I had rather," said Christina, "be placed among the sages."

She then went to France, where she was received with royal honours, which she never forgot to claim, by Louis XIV. But she disturbed the quiet of all the places which she visited, by her passion for interfering and controlling, not only political affairs, but the petty cabals of the court. She also disgusted the people by her violation of all the decencies and proprieties of life, by her continuing to wear the dress of the other sex, and by her open contempt for her own. But the act that roused the horror and indignation of Louis XIV. and his whole court, and obliged Christina to leave France, was the murder of Monaldeschi, an Italian, and her master of the horse, who is supposed to have been her lover, and to have betrayed the intrigue, though the fault for which he suffered was never disclosed by Christina. This event occurred in November, 1657, while she was residing in the royal palace of Fontainebleau. Monaldeschi, after having been allowed only about two hours from the time when the queen had made known to him her discovery of his perfidy, was put to death, by her orders, in the gallery aux Cerfs of the palace, by three men.

Louis XIV. was highly indignant at this violation of justice in his dominions; but Christina sustained her act, and stated that she had reserved supreme power over her suite, and that wherever she went she was still a queen. She was, however, obliged to return to Rome, where she soon involved herself in a quarrel with the pope, Alexander VII. She then went to Sweden; but she was not well received there, and soon left for Hamburg, and from thence to Rome. She again returned to Sweden, but met with a still colder reception than before. It is said that her journeys to Sweden were undertaken for the purpose of resuming the crown, as Charles Gustavus had died in 1660. But this can hardly be true, as her adopted religion, to which she always remained constant, would be an insuperable obstacle, by the laws and constitution of Sweden, to her reassuming the government.

After many wanderings, Christina died at Rome, April 15th, 1689, aged sixty-three. She was interred in the church of St. Peter, and the pope erected a monument to her, with a long inscription, although she had requested that these words, Vixit Christina annos LXIII., should be the only inscription on her tomb. Her principal heir was her intendant, Cardinal Azzolini. Her library was bought by the pope, who placed nine hundred manuscripts of this collection in the Vatican, and gave the rest of the books to his family.

A traveller, who saw her at Rome, when she was about sixty, thus describes her dress and appearance:—"She was usually habited in a coat, or vest, of black satin, reaching almost to the knees, and buttoned down the front; under this, a very short petticoat. Her own light brown hair, once so beautiful and luxuriant, was cut short, and combed up so as to stand on end without covering or ornament. She was very short, fat, and round; her voice, her features and complexion, were completely masculine, and had ceased to be in any respect agreeable. Her eyes, however, retained their brilliancy, and her tongue bewitched as oddly as her eyes. Her manners, whenever she chose, were winning." Such was the disagreeable, unhonoured age of a woman who despised the manners, duties, and decorums of her sex. Yet in a letter, written about this time to Mademoiselle de Scuderi, the poor, mistaken Christina shows that she could not divest herself of all feminine feelings. "You must know," she writes, "that since you saw me some years ago, I am not grown handsomer; far from it; and, to confess the truth, I am still, in spite of flattery, as ill satisfied with my own person as ever I was. I envy not those who possess fortune, dominions, treasures; I raise myself above all mortals by wisdom and virtue; and that is what makes me discontented. Au reste, I am in good health, which will last as long as it pleases God. I have naturally an extreme aversion to grow old, and I hardly know how I can get used to the idea. If I had had my choice between old age and death, I think I should have chosen the latter without hesitation. But since we are not consulted on this point, I shall resign myself to live on with as much pleasure as I can. Death, which I see approaching step by step, does not alarm me. I await it without a wish and without a fear."

Christina wrote a great deal; but her "Maxims and Sentences," and "Reflections on the Life and Actions of Alexander the Great," are all that have been preserved. She had good business talents, and a wonderful firmness of purpose. The great defects of her character, and the errors of her life, may be traced to her injudicious education, including the dislike she felt for women, and her contempt of feminine virtues and pursuits. She should be a warning to all those aspiring females, who would put off the dignity, delicacy, and dress of their own sex, in the vain hope that, by masculine freedom of deportment and attire, they should gain strength, wisdom, and enjoyment. We give a few fragments from her works:

Fools are more to be feared than the wicked.

Whatever is false, is ridiculous.

There is a species of pleasure in suffering from the ingratitude of others, which is reserved for great minds alone.

We should never speak of ourselves, either good or evil. (This was a maxim which she was continually violating in her own person: she appears to have been the greatest egotist extant, for a female.)

To suffer for having acted well, is itself a species of recompense.

We read for instruction, for correction, and for consolation.

There is a star above us which unites souls of the first order, though worlds and ages separate them.

Life becomes useless and insipid, when we have no longer either friends or enemies.

We grow old more through indolence, than through age.

The Salique law, which excludes women from the throne, is a just and a wise law.

Cruelty is the result of baseness and of cowardice.

To speak truth, and to do good, is to resemble, in some sort, the Deity we worship.

This life is like an inn, in which the soul spends a few moments on its journey.

CHUDLEIGH, LADY MARY,

WAS born in 1656, and was the daughter of Richard Lee, Esq., of Winslade in Devonshire, England. She married Sir George Chudleigh, bart., by whom she had several children; among the rest Eliza Maria, who dying in the bloom of life, her mother poured out her grief in a poem, called "A Dialogue between Lucinda and Marissa." She wrote another poem called "The Ladies' Defence," occasioned by a sermon preached against women. These, with many others, were collected into a volume and printed, for the third time, in 1722. She published also a volume of essays, in prose and verse, in 1710, which have been much admired for a delicacy of style.

This lady is said to have written several tragedies, operas, masques, &c., which were not printed. She died in 1710, in her 55th year. She was a woman of great virtue as well as understanding, and made the latter subservient to the former. She was only taught her native language, but her great application and uncommon abilities, enabled her to figure among the literati of her time. She wrote essays upon knowledge, pride, humility, life, death, fear, grief, riches, self-love, justice, anger, calumny, friendship, love, avarice, and solitude, in which she showed an uncommon degree of knowledge and piety.

CIBBER, SUSANNA MARIA,

WHO for several years was considered not only the best actress in England, but thought by many superior to the celebrated Mdle. Clairon of Paris, was the daughter of an upholsterer of Covent-Garden, and sister to Dr. Thomas Augustin Arne, celebrated for his taste in musical composition. Her first appearance on the stage was as a singer, but either her judgment or ear was not equal to her sweetness of voice. She married, in April, 1734, Theophilus Cibber, who was then a widower. This marriage was not pleasing to Colley Cibber, the father, but he was induced to forgive them. He was then manager of Drury-Lane theatre, and one day at rehearsal, his son happening to say he hoped young Mrs. Cibber might be brought on in speaking parts, Colley desired her to declaim before him, and was surprised to find such a variety of powers of voice, face, figure, and expression united. She appeared on the stage in 1736, in the character of Zara, in the first representation of Aaron Hill's tragedy. The audience were astonished and delighted, and her reputation as an actress was established.

But her domestic tranquillity did not equal her public success. Her husband was luxurious, prodigal, rapacious, and unscrupulous and dishonourable in his means of obtaining money. She soon discontinued living with him, and resided entirely with a man on whom Mr. Cibber bestowed the appellation of Mr. Benefit. She retained her beauty and her power of pleasing, as an actress, for a long time. She died January 30th, 1766, and was buried at Westminster; leaving one child by the gentleman with whom she lived.

CICCI, MARIE LOUISA,

WAS born at Pisa, in 1760. When she was seven years old her father placed her in a convent, ordered her to be instructed merely in domestic duties, and forbade her to be taught even to write. By stealth, however, she read some of the best poets, and acquired the rudiments of writing, supplying the want of pen and ink by grape-juice and bits of wood. With these rude materials she wrote her first verses in her tenth year. At a more mature age, she made herself mistress of natural philosophy, of the English and French languages, and studied the works of Locke and Newton. Her Anacreontic verses are distinguished by their graceful ease and spirit. In private life she was virtuous and amiable. She died in 1794.

CINCHON, COUNTESS OF,

THE wife of the viceroy of Peru, was the first person who brought the Peruvian bark to Europe, and made known its virtues. This took place in 1632. In honour of her, Linnæus gave the name of Cinchona to the genus of plants by which the bark is produced.

CIRANI, ELIZABETH,

A NATIVE of Bologna, was eminently distinguished as a painter. Though she was happy in tender and delicate subjects, she excelled also in the great and terrible. Her genius gained her many friends, whom her excellent qualities retained. She died near the close of the eighteenth century.

CLAIRON, CLARA JOSEPHA DE LA TUDE,

ONE of the most celebrated actresses of France, was born in 1723, near Condé, and went upon the stage when only twelve years old. Phédre was the first character in which she displayed all her theatrical talents. In 1765 she left the stage, and was for many years the mistress of the margrave of Anspach. She died in 1803. She published "Memoirs and Reflections upon the Declamation Theatrical."

CLAYPOLE, ELIZABETH,

WAS the second and favourite daughter of the protector, Oliver Cromwell. She was born at Huntingdon in 1629, and in 1646 married John Claypole, Esq., of a respectable family in Northamptonshire; who afterwards became master of the horse both to Oliver and his son Richard. Mrs. Claypole was invariably the friend of the oppressed, and exercised her gentle but powerful influence over her father in favour of the suffering royalists. She died at Hampton Court, August 6th, 1658, in the twenty-ninth year of her age.

CLEMENTS, MARGARET,

BORN in 1508, niece to Sir Thomas More, in whose house she was brought up, was carefully educated, and made great progress in all the liberal sciences. She corresponded with the celebrated Erasmus, who commends her epistles for their good sense and chaste Latin. About 1531 she married her tutor, Dr. John Clements. They had one daughter, Winifred, on whose education they bestowed the greatest care, and who married a nephew of Sir Thomas More, William Rastell, the greatest lawyer of his time.

Dr. Clements and his wife left England to avoid a religious persecution, and settled at Mechlin, in Brabant, where Mrs. Clement died, July 6th, 1570.

CLERMONT, CLAUDE CATHERINE DE,

DAUGHTER of Clermont, lord of Dampierre, wife, first of M. d'Aunbaut, who perished in the civil wars of France, and afterwards of Albert, duke de Metz, was lady of honour to Catharine de Medicis, and governess to the royal children. She was an only daughter, and carefully educated. In all foreign affairs she was consulted as the only person at court who understood the languages. When her husband was in Italy, her son, the marquis of Belleisle, attempted to seize his father's estate; but she assembled soldiers, put herself at their head, defeated her son's project, and retained her vassals in obedience to their king, Henry IV., who loaded the duchess with honours. She survived her husband but a few months, dying in the latter part of the sixteenth century.

CLEVELAND, BARBARA VILLIERS, DUCHESS OF,

MISTRESS of Charles II. of England, was the only daughter of William, second Viscount Grandison, who died in 1643, of wounds he received at Bristol, while fighting for the royal cause. Barbara Villiers was born in 1640, and in 1658 married Roger Palmer, Esq., a student at one of the Inns of Court, and heir to a large fortune. The following year they joined the court of Charles in the Low Countries, where Mrs. Palmer completely captivated that susceptible prince. At the Restoration they accompanied Charles to England, where for ten years her influence over the king was supreme. He even appointed her lady of the bed-chamber to his wife; and, in order to do this, he raised her husband to a peerage in 1662, as earl of Castlemaine. She was afterwards created duchess of Cleveland. She was beautiful, but haughty, imperious, extravagant, and unfaithful to the king as well as to her husband. Her jealous temper at length caused a quarrel between Charles and herself; and, in 1670, the duchess retired to France. In 1705, when sixty-five years old, she married Robert Fielding, a very handsome man, generally called Beau Fielding, who treated her brutally. She afterwards discovered that he had been previously married to another woman. The duchess died in England, October 9th, 1709. Her infamy renders the court, in which she so long ruled the profligate monarch, still a word of loathing and contempt; and the peerage is disgraced by such instances of high rank conferred on the vilest creatures who minister to the corrupt passions of men in power

CLIFFORD, ANNE,

COUNTESS of Pembroke, Dorset, and Montgomery, was sole daughter and heiress to George, earl of Cumberland. She was born at Skipton-castle in Craven, January 30th, 1589. Her father died when she was only ten years old; but her mother, a daughter of the earl of Bedford, educated her with care and discretion. She married, first, Richard, lord Buckhurst, afterwards earl of Dorset, by whom she had three sons who died young, and two daughters. After his death, she married Philip Herbert, earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, by whom she had no children, and with whom she lived very unhappily. She erected a monument to her tutor, Daniel the poet, and another to Spenser; besides which she founded two hospitals, and repaired or built seven churches. But the most singular act of her life is the letter she wrote to the secretary of state, after the restoration of Charles II., who had recommended a candidate for one of her boroughs. The countess replied, "I have been bullied by an usurper, I have been neglected by a court, but I will not be dictated to by a subject; your man shan't stand. Anne, Dorset, Pembroke, and Montgomery." This letter excited great admiration.

The countess of Pembroke was considered one of the most eminent women of her time for intellectual accomplishments, spirit, magnificence, and benevolence. She died in her castle at Brougham, March 23d, 1675, at the age of eighty-six. She was buried at Appleby, in Westmoreland, under the monument she had erected. Her funeral sermon was preached by the bishop of Carlisle, from a verse in the proverbs of Solomon—"Every wise woman buildeth her house." In her ended the Clifford family.

Although the countess expended more than forty thousand pounds in building, and was truly royal in her acts of generosity and benevolence, yet she was prudent, economical, and exact to the last degree in her accounts. Bishop Rainbow calls her "a perfect mistress of forecast and aftercast." Her information was so extensive, that it was said of her "that she knew how to converse on all subjects, from predestination to slea-silk." Her manner of living was simple, abstemious, and even parsimonious; and she was accustomed to boast that she had hardly ever tasted wine or physic.

A narrative, or rather journal, of her own life, was left by the countess, consisting principally of minute details, which are not interesting, excepting in the description she gives of herself, her own mental and personal endowments.

"I was very happy," says she, "in my first constitution, both of mind and body. I resembled equally both father and mother: the colour of my eyes was black like my father's; the form and aspect of them quick and lively, like my mother's; my hair brown and thick, and so long that it reached the calf of my legs, with a peak of hair on my forehead, and a dimple on my chin; full cheeks, like my father, and a round face like my mother's; an exquisite shape of body resembling my father. But now time and age have ended all these beauties, to be compared to the grass of the field. I have passed the sixty-third year of my age. The perfections of my mind surpassed those of my body. I had a strong and copious memory, a sound judgment, a discerning spirit, and an imagination so strong, that many times even my dreams and apprehensions beforehand proved to be true; so that old Mr. John Denham, a great astronomer, who lived in my father's house, would often say that I had much in me in nature to show, that the sweet influence of the Pleiades and the bands of Orion, mentioned in Job, were powerful both at my conception and nativity." She goes on to speak of "sucking from her dear mother the milk of goodness, which made her mind grow strong against the storms of fortune." She informs us that in her childhood, by means of her aunt Warwick, she was much beloved by queen Elizabeth.

Her escape from various perils is thus recorded: "In my infancy and youth, and a great part of my life, I have escaped many dangers, both by fire and water, by passage in coaches, and falls from horses, by burning fevers, and excessive extremity of bleeding, many times to the great hazard of my life. All which, and many wicked devices of my enemies, I have passed through miraculously, and much the better by the help of the prayers of my dear mother, who incessantly begged of God for my safety and preservation."

The following account of her marriage life may not be unacceptable to the reader: "I was born a happy creature in mind, body, and fortune; and those two lords, to whom I was afterwards by the Divine Providence married, were worthy noblemen as any then in this kingdom; yet it was my misfortune to have contradictions and crosses with both. With my first lord about the desire he had to make me sell my rights in the lands of my ancient inheritance, which I never would consent to, insomuch as this was the cause of long contention; as also for his profuseness in consuming his estate, and some other extravagances. With my second lord, because my youngest daughter, the lady Elizabeth Sackville, would not be brought to marry one of his youngest sons; and that I would not relinquish my interest in five thousand pounds (being part of her portion) out of my lands in Craven: nor did there want divers malicious ill-willers to blow and foment the coals of dissension between us: so as, in both their lifetimes, the marble pillars of Knowle in Kent, and Wilton in Wiltshire, were to me oftentimes but the gay arbour of anguish. A wise man, that knew the insides of my fortune, would often say, that I lived in both these my lords' great families as the river Rhone runs through the lake of Geneva, without mingling its streams with the lake; for I gave myself up to retiredness as much as I could, and made good books and virtuous thoughts my companions, which can never discern affliction, nor be daunted when it unjustly happens. And by a happy genius I overcame all these troubles, the prayers of my blessed mother helping me therein."

CLIVE, CATHARINE,

DAUGHTER of William Rafton, of Ireland, an actress of great merit, was born in 1711. She was quite young when she made her first appearance before the public, and for more than thirty years was considered the best performer, in high or low comedy, on the stage. In 1732, she married George Clive, a lawyer, and brother to baron Clive; but this union was not a happy one, and they soon agreed to separate, and for the rest of their lives had no intercourse whatever.

Mrs. Clive left the stage in 1768, and retired to a small but elegant house near Strawberry-hill, in Twickenham, where she resided in ease and independence, respected by the world, and surrounded by friends. She died Dec. 6th, 1785

COCHRANE, GRIZEL,

Was the daughter of Sir John Cochrane, of Ochiltree, Scotland, second son of the first Earl of Dundonald. Her father, being taken prisoner in July, 1685, and confined in the Tolbooth at Edinburgh, was, in consequence of participating in the rebellion against James II., condemned to death for high treason, and his execution was only delayed till the death-warrant should arrive from London. In the mean time the earl of Dundonald was making every exertion to obtain his pardon by interesting the king's confessor in his son's favour. But this required some time, and the death-warrant was daily expected. Grizel Cochrane, though only eighteen at the time, determined to prevent its arrival. Disguising herself as a servant-girl, and mounting her own horse, on whose speed she could rely, she, by riding two days, reached the abode of her nurse, who lived on the English side of the Tweed. Here attiring herself in her foster-brother's clothes, and arming herself with pistols, she proceeded to a small public-house near Belford, where the postman was accustomed to stop for a few hours to rest. Sending the landlady out on some errand, Grizel stepped to the room where the postman was sleeping, but his mail-bags were under his head, and could not be touched without awaking him. However, she succeeded in drawing the load out of the pistols, which lay near him, before the woman returned, and then overtaking him about half-way between Belford and Berwick, she succeeded in obtaining the mail-bags, in which she discovered her father's death-warrant. Destroying this, and several other obnoxious papers, she reassumed her female dress, and returned to Edinburgh. As it then took eight days for communications to pass from London to Edinburgh, the sixteen days Grizel thus gained for her father were sufficient to allow the earl of Dundonald to obtain his son's pardon. Miss Cochrane afterwards married Mr. Ker, of Morriston, in the county of Berwick.

COCKBURN, CATHARINE,

THE daughter of captain David Trotter, a Scotch gentleman in the navy, was born in 1679. She gave early proofs of a poetic imagination by the production of three tragedies and a comedy, which were all acted; the first of them in her seventeenth year. She had also a turn for philosophy; and she engaged in controversy, defending Mr. Locke's opinions against Dr. Burnet of the Charter-House, and Dr. Holdsworth. She was induced to turn Roman Catholic when very young, but renounced that faith in her riper years.

In 1708, she married Mr. Cockburn, the son of an eminent Scotch divine, and was precluded for twenty years from pursuing her studies, by the cares of a family, which she nevertheless resumed with ardour. Mrs. Cockburn died in 1749; her works are collected in two octavo volumes.

She wrote, among her plays, "Agnes de Castro;" "The Fatal Friendship;" "Love at a Loss, or Most Votes carry it;" and "The Unhappy Penitent." She also wrote several poems and controversial essays. In a poem addressed to queen Caroline, wife of George II., Mrs. Cockburn thus alludes to the disadvantages under which a woman then pursued the path of literature:—

"Learning denied us, we at random tread
Unbeaten paths, that late to knowledge lead;
By secret steps break through th' obstructed way.
Nor dare acquirements gain'd by stealth display.
If some adventurous genius should arise,
Who on exalted themes her talents tries,
She fears to give the work, tho' prais'd, a name,
And flies not more from infamy than fame."

That she was scrupulous never to neglect any womanly duty, gives added importance to her example of improvement. Her familiar letters show this happy talent of biding her time. In one to her niece, dated October 6th, 1732, she writes, "Sundays being privileged from the needle, I have found time of late to read three short pamphlets, in answer to "Christianity as old as the Creation," by Dr. Burnet; which, they say, are the best that have been written on a subject that has for some time employed all pens and heads." In another letter, in the year 1740, she speaks of finding more time for reading and writing during the long winter's evenings, than in the summer months, since she could not work by candle-light. "In the summer," says she, "I am so much employed with my needle, that I read little, and write less." In a letter, intended to be sent to Mr. Pope, she writes, "You had but just begun to dawn upon the world, when I retired from it. Being married in 1708, I bade adieu to the muses, and so wholly gave myself up to the cares of a family, and the education of my children, that I scarcely knew whether there were such things as books, plays, or poems, stirring in Great Britain. However, after some years, your 'Essay on Criticism,' and 'Rape of the Lock,' broke in upon me. I rejoiced that so bright a genius was rising on our isle; but thought no more about you, till my young family was grown up to have less need of my assistance; and, beginning to have some taste for polite literature, my inclination revived with my leisure to inquire after what had been most celebrated in that kind. I then read your Homer, &c." This is the true way for a woman to live contentedly, to grow old gracefully, and to die happily.

COLIGNI, HENRIETTA, COUNTESS
DE LA LUZE,

FAMOUS for her poetry, which was printed with the works of Pellison and others, in 1695 and 1725, in two duodecimo volumes, was the daughter of Gaspar de Coligni, marshal of France, and colonel-general of infantry. She married, when very young, Thomas Hamilton, a Scotch nobleman, and, after his death, the count de la Luze, of an illustrious house in Champagne.

The jealousy of her second husband embittered her life, and his severities towards her induced her to abjure Protestantism and embrace the Roman Catholic faith, which caused queen Christina of Sweden to say "That the countess had changed her religion, that she might not see her husband, neither in this world nor the next." Their antipathy at last became so great that the countess offered her husband 25,000 crowns to disannul the marriage, which he accepted, and it was dissolved by parliament.

She then devoted herself to the study of poetry; and her writings, which were principally in the elegiac strain, were much admired. Her other works were songs, madrigals, and odes. The wits of her time ascribed to her the majesty of Juno, with Minerva's wit and Venus' beauty. She died at Paris, March 10th, 1673.

CONTAT, LOUISE,

(By marriage, Madame de Parny, but known on the stage by her maiden name), was born at Paris in 1760, made her début as Atalide, in Bajazet, at the Théâtre Français, in 1776, but afterwards devoted her brilliant endowments entirely to comedy. She possessed great versatility of talent, and united beauty, grace, ease, and archness, with dignity, tenderness, delicacy, and judgment. She restored to the stage the masterpieces of Molière, which had long been neglected by the public. After a theatrical career of thirty-two years, most of which were a continual series of triumphs, Madame de Parny retired from the stage in 1808, and became the centre of a brilliant circle of friends, in which she was remarkable for her powers of conversation. A few weeks before her death, she threw into the fire a large collection of anecdotes and other of her writings, in prose and verse, because they contained some strokes of personal satire. She died in 1813. M. Arnault owed his liberty and life, in 1792, to her interference in his favour, at the risk of her own life.

CONTI, MARGARET LOUISA,

Of Lorraine, princess de, daughter of Henry, duke de Guise, surnamed the Balafre, or The Scarred, was born in 1577, and died in 1631. In 1605 she married, by the request of Henry IV., who was in love with her and wished her to remain at court, Francis de Bourbon, prince de Conti. They, however, left Henry's court secretly, on their wedding night, and went to Brussels. The prince de Conti dying in 1614, Louisa devoted herself to literature, patronised the learned, and employed her time in studying their works, and in writing. She was one of cardinal Richelieu's enemies, and he banished her to Eu, where she died. She wrote the loves of Henry IV., under the title of "Les Amoures du Grande Alexandre." She was suspected of having married the marshal de Bassompierre for her second husband.

CONTI, PRINCESS DE,

Whose maiden name was Mademoiselle de Blois, was the daughter of Louis XIV. and Louise de la Vallière. She married Louis Armand de Bourbon, prince de Conti, brother of the prince who was chosen king of Poland. Louis Armand died of the small-pox. The princess was equally celebrated for her wit and wonderful beauty. Muley Ismael, king of Morocco, happening to see her portrait, fell in love with her, and sent an ambassador to demand her hand. Another likeness of this princess inspired the son of the viceroy of Linna with a violent passion; and one of these pictures having been lost in India, was found by the natives, who worshipped it as the image of the goddess Monas. The princess was a protectress of literary men. She died at the commencement of the eighteenth century.

CORDAY D'ARMONT, MARIA-ANNE CHARLOTTE,

Was one of the last descendants of a noble Norman family; she numbered among her ancestors the great tragedian Corneille, and Fontenelle was a near relation.

Her father, Jacques of Corday and of Armont, was a younger son of this noble line. He was, however, poorer than many of the peasants amongst whom he lived, cultivating with his own hands his narrow inheritance. He married in early life a lady of gentle blood, but as poor as himself. They had five children and a noble name to support, in a vain show of dignity, on their insufficient income. It thus happened that Charlotte, their fourth child and second daughter, was born in a thatched dwelling, in the village of Saint Saturnin des Lignerets; and that in the register of the parish church where she was baptized, on the 28th of July, 1768, the day after her birth, she is described as "born in lawful wedlock of Jacques François of Corday, esquire, sieur of Armont, and of the noble dame Marie Charlotte-Jacqueline, of Gauthier des Authieux, his wife." It was under these difficult circumstances, which embittered his temper, and often caused him to inveigh, in energetic terms, against the injustice of the law of primogeniture, that M. d'Armont reared his family. As soon as they were of age, his sons entered the army; one of his daughters died young; and he became a widower when the other two were emerging from childhood into youth. They remained for some time with their father, but at length entered the Abbaye aux Dames, in the neighbouring town of Caën.

The greatest portion of the youth of Charlotte Corday—to give her the name by which she is generally known—was spent in the calm obscurity of her convent solitude.

When the Abbaye aux Dames was closed, in consequence of the revolution, Charlotte was in her twentieth year, in the prime of life and of her wonderful beauty; and never, perhaps, did a vision of more dazzling loveliness step forth from beneath the dark convent portal into the light of the free and open world. She was rather tall, but admirably proportioned, with a figure full of native grace and dignity; her hands, arms, and shoulders, were models of pure sculptural beauty. An expression of singular gentleness and serenity characterized her fair, oval countenance and regular features. Her open forehead, dark and well-arched eyebrows, and eyes of a grey so deep that it was often mistaken for blue, added to her naturally grave and meditative appearance; her nose was straight and well formed, her mouth serious but exquisitely beautiful. Like most of the women of the Norman race, she had a complexion of transparent purity; enhanced by the rich brown hair which fell in thick curls around her neck, according to the fashion of the period. A simple severity characterized her dress of sombre hue, and the low and becoming lace cap which she habitually wore, is still known by her name in France. Her whole aspect was fraught with so much modest grace and dignity, that, notwithstanding her youth, the first feeling she invariably inspired was one of respect; blended with involuntary admiration, for a being of such pure and touching loveliness.

On leaving the convent in which she had been educated, Charlotte Corday went to reside with her aunt, Madame Coutellier de Bretteville Gouville; an old royalist lady, who inhabited an ancient-looking house in one of the principal streets of Caën. There the young girl, who had inherited a little property, spent several years, chiefly engaged in watching the progress of the revolution. The feelings of her father were similarly engrossed: he wrote several pamphlets in favour of the revolutionary principles; and one in which he attacked the right of primogeniture. His republican tendencies confirmed Charlotte in her opinions; but of the deep, overpowering strength which those opinions acquired in her soul, during the long hours she daily devoted to meditation, no one ever knew, until a stern and fearful deed—more stern and fearful in one so gentle—had revealed it to all France. A silent reserve characterized this epoch of Charlotte Corday's life: her enthusiasm was not external, but inward: she listened to the discussions which were carried on around her, without taking a part in them herself. She seemed to feel, instinctively, that great thoughts are always better nursed in the heart's solitude: that they can only lose their native depth and intensity by being revealed too freely before the indifferent gaze of the world. Those with whom she then occasionally conversed took little heed of the substance of her discourse, and could remember nothing of it when she afterwards became celebrated; but all recollected well her voice, and spoke with strange enthusiasm of its pure, silvery sound. Like Madame Roland, whom she resembled in so many respects, Charlotte possessed this rare and great attraction; and there was something so touching in her youthful and almost childlike utterance of heroic thoughts, that it affected even to tears those who heard her, on her trial, calmly defending herself from the infamous accusations of her judges, and glorying, with the same low, sweet tones, in the deadly deed which had brought her before them.

The fall of the Girondists, on the 31st of May, first suggested to Charlotte Corday the possibility of giving an active shape to her hitherto passive feelings. She watched with intense, though still silent, interest the progress of events, concealing her secret indignation, and thoughts of vengeance, under her habitually calm aspect. Those feelings were heightened in her soul by the presence of the fugitive Girondists, who had found a refuge in Caën, and were urging the Normans to raise an army to march on Paris. She found a pretence to call upon Barbaroux, then with his friends at the Intendance. She came twice, accompanied by an old servant, and protected by her own modest dignity. Péthion saw her in the hall, where she was waiting for the handsome Girondist, and observed, with a smile, "So the beautiful aristocrat is come to see republicans." "Citizen Péthion," she replied, "you now judge me without knowing me, but a time will come when you shall learn who I am." With Barbaroux, Charlotte chiefly conversed of the imprisoned Girondists; of Madame Roland and Marat. The name of this man had long haunted her with a mingled feeling of dread and horror. To Marat she ascribed the proscription of the Girondists, the woes of the Republic, and on him she resolved to avenge her ill-fated country. Charlotte was not aware that Marat was but the tool of Danton and Robespierre. "If such actions could be counselled," afterwards said Barbaroux, "it is not Marat whom we would have advised her to strike."

Whilst this deadly thought was daily strengthening itself in Charlotte's mind, she received several offers of marriage. She declined them, on the plea of wishing to remain free: but strange indeed must have seemed to her, at that moment, those proposals of earthly love. One of those whom her beauty had enamoured, M. de Franque- lin, a young volunteer in the cause of the Girondists, died of grief on learning her fate; his last request was, that her portrait, and a few letters he had formerly received from her, might be buried with him in his grave.

For several days after her last interview with Barbaroux, Charlotte brooded silently over her great thought, often meditating on the history of Judith. Her aunt subsequently remembered that, on entering her room one morning, she found an old Bible open on her bed: the verse in which it is recorded that "the Lord had gifted Judith with a special beauty and fairness," for the deliverance of Israel, was underlined with a pencil.

On another occasion Madame de Bretteville found her niece weeping alone; she inquired into the cause of her tears. "They flow," replied Charlotte, "for the misfortunes of my country." Heroic and devoted as she was, she then also wept, perchance, over her own youth and beauty, so soon to be sacrificed for ever. No personal considerations altered her resolve; she procured a passport, provided herself with money, and paid a farewell visit to her father, to inform him that, considering the unsettled condition of France, she thought it best to retire to England. He approved of her intention, and bade her adieu. On returning to Caën, Charlotte told the same tale to Madame de Bretteville, left a secret provision for an old nurse, and distributed the little property she possessed amongst her friends.

It was on the morning of the 9th of July, 1793, that she left the house of her aunt, without trusting herself with a last farewell. Her most earnest wish was, when her deed should have been accomplished, to perish, wholly unknown, by the hands of an infuriated multitude. The woman who could contemplate such a fate, and calmly devote herself to it, without one selfish thought of future renown, had indeed the heroic soul of a martyr.

Her journey to Paris was marked by no other event than the unwelcome attentions of some Jacobins with whom she travelled. One of them, struck by her modest and gentle beauty, made her a very serious proposal of marriage: she playfully evaded his request, but promised that he should learn who and what she was at some future period. On entering Paris she proceeded immediately to the Hotel de la Providence, Rue des Vieux Augustins, not far from Marat's dwelling. Here she rested for two days, before calling on her intended victim. Nothing can mark more forcibly the singular calmness of her mind: she felt no hurry to accomplish the deed for which she had journeyed so far, and over which she had meditated so deeply: her soul remained serene and undaunted to the last. The room which she occupied, and which has often been pointed out to inquiring strangers, was a dark and wretched attic, into which light scarcely ever penetrated. There she read again the volume of Plutarch she had brought with her,—unwilling to part with her favourite author, even in her last hours,—and probably composed that energetic address to the people which was found upon her after her apprehension. One of the first acts of Charlotte was to call on the Girondist, Duperret, for whom she was provided with a letter from Barbaroux, relative to the supposed business she had in Paris: her real motive was to learn how she could see Marat. She had first intended to strike him in the Champ de Mars, on the 14th of July, the anniversary of the fall of the Bastille, when a great and imposing ceremony was to take place. The festival being delayed, she resolved to seek him in the Convention, and immolate him on the very summit of the Mountain; but Marat was too ill to attend the meetings of the National Assembly: this Charlotte learned from Duperret. She resolved, nevertheless, to go to the Convention, in order to fortify herself in her resolve. Mingling with the horde of Jacobins who crowded the galleries, she watched with deep attention the scene below. Saint Just was then urging the Convention to proscribe Lanjuinais, the heroic defender of the Girondists. A young foreigner, a friend of Lanjuinais, and who stood at a short distance from Charlotte, noticed the expression of stern indignation which gathered over her features; until, like one overpowered by her feelings, and apprehensive of displaying them too openly, she abruptly left the place. Struck with her whole appearance, he followed her out; a sudden shower of rain, which compelled them to seek shelter under the same archway, afforded him an opportunity of entering into conversation with her. When she learned that he was a friend of Lanjuinais, she waived her reserve, and questioned him with much interest concerning Madame Roland and the Girondists. She also asked him about Marat, with whom she said she had business. "Marat is ill; it would be better for you to apply to the public accuser, Fouquier Tinville," said the stranger. "I do not want him now, but I may have to deal with him yet," she significantly replied.

Perceiving that the rain did not cease, she requested her companion to procure her a conveyance; he complied; and, before parting from her, begged to be favoured with her name. She refused; adding, however, "You will know it before long." With Italian courtesy, he kissed her hand as he assisted her into the fiacre. She smiled, and bade him farewell.

Charlotte perceived that to call on Marat was the only means by which she might accomplish her purpose. She did so on the morning of the 13th of July, having first purchased a knife in the Palais Royal, and written him a note, in which she requested an interview. She was refused admittance. She then wrote him a second note, more pressing than the first, and in which she represented herself as persecuted for the cause of freedom. Without waiting to see what effect this note might produce, she called again at half-past seven the same evening.

Marat then resided in the Rue des Cordeliers, in a gloomy-looking house, which has since been demolished. His constant fears of assassination were shared by those around him; the porter, seeing a strange woman pass by his lodge without pausing to make any inquiry, ran out and called her back. She did not heed his remonstrance, but swiftly ascended the old stone staircase, until she had reached the door of Marat's apartment. It was cautiously opened by Albertine, a woman with whom Marat cohabited, and who passed for his wife. Recognising the same young and handsome girl who had already called on her husband, and animated, perhaps, by a feeling of jealous mistrust, Albertine refused to admit her; Charlotte insisted with great earnestness. The sound of their altercation reached Marat; he immediately ordered his wife to admit the stranger, whom he recognised as the author of the two letters he had received in the course of the day. Albertine obeyed reluctantly; she allowed Charlotte to enter; and, after crossing with her an antechamber, where she had been occupied with a man named Laurent Basse in folding some numbers of the "Ami du Peuple," she ushered her through two other rooms, until they came to a narrow closet, where Marat was then in a bath. He gave a look at Charlotte, and ordered his wife to leave them alone: she complied, but allowed the door of the closet to remain half open, and kept within call.

According to his usual custom, Marat wore a soiled handkerchief bound round his head, increasing his natural hideousness. A coarse covering was thrown across the bath; a board, likewise placed transversely, supported his papers. Laying down his pen, he asked Charlotte the purport of her visit. The closet was so narrow that she touched the bath near which she stood. She gazed on him with ill-disguised horror and disgust, but answered, as composedly as she could, that she had come from Caën, in order to give him correct intelligence concerning the proceedings of the Girondists there. He listened, questioned her eagerly, wrote down the names of the Girondists, then added, with a smile of triumph: "Before a week they shall have perished on the guillotine." "These words," afterwards said Charlotte, "sealed his fate." Drawing from beneath the handkerchief which covered her bosom the knife she had kept there all along, she plunged it to the hilt in Marat's heart. He gave one loud expiring cry for help, and sank back dead, in the bath. By an instinctive impulse, Charlotte had instantly drawn out the knife from the breast of her victim, but she did not strike again; casting it down at his feet, she left the closet, and sat down in the neighbouring room, thoughtfully passing her hand across her brow: her task was done.

The wife of Marat had rushed to his aid on hearing his cry for help. Laurent Basse, seeing that all was over, turned round towards Charlotte, and, with a blow of a chair, felled her to the floor; whilst the infuriated Albertine trampled her under her feet. The tumult aroused the other tenants of the house; the alarm spread, and a crowd gathered in the apartment, who learned with stupor that Marat, the Friend of the People, had been murdered. Deeper still was their wonder when they gazed on the murderess. She stood there before them with still disordered garments, and her dishevelled hair, loosely bound by a broad green riband, falling around her; but so calm, so serenely lovely, that those who most abhorred her crime gazed on her with involuntary admiration. "Was she then so beautiful?" was the question addressed, many years afterwards, to an old man, one of the few remaining witnesses of this scene. "Beautiful!" he echoed, enthusiastically; adding, with the wonted regrets of old age: "Ay, there are none such now!"

The commissary of police began his interrogatory in the saloon of Marat's apartment. She told him her name, how long she had been in Paris, confessed her crime, and recognised the knife with which it had been perpetrated. The sheath was found in her pocket, with a thimble, some thread, money, and her watch.

"What was your motive in assassinating Marat?" asked the commissary.

"To prevent a civil war," she answered.

"Who are your accomplices?"

"I have none."

She was ordered to be transferred to the Abbaye, the nearest prison. An immense and infuriated crowd had gathered around the door of Marat's house; one of the witnesses perceived that she would have liked to be delivered to this maddened multitude, and thus perish at once. She was not saved from their hands without difficulty; her courage failed her at the sight of the peril she ran, and she fainted away on being conveyed to the fiacre. On reaching the Abbaye, she was questioned until midnight by Chabot and Drouet, two Jacobin members of the Convention. She answered their interrogatories with singular firmness; observing, in conclusion: "I have done my task, let others do theirs." Chabot threatened her with the scaffold; she answered him with a smile of disdain. Her behaviour until the 17th, the day of her trial, was marked by the same firmness. She wrote to Barbaroux a charming letter, full of graceful wit and heroic feeling. Her playfulness never degenerated into levity: like that of the illustrious Thomas More, it was the serenity of a mind whom death had no power to daunt. Speaking of her action, she observes, "I considered that so many brave men need not come to Paris for the head of one man. He deserved not so much honour: the hand of a woman was enough. . . . I have never hated but one being, and him with what intensity I have sufficiently shown; but there are a thousand whom I love still more than I hated him. . . . I confess that I employed a perfidious artifice in order that he might receive me. In leaving Caën, I thought to sacrifice him on the pinnacle of 'the Mountain,' but he no longer went to it. In Paris they cannot understand how a useless woman, whose longest life could have been of no good, could sacrifice herself to save her country. . . . May peace be as soon established as I desire! A great criminal has been laid low. . . . the happiness of my country makes mine. A lively imagination and a feeling heart promise but a stormy life; I beseech those who might regret me to consider this: they will then rejoice at my fate." A tenderer tone marks the brief letter she addressed to her father on the eve of her trial and death: "Forgive me, my dear father," she observed, "for having disposed of my existence without your permission. I have avenged many innocent victims. I have warded away many disasters. The people, undeceived, will one day rejoice at being delivered from a tyrant. If I endeavoured to persuade you that I was going to England, it was because I hoped to remain unknown: I recognised that this was impossible. I hope you will not be subjected to annoyance: you have at least defenders at Caën; I have chosen Gustave Doucet de Pontécoulant for mine: it is a mere matter of form. Such a deed allows of no defence. Farewell, my dear father. I beseech of you to forget me; or, rather, to rejoice at my fate. I die for a good cause. I embrace my sister, whom I love with my whole heart. Do not forget the line of Corneille:

'Le crime faite la honte, et non pas l'échafaud.'

To-morrow at eight I am to be tried."

On the morning of the 17th, she was led before her judges. She was dressed with care, and had never looked more lovely. Her bearing was so imposing and dignified, that the spectators and the judges seemed to stand arraigned before her. She interrupted the first witness, by declaring that it was she who had killed Marat. "Who inspired you with so much hatred against him?" asked the President.

"I needed not the hatred of others, I had enough of my own," she energetically replied; "besides, we do not execute well that which we have not ourselves conceived."

"What, then, did you hate in Marat?"

"His crimes."

"Do you think that you have assassinated all the Marats?"

"No; but now that he is dead, the rest may fear."

She answered other questions with equal firmness and laconism. Her project, she declared, had been formed since the 31st of May. "She had killed one man to save a hundred thousand. She was a republican long before the Revolution, and had never failed in energy."

"What do you understand by energy?" asked the President.

"That feeling," she replied, "which induces us to cast aside selfish considerations, and sacrifice ourselves for our country."

Fouquier Tinville here observed, alluding to the sure blow she had given, that she must be well practised in crime. "The monster takes me for an assassin!" she exclaimed, in a tone thrilling with indignation. This closed the debates, and her defender rose. It was not Doucet de Pontécoulant—who had not received her letter—but Chauveau de la Garde, chosen by the President. Charlotte gave him an anxious look, as though she feared he might seek to save her at the expense of honour. He spoke, and she perceived that her apprehensions were unfounded. Without excusing her crime or attributing it to insanity, he pleaded for the fervour of her conviction; which he had the courage to call sublime. The appeal proved unavailing. Charlotte Corday was condemned. Without deigning to answer the President, who asked her if she had aught to object to the penalty of death being carried out against her, she rose, and walking up to her defender, thanked him gracefully. "These gentlemen," said she, pointing to the judges, "have just informed me that the whole of my property is confiscated. I owe something in the prison: as a proof of my friendship and esteem, I request you to pay this little debt."

On returning to the Conciergerie, she found an artist, named Hauër, waiting for her, to finish her portrait, which he had begun at the Tribunal. They conversed freely together, until the executioner, carrying the red chemise destined for assassins, and the scissors with which he was to cut her hair off, made his appearance. "What, so soon!" exclaimed Charlotte Corday, slightly turning pale; but rallying her courage, she resumed her composure, and presented a lock of her hair to M. Hauër, as the only reward in her power to give. A priest came to offer her his ministry. She thanked him and the persons by whom he had been sent, but declined his spiritual aid. The executioner cut her hair, bound her hands, and threw the red chemise over her. M. Hauër was struck with the almost unearthly loveliness which the crimson hue of this garment imparted to the ill-fated maiden. "This toilet of death, though performed by rude hands, leads to immortality," said Charlotte, with a smile.

A heavy storm broke forth as the car of the condemned left the Conciergerie for the Place de la Révolution. An immense crowd lined every street through which Charlotte Corday passed. Hootings and execrations at first rose on her path; but as her pure and serene beauty dawned on the multitude, as the exquisite loveliness of her countenance and the sculptured beauty of her figure became more fully revealed, pity and admiration superseded every other feeling. Her bearing was so admirably calm and dignified, as to rouse sympathy in the breasts of those who detested not only her crime, but the cause for which it had been committed. Many men of every party took off their hats and bowed as the cart passed before them. Amongst those who waited its approach, was a young German, named Adam Luz, who stood at the entrance of the Rue Sainte Honoré, and followed Charlotte to the scaffold. He gazed on the lovely and heroic maiden with all the enthusiasm of his imaginative race. A love, unexampled perhaps in the history of the human heart, took possession of his soul. Not one wandering look of "those beautiful eyes, which revealed a soul as intrepid as it was tender," escaped him. Every earthly grace so soon to perish in death, every trace of the lofty and immortal spirit, filled him with bitter and intoxicating emotions unknown till then. "To die for her; to be struck by the same hand; to feel in death the same cold axe which had severed the angelic head of Charlotte; to be united to her in heroism, freedom, love, and death, was now the only hope and desire of his heart."

Unconscious of the passionate love she had awakened, Charlotte now stood near the guillotine. She turned pale on first beholding it, but soon resumed her serenity. A deep blush suffused her face when the executioner removed the handkerchief that covered her neck and shoulders; but she calmly laid her head upon the block. The executioner touched a spring, and the axe came down. One of the assistants immediately stepped forward, and holding up the lifeless head to the gaze of the crowd, struck it on either cheek. The brutal act only excited a feeling of horror; and it is said that—as though even in death her indignant spirit protested against this outrage—an angry and crimson flush passed over the features of Charlotte Corday.

A few days after her execution, Adam Luz published a pamphlet, in which he enthusiastically praised her deed, and proposed that a statue with the inscription, "Greater than Brutus," should be erected to her memory on the spot where she had perished. He was arrested and thrown into prison On entering the Abbaye, he passionately exclaimed, "I am going to die for her!" His wish was fulfilled ere long.

Strange feverish times were those which could rouse a gentle and lovely maiden to avenge freedom by such a deadly deed; which could waken in a human heart a love whose thoughts were not of life or earthly bliss, but of the grave and the scaffold. Let the times, then, explain those natures, where so much evil and heroism are blended that man cannot mark the limits between both. Whatever judgment may be passed upon her, the character of Charlotte Corday was certainly not cast in an ordinary mould. It is a striking and noble trait, that to the last she did not repent: never was error more sincere. If she could have repented, she would never have become guilty.

Her deed created an extraordinary impression throughout France. On hearing of it, a beautiful royalist lady fell down on her knees and invoked "Saint Charlotte Corday." The republican Madame Roland calls her a heroine worthy of a better age. The poet, André Chénier—who, before a year had elapsed, followed her on the scaffold—sang her heroism in a soul-stirring strain.

The political influence of that deed may be estimated by the exclamation of Vergniaud: "She kills us, but she teaches us how to die!" It was so. The assassination of Marat exasperated all his fanatic partisans against the Girondists. Almost divine honours were paid to his memory; forms of prayer were addressed to him; altars were erected to his honour, and numberless victims sent to the scaffold as a peace-offering to his manes. On the wreck of his popularity rose the far more dangerous power of Robespierre: a new impulse was given to the Reign of Terror. This was the "peace" which the erring and heroic Charlotte Corday won for France.

The author of "The Women in France," from whose interesting book we have selected this memoir, thus remarks on the character of this extraordinary woman: "To judge her absolutely lies not in the province of man. Beautiful, pure, gentle, and—a murderess!" It may be added, that, compared with the men of her time, Charlotte Corday was like a bright star shining through noxious and dark exhalations of selfishness and wickedness. She was not a Christian, for true Christianity had lost its power over the people of France; but she displayed, with the stern strength of a Roman soul, the highest principle of our unregenerate nature—patriotism.

CORTESI, GIOVANNA MARMOCCHINI,

A CELEBRATED Florentine artist, was born in 1670, and instructed by Livio Mehus, and Pietro Dandini; but, by order of the grand-duchess, she was afterwards taught to paint in miniature by Hippolito Galantini. In that style she became very eminent for her colouring, drawing, and the striking likenesses she produced. She usually worked in oil, but also painted equally well with crayons. She died in 1736.

CORNARO, HELENA LUCRETIA.

A LEARNED Venetian lady, was the daughter of Gio Baptista Cornaro, and educated in a very different manner from her sex generally: she was taught languages, sciences, and the philosophy of the schools, difficult as it then was. She took her degrees at Padua, and was perhaps the first lady who was made a doctor. She was also admitted to the university at Rome, where she had the title of Humble given her, as she had that of Unalterable at Padua. She deserved both these appellations, since all her learning had not inspired her with vanity, nor could any thing disturb her calmness and tranquillity of mind. She made a vow of virginity, and though all means were used to persuade her to marry, and dispensation obtained from the pope, she remained immovable. She exercised upon herself the discipline of flagellation, fasted often, and spent nearly her whole time in study and devotion.

Persons of note who passed through Venice were more desirous to see her than any of the curiosities of that superb city. The cardinals de Bouillon and d'Etres were commanded by the king of France to call on her, on their journey through Italy, and examine whether what was said of her was true; and they found that she fully equalled her high reputation all over Europe. Her severe studies impaired her health, and she died in 1685.

As soon as the news of her death reached Rome, the academicians, called Infecondi, who had admitted her to their society, made innumerable odes and epitaphs to her memory. They celebrated a funeral solemnity in her honour, in the college of the Barnabite friars, with the highest pomp and magnificence; and one of the academicians made a funeral oration, in which he expatiated on all her great and valuable qualities. She was not the author of any literary productions.

COSEL, COUNTESS OF,

ONE of the numerous mistresses of Augustus II., king of Poland and elector of Saxony, was the wife of the Saxon minister Hoymb, who, knowing the king's disposition, kept her far from court; but, on one occasion, excited by wine, he praised her so highly to the king, that Augustus ordered her to be brought to Dresden. Soon after she was divorced from Hoymb, and appeared at court as the countess of Cosel. A palace was built for her by the king, still called the Cosel palace, which was pre-eminent for magnificence and luxury. For nine years the countess preserved the king's favour, and exercised an arbitrary sway in the affairs of government. The money coined while she was in favour bore the stamp of the royal arms in conjunction with those of the countess. At last she fell into disgrace, and was dismissed. She retired to Prussia, and was afterwards arrested at Halle, at the request of Augustus, and imprisoned at Stolpe, in Saxony, where she remained forty-five years. She died at the age of eighty.

COSSON DE LA CRESSONNIÈRE,
CHARLOTTE CATHARINE,

BORN at Mèzières, in the eighteenth century, was the author of several poems which were published in the "Mercur de France," and other periodical journals. She also wrote a poetical "Lamentation on the Death of the Dauphin."

COSTA, MARIA MARGARITA,

AN Italian poetess, whose works were published at Paris, was born at Rome, in 1716. She was a woman of vast erudition, and wrote successfully in different kinds of literature. She wrote the librettos of several operas.

COSWAY, MARY,

ONE of the best miniature-painters of Italy, was the daughter of an Englishman by the name of Hadfield, who kept a hotel at Leghorn. Mary was born in the year 1779, and married, when twenty years old, an Englishman by the name of Cosway, who had acquired some celebrity as a painter. He soon discovered the talent of his wife, and aided her in cultivating it. He then went with her to Paris, where she devoted herself altogether to miniature-painting and engraving. Her fame extended soon throughout the country, and people from all parts of the kingdom came to have their likenesses taken by her. Her greatest undertaking, a work which was to contain a copy of the best paintings in the Museum, accompanied with historical notices, remained unfinished on account of the loss of a child, which affected her so much that she became melancholy, and gave up her artistical pursuits. She died, 1804, in a sunnery near Lyons.

COTTIN, SOPHIE,

WHOSE maiden name was Ristaud, was born at Tonneins, in the department of Lot and Garonne, in 1773. She married M. Cottin, a banker at Bordeaux, and went soon after to reside at Paris, where her husband died. She was then twenty years of age, and might have been much admired; but she had been tenderly attached to her husband, and never would re-marry. To relieve her sorrows, she gave herself up to intellectual pursuits; and thus, in the expression of her thoughts and feelings, she began to write. Her first attempts were small poems, and a story, "Claire d'Albe," which she was induced to publish by the following singular circumstances. Upon the breaking out of the revolution of 1789, Madame Cottin, who did not partake of the popular opinions, adopted the most secluded life possible, devoting herself to study and reading. At the same time she took a lively interest in the misfortunes of those unhappy days, and her heart bled to hear of the imprisonment and execution of many a well-known citizen. In the darkest days of "terror," she one evening received the following letter:

Madam,—I am almost unknown to you. I have seen you but a few times, and have probably made but a slight impression on you; but I am in urgent distress, and I apply to you with confidence, certain of receiving the aid you can administer.

Madam, my name is on the proscribed list; I am surrounded by spies and enemies; every step leads me to the guillotine, and I can only hope for safety in a foreign land. But I am totally without money to release myself from these dangers; a way has now opened for me, but persons must be feed, and 2150 livres is the sum requisite. I supplicate you then, madam, to take pity on an unfortunate fellow-creature who wishes to preserve his life for the sake of a family depending on him. The person who delivers this will call for your answer, and may be entirely trusted.

DE FONBELLE.

Madame Cottin remembered the name of Fonbelle, and also remembered that he was highly esteemed in the house where she had met him; she was anxious to save him; but how or where to get the required sum? She thought, she considered; when at last the idea struck her. She had often been urged by her friends to publish the tales she had written for her amusement, but had always shrunk from coming before the world. In this extremity, however, she bethought her of a story, of which she had read the first chapters in a little circle, where it had produced a favourable impression. She instantly sat down to her writing-desk, drew out her imperfect manuscript, and resolved to complete it. The night passed—she was still at her labours; two o'clock came—her room was the only one in the house that showed a light; there was a knocking at the door—a noise in the entry! Who could it be, at that hour? Her heart beat violently. It was a domiciliary visit! The letter of Fonbelle lay on the desk—it needed all her presence of mind—the gens-d'armes were already in the room. The expedient she adopted was singular, but successful; she told them she was an authoress, merely occupied in her vocation, and, that they might be convinced of it, offered to give them a sketch of her story. They ranged themselves on chairs round the room, and she proceeded to relate to them "Claire d'Albe." There was such a charm in her voice, and in her manner of arranging the incidents—so much dramatic interest in her conduct of the events—that these rude men became deeply affected. The same people who would have remorselessly dragged the fairest and tenderest to a merciless execution, absolutely sobbed over fictitious woes, pathetically related. When she had finished, they were so much gratified, that they forbore touching her papers; and their search through the house was but nominal. They departed, after shaking hands with her, telling her when the book came out, they would immediately purchase a copy.

The book was soon finished; but that was not all—it must be sold. Madame Cottin went in the morning to at least twenty booksellers; none were willing to risk their money with an unknown author. Her active benevolence was not to be abated by repulse. At last, by the means of a friend, she was introduced to a kind-hearted publisher, who, hearing she was pressed for money, consented to oblige her. "What do you ask, madam?" said he; "the book is prettily written, as far as I see, but it is not a master-piece." "Fifty Louis," replied she; "since you are so frank, I confess that I am under the most urgent necessity to procure this sum."

The good man feared the risk; but his better feelings prevailed, and he counted her out fifty golden Louis. The rest of the sum she made up from money she had reserved for her housekeeping supplies, determined to live frugally till her next account day. When the messenger returned, she placed in his hands the 2150 livres; and in a fortnight, had the pleasure of a letter from M. De Fonbelle, assuring her of his safety and gratitude, while on the same day her volume appeared in print. It was received with so much approbation, that she was induced to bring out, in succession, her other more admired works.

This anecdote has been detailed, as it honours Madame Cottin more than even her literary reputation. How noble, to take the first steps in the career of authorship from no sordid motive, nor even from a vain desire of renown, but solely to save the life of an innocent victim of injustice! Her other works were all brought out for the indulgence of her wish to succour the indigent, and never did a lower motive inspire her genius. Her written works are like her entire life—an exposition of the noblest sentiments. The eloquence and fervour with which she expresses the most secret feelings of the heart, have been much admired, particularly by her own sex. Her authorship commenced from the irrepressible desire to occupy her time innocently, and improve her own mind. The last work she undertook, was on religion; and she had also commenced one on education; a painful disease prevented her from finishing either. The latter was the only one of her works for which she was anxious to gain a favourable reception with the public. Singular as it will now seem, she disapproved, in general, of women appearing as authors; but, in her solicitude for this work on education, she honoured the true and instinctive promptings of female genius—to teach. Madame Cottin died, after a severe illness of three months, August 25th, 1807. Her works have been collected, and published at Paris.

Her published works are, besides "Claire d'Albe," "Malvina," "Amelie de Mansfield," "Matilda," and "Elizabeth, or the Exile of Siberia;" this last is considered her best work. We shall give a few selections from it; but first, a morceau or two from her own thoughts.

TEMPTATIONS.

When we have to account to ourselves alone, the predominant passion finds a thousand ways of leading us into its paths, and even of persuading us that there is nothing wrong in following them. We have resisted a little while, and we think we have done wonders; because we estimate the merit of our resistance, not by its duration, but by the difficulty it has cost us. When, however, we have to show to the eyes of others, our feeble efforts, which will not then be judged by the anguish under which we made them, and our rapid yielding, which will not then be excused by the force that determined it—when, in fine, we are sure that only the result of our conduct will be considered, and not the poignant feelings that produced it—then this result will appear to us, as it will be viewed by strangers. The point from which we set out, and the point at which we have arrived, remain alone; all intermediate palliations have vanished. We are frightened at the fearful steps we have taken, and the more so, as we have taken them without knowing where they led us.

LIFE.

We like to feel life; its agitations, its perplexities, while they lacerate us, attach us. In affliction, the whole of life is before us; the past with its regrets, the present with its tears, and the future with its hopes. It is in affliction, that the imagination elevates itself to the great thoughts of eternity and supreme justice, and that it takes us out of ourselves, to seek a remedy for our pains.

From "Elizabeth."

THE EXILES AND THEIR HOME.

On the banks of the Irtysh, which rises in Calmuck Tartary, and falls into the Oby, is situated Tobolsk, the capital of Siberia; bounded on the north by forests eleven hundred versts in length, extending to the borders of the frozen ocean, and interspersed with rocky mountains covered with perpetual snows. Around it are sterile plains, whose frozen sands have seldom received an impression from the human foot, and numerous frigid lakes, or rather stagnant marshes, whose icy streams never watered a meadow, nor opened to the sunbeam the beauties of a flower. On approaching nearer to the pole, these stately productions of nature, whose sheltering foliage is so grateful to the weary traveller, totally disappear. Brambles, dwarf-birches, and shrubs, alone ornament this desolate spot; and farther on, even these vanish, leaving nothing but swamps covered with a useless moss, and presenting, as it were, the last efforts of expiring nature. But still, amidst the horror and gloom of an eternal winter, nature displays some of her grandest spectacles;—the aurora borealis, enclosing the horizon like a resplendent arch, emits columns of quivering light, and frequently offers to view sights which are unknown in a more southern hemisphere. South of Tobolsk is the province called Ischim: plains strewed with the repositories of the dead, and divided by lakes of stagnant and unwholesome water, separate it from the Kirguis, an idolatrous and wandering people. It is bounded on the left by the river Irtysh, and on the right by the Tobol, the naked and barren shores of which present to the eye fragments of rocks promiscuously heaped together, with here and there a solitary fir-tree rearing its head. Beneath them, in a space formed by an angle of the river, is the small village of Saimka, about six hundred versts from Tobolsk: situated in the farthest extremity of the circle, in the midst of a desert, its environs are as gloomy as the sombre light which illuminates the hemisphere, and as dreary as the climate.

The province of Ischim is nevertheless denominated the Italy of Siberia; since it enjoys nearly four months of summer, though the winter is rigorous to an excess. The north winds which blow during that period are so incessant, and render the cold so piercing, that even in September the Tobol is paved with ice. A heavy snow falls upon the earth, and disappears not before the end of May; but from the time that it begins to dissolve, the celerity with which the trees shoot forth their leaves, and the fields display their verdure, is almost incredible; three days is the short period that nature requires to bring her plants to maturity. The blossoms of the birth-tree exhale an odoriferous scent, and the wild flowers of the field decorate the ground; flocks of various kinds of fowl play upon the surface of the lakes; the white crane plunges among the rushes of the solitary marsh to build her nest, which she plaits with reeds; whilst the flying squirrels, in the woods, cutting the air with their bushy tails, hop from tree to tree, and nibble the buds of the pines, and the tender leaves of the birch. Thus the natives of these dreary regions experience a season of pleasure; but the unhappy exiles who inhabit it, alas! experience none.

Of these miserable beings the greatest part reside in the villages situated on the borders of the river, between Tobolsk and the extremest boundary of Ischim; others are dispersed in cottages about the country. The government provides for some: but many are abandoned to the scanty subsistence they can procure from the chase during the winter season, and all are objects of general commiseration. Indeed the name they give to the exiles seems to have been dictated by the tenderest sympathy, as well as by a strong conviction of their innocence; they call them "Unfortunates."

A few versts from Saimka, in the centre of a marshy forest, upon the border of a deep circular lake, surrounded with black poplars, resided one of these banished families, consisting of three persons—a man about five-and-forty, his wife, and a beautiful daughter in the bloom of youth.

Secluded in the desert, this little family were strangers to the intercourse of society: the father went alone to the chase; but neither had he, his wife, or his daughter, ever been seen at Saimka; and, except one poor Tartarian peasant, who waited on them, no human being had entered their dwelling. The governor of Tobolsk only was informed of their birth, their country, and the cause of their banishment: and this secret he had not even confided to the lieutenant of his jurisdiction, who was established at Saimka. In committing these exiles to his care, the governor had merely given orders that they should be provided with a comfortable lodging, a garden, food, and raiment; and he had given to the lieutenant a positive charge to restrict them from all communication with any one, and particularly to intercept any letter they might attempt to convey to the court of Russia.

So much consideration, so much mystery, and such strict precaution excited a suspicion that, under the simple name of Peter Springer, the father of this family concealed a name more illustrious, and misfortunes of no common nature. Perhaps he had been guilty of some great crime; or possibly he was a victim to the hatred and injustice of the Russian ministers.

WINTER IN SIBERIA.

Siberia, in winter, is subject to sudden storms. Often, during this season, when the sky appears serene, dreadful hurricanes arise instantaneously, and obscure the atmosphere. They are impelled from the opposite sides of the horizon; and, when they meet, the strongest trees in vain oppose their violence. In vain the pliant birch bends to the ground: its flexible branches, with their trembling leaves, are broken and dispersed. The snow rolls from the tops of the mountains, carrying with it enormous masses of ice which break against the points of the rocks; these break in their turn, and the wind, carrying away the fragments, together with those of the falling huts, in which the terrified animals have in vain sought shelter, whirls them aloft in the air, and, dashing them back to the earth, strews the ground with the ruins of every production of nature.

* * * * *

THE MOTHER AND DAUGHTER.

The cold was intense, the firs appeared like trees of ice, their branches being hid under a thick covering of hoar frost. A mist obscured the horizon. Night's near approach gave to each object a still gloomier shade, and the ground, smooth as glass, refused to support the steps of the trembling Phedora. Elizabeth, reared in this climate, and accustomed to brave the extremest severity of the weather, assisted her mother, and led her on. Thus a tree, transplanted from its native soil, languishes in a foreign land, while the young suckling that springs from its root, habituated to the new climate, acquires strength, flourishes, and, in a few years, sustains the branches of the trunk that nourished it; protecting, by its friendly shade, the tree to which it is indebted for existence. Before Phedora had reached the plain, her strength totally failed: "Rest here, my dear mother," said Elizabeth, "and let me go alone to the edge of the forest. If we stay longer, the darkness of the night will prevent me from distinguishing my father in the plain." Phedora supported herself against a tree, while her laughter hastened forward, and in a few seconds she reached the plain. Some of the monuments with which it is interspersed are very high. Elizabeth climbed up the most elevated of them: her heart was full of grief, and her eyes dim with tears. She gazed around in vain for her father: all was still and lonely; the obscurity of night began to render the search useless. Terror almost suspended her faculties, when the report of a gun revived her hopes. She had never heard this sound but from the hand of her father, and, to her, it appeared a certain indication that he was near. She rushed towards the spot whence the noise proceeded, and, behind a pile of rocks, discovered a man in a bending posture, apparently seeking for something upon the ground. "My father, my father, is it you?" she exclaimed. He turned hastily; it was not Springer. His countenance was youthful, and his air noble; at the sight of Elizabeth he stood amazed. "Oh! it is not my father," resumed she with anguish, "but perhaps you may have seen him on the plain? Oh! can you tell me where to find him?"—"I know nothing of your father," replied the stranger; "but surely you ought not to be here alone at this unseasonable hour; you are exposed to great danger, and should not venture."—"Oh!" interrupted she, "I fear nothing but losing my father." As she spoke she raised her eyes to heaven: their expression revealed, at once, firmness in affliction, and dignity united with softness. They expressed the feelings of her soul, and seemed to foretell her future destiny. The stranger had never seen a person, nor had his imagination ever painted a vision, like Elizabeth: he almost believed himself in a dream. When the first emotion of surprise had subsided, he inquired the name of her father; "Peter Springer," she replied.—"How!" he exclaimed, "you are the daughter of the exile residing in a cottage by the lake! be comforted, I have seen your father. It is not an hour since he left me; he intended to make a circuit, and must be at home ere this."

CROSSING THE VOLGA.

She travelled so slowly that she was unable to reach Casan till the beginning of October. A strong wind from the north-west had prevailed for several days, and had collected so great a quantity of ice upon the Wolga, as to render the passage of that river almost impracticable. It could only be crossed by going partly in a boat and partly on foot, leaping from one piece of ice to another. Even the boatmen who were accustomed to this dangerous navigation, would not undertake it but in consideration of a high reward; and no passenger ever ventured to expose his life with them in the attempt. Elizabeth, without thinking of the danger, was about to enter one of their boats; they roughly pushed her away, declaring that she could not be permitted to cross till the river was quite frozen over. She inquired how long she would probably have to wait. "A fortnight, at least," they replied. This determined her immediately to proceed. "I beseech you, in the name of Heaven I beseech you," she exclaimed, "aid me in crossing the river. I come from beyond Tobolsk, and am going to Petersburg, to petition the emperor in behalf of my father, who is now an exile in Siberia; and I have so little money that if I am obliged to remain a fortnight at Casan, I shall have nothing left for the rest of my journey."

This affecting appeal softened the heart of one of the boatmen, who, taking her by the hand, "Come," said he, "you are a good girl; I will endeavour to ferry you over: the fear of God, and the love of your parents, guide your steps, and Heaven will protect you." He then took her into his boat, which he rowed half-way over: not being able to work it farther, he lifted Elizabeth on his shoulder; and alternately walking and leaping over the masses of ice, he reached, by the assistance of an oar, the opposite bank of the Wolga, where he set her down in safety. Elizabeth expressed her acknowledgments of the kindness in the most animated terms that her grateful heart could dictate, and, taking out her purse, which contained now but two rubles and a few smaller coins, offered a trifling reward for his services. "Poor child," said the boatman, looking at the contents of her purse, "is that all the money you have to defray the expenses of your journey hence to Petersburg? Believe me, that Nicholas Kisloff will not deprive you of a single obol! No, rather let me add to your little store; it will bring down a blessing upon me and my children." He then threw her a small piece of money, and returned to his boat, exclaiming, "May God watch over and protect you, my child!"

Elizabeth took up the money, and regarding it with her eyes filled with tears, said, "I will preserve thee for my father: thou wilt prove to him that his prayers have been heard, and that a paternal protection has, everywhere, been extended to me."

THE MITE GIVEN IN CHARITY.

She had occupied nearly three months in her journey from Sarapol to Voldomir; but, through the kind hospitality of the Russian peasants, who never take any payment for milk and bread, her little treasure had not been yet exhausted. Now, however, all began to fail; her feet were almost bare, and her ragged dress ill defended her from a frigidity of atmosphere, which had already sunk the thermometer thirty degrees below the freezing point, and which increased daily. The ground was covered with snow more than two feet deep. Sometimes it congealed while falling, and appeared like a shower of ice, so thick that the earth and sky were equally concealed from view. At other times torrents of rain rendered the roads almost impassable, or gusts of wind so violent arose, that Elizabeth, to defend herself from its rude assaults, was obliged to dig holes in the snow, covering her head with large pieces of the bark of pine trees, which she dexterously stripped off, as she had seen done by the inhabitants of Siberia.

One of these tempestuous hurricanes had raised the snow in thick clouds, and had created an obscurity so impenetrable, that Elizabeth, no longer able to discern the road, and stumbling at every step, was obliged to stop. She took refuge under a lofty rock, to which she clung as firmly as she could, that she might be enabled to withstand the fury of a storm which overthrew all around her. Whilst she was in this perilous situation, with her head bent down, a confused noise, that appeared to issue from behind the spot where she stood, raised a hope that a better shelter might be procured. With difficulty she tottered round the rock, and discovered a kibitki, which had been overturned and broken, and a hut at no great distance. She hastened to demand entrance. An old woman opened the door; and, struck with the wretchedness of her appearance, "My poor child," said she, "whence dost thou come, and why art thou wandering thus alone in this dreadful weather?" To this interrogation Elizabeth made her usual reply: "I come from beyond Tobolsk, and am going to Petersburg to solicit my father's pardon." At these words, a man who was sitting, dejectedly, in a corner of the room, suddenly raised his head from between his hands, and, regarding Elizabeth with an air of astonishment, exclaimed, "Is it possible that you come from so remote a country, alone, in this state of distress, and during this tempestuous season, to solicit pardon for your father? Alas! my poor child would perhaps have done as much, had not the barbarians torn me from her arms, leaving her in ignorance of my fate. She knows not what has become of me. She cannot plead for mercy. No, never shall I again behold her — this afflicting thought will kill me — separated for ever from my child, I cannot live. Now, indeed, that I know my doom," continued the unhappy father, "I might inform her of it; I have written a letter to her, but the carrier belonging to this kibitki, who is returning to Riga, the place of her abode, will not undertake the charge of it without some small compensation, and I am unable to offer him any. Not a single copeck do I possess: the barbarians have stripped me of everything."

Elizabeth drew from her pocket the last ruble she possessed, and, blushing deeply at the insignificance of the trifle, asked, in timid accents, as she presented it to the unfortunate exile, "If that would be enough?" He pressed to his lips the generous hand that was held forth to succour him; and then ran to offer the money to the carrier. As with the widow's mite, Heaven bestowed its blessing on the offering. The carrier was satisfied, and took charge of the letter. Thus did her noble sacrifice produce a fruit worthy of the heart of Elizabeth: it relieved the agonized feelings of a parent, and carried consolation to the wounded bosom of a child.

When the storm had abated, Elizabeth, before she pursued her journey, embraced the old woman, who had bestowed upon her all the care and tenderness of a mother; and said in a low voice, that she might not be heard by the exile, "I have nothing left to give: the blessing of my parents is the only recompense I have to offer for your kindness; it is the only treasure I possess."—"How!" interrupted the old woman aloud, "My poor child, have you then given away all you possessed?" Elizabeth blushed, and hung down her head. The exile started from his seat, and raising his hands to Heaven, threw himself upon his knees before her. "Angel that thou art," he exclaimed, "can I make no return to you, who have thus bestowed your all upon me?" A knife lay upon the table: Elizabeth took it up, cut off a lock of her hair, and said, "Sir, you are going into Siberia, and will see the governor of Tobolsk; give him this, I beseech you, and tell him, that Elizabeth sends it to her parents. He will perhaps consent to forward it to them as a token by which they may know that their daughter is still in existence."—

"Your wish shall be accomplished," answered the exile, "and if, in those deserts of which I am to be an inhabitant, I am not absolutely a slave, I will seek out the dwelling of your parents, and will tell them what you have this day done for me."

To the heart of Elizabeth, the gift of a throne would have afforded less delight, than the prospect of thus being able to convey consolation to her parents. She was now bereft of all, except the little piece of money given to her by the boatman of the Wolga. Yet she might deem herself rich, for she had just tasted the only pleasure which opulence could bestow; she had conferred happiness on a fellow-creature, had revived the desponding heart of a father, and had converted tears of sadness, shed by the orphan, into those of consolation. Such were the blessings which even a single ruble had effected.

COUVREUR, ADRIANNE LE,

A FRENCH actress, born at Fismes, in Champagne, in 1690. She first appeared in 1717, in the character of Electra, and was received with universal applause. Her best personation was Phædra. She was for some time mistress to marshal Saxe, whom, when reduced to distress, she assisted with a large sum of money raised upon her jewels.

COWLEY, HANNAH,

WHOSE maiden name was Parkhouse, was born at Tiverton, in Devonshire, in 1743, and died there in 1809. She is the author of nine comedies, among which are, the "Runaway," the "Belle's Stratagem," and "More Ways than One;" the tragedies of "Albina," and "The Fate of Sparta;" two farces; and the poems of "The Siege of Acre," "The Maid of Aragon," and "The Scottish Village." Her poems are of that description which Horace deprecates; but her comedies have considerable merit.

CRAVEN, ELIZABETH, LADY,

MARGRAVINE of Anspach, youngest daughter of the earl of Berkeley, was born in 1750, and married, in 1767, William, last earl of Craven, by whom she had seven children. But in consequence of his ill-treatment, they were separated in 1781. After this, lady Craven lived successively at the courts of Versailles, Madrid, Lisbon, Vienna, Berlin, Constantinople, Warsaw, St. Petersburg, Rome, Florence, Naples, and Anspach, where she became acquainted with the margrave Christian Frederick Charles Alexander, a nephew of Frederick the Great. On this tour, in 1787, she was persuaded to descend into the grotto of Antiparos, which no woman had ever before visited. Lord Craven died at Lisbon in 1791, and his widow soon after married the margrave, who surrendered his estates to the king of Prussia for a pension, and went to reside in England with his wife. He died there in 1806. The account of lady Craven's travels through the Crimea to Constantinople was first published, in a series of letters, in 1789. Besides these, she has written poems, plays, romances, and her own memoirs, entitled "Memoirs of the Margrave of Anspach, formerly Lady Craven, &c." London, 1825. These are interesting on account of her intercourse with Catharine II., Joseph II., and other princes.

CRAWFORD, ANNE,

A CELEBRATED English actress, both in comedy and tragedy; but better remembered by her maiden name of Barry. She was born at Bath, in 1734, and died in 1801.

CRÈQUY, VICTOIRE D'HOULAY, MARQUISE DE,

A DISTINGUISHED French lady, was born in 1699, and died in 1804. She has left several volumes of souvenirs, which form a sort of panorama of the eighteenth century. Allied by birth to the highest nobility, and inspired by nature with a taste for literary society, she was acquainted with most of the celebrated characters of all descriptions, that flourished during that lapse of time.

As a girl, being presented to Louis XIV., when, according to the etiquette of the court, she advanced to kiss the king's hand, the gallant monarch prevented the action by rendering this homage to herself; a fact only worth recording because the very same circumstance occurred on a presentation to Napoleon eighty years afterwards.

A family of the name of Crèquy, but whose ancestor had been an upholsterer in the time of Louis XII., claimed to belong to the great de Crèquy race. "There was some similarity in the pursuits of our ancestors," said Madame de Crèquy, "c'est que les uns gagnaient des batailles, tandis que les autres faisaient des sièges."

Louis XIV. said to her one day in the presence of marshal Saxe, "Look at the happy effects of the victory of Montenay! The marshal's legs were horribly puffed up with gout; he has come back active and well-proportioned!"

"All other heroes have been puffed up with glory," returned Madame de Crèquy. "Marshal Saxe is the first upon whom it has had a contrary effect."

These are but random examples of the ready wit for which she was celebrated among her contemporaries. Held at the baptismal font by the distinguished princess des Ursins, who governed Spain despotically under Philip V., she lived to see that monarchy submitted to the disposal of France, and its crown awarded to one born the private subject of an obscure province. That the marchioness de Crèquy maintained through all these changes her cheerfulness of mind, shows that her literary pursuits had a happy effect on the tranquillity and usefulness of her long life. An ignorant old lady is a pitiful object — she has then only frivolous pursuits, which appear more foolish with every increasing year.

CRETA, LAURA,

WAS born in Italy, in 1669. She received a learned education, and was a proficient in languages and philosophy. She married Pietro Lereni, but he died in less than two years after their union. She had been much attached to her husband, and refusing several advantageous offers of marriage, devoted herself to her studies, and lived in honoured widowhood to the close of her life. She corresponded with most of the eminent scholars and philosophers then living in Europe, who were happy in forming an acquaintance, through the medium of letters, with such a lady, renowned as the most learned woman of the age. She died at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and was, says a contemporary writer, "lamented throughout Christendom."

CROMWELL, ELIZABETH,

WIFE of Oliver Cromwell, was the daughter of Sir James Bourchier, knight, of Felsted, in Essex. She was married on the 22d of August, 1620. In person and manners she was very plain, and not well educated, even for those times. She seems to have been an upright, religious and charitable woman, who however did not possess much influence over her husband. After the death of Cromwell, in 1658, she retired for a short time into Wales, and then went to the house of her son-in-law Claypole, at Norborough, in Lincolnshire, where she lived till her death, October 8th, 1672. She was probably upwards of seventy when she died.

CRUZ, JUANA INEZ DE LA,

WAS born in November, 1651, a few leagues from the city of Mexico. Her father, a Spaniard, had sought wealth by an establishment in America, where he married a lady of the country, but of Spanish extraction. Juana, the fruit of this union, displayed in early childhood a passion for letters, and an extraordinary facility in the composition of Spanish verse. At eight years of age, she was placed by her parents with an uncle, who resided in Mexico, and who caused her to receive a learned education. Her talents having attracted notice and distinction, she was patronized by the lady of the viceroy, the marquis de Mancera, and, at the age of seventeen, was received into his family.

A Spanish encomiast of Juana, relates a curious anecdote respecting her, communicated to him, as he affirms, by the viceroy. Her patrons, filled with admiration and astonishment, by the powers and attainments of their young protégée, determined to prove the extent and solidity of her erudition. For this purpose they invited forty of the most eminent literary characters of the country, who assembled to examine Juana in the different branches of learning and science. Questions, arguments, and problems, were accordingly proposed to her, by the several professors, in philosophy, mathematics, history, theology, poetry, &c., to all of which she answered with equal readiness and skill, acquitting herself to the entire satisfaction of her judges. To this account it is added, that she received the praises extorted on this occasion by her acquirements, with the most perfect modesty; neither did she, at any period of her life, discover the smallest tendency to presumption or vanity, though honoured with the title of the tenth muse: a pious humility was her distinguishing characteristic. She lived forty-four years, twenty-seven of which she passed in the convent of St. Geronimo (where she took the veil) in the exercise of the most exemplary virtues.

That enthusiasm by which genius is characterised, necessarily led to devotion in circumstances like those in which Juana was placed. In the fervour of her zeal, she wrote in her blood a confession of her faith. She is said to have collected a library of four thousand volumes, in the study of which she placed her delight: nevertheless, towards the close of her life, she sacrificed this darling propensity for the purpose of applying the money which she acquired by the sale of her books, to the relief of the indigent. However heroic may be the motive of this self-denial, the rectitude of the principle is doubtful: the cultivation of the mind, with its consequent influence upon society, is a more real benefit to mankind than the partial relief of pecuniary exigencies.

Juana was not less lamented at her death, than celebrated and respected during her life: her writings were collected in three quarto volumes, to which are prefixed numerous panegyrics upon the author, both in verse and prose, by the most illustrious persons of old and new Spain. It is observed by the Spanish critic, father Feyjoo, that the compositions of Juana excel in ease and elegance, rather than in energy and strength. This is perhaps in some degree attributable to the age in which she lived, and to the subjects of her productions, which were principally compliments addressed to her friends, or sacred dramas, to which an absurd and senseless superstition afforded the materials. The following is an imitation in English of one of her poems, in which she complains of what is keenly felt by every woman of understanding, the injustice suffered by her sex.

Weak men, who without reason aim
To load poor woman with abuse,
Not seeing that yourselves produce
The very evils that you blame!

You 'gainst her firm resistance strive,
And having strack her judgment mute,
Soon to her levity impute
What from your labour you derive.

Of woman's weakness much afraid,
Of your own prowess still you boast;
Like the vain child who makes a ghost,
Then fears what he himself has made.

Her whom your arms have once embraced,
You think presumptuously to find,
When she is woo'd, as Thais kind,
When wedded, as Lucretia chaste.

How rare a fool must he appear,
Whose folly mounts to such a pass,
That first he breathes upon the glass,
Then grieves because it is not clear.

Still with unjust, ungrateful pride,
You must both favour and disdain:
The firm, as cruel you arraign,
The tender, you as weak deride.

Your foolish humour none can please,
Since judging all with equal phlegm;
One for her rigour you condemn,
And one you censure for her ease.

But while you show your pride and power,
With tyrant passions vainly hot,
She's only blest who heeds you not,
And leaves you all in happy hour.

CULMAN, ELIZABETH,

Is worthy of a place beside Lucretia Davidson; she died when only seventeen years old. Miss Culman was born in the year 1816 at St. Petersburg. She was already a prodigy of learning at an age when other children only commence their education. In her fourteenth year she was acquainted with ancient and modern Greek, the Latin, German, English, French, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese languages and literature, and had then already translated the Odes of Anacreon into her vernacular. But just when her mind gave promise of becoming one of the greatest ornaments of her country, death removed her to a higher state of existence. She died, in 1833, at St. Petersburg; and a year after her death, her writings, making three volumes, were published in that city.

CUNITIA, or CUNITZ, MARIA,

A LADY of great genius and learning, was born in Silesia, about the beginning of the seventeenth century. She became, when very young, celebrated for her extensive knowledge in many branches of learning, particularly in mathematics and astronomy, upon which she wrote several ingenious treatises; one of which, under the title of "Urania Propitia," printed in 1650, in Latin and German, she dedicated to Ferdinand III., emperor of Germany. In this work are contained astronomical tables, of great care and accuracy, founded upon Kepler's hypotheses. She acquired languages with amazing facility; and understood Polish, German, French, Italian, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. With equal care she acquired a knowledge of the sciences, history, physics, poetry, painting, music, both vocal and instrumental; and yet they were no more than her amusements. Her favourite studies were mathematics and astronomy; and she was ranked among the ablest astronomers of the age. The exact time of her birth is not known. She married Elias de Lewin, M. D., and died at Pistcheu, in 1664. The name of this learned lady is now little known, but several famous men have borrowed from her works to enrich their own, without any acknowledgment of the real author.

D.

DACIER, ANNE,

WAS daughter of Tanneguy le Fevre and Marie Oliver his wife. Anne was born at Saumur, in 1651. Her father, it is related, had an acquaintance who practised judicial astrology, and who, on the birth of the infant, desired he might be allowed to cast her nativity. After finishing his figures, he told M. le Fevre there must have been some mistake respecting the exact instant of the birth of the child, since her horoscope promised a future and fame quite foreign to a female. This story must be left to the faith of the reader; but, whatever might be its truth, it is certain that an incident occurred, when Mademoiselle Le Fevre was about ten years of age, which determined her father, who was professor of the Belles-Lettres at Saumur, to give her the advantage of a learned education.

M. Le Fevre had a son whom he instructed in the classics; and to whom he usually gave lessons in the room in which his daughter worked in tapestry. The youth, whether from incapacity or inattention, was sometimes at a loss when questioned by his father; on these occasions his sister, who appeared to be wholly occupied with her needle and her silks, never failed to suggest to him the proper reply, however intricate or embarrassing the subject. M. Le Fevre was, by this discovery, induced to cultivate the talents of his daughter. Mademoiselle Le Fevre afterwards confessed that she felt, at the time, a secret vexation for having thus betrayed her capacity, and exchanged the occupations and amusements of her sex, under the eye of an indulgent mother, for the discipline of her father, and the vigilance and application necessary to study.

After having learned the elements of the Latin language, she applied herself to the Greek, in which she made a rapid progress, and at the end of eight years no longer stood in need of the assistance of a master. As her mind strengthened and acquired a wider range, she emancipated herself from the trammels of authority, and laid down plans of study which she pursued with perseverance. She now read and thought for herself; and frequently, though with the utmost modesty and deference, presumed to differ, on subjects of literature and criticism, from her respectable father. Of this the translation of Quintus Curtius, by the celebrated Vaugelaus afforded an example. M. Le Fevre accorded, on this occasion, with the popular opinion of the times, in considering this performance as a masterpiece of eloquence: his daughter, on the contrary, whether more acute or less easily satisfied, censured the translation as defective in purity of style, and in the idiom of the French language.

Her father died in 1673, and the following year Mademoiselle Le Fevre went to Paris, and took up her residence in that city. She was then engaged on an edition of "Callimachus," which she published in 1674. Some sheets of that work having been shown to M. Huet, preceptor to the dauphin, and other learned men, a proposal was made to her to prepare some Latin authors for the dauphin's use; which proposal she accepted, and published an edition of Florus in 1674.

Her reputation being now spread all over Europe, Christina of Sweden ordered a present to be sent to her, in her name; upon which Mademoiselle Le Fevre sent the queen a Latin letter, with her edition of Florus. Her majesty not long after wrote to her, to persuade her to abandon the Protestant faith, and made her considerable offers to settle at court. But this she declined, and continued to publish works for the use of the dauphin. "Sextus Aurelius Victor" came out under her care, at Paris, in 1681; and in the same year she published a French translation of the poems of Anacreon and Sappho, with notes, which were so much admired as to make Boileau declare that it ought to deter any one from attempting to translate those poems in verse. She also published, for the use of the dauphin, "Eutropius," in 1683; and "Dictys Cretensis" and "Dares Phrygius" in 1684. She wrote French translations of the "Amphitryo," "Epidicus," and "Prudens," comedies of Plautus, in 1683; and of the "Plutus" and "Clouds" of Aristophanes, with notes. She was so charmed with this last comedy, that she had read it two hundred times.

She married M. Dacier, with whom she had been brought up in her father's house, in 1683, and soon after declared to the duke of Montausier and the bishop of Meaux a design of reconciling herself with the church of Rome; but as M. Dacier was not satisfied as to the propriety of the change, she retired with him to Castres in 1684, to examine the controversy between the Protestants and Papists. They determined in favour of the latter, and, after their conversion, the duke de Montausier and the bishop of Meaux recommended them at court, and the king settled a pension of 1500 livres on M. Dacier, and of 500 upon his wife. They then returned to Paris and resumed their studies.

In 1688, she published a French translation of "Terence's Comedies," with notes, in three volumes. She rose at five in the morning, during a very cold winter, and finished four of them, but reading them over a few months afterwards, she was so dissatisfied with them that she burnt them, and began the translation again. She brought the work to the highest perfection, and even equalled the grace and noble simplicity of the original. She assisted in the translation of "Marcus Antoninus," published by her husband in 1691, and in the specimen of the translation of "Plutarch's Lives," which he published three years afterwards.

In 1711, she published a French translation, with notes, of "Homer's Iliad," which was thought faithful and elegant. In 1714, she published the "Causes of the Corruption of Taste." This was written against M. de la Motte, who, in the preface to his "Iliad," had expressed but little admiration for that poem. This was the beginning of a literary war, in the course of which a number of books were produced. In 1716, she published a defence of Homer against the apology of father Hardouin, in which she attempts to show that father Hardouin, in endeavouring to apologize for Homer, has done him a greater injustice than his declared enemies. Her last work, the "Odyssey of Homer," with notes, translated from the Greek, was published the same year.

She died, after a painful sickness, August 17th, 1720, at sixty-nine years of age. She had two daughters and a son, whom she educated with the greatest care; but the son died young, one daughter became a nun, and the other, who is said to have united all the virtues and accomplishments of her sex, died at eighteen.

M. Dacier was inconsolable for his loss; nor did he long survive his wife. Never had there been a couple more united, better suited to each other, and between whom a more entire affection had subsisted. They had been educated together, and for more than forty years they lived in the enjoyment of that harmony of tastes and pursuits which enhanced their mutual esteem and love. Marriage, when thus made holy by the union of souls, as well as hearts and hands, while life is devoted to noble pursuits, displays human nature in the happiest light.

Madame Dacier was remarkable for firmness, generosity, good-nature, and piety. Her modesty was so great, that it was with difficulty she could be induced to speak on literary subjects. A learned German once visited her and requested her to write her name and a sentence in his book of collections. She, seeing in it the names of the greatest scholars in Europe, told him that she could not presume to put her name among so many illustrious persons. But as he insisted, she wrote her name with a sentence from Sophocles signifying that "Silence is the ornament of women." She was often solicited to publish a translation of some books of Scripture, with remarks upon them; but she always answered that "A woman ought to read and meditate on the Scriptures, and regulate her conduct by them, and to keep silence, agreeably to the command of St. Paul."

We must not forget to mention, that the academy of Ricovrati at Padua chose her one of their body in 1684, and learned men of all countries vied with each other in proving their sense of her merit.

DAMER, ANNE SEYMOUR,

ONLY child of Field-marshal Conway, was born in 1748. Almost in childhood, she imbibed a love of literature, and became highly accomplished. An accidental conversation with Hume, respecting some plaster casts, turned her attention to sculpture, and she took lessons from Ceracchi and Bacon, and studied in Italy. She was also fond of dramatic amusements, and was an excellent amateur actress. She died May 28th, 1808. The productions of her chisel are numerous and do her honour. Among them is a bust of Nelson in Guildhall, and two colossal heads on Henley bridge, and a statue in marble, of George III., in the Edinburgh Register office.

It is not so much the excellence of her works of art that entitles this lady to admiration, as that a person of her rank, wealth, and beauty, should give up society, in a great measure, to devote herself to so arduous an occupation as that of sculpture. She was a warm-hearted politician, and exerted all her influence, which was not trifling, in favour of Fox.

DANCY, ELIZABETH,

SECOND daughter of Sir Thomas More, was born in London, 1509, and educated very carefully under her father's care. She corresponded with Erasmus, who praises the purity of her Latin style. She married, when very young, Mr. Dancy, son and heir of Sir John Dancy. Her productions and the time of her death are uncertain.

DANGEVILLE, MARY ANNE BOTOL,

A CELEBRATED French actress, considered as superior to any of her profession in the class of characters she personated; she was the representative of the waiting-maids of French comedy. She died, March, 1796; but, more fortunate than people of higher station and greater talents, her eulogium was pronounced two years before her decease. In September 1794, M. Molé, at the Lyceum of Arts, at Paris, delivered a panegyric on this distinguished actress.

DARLING, GRACE,

WHOSE name, by an act of heroic daring, has resounded through the civilized world, was born November 24th, 1815, at Bamborough, on the coast of Northumberland, England. She was the seventh child of William Darling, a steady, judicious, and sensible man, who held the responsible office of keeper of the Longstone Lighthouse, situated on one of the most distant and exposed of the Farne Islands, a rocky group extending some seven or eight miles beyond this dangerous coast. In this isolated position, where weeks sometimes elapsed without communication with the mainland, the greater part of Grace's existence was passed, with no other companionship than that of her parents and brother, who resided at the Lighthouse. She benefited by the advantages of a respectable education, suited to one in her sphere of life, and her time was principally occupied in assisting her mother in household affairs.

Grace had reached her twenty-second year, when the incident occurred which has given her so wide-spread and just a fame. The Forfarshire steamer, proceeding from Hull to Dundee, with sixty-three persons on board, was wrecked upon one of the fearful crags of the Farne group, on the night of the 6th of September, 1838. The vessel, which subsequent enquiry proved to have been utterly unseaworthy, was broken in two pieces, the after part, with many souls upon it, being swept away instantly, while the fore part remained upon the rock. The captain and his wife were among the number of those who perished. Nine persons survived the horrors of that night upon the remaining fragment of the wreck, exposed, amid rain and profound darkness, to the fury of the waves, and expecting momentarily to be engulfed by the boiling surge.

At daybreak on the morning of the 7th, these poor people were discovered from Longstone by the Darlings, at nearly a mile's distance, by means of a glass, clinging to the rocks and remnants of the vessel. Grace, the moment she caught sight of them, perceiving their imminent danger—for the returning tide must wash them off—immediately determined to save them; and no remonstrances of her father, who, in the furious state of the sea, considered it a desperate and hopeless adventure, had any power in dissuading her. There was no one at the time at the Lighthouse but her parents and herself, her brother being absent on the mainland; and she declared if her father did not accompany her, she would go alone; that, live or die, she would attempt to save the wretched sufferers.

Her father consented to the trial. The boat was launched with the assistance of the mother, and the father and daughter, each taking an oar, proceeded upon their errand of mercy. They succeeded; and in no instance has lowly virtue and unobtrusive heroism met with more prompt acknowledgment or just reward. The highest enthusiasm prevailed throughout Great Britain as the adventure became known, and distant nations responded with hearty sympathy. To reward the bravery and humanity of Grace Darling, a subscription was raised in England, which amounted to £700, and she received besides numberless presents from individuals, some of them of distinguished rank. Her portrait was taken and multiplied over the kingdom; the Humane Society sent her a flattering vote of thanks and a piece of plate; dramatic pieces were performed representing her exploit; her sea-girt home was invaded by steamboat loads of wonder-seeking admirers, and offers of marriage, not a few, flowed in upon her.

Amid all this tumult of applause, so calculated to unsettle the mind, Grace Darling never for a moment swerved from the modest dignity which belonged to her character. She continued, notwithstanding the improvement in her circumstances, to reside at the Lighthouse with her parents, content to dwell in the secluded and humble sphere in which her lot had been cast; proving by her conduct that the liberality of the public had not been unworthily bestowed.

Grace Darling, as is too often the case with the noble and good, was not destined to long life. She survived only a few years to enjoy her well-earned fame. In 1841, symptoms of declining health exhibited themselves, and, on the 20th of October, 1842, she died of consumption.

Grace Darling is described as a woman of the middle size, comely, though not handsome, but with an expression of mildness and benevolence most winning. Her disposition was always retiring and reserved, the effect, no doubt, of her solitary mode of life; a life which unquestionably fostered and concentrated the quiet enthusiasm of her character, and made her the heroine of one of the most beautiful episodes that ever adorned the history of woman.

DARRAH, LYDIA,

A MEMBER of the Society of Friends, and the wife of William Darrah, of Philadelphia, rendered an important service to the American army during the revolutionary war. The house of William Darrah was chosen by General Howe, while the British army had possession of Philadelphia, as a place for private conference with the other officers. On the night of the second of December, 1777, Lydia Darrah overheard an order read, for the troops to march out of the city on the night of the fourth, to a secret attack on the American camp at White Marsh. Not wishing to endanger her husband's life by making him a sharer of the secret, she resolved to give the important information to General Washington herself. Obtaining permission from General Howe to leave the city on some domestic errand, she went directly towards the American camp. Meeting an American officer on her way, she disclosed the secret to him, making him promise not to betray her, and returned without any suspicions having been excited concerning her errand. In consequence of her information, when the British army marched out to the attack, on the night of the fourth, they found the enemy so well prepared, that they were obliged to return without firing a gun. Lydia Darrah's interposition was never discovered by the British.

DASCHKOFF, CATHARINE ROMANOWNA,

PRINCESS of, was descended from the noble family of Worenzoff, and was the early friend and confidant of the empress Catharine II. of Russia. She was born in 1744, and became a widow at the age of eighteen. She endeavoured to effect the accession of Catharine to the throne, but, at the same time, was in favour of a constitutional limitation of the imperial power. In a military dress, and on horseback, she led a body of troops to the presence of Catharine, who placed herself at their head, and precipitated her husband, Peter III., from the throne. The request of the princess Daschkoff to receive the command of the imperial guards, was refused. She did not long remain about the person of Catharine. Study became her favourite employment; and, after her return from abroad, in 1782, she was made director of the Academy of Sciences, and president of the newly-established Russian Academy. She wrote much in the Russian language, and promoted the publication of the Dictionary of the Russian Academy. She died at Moscow, in 1810.

Her courage and decision were extraordinary. Although her exertions in Catharine's favour had been repaid by ingratitude, neglect and coldness, yet the empress did not hesitate, when a conspiracy was formed to dethrone her, of which she thought the princess must be cognizant, to write her a long and flattering letter, in which she conjured her, in the name of their friendship, to reveal the projects against her, promising the princess full pardon for all concerned. The indignant princess replied to the four pages she had received in four lines. "Madam, I have heard nothing: but, if I had, I should beware of what I spoke. What do you require of me? That I should expire on the scaffold? I am ready to ascend it."

DAVIDSON, LUCRETIA MARIA,

SECOND daughter of Dr. Oliver and Margaret Davidson, was born at Plattsburg, on Lake Champlain, Sept. 27th, 1808. Her parents were then in indigent circumstances, and, to add to their troubles, her mother was often sickly. Under such circumstances, the little Lucretia would not be likely to owe her precocity to a forced education. The manifestations of intellectual activity were apparent in the infant, we may say; for at four years old she would retire by herself to pore over her books, and draw pictures of animals, and soon illustrated these rude drawings by poetry. Her first specimens of writing were imitations of printed letters; but she was very much distressed when these were discovered, and immediately destroyed them.

The first poem of hers which has been preserved, was written when she was nine years old. It was an elegy on a Robin, killed in the attempt to rear it. This piece was not inserted in her works. The earliest of her poems which has been printed, was written at eleven years old. Her parents were much gratified by her talents, and gave her all the indulgence in their power, which was only time for reading such books as she could obtain by borrowing; as they could afford no money to buy books, or to pay for her instruction. Before she was twelve years old, she had read most of the standard English poets—much of history, both sacred and profane—Shakespeare's, Kotzebue's and Goldsmith's dramatic works, and many of the popular novels and romances of the day. Of the latter, however, she was not an indiscriminate reader—many of those weak and worthless productions, which are the élite of the circulating libraries, this child, after reading a few pages, would throw aside in disgust. Would that all young ladies possessed her delicate taste and discriminating judgment!

When Lucretia was about twelve years old, a gentleman, who had heard of her genius and seen some of her verses, sent her a complimentary note, enclosing twenty dollars. Her first exclamation was, "Oh, now I shall buy me some books!" But her dear mother was lying ill—the little girl looked towards the sick-bed—tears gushed to her eyes, and putting the bill into her father's hand, she said—"Take it, father; it will buy many comforts for mother; I can do without books."

It is no wonder that her parents should feel the deepest affection for such a good and gifted child. Yet there will always be found officious, meddling persons, narrow-minded, if not envious, who are prone to prophesy evil on any pursuits in which they or theirs cannot compete. These meddlers advised that she should be deprived of pen, ink, and paper, and rigorously confined to domestic pursuits. Her parents were too kind and wise to follow this counsel; but Lucretia, by some means, learned that such had been given. Without a murmur, she resolved to submit to this trial: and she faithfully adhered to the resolution. She told no one of her intention or feelings, but gave up her writing and reading, and for several months devoted herself entirely to household business. Her mother was ill at the time, and did not notice the change in Lucretia's pursuits, till she saw the poor girl was growing emaciated, and a deep dejection was settled on her countenance. She said to her, one day, "Lucretia, it is a long time since you have written any thing." The sweet child burst into tears, and replied, "O, mother, I have given that up long ago." Her mother then drew from her the reasons which had influenced her to relinquish writing—namely, the opinions she had heard expressed that it was wrong for her to indulge in mental pursuits, and the feeling that she ought to do all in her power to lighten the cares of her parents. Mrs. Davidson was a good, sensible woman; with equal discretion and tenderness, she counselled her daughter to take a middle course, resume her studies, but divide her time between these darling pursuits and the duties of the household. Lucretia from thenceforth occasionally resumed her pen, and soon regained her quiet serenity and usual health.

Her love of knowledge grew with her growth, and strengthened by every accession of thought. "Oh!" said she one day to her mother—"Oh! that I only possessed half the means of improvement which I see others slighting! I should be the happiest of the happy!" At another time she exclaimed—"How much there is yet to learn!—If I could only grasp it at once!"

This passionate desire for instruction was at length gratified. When she was about sixteen, a gentleman, a stranger at Plattsburg, saw, by accident, some of her poems, and learned her history. With the prompt and warm generosity of a noble mind, he immediately proposed to place her at school, and give her every advantage for which she had so ardently longed. Her joy on learning this good fortune was almost overwhelming. She was, as soon as possible, placed at the Troy Female Seminary, under the care of Mrs. Emma Willard. She was there at the fountain for which she had so long thirsted, and her spiritual eagerness could not be restrained. "On her entering the Seminary," says the Principal, "she at once surprised us by the brilliancy and pathos of her compositions—she evinced a most exquisite sense of the beautiful in the productions of her pencil; always giving to whatever she attempted to copy, certain peculiar and original touches which marked the liveliness of her conceptions, and the power of her genius to embody those conceptions. But from studies which required calm and steady investigation, efforts of memory, judgment and consecutive thinking, her mind seemed to shrink. She had no confidence in herself, and appeared to regard with dismay any requisitions of this nature."—In truth, she had so long indulged in solitary musings, and her sensibility had become so exquisite, heightened and refined as it had been by her vivid imagination, that she was dismayed, agonized even, with the feeling of responsibility, which her public examination involved. She was greatly beloved and tenderly cherished by her teachers; but it is probable that the excitement of the new situation in which she was placed, and the new studies she had to pursue, operated fatally on her constitution. She was, during the vacation, taken with an illness, which left her feeble and very nervous. When she recovered, she was placed at Albany, at the school of Miss Gilbert—but there she was soon attacked by severe disease. She partially recovered, and was removed to her home, where she gradually declined till death released her pure and exalted mind from its prison-house of clay. She died, August 27th, 1825, before she had completed her seventeenth year.

In person she was exceedingly beautiful. Her forehead was high, open, and fair as infancy—her eyes large, dark, and of that soft beaming expression which shows the soul in the glance—her features were fine and symmetrical, and her complexion brilliant, especially when the least excitement moved her feelings. But the prevailing expression of her face was melancholy. Her beauty, as well as her mental endowments, made her the object of much regard; but she shrunk from observation—any particular attention always seemed to give her pain; so exquisite was her modesty. In truth, her soul was too delicate for this "cold world of storms and clouds." Her imagination never revelled in the "garishness of joy;"—a pensive, meditative mood was the natural tone of her mind. The adverse circumstances by which she was surrounded, no doubt deepened this seriousness, till it became almost morbid melancholy—but no external advantages of fortune would have given to her disposition buoyant cheerfulness. It seems the lot of youthful genius to be sad; Kirke White was thus melancholy. Like flowers opened too early, these children of song shrink from the storms of life before they have felt its sunbeams.

The writings of Miss Davidson were astonishingly voluminous. She had destroyed many of her pieces; her mother says, at least one-third—yet those remaining amount to two hundred and seventy-eight pieces. There are among them five regular poems of several cantos each, twenty-four school-exercises, three unfinished romances, a complete tragedy, written at thirteen years of age, and about forty letters to her mother. Her poetry is marked by strong imaginative powers, and the sentiment of sad forebodings. These dark visions, though they tinged all her earthly horizon, were not permitted to cloud her hope of heaven. She died calmly, relying on the merits of our Lord and Saviour for salvation. The last word she spoke was the name of the gentleman who had so kindly assisted her. And if his name were known, often would it be spoken; for his generosity to this humble, but highly gifted daughter of song, will make his deed of charity a sacred remembrance to all who love genius, and sympathize with the suffering.

Her poems, with a biographical sketch, were published in 1829, under the title "Amir Khan, and other poems, the remains of L. M. Davidson." This work was reviewed in the London Quarterly of the same year; and the writer says, "In our own language, except in the cases of Chatterton and Kirke White, we can call to mind no instance of so early, so ardent, and so fatal a pursuit of intellectual advancement."

TO A FRIEND.

And thou hast marked in childhood's hour
The fearless boundings of my breast,
When fresh as summer's opening flower,
I freely frolicked and was blest.

Oh say, was not this eye more bright?
Were not these lips more wont to smile?
Methinks that then my heart was light,
And I a fearless, joyous child.

And thou didst mark me gay and wild,
My careless, reckless laugh of mirth;
The simple pleasures of a child,
The holiday of man on earth.

Then thou hast seen me in that hour,
When every nerve of life was new,
When pleasures fanned youth's infant flower,
And Hope her witcheries round it threw

That hour is fading; it hath fled;
And I am left in darkness now,
A wanderer towards a lowly bed,
The grave, that home of all below.

THE GUARDIAN ANGEL.

To Miss E. C.—Composed on a blank leaf of her Paley during recitation.

I'm thy guardian angel, sweet maid, and I rest
In mine own chosen temple, thy innocent breast;
At midnight I steal from my sacred retreat,
When the chords of thy heart in soft unison beat.

When thy bright eye is closed, when thy dark tresses flow
In beautiful wreaths o'er thy pillow of snow,
O then I watch o'er thee, all pure as thou art,
And listen to music which steals from thy heart.

Thy smile is the sunshine which gladdens my soul,
My tempest the clouds which around thee may roll;
I feast my light form on thy rapture-breathed sighs,
And drink at the fount of those beautiful eyes.

The thoughts of thy heart are recorded by me,
There are some which half-breathed, half-acknowledged by thee,
Steal sweetly and silently o'er thy pure breast,
Just ruffling its calmness, then murmuring to rest.

Like a breeze o'er the lake, when it breathlessly lies,
With its own mimic mountains, and star-spangled skies,
I stretch my light pinions around thee when sleeping,
To guard thee from spirits of sorrow and weeping.

I breathe o'er thy slumbers sweet dreams of delight,
Till you wake but to sigh for the visions of night;
Then remember, wherever your pathway may lie,
Be it clouded with sorrow, or brilliant with joy,

My spirit shall watch thee, wherever thou art,
My incense shall rise from the throne of thy heart.
Farewell! for the shadows of evening are fled,
And the young rays of morning are wreathed round my head.

TO A STAR.

Thou brightly glittering Star of Even —
Thou gem upon the brow of heaven!
Oh! were this fluttering spirit free,
How quick 't would spread its wings to thee!

How calmly, brightly dost thou shine,
Like the pure lamp in Virtue's shrine;
Sure the fair world which thou mayst boast
Was never ransomed — never lost.

There, beings pure as heaven's own air,
Their hopes, their joys, together share;
While hovering angels touch the string,
And seraphs spread the sheltering wing.

'There cloudless days and brilliant nights,
Illumed by heaven's refulgent lights;
There, seasons, years, unnoticed roll,
And unregretted by the soul.

Thou little sparkling Star of Even —
Thou gem upon an azure heaven!
How swiftly will I soar to thee,
When this imprisoned soul is free!

STANZAS.

Addressed to her Sister, requesting her to sing "Moore's Farewell to his Harp."

When evening spreads her shades around,
And darkness fills the arch of heaven,
When not a murmur, not a sound
To Fancy's sportive ear is given;

When the broad orb of heaven is bright,
And looks around with golden eye;
When Nature, softened by her light,
Seems calmly, solemnly to lie; —

Then, when our thoughts are raised above
This world, and all this world can give,
Oh, sister! sing the song I love,
And tears of gratitude receive.

The song which thrills my bosom's core,
And, loving, trembles half afraid,
Oh, sister! sing the song once more
Which ne'er for mortal ear was made

'T were almost sacrilege to sing
Those notes amid the glare of day;
Notes borne by angels' purest wing,
And wafted by their breath away.

When sleeping in my grass-grown bed,
Shouldst thou still linger here above,
Wilt thou not kneel beside my head,
And, sister, sing the song I love?

LINES,

Addressed to her mother, a few months before Lucretia's death.

Oh thou whose care sustained my infant years,
And taught my prattling lip each note of love;
Whose soothing voice breathed comfort to my fears,
And round my brow hope's brightest garland wove:

To thee my lay is a life, the simplest song,
Which Nature gave me at life's opening day;
To thee these rude, these untaught strains belong,
Whose heart indulgent will not spurn my lay.

O say, amid this wilderness of life,
What bosom would have throbb'd like thine for me?
Who would have smiled responsive? — who in grief
Would e'er have felt, and, feeling, grieved like thee?

Who would have guarded, with a falcon eye,
Each trembling footstep or each sport of fear?
Who would have marked my bosom bounding high,
And clasped me to her heart, with love's bright tear?

Who would have hung around my sleepless couch,
And fanned, with anxious hand, my burning brow?
Who would have fondly pressed my fevered lip,
In all the agony of love and woe?

None but a mother — none but one like thee,
Whose bloom has faded in the midnight watch;
Whose eye, for me, has lost its witchery;
Whose form has felt disease's mildew touch.

Yes, thou hast lighted me to health and life,
By the bright lustre of thy youthful bloom —
Yes, thou hast wept so oft o'er every grief,
That wo hath traced thy brow with marks of gloom.

Oh, then, to thee this rude and simple song,
Which breathes of thankfulness and love for thee,
To thee, my mother, shall this lay belong,
Whose life is spent in toil and care for me.

FRAGMENT.*

There is a something which I dread, —
It is a dark, a tearful thing;
It steals along with withering tread,
Or sweeps on wild destruction's wing.

That thought comes o'er me in the hour
Of grief, of sickness or of sadness;
'T is not the dread of death — 't is more,
It is the dread of madness!

Oh! may these throbbing pulses pause,
Forgetful of their feverish course;
May this hot brain, which burning glows
With all a fiery whirlpool's force,

Be cold, and motionless, and still,
A tenant of its lowly bed;
But let not dark delirium steal —
* * * * *

DAVIDSON, MARGARET MILLER,

SISTER of Lucretia, was also the daughter of Dr. Davidson of Plattsburg, N. Y. She was born in 1823, and though her health was always extremely delicate, she early devoted herself to study and literary pursuits. In 1838, her father removed to Saratoga, where she died on the twenty-fifth of November of the same year, in her sixteenth year. She was distinguished, as well as her sister, for remarkable precocity of genius, and her poems would be creditable to much more experienced writers. In personal appearance and character, she was lovely and estimable. The particular bias of her mind towards poetry was, probably, induced, certainly fostered, by the example of her sister. Margaret was but two years old when Lucretia died, yet the sad event was never effaced from her mind. This impression was deepened as she grew older and listened to the story of her lovely and gifted sister, who had been a star of hope in her humble home. Often, when Mrs. Davidson, the mother, was relating what Lucretia had said and done, little Margaret would exclaim, "Oh, I will try to fill her place; teach me to be like her!" And she was like her, both in the precocity of her genius and in her early death. Their mother was kind, and, in some things, judicious; but we think she encouraged, or permitted rather, the development of the imagination of Margaret at the expense of her constitution, when, by patient and prudent training, it might have been suppressed. The following is among her best productions, and memorable as the last she ever wrote, only a few days before her death.

* These lines are the last she ever wrote; they were left thus unfinished.

TO MY MOTHER.

Oh, mother, would the power were mine
To wake the strain thou lovest to hear,
And breathe each trembling new-born thought
Within thy fondly listening ear,
As when, in days of health and glee,
My hopes and fancies wander'd free.

But, mother, now a shroud hath passed
Athwart my brightest visions here;
A cloud of darkest gloom hath wrapped
The remnant of my brief career:
No song, no echo can I win,
The sparkling fount hath dried within.

The torch of earthly hope burns dim,
And fancy spreads her wings no more,
And oh, how vain and trivial seem
The pleasures that I prized before;
My soul, with trembling steps and slow,
Is struggling on through doubt and strife;
Oh, may it prove, as time rolls on,
The pathway to eternal life!
Then, when my cares and fears are o'er,
I'll sing thee as in "days of yore."

I said that Hope had pass'd from earth—
'T was but to fold her wings in heaven,
To whisper of the soul's new birth,
Of sinners saved and sins forgiven:
When mine are wash'd in tears away,
Then shall my spirit swell the lay.

When God shall guide my soul above,
By the soft chords of heavenly love—
When the vain cares of earth depart,
And tuneful voices swell my heart,
Then shall each word, each note I raise,
Burst forth in pealing hymns of praise:
And all not offer'd at his shrine,
Dear mother, I will place on thine.

DAVIES, LADY ELEANOR,

WAS the fifth daughter of lord George Audley, earl of Castlehaven, and born about 1603. She received a learned education, and married, first, Sir John Davies, who died 1644; three months after his death, she married Sir Archibald Douglas. Neither of these marriages was happy, the lady's pretension to the spirit of prophecy seeming to have disgusted her husbands. She fancied that the spirit of the prophet Daniel had been infused into her body, and this she founded on an anagram she had made of her own name.

Dr. Heylin, in his Life of Archbishop Laud, thus speaks of her: "And that the other sex might whet their tongues upon him also, the lady Davies, the widow of Sir John Davies, attorney-general for king James in Ireland, scatters a prophecy against him. This lady had before spoken somewhat unluckily of the duke of Buckingham, importing that he should not live till the end of August, which raised her to the reputation of a Cunning Woman among the ignorant people: and now (1634) she prophesies of the new archbishop, that he should live but a few days after the 5th of November; for which and other prophecies of a more mischievous nature, she was after brought into the court of high commission; the woman being grown so mad, that she fancied the spirit of the prophet Daniel to have been infused into her body; and this she grounded on an anagram which she made up of her name: viz. ELEANOR DAVIES: REVEAL, O DANIEL. And though it had too much by an S, and too little by an L, yet she found Daniel and reveal in it, and that served her turn. Much pains was taken to dispossess her of this spirit; but all would not do, till Lamb, then dean of the arches, shot her through and through with an arrow borrowed from her own quiver: for whilst the bishops and divines were reasoning the point with her out of the Holy Scriptures, he took a pen into his hand, and at last hit upon this excellent anagram: DAME ELEANOR DAVIES: NEVER SO MAD A LADY; which having proved to be true by the rules of art, 'Madam,' said he, 'I see you build much on anagrams, and I have found out one which I hope will fit you.' This said, and reading it aloud, he put it into her hands in writing; which happy fancy brought that grave court into such a laughter, and the poor woman thereupon into such a confusion, that afterward she grew either wiser, or was less regarded."

In the continuation of Baker's Chronicle, the lady Davies is mentioned with more respect. Dr. Peter du Moulin also thus speaks of her: "She was learned above her sex, humble below her fortune, having a mind so great and noble, that prosperity could not make it remiss, nor the deepest adversity cause her to shrink, or discover the least pusillanimity or dejection of spirit; being full of the love of God, to that fulness the smiling world could not add, nor the frowning from it detract." It is probable that the learning of this lady, acting upon a raised imagination, and a fanatic turn of mind, produced a partial insanity.

"Great wit to madness nearly is allied."

The year before her death, which took place in 1652, lady Davies published a pamphlet, entitled "The Restitution of Prophecy; that buried Talent to be revived. By the lady Eleanor, 1651." In this tract, written very obscurely, are many severities against the persecutors of the author.

DEBORAH,

A JEWESS, living at Rome, who died in the beginning of the seventeenth century. She was distinguished while she lived for her poems and other works. None of these are now to be obtained; but if a literary work serves one generation of readers the author should be satisfied.

DEFFAND, MARIE DE VICHY CHAMBRON DU,

ONE of the most prominent French women of the regency and reign of Louis XV., was born at Paris in 1697, of a family noble and military. Educated in a convent, she early distinguished nerself for a tone of raillery on religious subjects. Massillon was called in to talk with her, but "Elle est charmante" was his only reproof. At the age of twenty, Mademoiselle de Vichy married the marquis du Defand, from whom her intrigues soon caused her to separate. Eyes remarkable for their beauty and brilliancy, a pleasant smile, and a countenance full of piquancy and expression, were the chief personal attractions of the young marchioness. Brilliant, witty, sceptical, and sarcastic, she drew around her the most distinguished men and women of her time. She had numerous lovers, the regent himself being for a short time among the number; and she possessed the power of securing the constancy of many of them, even up to their dotage.

Her hard selfishness of character and want of sympathy, rendered her incapable of love; but her clear cool judgment and abhorrence of finesse, rendered her perfectly frank and sincere. When the celebrated work of Helvetius appeared, he was blamed, in her presence, for having made selfishness the great motive of human actions.

"Bah!" said she, "he has only revealed every one's secret."

The greater portion of Madame du Defand's early life was passed at the court of the brilliant Duchess du Maine, whose friendship she enjoyed. At a later period, failing in her repeated attempts to become a devotee, for which she manifestly had no vocation, she nevertheless established herself in the convent of St. Joseph's, where, in handsome apartments, she gave evening parties and suppers to her friends. Soon after her retreat to the convent, she became totally blind, and continued in that melancholy condition for the last thirty years of her life; a misfortune which she endured with great fortitude. She gathered around her, however, a brilliant intellectual circle, to which she gave the tone, who met for common amusement, and served to dispel the ennui by which she was constantly attacked.

Horace Walpole, who became acquainted with her at this period of her life, has celebrated her in his amusing letters. Their friendship continued uninterrupted till her death, and was cemented by frequent visits to Paris by Walpole, and constant correspondence. Her treatment of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse, whom she first succoured, and then discarded through jealousy, made her many enemies, and drew from her ranks many of her most brilliant visitors. The latter part of her life was only the shadow of what it had been, her ennui, selfishness, and ill-temper repelling even her most attached friends. She died, after a final and unsuccessful attempt to become devout, in the month of September, 1780, in the eighty-fourth year of her age.

Madame du Defand's epistolary writings were characterized by an exquisite style; not obtained, however, it is said, without a degree of labour and study somewhat surprising to the readers of those spontaneous effusions. Her poetry never rose above mediocrity. The following are specimens; the first alludes to her own blindness, which gives a melancholy interest to the little song.

CHANSON.

Le ver à soie est à mes yeux
L'être dont le sort vaut le mieux :
Il travaille dans sa jeunesse ;
Il dort dans sa maturité ;
Il meurt enfin dans sa vieillesse
Au comble de la volupté.

Notre sort est bien différent ;
Il va toujours en empirant :
Quelques plaisirs dans la jeunesse :
Des soins dans la maturité ;
Tous les malheurs de la vieillesse ;
Puis la peur de l'éternité.

LES DEUX AGES DE L'HOMME.

Il est un âge heureux, mais qu'on perd sans retour,
Où la foible jeunesse entraîne sur ses traces Le plaisir vif avec l'amour
Et les désirs avec les grâces.
Il est un âge affreux, sombre et froide saison,
Où l'homme encor s'égare et prend dans sa tristesse
Son impuissance pour sagesse,
Et ses craintes pour la raison.

DEKKEN, AGATHE,

A DUTCH authoress, born in 1741, in the village of Amstelveen, near Amsterdam, on the 10th of December, 1741. When three years old she lost her parents, and being very poor, was placed in the Amsterdam orphan asylum. Her natural abilities and industry soon distinguished her from her companions, and her early and successful efforts in poetry, procured the protection and assistance of the "Diligentiæ Omnia" society. When she left the asylum, she accepted a place as companion to Miss Maria Borsh, a young lady who was herself a poetess. She lived with Miss Borsh till 1773. After the death of her friend and benefactress, Miss Dekken published a collection of poems, the result of their joint labours. She then went to live with another friend, Elizabeth Becker, the widow of a clergyman. Their united labours produced the first Dutch domestic novel, and they became thus the founders of a new school of novel writers. Shortly afterwards they published the "Wanderlengen door Bougogne," (1779.) In 1787 she removed to Paris, and had subsequently, during the reign of terror, some very narrow escapes from the guillotine. In 1790 she returned to Holland, when the dishonesty of a friend deprived her of her little property. She had now again to resort to her pen as a means of subsistence. She translated therefore several English novels, and published a collection of poems, which contains some patriotic and religious pieces, which are to this day esteemed master-pieces of Dutch poetry. She died on the 15th of November, 1807.

DELANY, MARY,

Was the daughter of Bernard Granville, Esq., afterwards Lord Lansdowne, a nobleman celebrated for his abilities and virtues. His character as a poet, and his friendship with Pope, Swift, and other eminent writers of the time, as well as his general patronage of men of genius and literature, have been so often recorded that they must be familiar to our readers. His daughter Mary received a very careful education, and at the age of seventeen was induced to marry, against her own inclination, Alexander Pendarves, a gentleman of large property at Roscrow, in Cornwall. From a great disparity of years, and other causes, she was very unhappy during this connexion. However, she wisely employed the retirement to which she was confined in cultivating her mind and her musical talents. She was distinguished for her powers of conversation, for her epistolary writing, and her taste.

In 1724 Mrs. Pendarves became a widow, when she left Cornwall for London. For several years after this she corresponded with Dean Swift. In 1743 she married Dr. Patrick Delany, whom she had long known, and their union was a very happy one. He died in 1768, and after that she was induced by the duchess-dowager of Portland, who had been an early and constant friend of hers, to reside a part of the time with her; and Mrs. Delany divided the year between London and Bulstrode.

On the death of the duchess-dowager of Portland, the king assigned Mrs. Delany, as a summer residence, the use of a furnished house in St. Alban's street, Windsor, adjoining the entrance to the castle, and a pension of three hundred pounds a year. Mrs. Delany died at her own house in St. James' street, on the 15th of April, 1788, having nearly completed her eighty-eighth year.

The circumstance that has principally entitled Mrs. Delany to a place in this dictionary was her skill in painting, and other ingenious arts. She was thirty years old before she learned to draw, and forty before she attempted oil-painting; but she devoted herself to it, and her proficiency was remarkable. She was principally a copyist, but painted a few original pictures, the largest of which was the raising of Lazarus. She excelled in embroidery and shell-work, and at the age of seventy-four invented a new and beautiful mode of exercising her ingenuity. This was in the construction of a Flora. She cut out the various parts of the flower she wished to imitate, in coloured paper, which she sometimes dyed herself, and pasted them, accurately arranged, on a black ground. The effect was so admirable that it was impossible often to distinguish the original from the imitation. Mrs. Delany continued to carry out this favourite design till she was eighty-three, when the partial failure of her sight obliged her to lay it aside, but not till she had finished nine hundred and eighty flowers. This is the completest Flora ever executed by one hand, and required great knowledge of botanical drawing.

She bequeathed this work to her nephew, count Dewes. At the age of eighty she began to write poetry;—the following she prefixed to the first volume of her Flora, or Herbal :

"Hail to the happy times when fancy led
My pensive mind the flow'ry path to tread,
And gave me emulation to presume,
With timid art, to trace fair nature's bloom :
To view with awe the great creative power
That shines confest in the minutest flower:
With wonder to pursue the glorious line,
And gratefully adore the hand divine."

It was said of Mrs. Delany's poetry that "her verses show at least a pious disposition." At eighty piety is the charm of woman's life and conversation, and also required for her own happiness. Mrs. Delany has left a beautiful example to her sex, by the manner in which she improved her time; she never grew old in feeling; always employed, and always improving her talents, she kept youth in her heart, and therefore never lost her power of pleasing. Miss Burney, who was the intimate friend of her last years of life, thus describes Mrs. Delany just before her death, when she had entered her 88th year:—

"Her eyes alone had failed, and these not totally. Not even was her general frame, though enfeebled, wholly deprived of its elastic powers. She was upright; her air and her carriage were full of dignity; all her motions were graceful; and her gestures, when she was animated, had a vivacity almost sportive. Her exquisitely susceptible soul, at every strong emotion, still mantled in her cheeks, and her spirits, to the last, retained their innocent gaiety; her conversation its balmy tone of sympathy; and her manners their soft and resistless attraction: while her piety was at once the most fervent, yet most humble."

Mrs. Delany died April 15th, 1788, and was interred in a vault belonging to St. James' church, where a monument has been erected to her memory.

DELORME, MARION,

BORN in 1612, at Chalons, in Champagne, was the mistress of Cinq-Mars, who was executed by Richelieu for high-treason, in the reign of Louis XIII. Even before the death of her lover she was unfaithful to him, and her house was the rendezvous of the young courtiers. In 1650 she was involved in another difficulty with the government, and only escaped arrest by a report of her sickness, followed by one of her death. She is said to have seen her own funeral from a window. She then went to England, married a wealthy nobleman, and being soon left a widow, she returned to France. On her way to Paris she was attacked by robbers and forced to marry their captain. Becoming a widow a second time, she married a man named Lebrun, with whom she went to Paris, where she died, in 1706, in great indigence. She was a friend of the celebrated Ninon de l'Enclos.

DEROCHES, MADELEINE REVUO,

AND her daughter Catherine, were famed among the French literati for wit and sparkling vivacity of mind. Their names cannot be separated, for like twin stars they illuminated the literary sky. The greatest minds of France sought and enjoyed their conversation: Marley, Scaliger, Rapin, and Pasquier, considered it more improving than that of their male friends, and Pasquier published a collection of their poems, with the curious title "Fleas of Miss Deroches," (1582). They were inseparable in death as during their life. They always expressed a wish that they might die at the same time; and Providence granted it. They died on the same day at Poitiers, victims of the plague, which prevailed there at that time. Their works were published, in two volumes, in the year 1604.

DESCARTES, CATHARINE,

DAUGHTER of a councillor of the Parliament of Brittany, and niece of the celebrated philosopher of that name, was, from her learning and talents, so worthy of her origin, that it was said, "The mind of the great Descartes had fallen on a distaff." Her most considerable work was an account of the death of her uncle, in prose and verse. She led a very quiet life in Brittany, and died, in 1706, of a disease brought on by hard study. She was born at Rennes in 1635.

DESHOULIÈRES, ANTOINETTE LIGIER DE LA GARDE,

Was born at Paris, in 1638. At that period the education of young ladies was very carefully attended; usage required them to be instructed in many subjects that are not always open to their sex. Mademoiselle de la Garde evinced a brightness of mind, and love for study, at a very early age. Her taste for poetry manifested itself almost in infancy; she "lisp'd in number." Henault, a poet of some reputation, was a friend of the family, and he took pleasure in instructing this charming damsel in the rules of versification; it has even been said that he sacrificed some poems of his own to add to the celebrity of his pupil. Mademoiselle de la Garde added the charms of beauty, and pleasing manners, to her literary abilities. Perhaps her admirers, who were many, would have expressed it—her beauty rendered her charming in spite of her literary abilities. In 1651 she became the wife of the seigneur Deshoulières, a lieutenant-colonel of the great Conde. He participated actively in the civil war of the Fronde, and becoming obnoxious to the queen-regent, suffered a confiscation of his property. Madame Deshoulières, who had accompanied her husband through the changes and chances of a soldier's life, went to Brussels, where a Spanish court resided, to obtain some claims which the colonel was not himself at leisure to pursue; this step resulted in an arbitrary imprisonment. She was confined, in a state prison, for eight months, and at the end of that time with difficulty released by the exertions of her husband. At the close of the civil wars M. Deshoulières obtained an office in Guienne, where he retired with his family. At this time Antoinette had the opportunity of visiting Vaucluse: the scene of Petrarch's inspiration; and here it was that she composed her happiest effusions. Her pastorals, particularly "Les Moutons" and "Le Ruisseau," are universally allowed to be among the very best of that sort of writing in the French language. Some of her maxims are still frequently cited, the following especially, whose truth comes home to everybody.

Il n'est pas si facile qu'on pense,
D'être honnête homme, et de jouer gros jeu,
Le desir de gagner, qui nuit et jour occupe,
Est un dangereux aiguillon:
Souvent, quoique l'esprit, quoique le cœur soit bon,
On commence par être dupe;
On finit par être fripon.

L'amour propre est, hélas! le plus sot des amours.
Cependant des erreurs il est la plus commune:
Quelque puissant qu'on soit en richesse, en crédit
Quelque mauvais succès qu'ait tout ce qu'on écrit,
Nul n'est content de sa fortune
Ni mécontent de son esprit.

A little anecdote may serve for a moment's amusement, while it displays no inconsiderable courage in the heroine. It should be prefaced, by recalling to the reader that in the seventeenth century a ghost was a thing to be afraid of, and that not merely the "fair and innocent" succumbed to the unreal terrors of superstition. The cardinal de Retz gives a curious proof of this, in the account of the dismay cast over himself and the great Turenne, with many other of less note, by an imaginary band of spectres. Madame Deshoulières went to pay a visit to a friend of hers in the country. She was informed that one of the chambers was haunted; that for some time, every night, a phantom repaired there; and that, consequently, nobody would inhabit that side of the chateau. Madame Deshoulières was neither credulous nor superstitious, and she immediately offered to undertake the adventure of sleeping in the fatal apartment. In the middle of the night she heard the door open—she spoke—the spectre made no reply, but walked on with a heavy tread, uttering rough sounds. A table at the foot of the bed was thrown down, and the curtains pushed back with a great noise; the phantom approached, the lady, nowise disconcerted, stretched out her hands to discover whether it had a palpable form. She seized two long, soft ears; she dared not let go, lest she should lose the fruit of her undertaking, but actually remained in that attitude till the dawn of day revealed, as the cause of all the alarm, a large dog, very much petted by the family. This animal, not liking to sleep in open yard, formed the habit of betaking himself to this room, the door of which was so constructed that he could push it open.

Madame Deshoulières was made a member of the Academy of Arles and of that of the Ricoverati, in Padua. She numbered among her friends.

many of the most distinguished persons of the day. The two Corneilles, Flechier, Quinault, the duke of Nevers, and La Rochefoucault, professed for her the highest esteem as a woman and as an authoress. The great Condé appears to have entertained for her a more tender sentiment—his rank, power, and many dazzling qualities, might have proved dangerous to a lighter mind; but her firm principles of virtue, and love for her husband, preserved her from the shadow of reproach. She had several children—a daughter, Antoinette, who inherited some of her mother's poetical talent; she took a prize at the French Academy, though Fontenelle was her competitor.

Madame Deshoulières achieved her literary reputation, not by isolating herself from the duties of society, as some poets have deemed necessary to the development of the poetic temperament. A tender mother—an active friend—as we have seen above, she did not hesitate to plunge into the difficulties of diplomacy, when called upon to aid her husband,—proving that the cultivation of the mind is by no means incompatible with attention to the minute and daily duties of the mother of a family. And those ladies who affect to despise feminine pursuits, or who complain of the cramping effect of woman's household cares, may learn from the example of this successful authoress, that neither are obstacles in the path of real genius, but rather an incentive to call forth talents, by developing the character in conformity with nature. Madame Deshoulières had studied with success geometry and philosophy, and was well versed in the Latin, Italian, and Spanish languages. She died in 1694. The following poem was very popular:—

LES MOUTONS.

IDYLLE.

Hélas! petits moutons, que vous êtes heureux!
 Vous paissez dans nos champs sans soucis, sans alarmes.
 Aussitôt aimés qu'amoureux,
 On ne vous force point à répandre des larmes;
 Vous ne formez jamais d'inutiles desirs.
 Dans vos tranquilles cœurs l'amour suit la nature;
 Sans ressentir ses maux, vous avez ses plaisirs.
 L'ambition, l'honneur, l'intérêt, l'imposture,
 Qui font tant de maux parmi nous,
 Ne se recroisent point chez vous.
 Cependant nous avons la raison pour partage,
 Et vous en ignorez l'usage.
 Innocens animaux, n'en soyez point jaloux:
 Ce n'est pas un grand avantage.
 Cette fière raison, dont on fait tant de bruit,
 Contre les passions n'est pas un sûr remède:
 Un peu de vin la trouble, un enfant la séduit;
 Et déchirer un cœur qui l'appelle à son aide,
 Est tout l'effet qu'elle produit.
 Toujours impuissante et sévère,
 Elle s'oppose à tout et ne surmonte rien.
 Sous la garde de votre chien,
 Vous devez beaucoup moins redouter la colère
 Des loups cruels et ravissans,
 Que, sous l'autorité d'une telle chimère,
 Nous ne devons craindre nos sens.
 Ne vaudroit-il pas mieux vivre comme vous faites,
 Dans une douce oisiveté?
 Ne vaudroit-il pas mieux être comme vous êtes,
 Dans une heureuse obscurité,
 Que d'avoir, sans tranquillité,
 Des richesses, de la naissance,
 De l'esprit et de la beauté?
 Ces prétendus trésors, dont on fait vanité,
 Valent moins que votre indolence:

T

Ils nous livrent sans cesse à des soins criminels:
 Par eux plus d'un remords nous ronge;
 Nous voulons les rendre éternels,
 Sans songer qu'eux et nous passerons comme il ronge
 Il n'est dans ce vaste univers
 Rien d'assuré, rien de solide.
 Des choses d'ici-bas la fortune décide
 Selon ses caprices divers.
 Tout l'effort de notre prudence
 Ne peut nous dérober au moindre de ses coups.
 Paissez, moutons, paissez sans règle et sans science;
 Malgré la trompeuse apparence,
 Vous êtes plus sages que nous.

DESMOULINS, LUCILLE,

Was born in Paris, in 1771. Her father was a clerk of the finances, and her mother one of the most beautiful women of the age. Lucille, whose maiden name was Duplessis, was carefully educated. She formed an attachment, when very young, to Camille Desmoulins, a young man of great talent, who became one of the first leaders and victims of the revolution. They were married in 1790. Camille Desmoulins, after having made himself conspicuous by his speeches in favour of the death of Louis XVI., was appointed a member of the Convention, and for some time was very much followed. But as his feelings gradually changed from hatred against the aristocrats to pity for the innocent victims of the people's fury, he lost his popularity, was denounced, and imprisoned. Lucille exerted herself to the utmost to save him, and wandered continually around his prison, trying to rouse the people in his favour; but in vain. He was guillotined, and she was tried and condemned for having endeavoured to rescue him. She was calm, and even cheerful, during her hasty trial; and dressing herself with the greatest care, she entered the fatal cart, and, in the full bloom of her youth and beauty, ascended, with the most perfect serenity, the scaffold. She was executed in 1794, at the age of twenty-three

DEVONSHIRE, GEORGIANA CAVENDISH,
DUCHESS OF,

A LADY as remarkable for her talents as her beauty, was the eldest daughter of earl Spencer, and was born in 1757. In her seventeenth year, she married the duke of Devonshire, a distinguished nobleman. The beautiful duchess, in the bloom of youth, became not only the leader of female fashions, and the star of the aristocratic world, but she also aspired to political influence. In 1780, she became the zealous partizan of Mr. Fox, and canvassed successfully for votes in his favour. The story of the butcher selling her his vote for a kiss, is well known. Among a variety of other jeux d'esprits which appeared on that occasion, was the following:—

"Array'd in matchless beauty, Devon's fair,
In Fox's favour takes a zealous part;
But oh! where'er the piffereer comes, beware—
She supplicates a vote, and steals a heart."

The duchess was benevolent, as well as patriotic, and few ladies in her high station have left such an impression of the kindly feelings of the heart on the public mind.

An anecdote is related of her by Gibbon, the celebrated historian, who became acquainted with her while she passed through Switzerland, during her travels abroad. The duchess returned to London; it was in the year 1793, when England was at war with France. The patriotism of the duchess now displayed a true feminine character; she took an anxious interest in the health and comfort of the protecting armies; and when, late in the autumn, Gibbon revisited England, and renewed his acquaintance with the duchess of Devonshire, he found her "making flannel waistcoats for the soldiers." This was more lady-like than canvassing for votes.

The duchess had three children, two daughters and a son, and seems to have been a careful and loving mother, as she was an excellent wife. She died, after a short illness, on the 30th of March, 1806, in the forty-ninth year of her life. She possessed a highly cultivated taste for poetry and the fine arts, and was liberal in her encouragement of talents and genius. She had written many poems, but only a few pieces have been published. These are spirited and elegant, and show a mind filled with enthusiasm for the true and the good. We subjoin an extract from the longest and most elaborate poem, entitled

THE PASSAGE OF THE MOUNTAIN OF ST. GOTHARD.

But though no more amidst those scenes I roam,
My fancy long its image shall retain—
The flock returning to its welcome home—
And the wild carol of the cow-herd's strain.

Lucerna's lake its glassy surface shows,
Whilst nature's varied beauties deck its side:
Here rocks and woods its narrow waves enclose,
And there its spreading bosom opens wide.

And hail the chapel! hail the platform wild!
Where Tell directed the avenging dart:
With well-strung arm, at first preserved his child,
Then winged the arrow to the tyrant's heart.

Across the lake, and deep embower'd in wood,
Behold another hallow'd chapel stands,
Where three Swiss heroes lawless force withstood,
And stamp'd the freedom of their native land.

Their Liberty requir'd no rites uncouth,
No blood demanded, and no slaves enchain'd;
Her rule was gentle, and her voice was truth,
By social order form'd, by law restrain'd.

We quit the lake—and cultivation's toil,
With nature's charms combin'd, adorn the way:
And well-earn'd wealth improves the ready soil,
And simple manners still maintain their sway.

Farewell, Helvetia—from whose lofty breast
Proud Alps arise, and copious rivers flow;
Where, source of streams, eternal glaciers rest,
And peaceful science gilds the plains below.

On thy rocks the wond'ring eye shall gaze,
Thy valleys oft the raptur'd bosom seek—
There, nature's hand her boldest work displays;
Here, bliss domestic beams on every cheek.

Hope of my life! dear children of my heart!
That anxious heart, to each fond feeling true,
To you still pants, each pleasure to impart,
And more—O transport!—reach its home and you

DEYSTER, ANNA,

THE daughter of Louis Deyster, a Flemish painter, was born at Bruges in 1696. She excelled in landscapes, and imitated her father's works so well, that few of the best judges could distinguish the copies from the originals. She died in poverty, because, abandoning painting, she devoted her time to constructing organs and harpsichords, and was not successful. She died in 1746.

DIGBY, LETTICE,

Was descended from the ancient family of the Fitzgeralds of Kildare. She was created baroness of Offale for life, and on her marriage with lord Digby, of Coleshill, in the county of Longford, brought her large possessions into that family. As lady Digby lived in the time of the rebellion, the insurgents often assaulted her in her castle of Geashill, which she defended with great resolution. She died in 1658, and lies buried in the cathedral of St. Patrick. She left seven sons and three daughters.

DOMAIR, ESTHER, BORN GAD,

Was a woman of great genius and masculine powers of mind. She was born at Breslau, 1770, of Jewish parents. Already in her early youth, she busied herself with plans for improving the condition and education of her sex, and wrote several essays on the subject. When twenty years old, she went to Berlin, where she became acquainted with Madame de Genlis, who contributed much to model her mind. In 1791, she embraced Christianity; and in 1792 married Dr. W. F. Domeir. With him she travelled through southern Europe, and spent several years in Portugal. The result of her observations was published in the year 1803, in Hamburg, under the title "Letters during my residence in Portugal and England." She wrote also several smaller works, and translated a number of French books into English. She died in 1802, lamented by all her friends. Her writings are distinguished for vivid description, strong sense, and beauty of thought, without much polish of sentiment or style.

DUBOIS, DOROTHEA,

DAUGHTER of Annesley, earl of Anglesea, by Anne Sympson, married a musician, and ended 290

voured, by her writings, to reclaim her rights from her father, who had basely denied his marriage with her mother, and disowned her as his child. She wrote the "Divorce," a musical entertainment, and "Theodora," a novel, in which she delineates her own history. She died in Dublin, in 1774.

DUCLOS, MARIE ANNE,

A FRENCH actress of great merit, was born at Paris, where she died in 1748, aged seventy-eight. She excelled in the representation of queens and princesses. Her maiden name was Chateauneuf; that of Duclos was assumed; she married, in 1730, Duchemin, an actor, from whom she was divorced three years after.

DUFRESNOY, MADEMOISELLE,

Was born in Paris, and entered "La congregation des filles de la Croix." Her poems were very popular, and she holds a respectable rank among the female poets of France. She died in 1825.

DUMÉE, JOAN,

Was born at Paris, and instructed, from her earliest infancy, in belles-lettres. She married very young, and was scarcely seventeen when her husband was killed, in Germany, at the head of a company he commanded. She employed the liberty her widowhood gave her in ardent application to study, devoting herself especially to astronomy. She published, in 1680, at Paris, a quarto volume under the title of "Discourses of Copernicus touching the Mobility of the Earth, by Madame Joanne Dumée, of Paris." She explains with clearness the three motions attributed to the earth, and the arguments that establish or militate against the system of Copernicus.

DUMESNIL, MARIE FRANCES,

A CELEBRATED tragic actress, was born at Paris in 1713, went upon the stage in 1737, and remained popular till the moment of her retirement, in 1775. She died in 1803, having preserved her intellectual powers to the last. She displayed her talents most strikingly in queens and lofty characters, especially in the parts of Merope, Clytemnestra, Athaliah, and Agrippina. When she exerted her full powers, she surpassed all her theatrical contemporaries in exciting emotions of pity and of terror.

DUMONT, MADAME,

Was born at Paris, in the 18th century. She was the daughter of M. Lutel, an officer in the household of the duke of Orleans, then regent. She was celebrated for her poetical talents, and she published a collection of fugitive pieces, translations of Horace, fables, songs, &c.

DUPRÉ, MARY,

DAUGHTER of a sister of des Marêts de St. Sorlin, of the French Academy, was born at Paris and educated by her uncle. Endowed with a happy genius and a retentive memory, she read the principal French, Italian, and Latin authors, in the original, and understood Greek and philosophy.

She studied Descartes so thoroughly, that she obtained the surname of la Cartesienne; and she also wrote very agreeable verses, and corresponded with several of her learned contemporaries. The answers of Isis to Climene, in the select pieces of poetry published by father Bouhors, are by this lady. She lived in the seventeenth century.

DURAND, CATHARINE,

A FRENCH poetess, married a man by the name of Bedacien, and died in 1736. She kept the name of Durand because she had begun to write under it. She published several romances, comedies, in prose and verse, and some poetry. An "Ode a la Louange de Louis XIV." gained the prize for poetry at the French Academy, in 1701. It is too long for insertion, and its chief merit, that which obtained the prize, was doubtless the homage the author rendered the Grand Monarque.

DURAS, DUCHESS OF,

A MODERN French authoress, best known from her novel Aurika. She was the daughter of a captain in the navy, count Corsain. During the French revolution, in 1793, she left France and went with her father to England. There she married the refugee duke Duras, a firm royalist. In the year 1800, she returned with her husband to France, where she made the acquaintance of Madame de Staël, and then opened her labours to a literary circle, composed of the greatest minds of the country. When Louis XVIII. returned to France, he called her husband to his court, and gave him a place near his person. The duchess, although now a great favourite at court, devoted much of her time to a school which she established, and in superintending several benevolent societies of which she was an active member. Her novel Aurika, in which she attacks, in a firm but gentle way, the prejudices of the nobility of birth, made quite a sensation, and was translated in several countries. Her next work, "Edward," was not quite equal to the first. She died in the year 1828.

DUSTON, HANNAH,

Was the wife of Thomas Duston, of Haverhill, in Massachusetts. In 1679, Haverhill was attacked by the Indians; and Mrs. Duston, with her infant, only a week old, and the nurse, were taken by them. Mr. Duston succeeded in saving himself and the other seven children. After proceeding a short distance, the Indians killed the child, by dashing out its brains against a tree, because it embarrassed their march. Proceeding on the fatiguing journey, they arrived at an island in the Merrimack, just above Concord, N. H., now called Duston's Island. When they reached the place of rest, they slept soundly. Mrs. Duston did not sleep. The nurse, and an English boy, a prisoner, were apprised of her design, but were not of much use to her in the execution of it. In the stillness of the night she arose and went out of the wigwam to test the soundness and security of savage sleep. They moved not; they were to sleep until the last day. She returned, took one of their hatchets, and dispatched ten of them,—each with a single blow. An Indian woman, who was rising when she struck her, fled with her probable death-wound; and an Indian boy was designedly spared; for the avenger of blood was a woman and a mother, and could not deal a death-blow upon a helpless child. She surveyed the carnage ground by the light of the fire, which she stirred up after the deed was done; and catching a few handfuls of roasted corn, she commenced her journey; but on reflecting a moment, she thought the people of Haverhill would consider her tale as the ravings of madness, when she should get home, if ever that time might come; she therefore returned, and scalped the slain; then put her nurse and English boy into the canoe, and with herself they floated down to the falls, when she landed, and took to the woods, keeping the river in sight, which she knew must direct her on her way home. After suffering incredible hardships by hunger, cold, and fatigue, she reached home, to the surprise and joy of her husband, children and friends. The general court of Massachusetts examined her story, and being satisfied of the truth of it, took her trophies, the scalps, and gave her fifty pounds. The people of Boston made her many presents. All classes were anxious to see her; and they found her as modest as brave.

In 1830, the house in Haverhill where Mrs. Duston had resided was standing, and was visited as a memorable spot, the home of an American heroine.

DWIGHT, ELIZABETH BAKER,

Was born at Andover, in Massachusetts, in 1808. Her maiden name was Baker. She was carefully educated; and her naturally strong mind was thus disciplined to give greater effect to her graces of character. She was about seventeen years of age when she became a member of the church of which Dr. Justin Edwards was pastor. From this period till the time of her marriage, Miss Baker was remarkable for the mingled sweetness and discretion of her manners; constantly striving to improve her time and talents in the service of the Saviour, whom she, like Mary of Bethany, had chosen for her portion.

In 1830, she married the Rev. H. G. O. Dwight, and sailed with him to Malta, where she resided two years, her husband being a missionary to that place. She was actively and very usefully engaged while there, and when her husband removed to Constantinople.

Her correspondence at this period, and the testimony of her associates, show how earnestly her spirit entered into the work she had undertaken. Her pious and tender sympathy was most efficient help to her husband, in his arduous missionary duties; though her delicate health, and many household cares, prevented her from giving the active assistance in the teacher's department she had intended, and was well qualified to have done. She had anticipated this work as her happiest privilege; to be able to imbue the minds of the children of unbelievers with the sweet and salutary truths of the gospel had been Mrs. Dwight's most cherished desire.

The missionary family resided at San Stefano, near the Bosphorus. Scenes of beauty and of storied interest were around Mrs. Dwight; still she had few opportunities of visiting the remarkable places in this region of the world. Once she made an excursion with Lady Frankland and an American friend to the Black Sea, and found her health renovated; still she was drooping and delicate, like a transplanted flower, which pines for its own mountain home, and the fresh breezes and pure sunshine of its first blossoming.

In the spring of 1837, the plague appeared at Constantinople, and Mrs. Dwight felt she was one of its doomed victims. The presentiment proved true. She died on the 8th of July, 1837; her devoted husband being the only person who remained to watch over, comfort her, and receive her last breath. She was only twenty-nine years of age, and had hardly become habituated to the missionary cross, when she was called to wear its crown.

DYER, MARY,

Was the wife of William Dyer, who removed from Massachusetts to Rhode Island in 1638. Having been sentenced to execution for "rebellious sedition and obtruding herself after banishment upon pain of death," she was reprieved at the request of her son, on condition that she departed in forty-eight hours, and did not return. She returned, and was executed June 1st, 1660. She was a Quakeress, and, in the estimation of her friends, a martyr.

E.

EBOLI, ANNE DE MENDOZA LA CERDA,

PRINCESS of, was married to Rui de Gomez de Silva, the favourite of Philip II. of Spain, whose favour he was supposed to have owed to the attractions of his wife. Her ambition induced her to listen to the king's passion, by which means she obtained, for a time, great influence in the state. Antonio Perez, the secretary of state, was the rival of his master, who, discovering the circumstance, would have sacrificed the lovers to his vengeance; but Perez made his escape to France, and the princess was imprisoned.

EDGEWORTH, MARIA,

DESCENDED from a respectable Irish family, was born in Oxfordshire, England, January 1st, 1767. Her father was Richard Lovell Edgeworth, Esq., who, succeeding to an estate in Ireland, removed thither when Maria was about four years old. The family residence was at Edgeworthstown, Longford county; and here the subject of our sketch passed her long and most useful life, leaving an example of literary excellence and beneficent goodness rarely surpassed in the annals of woman.

Mr. Edgeworth was a man of talent, who devoted his original and very active mind chiefly to subjects of practical utility. Mechanics and general literature were his pursuits, in so far as he could make these subservient to his theories of education and improvement; but his heart was centered in his home, and his eldest child, Maria, was his pride. She early manifested a decided taste for literary pursuits; and it appears to have been one of her father's greatest pleasures to direct her studies and develop her genius. This sympathy and assistance were of invaluable advantage to her at the beginning of her literary career; and sweetly did she repay these attentions when her own ripened talents outstripped his more methodical but less gifted intellect!

The father and daughter wrote, at first, together, and several works were their joint productions. The earliest book thus written in partnership was "Practical Education;" the second bore the title of "An Essay on Irish Bulls," which does not sound significantly of a young lady's agency, yet the book was very popular, because, with much wit, there was deep sympathy with the peculiar virtues of the Irish character, and pathetic touches in the stories illustrating Irish life, which warmed and won the heart of the reader. Miss Edgeworth was an earnest philanthropist, and herein lay the secret strength of her literary power. She felt for the wants and weaknesses of humanity; but as she saw human nature chiefly in Irish nature, her thoughts were directed towards the improvement of her adopted country, rather more, we suspect, from propinquity than patriotism. Be this as it may, her best novels are those in which Irish character is portrayed; but her best books are those written for the young; because in these her genuine philanthropy is most freely unfolded.

From the beginning of the century, 1800, when Miss Edgeworth commenced her literary career, till 1825, almost every year was the herald of a new work from the pen of this distinguished lady. "Castle Rackrent," "Belinda," "Leonora," "Popular Tales," "Tales of Fashionable Life," "Patronage," "Vivian," "Harrington and Ormond," followed each other rapidly, and all were welcomed and approved by the public voice. In 1817, Mr. Edgeworth died, and Maria's profound sorrow for his loss suspended for some time her career of authorship. She did not resume her tales of fiction until she had given expression to her filial affection and gratitude to her father for his precious care in training her mind and encouraging her talents, and also to her deep and tender grief for his loss, by completing the "Memoir" he had commenced of his own life. This was published in 1820. Then she resumed her course of moral instruction for the young, and published that work, which so many children, in America as well as in Great Britain, have been happier and better for reading, namely, "Rosamond, a Sequel to Early Lessons." In 1825, "Harriet and Lucy," a continuation of the "Early Lessons," in four volumes, was issued.

In 1823, Miss Edgeworth visited Sir Walter Scott at Abbotsford. "Never," says Mr. Lockhart, "did I see a brighter day at Abbotsford than that on which Miss Edgeworth first arrived there; never can I forget her look and accent when she was received by him at his archway, and exclaimed, 'Everything about you is exactly what one ought to have had wit enough to dream.' The weather was beautiful, and the edifice and its appurtenances were all but complete; and day after day, so long as she could remain, her host had always some new plan of gaiety. Miss Edgeworth remained a fortnight at Abbotsford. Two years afterwards, she had an opportunity of repaying the hospitalities of her entertainer, by receiving him at Edgeworthstown, where Sir Walter met with as cordial a welcome, and where he found 'neither mud hovels nor naked peasantry, but snug cottages and smiling faces all about.' Literary fame had spoiled neither of these eminent persons, nor unfitted them for the common business and enjoyment of life. 'We shall never,' said Scott, 'learn to feel and respect our real calling and destiny, unless we have taught ourselves to consider everything as moonshine compared with the education of the heart.' Maria did not listen to this without some water in her eyes; her tears are always ready when any generous string is touched—(for, as Pope says, "the finest minds, like the finest metals, dissolve the easiest"); but she brushed them gaily aside, and said, "You see how it is; Dean Swift said he had written his books in order that people might learn to treat him like a great lord. Sir Walter writes his in order that he may be able to treat his people as a great lord ought to do.”

In 1834, Miss Edgeworth made her last appearance as a novelist, with the exquisite story of “Helen,” in three volumes. It is her best work of fiction, combining with truth and nature more of the warmth of fancy and pathos of feeling than she displayed in her earlier writings. As though the last beams from the sun of her genius had, like the departing rays of a long unclouded day, become softer in their brightness and beauty, while stealing away from the world they had blessed.

As every thing pertaining to the private life of a woman whose intellect has had such wide-spread and happy influence on the risen and rising generations of the Saxon race, is of incalculable importance to the literary character of her sex, we will give a sketch of Miss Edgeworth at home, from the pen of one who knew her well, and has most charmingly described her. Mrs. S. C. Hall, in the “Art-Journal,” thus delineates the domestic life of her revered friend, whom she visited in 1842:

“The entrance-hall at Edgeworthstown was an admirable preface to the house and family; it was spacious, hung with portraits; here, a case of stuffed birds; there, another of curiosities; specimens of various kinds, models of various things, all well arranged and well kept, all capable of affording amusement or instruction; an excellent place it was for children to play in, for at every pause in their games their little minds would be led to question what they saw; a charming waiting-room, it might have been, were it not that at Edgeworthstown no one was ever kept waiting, everything was as well-timed as at a railway-station. Many of this numerous family at that period had passed from time to eternity; others were absent; but there still remained a large family party. Among them were two of Miss Edgeworth’s sisters, and Mr. and Mrs. Francis Edgeworth, and their children.

The library at Edgeworthstown is by no means the stately, solitary room that libraries generally are; it is large, spacious, and lofty, well stored with books, and embellished with those most valuable of all classes of prints, the ‘suggestive.’ It is also picturesque, having been added to, and supported by pillars, so as to increase its breadth, and the beautiful lawn seen through the windows, embellished and varied by clumps of trees, imparts much cheerfulness to the exterior. If you look at the oblong table in the centre, you will see the rallying-point of the family, who were generally grouped around it, reading, writing, or working; while Miss Edgeworth, only anxious upon one point,—that all in the house should do exactly as they liked, without reference to her,—sat in her own peculiar corner on the sofa: her desk,—upon which was Sir Walter Scott’s pen, given to her by him, when in Ireland,—placed before her on a little quaint, unassuming table, constructed and added to for convenience. Miss Edgeworth’s attractiveness, and yet power of attention to what was going on,—the one not seeming to interfere with the other,—puzzled me exceedingly. In that same corner, and upon that table, she had written nearly all that has enlightened and delighted the world; the novels that moved Sir Walter Scott ‘to do for Scotland what Miss Edgeworth had done for Ireland;’ the works in which she brought the elevated sensibilities and sound morality of maturer life to a level with the comprehension of childhood, and rendered knowledge, and virtue, and care, and order, the playthings and companions of the nursery;—in that spot,—and while the multitudinous family were moving about and talking of the ordinary and everyday things of life,—she remained, wrapt up, to all appearance, in her subject, yet knowing, by a sort of instinct, when she was really wanted in the conversation; and then, without laying down her pen,—hardly looking up from her page,—she would, by a judicious sentence, wisely and kindly spoken, explain and illustrate, in a few words, so as to clear up any difficulty; or turn the conversation into a new and more pleasing current. She had the most harmonious way of throwing in explanations; informing, while entertaining, and that without embarrassing.

It was quite charming to see how Mr. Francis Edgeworth’s children enjoyed the freedom of the library without abusing it; to set these little people right when they were wrong, to rise from her table to fetch them a toy, or even to save a servant a journey; to run up the high steps and find a volume that escaped all eyes but her own; and having done all this, in less space of time than I have taken to write it, to hunt out the exact passage wanted or referred to—were the hourly employments of this unspoiled and admirable woman. She would then resume her pen, and continue writing, pausing sometimes to read a passage from an article or letter that pleased herself, and would please her still more if it excited the sympathy of those she loved. I expressed my astonishment at this to Mrs. Edgeworth, who said that “Maria was always the same; her mind was so rightly balanced, everything so honestly weighed, that she suffered no inconvenience from what would disturb and distract an ordinary writer.” Perhaps to this habit, however, may be traced a want of closeness in her arguments; indeed, neither on paper or in conversation was she argumentative. She would rush at a thing at once, rendering it sparkling and interesting by her playfulness, and informing by anecdote or illustration, and then start another subject. She spoke in eloquent sentences, and felt so truly what she said, that she made others instantly feel also.

* * * * *

“I regretted that so much of Miss Edgeworth’s mind and attention were given to local matters, but the pleasure she herself derived from the improvement of every living thing around her, was delightful to witness. I thought myself particularly good to be up and about at half-past seven in the morning; but early as it was, Miss Edgeworth had preceded me; and a table heaped with early roses, upon which the dew was still moist, and a pair of gloves, too small for any hands but hers, told who was the early florist. She was passionately fond of flowers: she liked to grow them, and to give them; one of the most loved and cherished of my garden's rose-bushes, is a gift from Miss Edgeworth. There was a rose, or a little bouquet of her arranging, always by each plate on the breakfast-table, and if she saw my bouquet faded, she was sure to tap at my door with a fresh one before dinner. And this from Maria Edgeworth—then between seventy and eighty!—to me!! These small attentions enter the heart and remain there, when great services and great talents are regarded perhaps like great mountains,—distant, and cold, and ungenial. I linger over what I write, and yet feel I cannot pourtray her at all as I desire to do.

* * * * *

"Her whole life was a lesson of truth, and yet her truths never offended; she took the rough edge off an opinion with so tender and skilful a hand, she was so much fonder of willing you into a virtue than exciting terror at a vice; so stedfast yet so gentle, that whenever she left the room, there was something wanting, a joy departed, a light gone out.

She had a vivid perception of the ridiculous, but that was kept in admirable order by her benevolence. Her eyes and mouth would often smile, when she restrained an observation, which, if it had found words, would have amused us, while it perhaps pained others; and yet she had the happiest manner of saying things, drawing a picture with a few words, as a great artist produces a likeness with a few touches of his pencil. I remember Cuvier excited my admiration very much, during one of our visits to Paris; I saw him frequently in society, and his magnificent head captivated my imagination. "Yes," said Miss Edgeworth, "he is indeed a wonder, but he has been an example of the folly of literary and scientific men being taken out of their sphere; Cuvier was more vain of his bad speeches in the Chamber of Peers, than he was of his vast reputation as a naturalist."

I never knew any one so ready to give information; her mind was generous in every sense of the word, in small things as well as in large; she gave away all the duplicates of her shells—"One is enough," she would say, "I must keep that out of compliment to the giver." She was not reserved in speaking of her literary labours, but she never volunteered speaking of them or of herself; she never seemed to be in her own head, as it were—much less in her own heart: she loved herself, thought of herself, cared for herself, infinitely less than she did for those around her. Naturally anxious to know everything connected with her habits of thought and writing—I often reverted to her books, which she said I remembered a great deal better than she did herself. When she saw that I really enjoyed talking about them, she spoke of them with her usual frankness. I told her I observed that she spoke to children as she wrote for them, and she said it was so; and she believed that having been so much with children, had taught her to think for them. I have no doubt that the succession of children in the Edgeworth family, kept alive her interest in childhood; those who withdraw from the society of youth, when they themselves are no longer young, turn away from the greenness and freshness of existence; it is as if winter made no preparation for, and had no desire to be succeeded by spring.

While seeing the little weaknesses of humanity, clearly and truly, she avoided dwelling upon them, and could not bear to inflict pain: "People," she said, "see matters so differently that the very thing I should be most proud of makes others blush with shame; Wedgwood carried the 'hod' of mortar in his youth, but his family objected to that fact being stated in 'Harry and Lucy.'"

I once asked her how long she took to write a novel. She replied, she had generally taken ample time; she had written "Ormond" in three months; "but that," she added, "was at my father's command; I read to him at night what I wrote by day, and I never heard of the book, nor could I think of it, after his death, until my sister, two years after, read it me; then it was quite forgotten." She had a great veneration for father Matthew, and said Mr. Hall did himself honour by being the first Protestant, and the first Conservative, who advocated his cause in print: "What authors say goes for nothing," she observed; "it is what they write they should be judged by."

* * * * *

I remember saying to her, how happy it was for Ireland that she had overcome every religious prejudice.

"Ah!" she exclaimed, "I never had religious prejudices to overcome, so I deserve no praise for being without them." Miss Edgeworth never wrote that other people might practise, but she wrote what she and hers practised daily; it was evident from the children being constantly with the family, that they still held by the opinion that intercourse between children and servants is injurious to the former. "We believe in it," said Miss Edgeworth; "but I have long learned how very impossible it is for others to practise it. My father made it easy; for not only his wife, but his children knew all his affairs. Whatever business he had to do was done in the midst of his family, usually in the common sitting-room; so that we were intimately acquainted, not only with his general principles of conduct, but with the most minute details of their every-day application."

* * * * *

Some of the "unco good" have complained of what they call the want of religious, but what I should rather call sectarian, instruction, in Miss Edgeworth's juvenile works. "We wrote," she said to me, "for every sect, and did not, nor do I now, think it right, to introduce the awful idea of God's superintendence upon puerile occasions. I hold religion in a more exalted view than as a subject of perpetual outward exhibition. Many dignitaries of the established church honoured my father by their esteem and private friendship; this could not have been, had they believed him to be either an open or concealed enemy to Christianity." Certainly, as a magistrate, as a member of the Board of Education, as a member of parliament, Mr. Edgeworth had public opportunities of recording his opinions; and there is no trace, that I could ever discover, of his desiring to found a system of morality exclusive of religion. Unfortunately, in Ireland, if you are not,—I do not like the word, but I can find no other,—bigoted, to one or the other party, you are marked and stigmatised as irreligious—or worse—by both.

I do not design to write a panegyric. Miss Edgeworth's own works will suffice for that; they are imperishable monuments of her usefulness and her "good will," especially towards the country of her adoption and towards children. But even after a visit to Edgeworthstown, where a natural habit of observation, as well as a desire to read her rightly, made me more than usually awake to every word and every passing incident—bright days of rambling and sunshine, and dark days of rain and conversation with her and hers—seeing her thus away from the meretricious glare and false lights of London society, where I had first met her—in the trying seclusion of a country-house, in the midst of a most mingled family—where her father's last wife was many years younger than herself, and the half foreign children and foreign wife of her youngest brother, rendered the mingling still more extraordinary—recalling all seen and known of other families, where children of the same parents too seldom live together in unity—I remember nothing that at this distance of time does not excite my admiration and increase my affection for this admirable woman, combining in her small self whatever we believe to be most deserving of praise in her sex. She was a literary woman, without vanity, affectation, or jealousy—a very sunbeam of light, in a home rendered historic by her genius—a perfect woman in her attention to those little offices of love and kindness which sanctify domestic life; a patriot, but not a politician—the champion of a country's virtues, without being blind either to its follies or its crimes. Honoured wherever her name was heard during half a century of literary industry—idolized by a family composed as I have said of many members under one roof, yet tuned into matchless harmony by admirable management and right affection,—this woman, so loved, so honoured, so cherished to the very last, was entirely unselfish."

The true feminine beauty and excellence of Miss Edgeworth's character seem to rise palpably before us as we read these delineations by one who knew her so intimately and loved her so well. And these reminiscences gain enhanced value from the circumstance that Miss Edgeworth left positive orders her private correspondence should not be published; we cannot, therefore, hope for a more intimate knowledge of this estimable woman than Mrs. Hall has given. One more trait from this reminiscence, a written portrait of Miss Edgeworth.*

* Miss Edgeworth would never sit for her picture; the one we have given is from a sketch taken for Mr. S. C. Hall, when at Edgeworthstown, by Mr. Fairholt.

In person she was very small,—smaller than Hannah More,—and with more than Hannah More's vivacity of manner; her face was pale and thin; her features irregular; they may have been considered plain, even in youth; but her expression was so benevolent, her manner so entirely well bred,—partaking of English dignity and Irish frankness,—that you never thought of her, in reference either to plainness or beauty; she was all in all; occupied, without fatiguing the attention; charmed by her pleasant voice; while the earnestness and truth that beamed in her bright blue—very blue—eyes, made of value, every word she uttered,—her words were always well chosen; her manner of expression was graceful and natural; her sentences were frequently epigrammatic; she knew how to listen as well as to talk, and gathered information in a manner highly complimentary to the society of which, at the time, she formed a part; while listening to her, she continually recalled to me the story of the fairy whose lips dropped diamonds and pearls whenever they opened.

Miss Edgeworth was remarkably neat and particular in her dress; her feet and hands were so very small as to be quite child-like. I once took a shoe of hers to Melnotte's, in Paris, she having commissioned me to procure her some shoes there, and the people insisted that I must require them "pour une jeune demoiselle."

* * * * *

We have chosen the first work of Miss Edgeworth from which to make our extracts, partly because it is less read than her novels, but chiefly because the sentiments are those which actuated her own life, and form the moral of all she wrote. In the "Practical Education" is contained the soul, so to speak, of her genius. She wrought out her materials of thought into many forms, and coloured these with the rainbow tinting of her fancy, and ornamented them with the polished beauty of benevolent feeling; but the precious gold of truth, which she first assayed in this elementary book, makes the sterling worth of all her books. And what a number she has written! The term of her life was long, but measured by what she accomplished seems to comprise the two centuries in which she lived. So quiet and easy was her death, it seemed but a sweet sleep, after only a half-hour's illness, May 21st, 1849. She died in her eighty-third year, ripe in good works, and in the "charity which never faileth," for the kingdom of love and peace.

From "Practical Education."

ONLY CHILDREN.

An only child runs a dreadful chance of being spoiled. He is born a person of consequence; he soon discovers his innate merit; every eye is turned upon him the moment he enters the room; his looks, his dress, his appetite, are all matters of daily concern to a whole family; his wishes are divined; his wants are prevented; his witty sayings are repeated in his presence; his smiles are courted; his caresses excite jealousy; and he soon learns how to avail himself of his central situation. His father and mother make him alternately their idol, and their plaything; they do not think of educating, they only think of admiring him: they imagine that he is unlike all other children in the universe; and that his genius and his temper are independent of all cultivation. But when this little paragon of perfection has two or three brothers and sisters, the scene changes; the man of consequence dwindles into an insignificant little boy.

THE POWER OF SYMPATHY.

Long before children can understand reasoning, they can feel sympathy; during this early period of their education, example and habit, slight external circumstances, and the propensity to imitation, govern their thoughts and actions. Imitation is the involuntary effect of sympathy in children; hence, those who have the most sympathy are most liable to be improved or injured by early examples. Examples of the malevolent passions should therefore be most carefully excluded from the sight of those who have yet no choice in their sympathy; expressions of kindness and affection in the countenance, the voice, the actions, of all who approach, and of all who have the care of infants, are not only immediately and evidently agreeable to children, but ought also to be used as the best possible means of exciting benevolent sympathies in their minds. Children who habitually meet with kindness, habitually feel complacency; that species of instinctive, or rather of associated affection, which always rises in the mind from the recollection of past pleasures, is immediately excited in such children by the sight of their parents. By an easy transition of ideas, they expect the same benevolence, even from strangers, which they have experienced from their friends, and their sympathy naturally prepares them to wish for society; this wish is often improperly indulged.

At the age when children begin to unfold their ideas, and to express their thoughts in words, they are such interesting and entertaining companions, that they attract a large portion of our daily attention: we listen eagerly to their simple observations; we enter into their young astonishment at every new object; we are delighted to watch all their emotions; we help them with words to express their ideas; we anxiously endeavour to understand their imperfect reasonings; and are pleased to find, or put them in the right. This season of universal smiles and courtesy is delightful to children while it lasts; but it soon passes away: they soon speak without exciting any astonishment; and instead of meeting with admiration for every attempt to express an idea, they are soon repulsed for troublesome volubility; even when they talk sense, they are suffered to talk unheard, or else they are checked for unbecoming presumption. Children feel this change in public opinion and manners most severely; they are not sensible of any change in themselves, except, perhaps, they are conscious of having improved both in sense and language.

MUSIC AS AN ACCOMPLISHMENT.

Out of the prodigious number of young women who learn music and drawing, for instance, how many are there who, after they have become mistresses of their own time, and after they have the choice of their own amusements, continue to practise these accomplishments for the pure pleasure of occupation? As soon as a young lady is married, does she not frequently discover that "she really has not leisure to cultivate talents which take up so much time?" Does she not complain of the labour of practising four or five hours a day, to keep up her musical character? What motive has she for perseverance? She is, perhaps, already tired of playing to all her acquaintance. She may really take pleasure in hearing good music; but her own performance will not, then, please her ear so much as that of many others. She will prefer the more indolent pleasure of hearing the best music that can be heard for money at public concerts. She will then, of course, leave off playing, but continue very fond of music. How often is the labour of years thus lost for ever!

THE BEST ACCOMPLISHMENTS.

We must further observe, that the habit of pursuing any occupation which requires no mental exertion, induces an indolence or incapacity of intellect. Mere artists are commonly as stupid as mere artificers, and these are little more than machines.

The length of time which is required to obtain practical skill and dexterity in certain accomplishments, is one reason why there are so few people who obtain any thing more than mechanical excellence. They become the slaves of custom, and they become proud of their slavery. At first, they might have considered custom as a tyrant; but when they have obeyed her for a certain time, they do her voluntary homage ever after, as to a sovereign by divine right. To prevent this species of intellectual degradation, we must, in education, be careful to rank mere mechanical talents below the exercise of the mental powers. Thus the ambition of young people will be directed to high objects; and all inferior qualifications may be attained without contracting the understanding. Praise children for patience, for perseverance, for industry; encourage them to reason and to invent upon all subjects, and you may direct their attention afterwards as you think proper. But if you applaud children merely for drawing a flower neatly, or copying a landscape, without exciting their ambition to any thing higher, you will never create superior talents, or a superior character. The proficiency that is made in any particular accomplishment, at any given age, should not be considered so much, even by those who highly value accomplishments, as the power, the energy, that is excited in the pupil's mind, from which future progress is insured. The writing and drawing automaton performs its advertised wonders to the satisfaction of the spectators; but the machine is not "instinct with spirit;" you cannot expect from its pencil the sketch of a Raphael, or from its pen the thoughts of a Shakspeare. It is easy to guide the hand, but who can transfuse a soul into the image?

LITERARY EDUCATION.

It will be sufficient to profess the distinct opinion which a longer consideration of the subject has yet more fully confirmed, That it will tend to the happiness of society in general, that women should have their understandings cultivated and enlarged as much as possible; that the happiness of domestic life, the virtues and the powers of pleasing in the female sex, the yet more desirable power of attaching those worthy of their love and esteem, will be increased, by the judicious cultivation of the female understanding, more than by all that modern gallantry or ancient chivalry could devise in favour of the sex. Much prudence and ability are requisite to conduct properly a young woman's literary education. Her imagination must not be raised above the taste for necessary occupations, or the numerous small, but not trifling, pleasures of domestic life; her mind must be enlarged, yet the delicacy of her manners must be preserved; her knowledge must be various, and her powers of reasoning unawed by authority; yet she must habitually feel that nice sense of propriety, which is at once the guard and the charm of every feminine virtue. By early caution—unremitting, scrupulous caution—in the choice of the books which are put into the hands of girls, a mother, or a preceptress, may fully occupy and entertain their pupils, and excite in their minds a taste for propriety, as well as a taste for literature. It cannot be necessary to add more than this general idea, that a mother ought to be answerable to her daughter's husband for the books her daughter had read, as well as for the company she had kept.

ON PRUDENCE.

In the education of girls, we must teach them much more caution than is necessary to boys: their prudence must be more the result of reasoning than of experiment; they must trust to the experience of others; they cannot always have recourse to what ought to be; they must adapt themselves to what is. They cannot rectify the material mistakes in their conduct. Timidity, a certain tardiness of decision, and reluctance to act in public situations, are not considered as defects in a woman's character; her pausing prudence does not, to a man of discernment, denote imbecility; but appears to him the graceful, auspicious characteristic of female virtue. There is always more probability that women should endanger their own happiness by precipitation, than by forbearance. Promptitude of choice is seldom expected from the female sex; they should avail themselves of the leisure that is permitted to them from reflection. "Begin nothing of which you have not considered the end," was the piece of advice for which the Eastern sultan paid a purse of gold, the price set upon it by a sage. The monarch did not repent of his purchase. This maxim should be engraved upon the memory of our female pupils, by the repeated lessons of education. We should, even in trifles, avoid every circumstance which can tend to make girls venturesome; which can encourage them to trust their good fortune, instead of relying on their own prudence.

ECONOMY.

Economy in women is an essential domestic virtue. Some women have a foolish love of expensive baubles; a taste which a very little care, probably, in their early education might have prevented. We are told that when a collection of three hundred and fifty pounds was made for the celebrated Cuzzona, to save her from absolute want, she immediately laid out two hundred pounds of the money in the purchase of a shell-cap, which was then in fashion. Prudent mothers will avoid showing any admiration of pretty trinkets before their young daughters; and they will oppose the ideas of utility and durability to the mere caprice of fashion, which creates a taste for beauty, as it were, by proclamation. "Such a thing is pretty, but it is of no use. Such a thing is pretty, but it will soon wear out"—a mother may say; and she should prove the truth of her assertions to her pupils.

ELEONORE OF TOLEDO,

DAUGHTER of Pertor of Toledo, viceroy of Naples, was born in the year 1526, and showed, even when a child, marks of an extraordinary mind. In 1543, she married Cosmos I., a Medici. Her husband was only twenty-four years old, though already six years a ruling prince. He had ascended the throne after the assassination of Alexander, in the year 1533, and found himself now constantly engaged in active hostilities with the Strozzi, the hereditary enemies of his house. Bloody and terrible were the battles fought in this struggle; but Eleonore never left the side of her husband even during the hottest encounters of the fight. Her extraordinary courage contributed greatly to the termination of the war; for, one day while riding with an escort of only fifteen horsemen, she met the leader of the hostile forces, Philip Strozzi, with a force of forty-five horsemen, reconnoitring the camp. Without a moment's hesitation, she threw herself upon them, cut them to pieces, and made Strozzi prisoner. Philip knew that no prisoner had hitherto been spared, and, in order to escape an ignominious death upon the scaffold, committed suicide in prison. This sad event induced Eleonore to prevail upon her husband to promise that henceforth he would spare the lives of his prisoners. Eleonore also accompanied her husband in the war between Charles V. and Francis I., and was actively engaged in the storming and taking of Sienna. She afterwards urged her husband to have himself crowned a king, but in this he failed. Pius V. finally changed his title, duke of Florence, into that of grand-duke of Tuscany.

Eleonore's ambition being now satisfied, she devoted the rest of her life to encourage education, the fine arts, and benevolent institutions. The exact time of her decease is not known.

ELIZABETH, QUEEN OF ENGLAND,

WAS the daughter of Henry VIII. by his second wife, Anne Boleyn, and born September 7th, 1533. Upon that king's marriage with Jane Seymour, in 1535, she was declared illegitimate, with her half-sister Mary; and the succession to the crown established on the king's issue by his third wife. Her mother, at her death, had earnestly recommended her to the care of Dr. Parker, a great reformer, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury; who had the charge of her education, and instructed her carefully in the principles of the Christian religion. She spent her youth in the manner of a private person, and was unmolested; but, when her sister Mary ascended the throne, she was imprisoned on suspicion of being concerned in lady Jane Grey's promotion; and in March, 1557, committed to the Tower. She came near losing her life, for bishop Gardiner was against her, supposing Popery but half re-established while she lived. But Philip of Spain, Mary's husband, interceded for her, and saved her. For as Philip and Mary had no children, he considered that if Elizabeth were removed, the crown of England, after Mary's death, would pass to Mary of Scotland, who had just married the dauphin of France. And his hatred of France proved stronger than his zeal for his religion. Nevertheless, Elizabeth underwent great sufferings and ill treatment during her sister's reign.

Elizabeth began to reign in 1558. She was then twenty-five, and highly accomplished. Her person was graceful, her carriage noble and majestic, and though her features were not regular, yet her fair complexion, her lustrous eyes, and intelligent, animated expression, hardly suffered smaller imperfections to be observed. She was endowed with great talents, enlarged, cultivated, and refined by education. She wrote letters in English and Italian at thirteen; and, before she was seventeen, was perfect in the Latin, Greek, and French, and not unacquainted with other European languages. She also studied philosophy, rhetoric, history, divinity, poetry and music, and everything that could improve or adorn her mind.

Her first object, after her accession, was to restore the Protestant religion; to this she was led by interest as well as principle. For the pope treated her in such a manner, that she clearly perceived, if she professed Popery, she must allow her father's divorce from Catharine of Arragon to be void, and consequently herself illegitimate; and this would have annulled her pretensions to the crown. She has been strongly suspected by some of an inclination to the Roman Catholic religion; but there is no proof of this. Indeed she was the real foundress of the English Episcopal Church, as it now exists. True, she was greatly assisted by her counsellor, Cecil, afterwards lord Burleigh; still Elizabeth herself always held the reins of government over the church, as well as over the state; and what she founded and upheld steadily for fifty years, must have been conformable to her own faith.

The queen, while she was princess, had a private proposal of marriage from the king of Sweden; but she declared "she could not change her condition," though it was then very disagreeable. Upon her becoming queen, Philip of Spain, her late sister's husband, made an offer of himself to her, which she declined. In the first parliament of her reign, the house of commons addressed her, and represented to her how necessary it was, for the happiness of the nation, that she should think of marrying. She replied, "That, by the ceremony of her inauguration, she was married to her people, and her subjects were to her instead of children; that they should not want a successor when she died; and that, for her part, she should be very well contented to have her tomb-stone tell posterity, 'Here lies a queen, who reigned so long, and lived and died a virgin.'" Several matches were afterwards proposed to her by her people, and many distinguished personages were desirous of uniting themselves to this illustrious princess, but she maintained her celibacy.

It was not long before Elizabeth, by the advice of her council, began to interfere in the affairs of Scotland. Mary, the young queen of that country, was the next heir in blood to the crown of England; and as the zealous Romanists considered the birth of Elizabeth illegitimate, and her succession as rendered invalid by the papal excommunication she had undergone, they regarded Mary as the true sovereign of England. In accordance with this idea, when queen Mary died, Mary of Scotland and her husband, the dauphin of France, openly assumed the arms and title of English royalty. This act of hostility Elizabeth never forgot. When Mary returned to Scotland, some ineffectual attempts were made to induce Elizabeth to recognize her as presumptive successor to the English throne; but Elizabeth then, as ever afterwards, displayed the greatest aversion to the nomination of a successor. The matter was suffered to rest, and the two queens lived in apparent amity. The queen of England always evinced a weak jealousy of Mary's superior personal charms, and attempted a rivalry in that respect, as mean as it was hopeless. Another weakness of hers was a propensity to adopt court favourites, whom she selected rather on account of their external accomplishments than their merit. This foible was sometimes detrimental to her state affairs; though she generally gave her ministers and counsellors, who were chosen for their real merit, a due superiority in business affairs over her favourites.

One of the most conspicuous of these, Dudley, earl of Leicester, who obtained a great ascendancy over her, aspired to her hand; but she checked his presumption, and proposed him as a husband to the queen of Scotland, whom she had thwarted in every attempt she made to ally herself to a foreign potentate. But when Mary seemed disposed to listen favourably to this proposal, Elizabeth interfered and prevented her rival from taking away her favourite. Elizabeth and her ministers had also fomented those political dissensions which gave Mary so much disquiet.

In 1568, Mary fled from Scotland, and took refuge in England, having previously informed Elizabeth of her determination. The English queen resolved to detain her rival in perpetual imprisonment; in consequence of which two or three rebellions were excited by the Catholics of England, but these were soon quelled by the prompt measures of Elizabeth.

The Puritan party began at this time to give the queen some uneasiness; for with a haughty and arbitrary temper, and a high idea of her prerogative, she was greatly offended by the spirit of civil liberty which, from their earliest rise, marked the Puritans. Elizabeth, however, understood so well the art of making concessions, and at the same time of supporting her dignity, that though she ruled her people with a rigorous hand, she always retained their confidence and affection. Her wise frugality prevented her from being burdensome to the nation; and she is a singular instance of a sovereign who returned a portion of the people's grants. The principal pecuniary cause of complaint in her reign arose from her custom of rewarding her courtiers with monopolies.

One of the most singular instances of contention between the feminine weakness and the political prudence of Elizabeth, was her conduct with respect to her suitor, the Duke d'Anjou, youngest brother of Charles IX. of France. This prince, about twenty-five years younger than herself, had been encouraged to come over to England, and prosecute his courtship in person. The negotiations for the marriage were nearly completed; and the queen was seen, in public, to take a ring from her own finger, and put it on his, as a pledge of their union. At length, perhaps in consequence of the great dislike of the nation to the match, she suddenly broke off the affair, and sent back the enraged prince to his government of the Netherlands.

In 1585, Elizabeth openly defied the hostility of Spain, by entering into a treaty with the revolted Low Countries, by which she bound herself to assist them with a considerable force, on condition of having some ports in her hands for her security. She refused the offer, which was twice made, of the sovereignty of these provinces, but stipulated for the admission of her general into the council of the states. The person she chose for this high trust, was the earl of Leicester, who did little honour to her choice. She at the same time sent a powerful armament against the Spanish settlement of the West Indies, under Sir Francis Drake. She likewise made a league of mutual defence with James, king of Scotland, whose friendship she courted, while she kept his mother imprisoned.

In 1586, a conspiracy was formed against the life of Elizabeth, the detection of which had very important consequences. Ballard, a Catholic priest, induced Anthony Babington, a Derbyshire gentleman of fortune, to undertake the queen's assassination. He was acting in the service of the queen of Scots, but it is doubtful whether Mary was aware of the intended murder of Elizabeth. The plot was discovered, and letters of Mary found, which rendered her participation in it, to a certain extent, a matter of judicial proof. Fourteen of the principal conspirators were executed, and Mary was tried and condemned to death. Elizabeth, though consenting to her execution, practised all the artifice and dissimulation which belonged to her character, to avoid as much as possible the odium of putting to death a queen and a near kinswoman. She wept and lamented as though she had lost a dear friend; she stormed at her council, and inflicted on her secretary, Davison, who had sent off the warrant, a ruinous fine.

The next great event of this reign was the expedition sent against England by the Spaniards. A large fleet, the Invincible Armada, as it was called, set sail in the summer of 1588, and presented a more formidable spectacle in the English channel than had been witnessed for many centuries. Elizabeth exerted all her energy to infuse confidence in her subjects. She rode on horseback through the camp at Tilbury, with a cheerful and undaunted demeanour, and addressed the troops with the true spirit of a hero. Happily the English fleet, aided by the winds, conquered the invincible armada, before it reached the coast. Elizabeth also assisted Henry IV., of Navarre, in obtaining possession of the throne of France.

In these enterprises by land and sea, the gallant Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, distinguished himself very much. On the death of Leicester, he had succeeded to his place in the estimation of the queen; and his splendid qualities and heroic valour seemed to justify her partiality. Her partiality, however, did not prevent her from asserting her own dignity; and once, when in the heat of debate he had turned his back upon her, she resented the affront by a sound box on his ear. She afterwards mollified his deeply-injured pride, and sent him over to Ireland as lord-lieutenant. Through his mismanagement the expedition failed. Upon his unpermitted return to justify himself, she at first received him graciously; but after a few hours of reflection her conduct changed so towards him, that he became really ill. This roused the pity of the queen, who sent her physicians to him with kind messages. After his recovery he again lost her favour, and urged by his enemies, and his own impetuous temper, Essex broke out in open rebellion against his sovereign. Elizabeth, after a long delay, signed his death-warrant with the most painful reluctance. He was executed in 1600.

In 1601, Elizabeth held a conference with Sully, who came from Henry IV. of France, concerning the establishment of a new system of European power, which was to produce a lasting peace. Sully returned much impressed by the solidity and enlargement of her views. She never was more respected abroad, or more beloved and cherished by her subjects, than just at the termination of her reign. But the last scene was darkened by a deep melancholy, and she died in a most deplorable state of despondency.

An incident relative to the unfortunate Essex has been suggested as the cause of her grief. She had given him a ring, as a pledge of her affection, promising him at sight of it a favourable hearing, with whatever offences he might be charged. After his condemnation, Essex had sent this ring to the queen by the countess of Nottingham, who had been persuaded by her husband, an enemy of the earl, to retain the pledge. On her death-bed, the countess sent for the queen, and revealed the secret to her, entreating her pardon. The queen, in a violent rage, shook the dying countess in her bed, exclaiming, "that God might pardon her, but she never could."

From this time, she rejected all consolation, refused food, and throwing herself on the floor, passed days and nights without changing her place. Nature, at length, began to sink; and as her end drew near, she was urged to declare her successor. She said she had held a regal sceptre, and would have none but a king to succeed her; and who should that be but her nearest kinsman, the king of Scots? She died March 24th, 1602, in the seventieth year of her age.

Elizabeth was rather noble as a queen, than amiable as a woman. Pope Sixtus V., who highly admired her, gave her a place among the only three persons then living who deserved to reign—the other two were himself and Henry IV. The character of this great queen has been misunderstood, because she has been judged as a woman rather than as a sovereign. It should never be forgotten, that she voluntarily relinquished the enjoyment of domestic life, where woman's nature is most truly and beautifully displayed, in order to devote herself to the cares of state and the happiness of her people. She should therefore be judged as a ruler; only it should ever be borne in mind that a higher degree of moral power ought to be found in the character of woman, in whatever station she occupies, than is manifested by man. It was this moral sense in which Elizabeth excelled all the kings of England, from the time of Alfred to her own day, that made her power and her glory. This intuitive wisdom guided her in the choice of able counsellors, and kept her true to the best interests of her subjects; and inspired her to preserve the manners of her court in that chastity which is the atmosphere of the highest genius as well as the purest patriotism. Thus it was from her wise rule that the English nation prospered, and, as an eloquent writer admits—"The kingdom, under her government, acquired and maintained a higher and more influential place among the states of Europe, principally by policy, than it had ever been raised to by the most successful military exertions of former ages. Commerce flourished and made great advances, and wealth was much more extensively and more rapidly diffused among the body of the people than at any former period. It is the feeling of progress, rather than any degree of actual attainment, that keeps a nation in spirits; and this feeling every thing conspired to keep alive in the hearts of the English in the age of Elizabeth; even the remembrance of the stormy times of their fathers, from which they had escaped, lending its aid to heighten the charm of the present calm. To these happy circumstances of the national condition was owing, above all, and destined to survive all their other products, the rich native literature, more especially in poetry and the drama, which now rushed up, as if from the tillage of a virgin soil, covering the land with its perennial fruit and flowers. Spenser and Shakespeare, Beaumont and Fletcher, Raleigh and Bacon, and many other distinguished names, gained their earliest celebrity in the Elizabethan age."

Elizabeth was herself fond of learning, and no mean scholar in her attainments. She was well skilled in the Greek, and translated from that language into Latin, a dialogue of Xenophon, two orations of Isocrates, and a play of Euripides; she also wrote a "Commentary on Plato." From the Latin, she translated Boethius' Consolations of Philosophy, Sallust's Jugurthian War, and a part of Horace's Art of Poetry. In the Royal and Noble Authors of Lord Orford, may be found a catalogue of translations from the French, prayers, meditations, speeches in parliament, and letters, which testify sufficiently to the learning and general capacity of Elizabeth. She was also skilled in the art of poetry. Being pressed by a Catholic priest, during the life of her sister Mary, while she was undergoing great persecution, to declare her opinion concerning the real presence of Christ in the wafer, she answered in the following impromptu:—

"Christ was the Word that spake it;
He took the bread and brake it;
And what that Word did make it,
That I believe, and take it."

When she was a prisoner at Woodstock, she composed the following verses, and wrote them with charcoal on a shutter:—

Oh, Fortune! how thy restlesse wavering state
Hath fraught with cares my troubled witt!
Witness this present prisonn, whither fate
Could beare me, and the joys I quit.
Thou causedest the guiltie to be losed
From bandes, wherein are innocents inclosed.
Causing the guilties to be strait reserved,
And freeing those that death had well deserved
But by her envie can be nothing wroughte,
So God send to my foes all they have thoughte.

ELIZABETH, PRISONER.

We will add a specimen of the prose of this great queen and learned lady; namely, a letter, written by Elizabeth to her sister, queen Mary. The original is preserved in the Cottonian Library, and was first published in D'Israeli's "Curiosities of Literature." The letter, besides showing the literary taste of that age, and the manner in which the English language was then written, also displays the subjection in which Elizabeth was then compelled to keep her haughty spirit. D'Israeli remarks on this letter:—"She was, at the time of its composition, in habitual intercourse with the most excellent writers of antiquity; her letter displays this in every part of it; it is polished and repolished."

LETTER.

Like as the riche man that dayly gathereth riches to riches, and to one bag of money layeth a greate sort til it come to infinit, so me thinkes, your Majestie not beinge suffised with many benefites and gentilnes shewed to me afore this time, dothe now increase them in askinge and desiring wher you may bid and cõmaunde, requiring a thinge not worthy the desiringe for it selfe, but made worthy for your highness request. My pictur I mene, in wiche if the inward good mynde towardes your grace might as wel be declared as the outwarde face and countenance shal be seen, I wold nor haue taried the cõmandement but prevent it, nor haue bine the last to graunt but the first to offer it. For the face, I graunt, I might wel blusche to offer, but the mynde I shall neur be ashamed to present. For thogh from the grace of the pictur, the coulers may fade by time, may giue by wether, may be spotted by chance, yet the other nor time with her swift winges shall ouertake, nor the mistie cloudes with their loweringes may darken, nor chance with her slipery fote may overthrow. Of this althogh yet the profe could not be greate because the occasions hathe bine but smal, notwithstandinge as a dog hathe a day, so may I perchaunce haue time to declare it in dides wher now I do write them but in wordes. And further I shal most humbly beseeche your Maiestie that whan you shal loke on my pictur you wil witsafe to thinke that as you haue but the outwarde shadow of the body afore you, so my inward minde wischeth, that the body it selfe wer oftener in your presence; howbeit bicause bothe my so beinge I thinke coule do your Maiestie litel pleasure thogh my selfe great good, and againe bicause I se as yet not the time agreing therũto, I shal lerne to folow this sainge of Orace, Feras non culpes quod vitari non potest. And thus I wil (troblinge your Maiestie I fere) ende with my most humble thankes, beseechinge God longe to preserue you to his honour, to your cofort, to the realmes profit, and to my joy. From Hatfild this 1 day of May.

Your Maiesties most humbly Sister and Seruante.

ELIZABETH.

But more to be praised than her poetry, is the encouragement she gave to the design of printing in English the large folio edition of the Holy Scriptures, known as "The Bishop's Bible." This was the best translation of the sacred book which had then appeared. It was printed in 1568, and the version, made by order of king James I., differs little from the Bible used by Elizabeth.

That she did not conform her own spirit to the Gospel requirements, but allowed pride, vanity, a violent temper, and selfishness, frequently to obscure her many great qualities, is to be regretted; but, compared with the kings her successors, she rises so high above their standard of character, that we almost forget to record her faults. To quote the remarks of a learned historian,—"The page of history has seldom to record a reign more honourable to the intellect and capacity of the person presiding over it, than that of Elizabeth of England."

ELIZABETH OF FRANCE,

DAUGHTER of Henry II. and of Catharine de Medicis, was born at Fontainebleau, in 1545. She was the destined wife of Edward VI. of England; but the marriage was prevented by his premature death. Elizabeth was then betrothed to Don Carlos, Infant of Spain; and though they were mutually attached to each other, she was compelled, in spite of her repugnance, to marry his father, Philip II., who became a widower by the death of his wife Mary. Don Carlos never forgave this injury; and having expressed his sentiments too freely, was murdered, probably by the command of his father, who was jealous of him. Elizabeth was deeply affected by the fate of Don Carlos; she died, in child-bed, ten weeks after him, at the age of twenty-two. She left two daughters.

ELIZABETH OF AUSTRIA,

DAUGHTER of the emperor Maximilian II., and wife of Charles IX., king of France, was married at Mézieres, Nov. 26th, 1570. She was one of the most beautiful women of her time; but her virtue even surpassed her beauty. The jealousy of the queen-mother, Catharine de Medicis, and the influence she possessed over the mind of her son, prevented Elizabeth from having any share in the events that occurred in the tumultuous reign of Charles IX.

The deplorable massacre of St. Bartholomew affected her extremely; though she was not informed of it till the morning, lest her opposition should influence the king.

She was gentle and patient, and devoted herself entirely to domestic concerns. Warmly attached to the king, during his illness, she spent all the time, when she was not attending on him, in prayers for his recovery. Thus she always preserved his affection and esteem; and he often said, that he might boast of having the most discreet and virtuous wife, not only in all France, or in all Europe, but in the whole world.

Elizabeth wrote two books: one "On the Word of God;" the other, "On the principal events that happened during her residence in France." After the death of the king, her husband, she retired to Vienna, where she died, in 1592, at the age of thirty-eight, in a convent of her own foundation.

ELIZABETH, CHARLOTTE,

DUCHESS of Orleans, only daughter of the elector Charles Louis, of the Palatinate, was born at Heidelberg in 1652. She was a princess of distinguished talents and character, and lived half a century in the court of Louis XIV. without changing her German habits for French manners. Educated with the greatest care, at the court of her aunt, afterwards the electress Sophia of Hanover, at the age of nineteen, she married duke Philip of Orleans, from reasons of state policy. She was without personal charms, but her understanding was strong, and her character unaffected; and she was characterized by liveliness and wit. It is to be regretted that she exercised no more influence on the education of her children. Her second son was afterwards known as regent. Madame de Maintenon was her implacable enemy; but Louis XIV. was attracted by her integrity and frankness, her vivacity and wit. She often attended him to the chase. She preserved the highest respect for the literary men of Germany, particularly for Leibnitz, whose correspondence with the French literati she promoted. She died at St. Cloud in 1722. She has described herself and her situation with a natural humour, perfectly original, in her German letters, which form an interesting addition to the accounts of the court of Louis XIV. The most valuable of her letters are contained in the "Life and Character of the Duchess Elizabeth Charlotte of Orleans," by Professor Schütz, Leipzig, 1820.

ELIZABETH, PHILIPPINE MARIE HÉLÈNE, OF FRANCE, MADAME,

SISTER of Louis XVI., was born at Versailles, May 23d, 1764, and perished by the guillotine, May 10th, 1794. She was the youngest child of the dauphin Louis and his second wife, Josephine of Saxony, who died when Elizabeth was but three years old. She received an excellent education, and her acquirements were considerable. Her proposed union with the duke of Aosta, Infant of Spain, second son of the king of the Two Sicilies, was never concluded. When the private establishment of Elizabeth was fixed, she received 25,000 francs annually for the purchase of diamonds; but she requested that this sum should be paid for six years to a young favourite, whose poverty prevented her marriage. The revolution destroyed her happiness; but, during all its scenes of terror, she devoted herself to her brother the king and his family. She attended him everywhere, and often inspired him with firmness. When mistaken for the queen, June 20th, 1792, the cry was raised, "Down with the Austrian woman!" and the mob were about to kill her. An officer of the guard corrected the mistake, when she said calmly, "Why undeceive them? You might have spared them a greater crime."

She was confined with the royal family in the Temple, where she devoted herself to her fellow-prisoners. On the evening of May 9th, 1794, Elizabeth was led from the Temple to the Conciergerie, and tried for carrying on a correspondence with her brother. When asked her name and rank before the revolutionary tribunal, May 10th, she replied with dignity, "I am Elizabeth of France, the aunt of your king." This bold answer filled the judges with astonishment. Twenty-four others were sentenced with her, and she had to witness the execution of them all. She met death calmly, without uttering a single complaint against her judges.

Though not beautiful, Elizabeth was very attractive and lovely. She was modest and timid in prosperity, but calm and courageous in adversity. Her character was spotless.

ELIZABETH CHRISTINA,

WIFE of Frederic II. of Prussia, princess of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel, was born in 1715, at Brunswick; married in 1733; and died in 1797. Being compelled to this marriage, Frederic lived separate from her during his whole life. But on his ascending the throne in 1740, he gave her proofs of his esteem, and on his death ordered her revenue of 40,000 crowns to be increased to 50,000; "for," said he, "during my whole reign she has never given me the slightest cause of dissatisfaction." Half of her income she appropriated to benevolent purposes. She translated several German works into French; and wrote in French, "La Sage Révolution;" "Méditation à l'Occasion du Renouveau de l'Année, sur les Soins que le Providence a pour les Humains, &c.;" "Réflexions pour tous les Jours de la Semaine;" "Réflexions sur l'Etat des Affaires, publiques en 1778, adressées aux Personnes craentives."

ELIZABETH PETROWNA,

THE second daughter of czar Peter the Great, was placed on the throne of Russia by the revolution of 1741. She was born in 1709, and was extremely beautiful. This, as well as her exalted rank and large dowry, occasioned her several offers; but she refused them all, and died unmarried. During the life of her father, Peter I., negotiations commenced for her marriage with Louis XV., but were not adopted by the court of France. By the will of Catharine, Elizabeth was betrothed to Charles Augustus, bishop of Lubeck, duke of Sleswick and Holstein, and brother to the king of Sweden; but he died before the completion of the ceremony. In the reign of Peter II. she was demanded by Charles, margrave of Anspach; in 1741, by the Persian tyrant Kouli Khan; and, at the time of the revolution, the regent Ann endeavoured to force her to espouse prince Louis of Brunswick, for whom she had a settled aversion. From the period of her accession she renounced all thoughts of marriage, and adopted her nephew Peter. Her dislike to marriage did not proceed from any aversion to the other sex; for she would frequently own that she was never happy but when she was in love. The same warmth of temper carried her to extremes of devotion; and she was scrupulously exact in her annual confessions, expressed the utmost contrition for her numerous transgressions, and adhered to the minutest ceremonies and ordinances of the church.

She is generally styled the humane Elizabeth, as she made a vow upon her accession to inflict no capital punishments during her reign; and is reported to have shed tears upon the news of every victory gained by her troops, from the reflection that it could not have been obtained without great bloodshed. But, although no criminal was formally executed in public, yet the state prisons were filled with wretched sufferers, many of whom, unheard of and unknown, perished in damp and unwholesome dungeons. The state inquisition, or secret committee, appointed to judge persons suspected of high treason, had constant occupation during her reign; many on the slightest suspicion were secretly tortured, and many expired under the knout. But the transaction that reflects the deepest disgrace on her reign was the public punishment of two ladies of rank, the countesses Bestuchef and Sapookin, who each received fifty strokes of the knout in the open square of St. Petersburg; their tongues were then cut out, and they were banished to Siberia. Madame Sapookin, who was thought the most beautiful woman in Russia, was accused of carrying on a secret correspondence with the French ambassador; but her real crime was, her having commented too freely on the amours of the empress.

Elizabeth died on the 25th of December, 1761, in the twenty-first year of her reign, and the 53d of her age.

During the reign of Elizabeth, Ivan, grandson of Peter the Great, and rightful heir to the throne of Russia, was kept by her in strict confinement.

ELSTOB, ELIZABETH,

SISTER of William Elstob, and famous for her skill in the Saxon language, was born in 1683. Her mother, to whom she owed the rudiments of her extraordinary education, dying when she was but eight years old, her guardians discouraged her progress in literature, as improper for her sex; and, after her brother's death, she met with so little patronage, that she retired to Evesham, in Worcestershire, where she with difficulty subsisted by keeping a small school.

Three letters of hers to the lord treasurer of Oxford are extant among the Harleian MSS., from which it appears that he obtained for her the queen's bounty towards printing the Saxon homilies; but, after the death of this queen, (Caroline, wife of George II.,) she was so low in her finances, as to be forced, though a mistress of nine languages, to become a governess. For this purpose she was taken into the family of the duchess-dowager of Portland, in 1739; and continued there till she died, May 30th, 1756.

The homily of "St. Gregory's Day," published by her brother, has her English translation, besides his Latin one. She appears to have written the preface too, in which she answers the objections made to women's learning, by producing "that glory of her sex," as she calls her, Mrs. Anna Maria à Shurman. In 1715 she published a "Saxon Grammar." Had her talents been kindly encouraged, she would, probably, have equalled Madame Dacier.

ENGLISH, HESTER,

A FRENCHWOMAN by extraction, was eminent for her fine chirography in the time of Queen Elizabeth and James I. Many of her performances are still extant, both in public libraries and in the hands of individuals. She was thought the most exquisite scribe of her age. She married, at the age of forty, Mr. Bartholomew Kello, a North Briton, and had a son, who was educated at Oxford, and was minister of Speckshall, in Suffolk.

ENNETIERES, MARIE D',

A LEARNED lady of Tournay, who wrote many works, particularly an epistle against Turks, Jews, Lutherans, &c., printed in 1539.

EPINAY, LOUISE D',

CELEBRATED for her connexion with Rousseau, was the daughter of M. Sardieu Desclavelles, who lost his life in Flanders, in the service of Louis XV., and left his family in moderate circumstances. She married M. Delalive de Bellegarde, who received the office of farmer-general. The extravagance of M. Delalive soon disturbed their happiness, and his indifference to the conduct of his wife, was equalled by his own dissolute life, and no doubt influenced hers. She gathered around her a distinguished circle, which though neither brilliant nor renowned, was free and natural. Here the man of learning consented to doff his philosophical armour, through which posterity has found it so difficult to discern his real features; and here, authors, artists, and men and women of the world, met without restraint. Possessed of judgment and penetration, Madame d'Epinaÿ had neither originality nor imagination. Her mind was of that plastic order which led her to yield to the opinions of those in whose intimacy she lived; and she never attempted to exercise over her circle, a control for which her good sense told her she was little adapted. Hume, Diderot, D'Holbach, and Grimm, were habitués of her society. It is to her connexion with Rousseau, however, that she owes the interest attached to her name, and the attention she excited in her own time. The details of their intimacy and quarrel for some time occupied all Paris. Madame d'Epinaÿ was constantly engaged in some literary labour. In 1783, she wrote "Les Conversations d'Emilie," which obtained the prize offered by Monthieu for useful works of that kind, in preference to the "Adèle et Théodore" of Madame de Genlis. She also wrote "Lettres à mon Fils," and "Mes Moments Heureux." An abridgment of her letters and correspondence, showing her relations with Duclos, Rousseau, Grimm, Holbach, Lambert, &c., appeared in Paris, in 1818. Madame d'Epinaÿ died in 1783.

ERAUSO, CATALINA DE,

THE Monja Alferéz, or Nun-Lieutenant. More famous women have lived than this, but a more extraordinary one has never been recorded. Her career was one of singular adventure, of wild passions, of unsparing cruelty, of heroic bravery; the few virtues which palliate her vices and savage conduct are such as are found to vindicate the dormant element in the breasts of brigands and pirates. And it is not the least singular circumstance connected with such a history, that it has been written down, detailed, and powerfully described by the heroine herself, in a style wonderfully vigorous, clear, and in pure and classic Spanish.

She was born in the city of Sebastian, in 1585, daughter of Don Miguel de Erauso. At that period, when families were numerous it was the custom to dispose of the girls by putting them into the church. Such was the destiny of Donna Catalina. At the age of four years she was sent to her aunt, prioress of a convent of Dominicans. She remained there till the age of fifteen. Rebellious fancies had frequently arisen in her mind: she had entered her noviciate, and as the fatal day for her profession approached, her desire for liberty increased. Being sent one day by her aunt into the parlour of that lady for a book, she saw the keys of the convent hanging on a nail. In one moment her resolution was taken; the nuns were all assembled in the choir for the matin service; she begged permission to go to bed, complaining of indisposition; this was granted her. We give the sequel in her own words:

"I went out of the choir, took a light, went to the cell of my aunt, took scissors, needle and thread, and a little money. I went out of the convent; I found myself in the street, without knowing where to go; that was no matter; all I wanted was liberty. I ran without stopping, till I reached a grove of chestnuts."

Such was her escape. She remained in that wood three days, subsisting on roots and wild fruits. She made herself male garments out of her petticoats, cut her hair, and started forth in the character of man. After going through various scenes in Spain; meeting her own father in search of her; acting as page, clerk, servant—always adroit, always able to serve herself with expedients—she joined an expedition to the New World. There she entered the army, and distinguished herself by the most daring actions. She adopted different names, at different periods; but the most noted one, that which she bore after being made lieutenant, was Alonzo Dias. She gained several battles. It seems that her sense and judgment in council were not inferior to her redoubtable prowess in the field. In the intervals of her military duty, she connected herself with the most desperate and vicious beings to be met with. Gambling, stabbing, robbing, were her pastimes. A curious caprice, which she diverted herself with not unfrequently, was to gain the affection of some young lady, by every art and assiduity, and when all was ready for the marriage, to disappear. It would be impossible, in this sketch, to detail her numerous homicides and fierce anger; but one may be alluded to from its consequences. Becoming enraged, at a gambling-house, with a man of consequence, of Chili, she attacked him, and savagely killed him. She was obliged to take the refuge of a sanctuary; but as the friends of the murdered person were of rank and power, her retreat was carefully guarded, and after remaining there eight months, she felt the necessity of escaping into another government. The only way to effect this was by traversing the icy deserts of the Andes. "In this attempt I may find death," said she; "by remaining here I shall certainly find it." At the outset she met three outlaws, who, like herself, were fugitives from justice. These banded themselves by necessity; fatigue and hunger were their first difficulties. Successively they killed their horses, when all other food was spent; but soon advancing into higher regions of the mountain, the cold became intense and biting. Still Catalina cheered on her companions, infused her own courage, and sustained their efforts to drag on, when one of them uttered a cheerful cry—help, aid dawned! Two men were standing at a little distance; the wretched creature tried to spring forward; he fell on a heap of snow. Catalina followed his indication; alas! horror and misery—the two men were unfortunate beings, dead, frozen stiff, with a ghastly look of anguish stamped on their frightful faces! Even Catalina was for an instant daunted. She turned to the man who had first seen them—he was dead! She felt it was no time to pause, but urging on her remaining companions, sought a new impetus for exertion in her very despair. The cold became more and more bitter; still she stopped not. She saw her companions sink, one by one; she had no time to mourn them—recommending herself to the Virgin, she went on. The temperature became milder; at last she reached Tucuman, where she met with the utmost kindness and hospitality. She soon resumed her wild military life, always involving herself in quarrels.

On one occasion she was condemned to be hung, and actually taken to the gallows. Even there no feminine tremors discomposed her firmness. The executioner was awkward in placing the cord.

"Put it on right, or let me alone," said she; "this priest will do it a great deal better than you!"

A pardon arrived in the mean time; for her gallant actions in battle, and real services, procured for her many protectors. She traversed every part of the Spanish countries, and acquitted herself in the most able manner of the duties of a sailor, soldier, and even lawyer; in every field for enterprise she appeared, and always in a distinguished manner; but all her merits as an able man were tarnished by a mad love for rapine, cruelty, gaming, and every vice save one, to which the soldiers of that epoch and country abandoned themselves. It is to be observed that she had carefully guarded the knowledge of her sex from everybody until an exigency occurred, when she disclosed her real condition. Her many deeds of violence provoked pursuit, and at last she was once more reduced to take refuge in a church at Guamango, in Peru; the bishop, a saintly person, considered it his duty to exhort the criminal; his tender and searching admonitions had their effect on the iron-hearted lieutenant. She sank on her knees, and said, "Father, I am a woman!" Then followed a complete confession.

The bishop was excited by this strange story; he pitied the unfortunate young woman, only thirty-five years of age, who, by a dark fatality, had incurred such reprobation; he thought he perceived signs of compunction; these he fostered, and being encouraged by the result, obtained her pardon, and even a permission to return to Spain, without dread of ecclesiastic punishment. One cause of hope for her remained, she had preserved her chastity; and thus, though stained with many crimes, she was not abandoned to vice. Her will was strong, and her passions often violent; but she was not sensual or selfish. Had she been properly educated, and allowed to live in society, she would probably have proved a woman of superior powers of mind, and been active in good works as she was in evil, when driven to abandon her country and put off the semblance of her own sex.

Donna Catalina set sail and arrived at Cadiz in 1624. Already her fame had preceded her, and during her travels through Spain and Italy she was looked upon as an object of curiosity. The pope, Urban VIII., gave her permission to retain for life her male attire. The period of her death is unknown; but some documents which have been preserved in a convent at Vera Cruz testify that she devoted the remainder of her life to commerce, under the name of Antonio de Erauso. The celebrated Spanish painter, Pacheco, took her portrait from life, when she was at Seville. From the original, still preserved, is taken the print affixed to this sketch.

ERDMUTHE, SOPHIA, MARGRAVINE,

Of Baireuth, was born February 15th, 1644. True devotional feelings animated her mind already when quite a child, and these were guided by an intellect which belonged only to riper years. When she was in her tenth year she wrote a series of poetical and prose papers, and a volume to which she gave the title of "Christian Closet for the Heart." Her teacher, the celebrated Dr. Weber, discovered them accidentally in her desk, and was so much struck with their beauty and pious tendency, that he prevailed upon her parents to have them published; and he accompanied them with a preface. Many of the hymns which she wrote at that age are still incorporated in the German books, though few know at the present time that they were composed by so young a child. In 1662, on the 19th of October, she married the margrave Christian Ernst of Baireuth, to whom she became a loving wife and able coadjutor in deeds of charity and piety; but she would never consent to take part in his government affairs. She established the first Magdalene house of refuge in that part of Germany. Much of her time was devoted to writing. One of her best works was published in 1666, "A Treatise on the Age of the World, and a Consideration of the States of the Roman Empire and their Condition." It is replete with theological, geographical, historical, and genealogical information. She died in the year 1670, on the 12th of June, and was buried in the court chapel which she had just caused to be built

ERNECOURT, BARBARA OF,

BETTER known as the Lady of St. Balmont, a second Joan of Arc, was born in the year 1609, at the castle of Newville, between Bar and Verdun. From the earliest childhood she trained herself to the use of arms, and in all knightly accomplishments. She married, when quite young, the lord of Balmont, who met and fell in love with her while hunting, and whom she frequently accompanied in the chase. During the "thirty years' war" in Germany, she always took command of her husband's castle, while he accompanied the duke of Lothringen to the field. This brave woman repulsed the enemy frequently, and on several occasions made sorties and succeeded in capturing both men and baggage. When peace was restored, she laid aside the sword and took up the pen, which she wielded with equal skill. Her first work, "Les Jumeaux Martyrs," was published in 1651; several other works, of considerable merit, appeared afterwards. The death of her husband, to whom she was tenderly attached, made her resolve to retire from the world, and she entered a nunnery; but died, before taking the veil, May 22d, 1660, aged fifty-one.

ESCOBAR, MARINE D',

THE foundress of the "Reconciliation of St. Bridget," in Spain. She died in 1633.

ESSARS, CHARLOTTE DES,

COUNTESS of Romorentin, and daughter of lieutenant-general des Essars in Champagne, was a woman of great beauty. She was introduced, in 1590, to Henry IV. of France, by whom she had two children, afterwards legitimated. She next lived with Louis de Lorraine, cardinal de Guise, by whom she had a son called the chevalier de Romorentin; and she married, in 1630, marshal de l'Hopital. Her wishes to advance her son Romorentin by her intrigues proved fatal to her, as she fell under the resentment of the king and Richelieu, by whom she was thrown into prison, where she died in 1651.

ESTAMPES, ANNE, OF PISSELEU, DUCHESS OF,

WAS a beautiful woman, daughter of de Herèli. She accompanied, as maid of honour, Louise of Savoy, when she went, in 1526, to meet her son Francis I. of France, at Madrid; who no sooner saw her than he loved her. He attempted to cover her dishonour by marrying her to one of his followers, whom he created duke d'Estampes. In the last years of Francis, the duchess, to counteract the views of the dauphin and his mistress, Diana of Poitiers, entered into correspondence with Charles V., emperor of Germany; and by her perfidious communications, enabled him to surprise and take Eprenay and Chateau-Lierri, where the magazines of the French were deposited. Francis confided entirely in her, and she sent constant information to Charles, so that the ruin of the kingdom seemed inevitable; but the quarrel that arose between Charles V. and Henry VIII. of England saved France. After the death of Francis, the favourite retired to her country-seat, and was screened from the prosecution of her husband, who wished to punish her for adultery, by the interference of the reigning monarch. She died a protestant.

ESTE, ELEONORA D',

WAS descended from the most illustrious of Italian princely races—that of the sovereigns of Este, Modena, and Reggio. She was daughter of Hercules II., marquis of Este, and Renée, daughter of Louis XII., king of France, and was born in 1537. Endowed by fortune with an exalted station, by nature with extraordinary beauty, fine taste and intellect, Eleonora drew the admiration of all, and seemed destined to a life whose tissue was woven in golden threads; but these very qualities, while they added lustre to her station, led to a true romance, the melancholy course of which clouded not only her own life, but that of one of the greatest geniuses that has ever shone and suffered.

Tasso was twenty-one years old when he appeared at the court of Alphonso of Este. He had just given to the world his "Jerusalem Delivered," and a well-founded enthusiasm for the poet pervaded all Italy. He was endowed with every pleasing quality—a handsome countenance, winning address, a captivating voice in speaking, and, what all poets do not possess, most extraordinary bravery. An indiscreet remark having been made by a certain cavalier upon his devotion to the princess Eleonora, he challenged the offender, who, with three brothers to aid him, basely attacked the bard. Tasso valiantly combated the whole four, until persons interfered to put an end to the duel. The duke Alphonso felt his pride offended at the cause of this rencontre; it is true, he punished the four cowardly brothers, but at the same time he sent Tasso into exile, where he remained until the duke was persuaded to recall him. After this time, Eleonora appears to have become cautious in her encouragement of the poet; but when we read the verses in which he speaks of her charms and his passion, who can wonder that a heart of any sensibility should be touched?

Eleonora was in her thirtieth year when Tasso was first introduced at her brother's court; a disparity of age—the poet being nine years her junior, which is certainly no argument against the passion she inspired. For a young man, at his first entrance into life, to fall in love ambitiously—with a woman older than himself, or with one who is, or ought to be, unattainable—is a common occurrence. Tasso was an admirer or beauty. Eleonora was exceedingly lovely; she had a transparent delicacy of complexion—a "Paleur, qui marque une ame tendre," as the lover thought. It is said that Tasso, being at a wedding of one of the Gonzago family, celebrated at the court of Este, blinded by his passion, impressed a kiss on the cheek of the princess Eleonora. The colour mounted to Alphonso's brow; but he turned coldly to his courtiers, and said, "What a great pity that the finest genius of the age has become suddenly mad!"

Upon this charge of madness, the prince caused Tasso to be shut up in the hospital of St. Anna. His long years of imprisonment, his sufferings, his laments, are known to everybody. In a few words, we will close the story of the unfortunate Eleonora. Obligated to witness the cruel punishment of her lover, and knowing the inflexible character of her brother, she fell into a slow fever; constantly receiving the tender complaints of the poet, whose pangs were daggers to her heart, she gradually sank into the grave. Solitary and melancholy, she dragged on the last days of her life; holding converse with no one, living on sad memories, languishing, and fading away. The doors of Tasso's prison were at length opened; but she was dead! Youth, love, fortune, all had vanished; fame, it is true, remained. The laurel-crown was placed on his brow at Rome, in the midst of a pompous festival. Could this recompense him for his wasted youth and his lost Eleonora? She died in 1581, about a year after Tasso's imprisonment.

ESTRADA, MARIA D',

WIFE of a soldier of Fernandez Cortez, followed her husband to Mexico, in 1519, where she fought by his side, and performed extraordinary exploits of valour, to the astonishment and admiration of all who beheld her.

ESTRÉES, GABRIELLE D', DUCHESS OF BEAUFORT,

THE mistress of Henry IV. of France, born about 1571, was the daughter of Antoine d'Estrées, a descendant of one of the noblest houses in Picardy, for a long time grand maître de l'artillerie, who distinguished himself in the defence of Noyon against the duke of Mayenne, for which Henry IV. made him governor of the Isle de France. Gabrielle was about twenty years of age when Henry first saw her, on a visit to Cœuvres castle; and her beauty immediately captivated him. Gabrielle, however, who was attached to the duke of Bellegarde, was at first little inclined to gratify the wishes of the king. But Henry still urged his suit, and often stole by the sentinels of his enemies, in the dress of a peasant, to see the object of his love. The heart of the lady was at length moved by such ardour and devotion. She became the mistress of the chivalric monarch, who never loved any other woman so passionately. To escape the severe scrutiny of her father, Henry married her to a nobleman named Damerval, of Liancourt; but, says Sully, il sut empêcher la consommation du mariage, and subsequently dissolved the marriage. Henry intended to raise Gabrielle to the throne as his lawful wife. For this purpose, he not only procured a divorce from Margaret of Valois, but also raised the county of Beaufort to a duchy, which he bestowed on Gabrielle, thus giving her a high rank at court. This design was strongly opposed by Sully, who often represented to the monarch the bad consequences of such a measure. Gabrielle, therefore, became his bitter enemy, and, instigated by the adversaries of the minister, she once so far forgot herself as to urge the king to discharge him. Henry's reply was, "By —, madam, if I must lose one of you, I would rather give up ten mistresses like you, than one servant like him." So ardent, however, was his passion for Gabrielle, that he once wrote to her in a moment of danger,—"If I am conquered, you know me too well to believe that I shall flee. My last thought shall be God's; my last but one, yours."

Notwithstanding the determination of the king, and the wishes of Gabrielle, their marriage never took place. Just before Easter, in 1599, when negotiations were already in train for the divorce of the king, she retired from court, by the advice of René Bénoit, the king's confessor, and went to Paris to spend the Passion-week. On Maundy Thursday, having eaten an orange after dinner, she was suddenly seized with convulsions, which distorted her beautiful countenance, and, on Saturday, she died in the most excruciating torments. Apoplexy, with convulsions, was the cause assigned for her death; but no one can doubt that she was poisoned. The king's grief for her loss was excessive; and, what is seldom the case, the royal mistress was universally lamented. Her amiable disposition, the gentleness of her character, and the modesty which prevented her from meddling with public affairs, won her general favour. She had three children by the king—Cæsar and Alexander, afterwards dukes of Vendôme, and a daughter, Catharine Henrietta, afterwards the wife of the duke of Elbeuf. Her biography, which appeared some years ago in France, is accompanied by an interesting correspondence between Gabrielle and her royal lover.

EUDOCIA, FEODOROWNA,

FIRST wife of Peter I., czar of Russia, was daughter of the boyar Feodor Lapookin. Peter married her in 1689, when he was only seventeen, and Alexis was born in 1690.

Peter had caused it to be proclaimed throughout his empire, that he intended to bestow his crown and his heart on the woman he judged most worthy. A hundred young girls were brought to Moscow, and his choice fell on Eudocia. But her joy was of short duration. Her opposition to Peter's reforms, and her remonstrances against his faithlessness, irritated him; and in 1696 she was divorced, compelled to assume the veil, and confined in a convent at Susdal. There she was said to have entered into a contract of marriage with general Glebof, by exchanging rings with him; but, though Glebof was afterwards tortured to the utmost extremity, he persisted in asserting his own and her innocence; and when the czar came to him and offered him pardon if he would confess, he spit in the czar's face, and told him that "he should disdain to speak to him, if it were not his desire to clear his mistress, who was as virtuous as any woman in the world."

Encouraged by the predictions of the archbishop of Rostof, who, from a dream, announced to her the death of Peter and her return to court, under the reign of her son Alexis, she reassumed the secular dress, and was publicly prayed for in the church of the convent, under the name of the empress Eudocia. Being brought to Moscow in 1718, and examined, she was, by her husband's order, scourged by two nuns, and imprisoned in the convent of Nova Ladoga, and allowed to see no one but the persons who brought her food, which she prepared herself; for she was allowed no servant, and but one cell. From thence she was removed to the fortress at Shlusselburgh. Being released on the accession of her grandson, Peter II., she repaired to Moscow, and was present at his coronation, as well as that of the empress Anne; and expired in the Devitza monastery, where she held her court, in 1731, in the fifty-ninth year of her age.

F.

FAINI, DIAMANTE,

Whose maiden name was Medaglia, one of the most noted Italian poets, was born in Roako, a village in the neighbourhood of Brescia. Her poetic talent developed itself while she was yet quite a child. When she reached her fifteenth year, she was well acquainted with the ancient languages, and had written several poems, which excited the admiration of the literary world. The academies of Unanimi in Italy, of Ardetti in Padua, and that of the Arcadi of Rome, were proud to inscribe her name among their members. But she was not only a poetess, — philosophy, mathematics, theology, and astronomy, all found in her a devoted admirer and a close student. She died the 13th of July, 1770, at Salo.

FALCONBERG, MARY,

THIRD daughter of Oliver Cromwell, and second wife of Thomas lord viscount Falconberg, was distinguished for her talents, her spirit, and her beauty. Bishop Burnet, who styles her “a wise and worthy woman,” adds, “that she was more likely to have maintained the post of protector than either of her brothers; according to an observation respecting her, that those who wore breeches deserved petticoats better; but if those in petticoats had been in breeches, they would have held faster.” After the deposition of Richard, of whose incapacity his sister was aware, she exerted herself in favour of Charles II., and is said to have greatly contributed towards the Restoration. It is certain that her husband was, by the committee of safety, sent to the Tower a short time before the return of Charles, in whose favour he held a distinguished place. Lady Falconberg was a member of the established church, and respected for her munificence and charity.

FANE, ELIZABETH,

AUTHOR of several pious meditations and proverbs in the English language, printed in London in 1550, was probably either the wife of Richard Fane, who married Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Stidolph, or of Sir Thomas Fane, who was engaged in Wyatt's rebellion in the reign of queen Mary. Her writings were entitled “Lady Elizabeth Fane's twenty-one Psalms, and one hundred and two Proverbs.”

FANSHAWE, ANN HARRISON, LADY,

THE eldest daughter of Sir John Harrison, of Balls, England, was born in London, March 25th, 1625. Her mother was Margaret Fanshawe, of an ancient and highly respectable family; and, what was of more importance to her daughter, she was an eminently pious as well as accomplished lady. So well did this careful mother instruct her eldest daughter, that when the former died, the latter, though only fifteen years of age, took charge of her father's house and family, and fulfilled all her duties in a manner highly exemplary.

Ann Harrison married, when about nineteen, Mr., afterwards Sir Richard Fanshawe, a relation of her mother's. He had been educated a lawyer, but not liking his profession, went abroad, with his wife, and was finally appointed secretary to the English ambassador at the Spanish court. Mr. Fanshawe was a loyal follower of the house of Stuart, true to the falling fortunes of Charles I., and the confidant and counsellor of Charles II., while he was striving to obtain the throne. During all the struggles and violence of those terrible times, Mrs. Fanshawe shared every danger and sympathized with every feeling of her dearly beloved husband. He was taken and imprisoned after the battle of Worcester, and during his imprisonment, she never failed to go secretly with a dark lantern, at four o'clock in the morning, to his window. She minded neither darkness nor storms, and often stood talking with him with her garments drenched in rain. Cromwell had a great respect for Sir Richard Fanshawe, and would have bought him into his service upon almost any terms.

Sir Richard Fanshawe was finally released, on a heavy bail, and they removed to Tankersly Park, Yorkshire, where the husband devoted himself to literary pursuits, which were also the taste of his wife. After the restoration, Sir Richard Fanshawe was in great favour at court, had a seat in parliament, was sent ambassador to Portugal and Spain; but in all these high stations the hearts of both husband and wife were centred in their domestic happiness. Sir Richard was recalled, unexpectedly, through some change of policy, and they were preparing to return, when he suddenly died. The queen of Spain was so moved by the desolation of the heart-broken widow, that she offered her a pension of thirty thousand ducats per annum, and a handsome provision for her children, if she would embrace the Catholic religion. Lady Fanshawe was deeply grateful for this kind interest, but could not accept any favour with such conditions. Her own language will best portray her feelings under this severe affliction. She thus writes in her journal:

“Oh! all powerful and good God, look down from heaven upon the most distressed wretch on earth. My glory and my guide, all my comfort in this life, is taken from me. See me staggering in my path, because I expected a temporal blessing as a reward for the great innocence and integrity of his whole life. Have pity on me, O Lord, and speak peace to my disquieted soul, now sinking under this great weight, which without thy support cannot sustain itself. See me, with five children, a distressed family, the temptation of the change of my religion, out of my country, away from my friends, without counsel, and without means to return with my sad family to England. Do with me, and for me, what thou pleasest; for I do wholly rely on thy promises to the widow and the fatherless; humbly beseeching thee that, when this mortal life is ended, I may be joined with the soul of my dear husband."

The body of Sir Richard Fanshawe was embalmed, and for several months his widow had it daily in her sight. She wished to accompany the remains to England, but could obtain no money from government; even the arrears due her husband were withheld by the ungrateful and profligate Charles II., who lavished upon his worthless minions and mistresses what was due his tried and suffering friends. At length Anne of Austria, widow of Philip IV., gave lady Fanshawe two thousand pistoles, saying with true feminine delicacy, "That the sum had been appropriated to purchasing a farewell present for Sir Richard, had he lived to depart from Spain." The mournful train reached England, October, 1666. The body was interred in the vault of St. Mary's chapel, Ware church, and Lady Fanshawe erected a handsome monument to her husband's memory. Their union of twenty-two years had been a pattern of conjugal truth and happiness; the widow continued as constant to the memory of the dear departed as she had been in her affection to him while he lived. Her whole aim and plan of life was to educate their children; and she wrote her own Memoir, "for her dear and only son." She survived her husband fourteen years, dying January, 1680, aged fifty-four.

Lady Fanshawe deserves to be honoured as the exemplar of what a good wife is and should be. Her interesting "Memoir" contains many instances of this; one, displaying what we mean by the obedience a true wife owes to her husband, we will give in her own words. Her husband was secretary to the prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II.

"And now I thought myself a perfect queen, and my husband so glorious a crown, that I more valued myself to be called by his name than born a princess, for I knew him very wise and very good, and his soul doted on me; upon which confidence I will tell you what happened. My Lady Rivers, a brave woman, and one that had suffered many thousand pounds' loss for the king, for whom I had a great reverence, and she a kinswoman's kindness for me, in discourse tacitly commended the knowledge of state affairs; she mentioned several women, who were very happy in a good understanding thereof, and said none of them was originally more capable than I. She said a post would arrive from Paris from the queen that night, and she should extremely like to know what news it brought; adding if I would ask my husband privately, he would tell me what he found in the packet, and I might tell her. I, that was young and innocent, and to that day had never in my mouth, 'What news?' now began to think there was more in enquiring into public affairs than I had thought of; and that being a fashionable thing it would make me more beloved of my husband than I already was, if that had been possible. When my husband returned home from the council, after receiving my welcome, he went with his hands full of papers into his study. I followed him; he turned hastily, and said, 'What wouldst thou have, my life?' I told him I heard the prince had received a packet from the queen, and I guessed he had it in his hand, and I desired to know what was in it. He smilingly replied, 'My love, I will immediately come to thee; pray thee go; for I am very busy.' When he came out of his closet, I revived my suit; he kissed me, and talked of other things. At supper I would eat nothing; he as usual sat by me, and drank often to me, which was his custom, and was full of discourse to company that was at table. Going to bed I asked him again, and said I could never believe he loved me, if he refused to tell me all he knew. He answered nothing, but stopped my mouth with kisses. I cried, and he went to sleep. Next morning very early, as his custom was, he called to rise, but began to discourse with me first, to which I made no reply; he rose, came on the other side of the bed, kissed me, drew the curtains softly, and went to court. When he came home to dinner, he presently came to me as was usual, and when I had him by the hand, I said, 'Thou dost not care to see me troubled;' to which he, taking me in his arms, answered, 'My dearest soul, nothing on earth can afflict me like that; when you asked me of my business, it was wholly out of my power to satisfy thee. My life, my fortune, shall be thine, and every thought of my heart, in which the trust I am in may not be revealed; but my honour is my own, which I cannot preserve, if I communicate the prince's affairs. I pray thee with this answer rest satisfied.'

"So great was his reason and goodness, that upon consideration it made my folly appear to me so vile, that from that day until the day of his death, I never thought fit to ask him any business, except what he communicated freely to me in order to his estate or family."

FARREN, MISS,

A HIGHLY accomplished actress, and an excellent and beautiful woman, was born in 1759. Her father was a surgeon at Cork, in Ireland, but his habits were so irregular that his family were often in great want. Miss Farren was driven to exertions for her own support, and made her first appearance at Liverpool in 1773. She was very well received. In 1777 she went to London, where she met with much applause. She excelled principally in high comedy. April 7th, 1797, Miss Farren retired from the stage; and in May she married the earl of Derby, who had been long attached to her, but who had been unable to offer his hand during the life of the countess of Derby, from whom he had long been separated. The new countess was esteemed and respected by all who knew her; and died, greatly regretted, April 23d, 1829.

FARNESE, FRANCESCA,

COMMONLY called Sister Francesca, was born at Rome. She was a nun, and founded a convent. Her poems are united to those of her sister, also a nun, called Sister Isabella. She was learned in her native literature, in Latin, and in theology. She has left many sacred poems of a very chaste and correct style. Before taking vows she wrote a romance and much miscellaneous poetry, which, under a mistaken sense of duty, she burned. She died in 1651.

FAUGERE, MISS,

WAS born in the year 1709, in the neighbourhood of Avignon. She was compelled by her parents to take the veil; but, with an utter repugnance to the life of a nun, she strained every nerve to free herself from the thralldom imposed upon her. Ten years elapsed, however, before her efforts were crowned with success, when she received a papal permission to leave the sisterhood. But even then she was looked upon by her family as having disgraced herself and them. She, however, removed to Paris, and from there to London. Wholly dependent upon her literary labours, she was compelled to write too much, and her writings are of very unequal merit. The best of her works are "Le Triumphe de l'Amitié," published in 1751; "Abassai, Histoire Orientale," in 1753; "Contes du Serail," in 1753; and "Les Zelindiens," in 1758. She also wrote "Dialogues Moraux et Amusans," published in 1777.

FAUGERES, MARGARETTA V.,

AN American lady, born in 1777, the daughter of Anne Elizabeth Bleeker, was distinguished for her literary accomplishments. Her youth was spent in the country; but she afterwards married and lived in New York. Many of her poetical pieces were published in the periodicals of the day, and much admired. She also wrote the tragedy of "Belisarius" and some other works. By the profligacy of her husband, Peter Faugeres, a physician, she was reduced to extreme poverty; and after his death was obliged to resort to teaching for support. Her fine talents were wasted in her struggles with misfortune, and she never accomplished what her genius promised. She died in 1801.

FAVART, MARIE JUSTINE BENOITE, MADAME,

WAS a celebrated French actress, whose maiden name was du Roncerai. She was always a great favourite with the public, in comedies, comic operas, and other lively pieces. Beloved among her friends for her sensibility, gentleness, and generosity of character, she was also a favourite with the public for her inexhaustible vivacity. She was born at Avignon in 1727, and died at Paris in 1772.

FAYETTE, LOUISE DE LA,

WAS celebrated for her friendship for Louis XIII., and for her self-denial in that dangerous situation. She was of a noble family, and a favourite maid of honour to the queen, Anne of Austria. The king, enslaved by Richelieu, sought consolation in the society of this lady, who took a sincere interest in his welfare, and was instrumental in reconciling him to his queen. When she found her regard for the king growing more tender than prudence allowed, she retired to a convent and took the veil. The king continued to visit her till the intrigues of Richelieu interrupted their friendship. The queen urged her return to court, but she rejected all temptations, and continued in her convent, with the universal esteem of France.

FAYETTE, MARIE MADELEINE, COUNTESS DE,

DAUGHTER of Aymar de la Vergne, marechal-de-camp, and governor of Havre-de-Grace, was more distinguished by her wit and literary productions than by her family. She married the Count de Fayette, in 1655, and removing to Paris, cultivated letters and the fine arts. Her house was the rendezvous for the most distinguished literati in Paris, especially the Duke de la Rochefoucault, Huet, Menage, La Fontaine, and Legrais. The last, when obliged to leave the house of Madame de Montpensier, found an honourable retreat with her. Madame Sévigné, who knew her well, speaks of her as an amiable and estimable lady. Her principal works are the three romances, "Zaide," "La Princesse de Cleves," and "La Princesse de Montpensier;" which were the first romances that exhibited the manners of fashionable life in an easy and natural manner. She also wrote "Memoires de la cour de France pour les années, 1688 et 1689," "Histoire d'Henriette d'Angleterre," and "Divers portraits de quelques personnes de la cour." All these works are still esteemed. She also wrote memoirs of other persons, which were not published, and were lost by her son, the Abbé de la Fayette. She understood Latin, which she learned in a very short time. Her works are written in an easy and elegant style, which was, at that time, unequalled. We will insert one of her letters, in the original, as a specimen of the French prose of that period, and the style of epistolary composition among the best educated. Madame de la Fayette died at Paris, in 1693.

LETTRE A MADAME DE SEVIGNÉ.

Hé bien, hé bien, ma belle, qu'avez-vous à crier comme un aigle? Je vous mande que vous attendiez à juger de moi quand vous serez ici; qu'y a-t-il de si terrible à ces paroles? mes journées sont remplies. Il est vrai que Bayard est ici, et qu'il fait mes affaires; mais quand il a couru tout le jour pour mon service, écrirai-je? encore faut-il lui parler? quand j'ai couru, moi, et que je reviens, je trouve M. de la Rochefoucault, que je n'ai point vu de tout le jour; écrirai-je? M. de la Rochefoucault et Gourville sont ici; écrirai-je? mais quand ils sont sortis? ah! quand ils sont sortis, il est onze heures, et je sors, moi. Je couche chez nos voisins à cause qu'on bâtit devant nos fenêtres. Mais l'après-dînée? j'ai mal à la tête; mais le matin, j'y ai mal encore, et je prends des bouillons d'herbes qui m'enivrent. Vous êtes en Provence, ma belle; vos heures sont libres, et votre tête encore plus: le goût d'écrire vous dure encore pour tout le monde; il m'est passé pour tout le monde; et si j'avais un amant qui voulût de mes lettres tous les matins, je romprais avec lui. Ne mesurez donc point notre amitié sur l'écriture; je vous aimerai autant, en ne vous écrivant qu'une page en un mois, que vous en m'en écrivant dix en huit jours. Quand je suis à Saint-Maur, je puis écrire, parce que j'ai plus de tête et de loisir; mais je n'ai pas celui d'y être: je n'y ai passé que huit jours cette année. Paris me tue. Adieu, ma très-chère; votre défiance seule compose votre unique défaut, et la seule chose qui peut me déplaire en vous. M. de la Rochefoucault vous écrira.

FEDELE, CASSANDRA,

OF Venice, born 1465. This noted lady was well acquainted with Greek, Latin, and with history. Julius II., Leo X., Louis XIII., and Ferdinand of Arragon, invited her to their courts; but her own republic would not allow her departure. Her death, which happened in 1558, was commemorated by the tributary praises of the literati of that day. Poliziano eulogizes her in the highest terms. There remain some letters and Latin orations of her composition.

FEDOROWNA, MARIA,

EMPERESS of the unfortunate Paul of Russia, and mother of the emperors Alexander and Nicholas, was born princess of Wurtemberg, in 1759. Selected by Catharine II. as bride for the heir to the throne, her early married life was one of mortification and insignificance. The capricious temper and ill-regulated character of Paul, vented themselves frequently in harsh measures towards this exemplary woman. Her sons, however, unceasingly manifested towards her the affection and duty her devotion to their childhood had so well merited. After the death of Paul, in 1801, she was released from the trammels in which her youth had been spent. From that epoch till the day of her death, she was occupied in attention to the poor and suffering. The number of magnificent institutions for the benefit of the unfortunate and afflicted, which she founded and directed, is really wonderful. She was the first person to introduce into Russia an attempt to instruct the deaf and dumb, employing for that purpose a pupil of the Abbé Sicard. She died in 1828.

FERGUSON, ELIZABETH GRÆME,

DAUGHTER of Dr. Thomas Græme, who came from Scotland to America, was born in Philadelphia, in 1739. She was very carefully educated, and showed uncommon abilities. While still young, she translated Fenelon's Telemachus into English verse; she also wrote several smaller poems, which, together with her essays and some of her letters, have been published. She married Mr. Hugh Henry Ferguson; but on the breaking out of the Revolution, in 1775, as he adhered to the British government, and she was faithful to her country, they separated, and never lived together again. Mrs. Ferguson died in 1801.

FERNANDEZ, MARIA MADDALENA MORELLI,

WON the admiration of all Italy as an improvisatrice. The talent of improvising in poetry seems to be almost exclusively allotted to the Italians, among whom the structure of their verse, and the conventional, ever-recurring rhymes, render it an easier matter to employ this frame-work to thought, than would be possible under a different system of prosody. If, however, the powers of ordinary improvisatori, from these reasons, are not to be overvalued,—when thought, imagery, feeling, passion, harmony of numbers, flow spontaneously, the admiration and wonder they excite must be unbounded, as these qualities are independent of any rhythm, and would command praise and enthusiasm, even when these effusions were produced upon study, and corrected efforts.

Among the improvisatori whose fame has been more than ephemeral, perhaps the first was Maria Morelli. She was born of noble parents, in the city of Pistoja, in the year 1740. From her earliest years she manifested a quick ear for harmony, and a talent for improvisation. This talent was heightened by an excellent education; her mind was stored with history and science, and her imagination improved by assiduous reading of the best poets. Her parents, proud of her genius, took her to Rome, to exhibit her powers to the academy of "Arcadia." Gifted with personal beauty and grace, she received the highest applause, and was made a member of that society, under the name of Corilla Olympia, by which she was afterwards universally designated. At Naples she was received with enthusiasm, and there captivated a young Sicilian gentleman, named Fernandez, to whom she was united in marriage. Her fame soon resounded throughout Europe, and she was noticed by the most illustrious persons of the age. The emperor Joseph II. visited her at Naples; and pope Clement XIV. directed to her an honourable brief, by which he permitted her to read forbidden books. She published some poems, an epic poem dedicated to the empress of Russia, an epistle to Metastasio, and some others. In 1776, she went through the ordeal of a trial of her poetic powers, for three days, at Rome, before a vast concourse of literary and noble personages. Some of the subjects were, Moral Philosophy, Revealed Religion, Physics, Metaphysics, Heroic Poetry, Harmony, Pastoral Poetry, &c. These were handed to her in order, in sealed notes, and she acquitted herself in every case so as to disarm criticism. She then was solemnly crowned with a laurel wreath. A minute description of this ceremony, which was accompanied with wonderful pomp and pageantry, has been written by two literary abbés, and published by the celebrated Bodoni, in 1779. Our poetess, after passing her youth amidst the homage of the great and powerful, retired upon her laurels to Florence, where she lived tranquilly to the age of sixty. She died in 1800.

FERRIOL, MADAME DE,

Was the sister of Madame de Tencin; handsome and intriguing, like her sister, but without her wit and suppleness. She was early married to M. de Ferriol, a magistrate, who cared little about his wife, and philosophically permitted her to have a long and open liason with the Maréchal d'Uxelles. This connexion with a minister, added to Madame de Ferriol's power. Her house was frequented by all those who had favours to ask; every class, and every party, were represented in her society.

Voltaire and Bolingbroke formed a part of her circle. As long as the maréchal continued constant, his handsome mistress remained in vogue; but his love cooled with age and the decline of her charms, and Madame de Ferriol, who had never been very witty, grew ill-tempered and morose with years. The world would no doubt have become indifferent and estranged, like the maréchal, had it not been for the attractions of a young and lovely Circassian slave, whom she had brought up, and who resided beneath her roof.

The origin of the connexion between Mademoiselle Aïssé and her protectress, was singular and romantic. She was purchased, when a child, in the slave-market of Constantinople, by Monsieur de Ferriol's elder brother. Struck by her singular beauty, he questioned her owner, and found that she was the daughter of a Circassian prince, who had been massacred, with all his people. M. de Ferriol confided the child to the care of his sister-in-law, and returned to Constantinople, where he resided as ambassador until the year 1711. Aïssé was kindly treated by Madame de Ferriol, and brought up on an equality with her two sons. Aïssé grew up in surpassing loveliness, and attracted considerable attention in the circle of Madame de Ferriol. Her beauty was not her only attraction; she possessed the most noble and amiable qualities of the heart. She was in all the bloom and freshness of her beauty, when M. de Ferriol returned to France. He was on the verge of seventy; his protégée barely seventeen. He endeavoured, nevertheless, to inspire her with a more tender feeling than gratitude; and when he failed, he asserted his right over her with oriental despotism. To escape this persecution, Aïssé appealed to her adopted brother, whose influence convinced her ancient admirer of the uselessness of his suit. M. de Ferriol consented to be reasonable, and thenceforward received from Aïssé all she could give—the affection of a daughter. She had many admirers; among them the regent, who urged his suit in explicit language. Stung and astonished by her coldness, he made her the most brilliant offers, all of which Aïssé indignantly refused.

Madame de Ferriol, to whom it was inconceivable that a young girl should resist the wishes of the first prince of the blood, and regent of the kingdom, combated her arguments, and called her moral scruples folly, exhorting her to do as all around her did. Unlike the noble and free-born ladies of France, the Circassian slave, bought in the market of Constantinople, inexorably refused to sell herself for gold or power. When the persecution she endured became intolerable, the young girl threw herself at the feet of her protectress, declaring, if the subject was urged again, she would seek refuge in a convent. Alarmed at a threat which would have deprived her society of its greatest attraction, Madame de Ferriol was compelled to desist.

Soon after this, an ardent attachment sprung up between Mademoiselle Aïssé and the Chevalier d'Aydie, a young knight of St. John, represented as a true hero of romance. Bound by his vows to a life of celibacy, their love was madness; and it was then, in the struggle between conscience and passion, that Madame de Ferriol's arguments recurred to the mind of Aïssé. She yielded to them; and Madame de Ferriol openly sanctioned between her ward and the chevalier, a connexion which was only treated as a matter of course by the society in which they moved. Naturally too pure and delicate for the errors into which her unhappy education had made her fall, Mademoiselle Aïssé soon felt all the horrors of remorse and shame, in the conviction of her degradation. Her lover, whose ardent attachment had been rendered more tender by the birth of a child, offered to procure a dispensation from the pope, and marry her; but she steadily refused; her unknown origin, the poverty of her lover, and the prejudices of the age, which would have rendered such an alliance degrading for him, made her persist in her refusal. She announced to her lover, after a long period of painful struggles, that henceforward friendship must be the only feeling between them. He submitted to her decision, protesting that her affection, whatever name she might give it, would be his only source of happiness; and promising never to seek to influence her against her conscience. He religiously kept his word; and his love for his Circassian mistress ever remained fervent and true.

Signs, she could not mistake, soon told Aïssé that her life was drawing to a close. She ardently desired to reconcile herself to God; and, by the aid of the chevalier, she was enabled to confess herself to a priest at the house of Madame du Deffand. The Chevalier d'Aydie survived his mistress many years; his sorrow was severe and lasting. He retired to the country, and devoted himself to the education of his daughter. Madame de Ferriol is chiefly remarkable as having been the protectress of Aïssé, of whose history a beautiful little sketch may be found in that clever book, "The Women of France," by Miss Kavanach.

FIELDING, SARAH,

THE third sister of Henry Fielding, the novelist, and herself a writer of some celebrity, was born in 1714, lived unmarried, and died in 1768. She showed a lively and penetrating genius in many of her productions, especially in the novel entitled "David Simple," and in the Letters afterwards published between the principal characters in that work. She also translated "Xenophon's Memorabilia." The following eulogy on this lady, was composed by Dr. John Hoadley, who erected a monument to her memory:—

"Her unaffected manners, candid mind,
Her heart benevolent, and soul resigned,
Were more her praise, than all she knew or thought,
Though Athens' wisdom to her sex she taught."

FICKER, CHRISTIANE D. S.,

THE inventor of the tambour-needle, was the daughter of Mr. Nier, the comptroller of the mines in Eibenstein, Saxony. She was born November 12th, 1769. She was led to the invention by her love for embroidering, and the desire to trace raised figures, by means of a thread and needle, upon the cloth. The invention has been of great use to the poor women of Saxony, to whom it became a fruitful source of employment from abroad. The inventor, though, like Fulton, gained nothing by the invention, except a present of a small sum of money, given to her by the queen Amelia Auguste. She died on the 22d of October, 1811, as the wife of Christian G. Ficker, pastor of Eibenstein.

FISHER, CATHARINE.

THE biographers of this lady appear to have been ignorant of her origin, though they all agree in allowing that she possessed great comprehension of mind, and acknowledge that she was one of the most perfect linguists that adorned the sixteenth century. About the year 1559, she married Gual-theus Gruter, a burgomaster of Antwerp, by whom she had one son, the celebrated James Gruter, whose philosophical works have been so universally admired. In the early part of his life, he had no other instructor than his mother, who was perfect mistress both of Latin and Greek; and to her has been ascribed his fondness for study, as it is during childhood that a bias is given to the mind. At what age she died, has not been specified; but the year, her biographers believe to have been 1579, the time when her son left the University of Cambridge, to study at Leyden; but this circumstance is not positively ascertained.

FISHER, MARY,

AN enthusiastic English Quakeress of the seventeenth century, who travelled to Constantinople, with the intention of converting the grand seignior. She embarked at Smyrna in an Italian vessel for Adrianople; but her design being discovered, she was taken from the ship, and sent to Venice. This opposition only increased her zeal, and she determined to pursue her journey by land. When she reached Adrianople, she obtained an audience of Mahomet IV., who, surprised at her courage, and the manner in which she addressed him, regarded her as deranged, and ordered her to be carried back to her own country in the first vessel that sailed. On her return, she was received in triumph by the Quakers, and married to one of the principal members of that sect.

FLAXMAN, ANN,

WIFE of John Flaxman, the celebrated sculptor, deserves a place among distinguished women, for the admirable manner in which she devoted herself to sustain her husband's genius, and aid him in his arduous career.

Her maiden name was Denman; she married John Flaxman when he was about twenty-seven years old, and she twenty-two. They had been for some time mutually attached to each other; but he was poor in purse, and though on the road to fame, had no one, but this chosen partner of his life, who sympathized in his success. She was amiable and accomplished, had a taste for art and literature, was skilful in French and Italian, and, like her husband, had acquired some knowledge of the Greek. But what was better than all, she was an enthusiastic admirer of his genius—she cheered and encouraged him in his moments of despondency—regulated modestly and prudently his domestic economy—arranged his drawings—managed now and then his correspondence, and acted in all particulars, so that it seemed as if the church, in performing a marriage, had accomplished a miracle, and blended them really into one flesh and one blood. That tranquillity of mind, so essential to those who live by thought, was of his household; and the sculptor, happy in the company of one who had taste and enthusiasm, soon renewed with double zeal the studies which courtship and matrimony had for a time interrupted. He had never doubted that in the company of her whom he loved he should be able to work with an intenser spirit; but of another opinion was Sir Joshua Reynolds. "So, Flaxman," said the president, one day, as he chanced to meet him, "I am told you are married; if so, sir, I tell you you are ruined for an artist." Flaxman went home, sat down beside his wife, took her hand, and said, with a smile, "I am ruined for an artist." "John," said she, "how has this happened, and who has done it?" "It happened," said he, "in the church, and Ann Denman has done it; I met Sir Joshua Reynolds just now, and he said marriage had ruined me in my profession."

For a moment, a cloud hung on Flaxman's brow; but this worthy couple understood each other too well, to have their happiness seriously marred by the unguarded and peevish remark of a wealthy old bachelor. They were proud, determined people, who asked no one's advice, who shared their domestic secrets with none of their neighbours, and lived as if they were unconscious that they were in the midst of a luxurious city. "Ann," said the sculptor, "I have long thought that I could rise to distinction in art without studying in Italy, but these words of Reynolds have determined me. I shall go to Rome as soon as my affairs are fit to be left; and to show him that wedlock is for a man's good rather than his harm, you shall accompany me. If I remain here, I shall be accused of ignorance concerning those noble works of art which are to the sight of a sculptor what learning is to a man of genius, and you will lie under the charge of detaining me." In this resolution Mrs. Flaxman fully concurred. They resolved to prepare themselves in silence for the journey, to inform no one of their intentions, and to set, meantime, a still stricter watch over their expenditure. No assistance was proffered by the Academy, nor was any asked; and five years elapsed from the day of the memorable speech of the president, before Flaxman, by incessant study and labour, had accumulated the means of departing for Italy. They went together; and in all his subsequent labours and triumphs, the wife was his good angel.

For thirty-eight years Flaxman lived wedded—his health was generally good, his spirits ever equal; and his wife, to whom his fame was happiness, had been always at his side. She was a most cheerful, intelligent woman; a collector, too, of drawings and sketches, and an admirer of Stothard, of whose designs and prints she had amassed more than a thousand. Her husband paid her the double respect due to affection and talent; and when any difficulty in composition occurred, he would say, with a smile, "Ask Mrs. Flaxman, she is my dictionary." She maintained the simplicity and dignity of her husband, and refused all presents of paintings, or drawings, or books, unless some reciprocal interchange were made. It is almost needless to say that Flaxman loved such a woman very tenderly. The hour of their separation approached—she fell ill, and died in the year 1820; and from the time of this bereavement, something like a lethargy came over his spirit. He survived his wife six years; and, as his biographer remarks, was "surrounded with the applause of the world."

FODOR, MAINVILLE, JOSEPHINE,

ONE of the most brilliant opera-singers of the eighteenth century. Her fame is European. She was the daughter of M. Fodor, the violinist, and born at Paris in 1793. Already in her eleventh year, she appeared at the opera in St. Petersburg with a success which drew the eyes of all the directors of operas in Europe upon her. Her fame increased from year to year, so that even at the age of seventeen she had the most brilliant offers from the best theatres in Europe. She married the actor Mainville, and appeared with her husband at all the court theatres in Denmark, England, France, Germany, Russia, Sweden, and Italy. The latter country greeted her with the title of Queen of Song, and Venice had a medal struck to honour her. Mademoiselle Sontag owes much to her instruction. She died a few years ago.

FOIX, MARGARET DE, DUCHESS D'EPERNON.

In 1588, the chief of the league, wishing to ruin the duke, rendered him an object of suspicion at court, and obtained an order to take from him the castle of Angoulême, of which he was governor. The magistrate charged with the execution of this act seized the duchess, and conducted her to the principal gate of the citadel, in order that her danger might induce the duke to submit. In this situation, one of the officers by whom the duchess was led was killed at her feet, and another mortally wounded. Calm amidst the dangers which menaced her, and insensible to the remonstrances of the enemy, who urged her to exhort her husband to surrender, she replied, magnanimously, that she knew not how to give ill counsel; nor would she enter into a treaty with murderers. "In what terms," said she, "can a wife, who is afflicted only that she has but one life to offer for the honour and safety of her husband, persuade him to an act of cowardice?" She went on to declare, that she would shed, with joy, the last drop of her blood to add new lustre to the reputation of her husband; or to lengthen his existence but a single day; that she would be guilty of no weakness that should disgrace him: and that she would die with pleasure at the castle-gate for him, without whom she should abhor life even on a throne.

To the duke, whom they endeavoured to terrify by the danger which threatened his wife, she held out her arms, and implored him not to suffer his resolution to be shaken by any considerations which respected her safety. It was her wish, she told him, that her body might serve him for a new rampart against his enemies. On him, she declared, in whom alone she lived, depended her fortune and her fate. That by sacrificing himself he would gain no advantage, since she was determined not to survive him; but that to live in his remembrance would, in despite of their adversaries, constitute her happiness and her glory.

The grace and energy with which she expressed herself, softened the hearts of the enemy, who deliberated on other means by which their purrese might be effected. In the interval the duke was relieved by his friends; when the duchess, impatient to rejoin this beloved husband, of whom she had proved herself so worthy, without waiting till the castle-gate was cleared, entered by a ladder at one of the windows, and was received with the honours and tenderness she merited.

FONSECA, ELEONORA, MAR-
CHIONESS OF,

A LADY of great beauty and talents, was born at Naples in 1768. She cultivated botany, and other branches of natural history, and assisted Spallanzani in his philosophical investigations. Though possessed of great beauty, she devoted her youth to the cultivation of her mind. She studied with much care natural history and anatomy. As might be supposed, she was a warm partisan of the French revolution. When the king and royal family were obliged to leave Naples in 1799, the marchioness of Fonseca narrowly escaped the fury of the Lazzaroni, who threatened the lives of those who were in the French interest. During the short-lived existence of the Parthenopean republic, in 1799, she warmly espoused the popular cause, and edited a republican journal called "The Neapolitan Monitor." For these expressions of her political principles the marchioness was executed, on the 20th of July, by the restored government. Her private character was irreproachable.

FONTANA, LAVINIA,

DAUGHTER of Prospero Fontana, a painter of Bologna, died in 1602, aged fifty. She was eminent as a painter, and was patronized by Pope Gregory XIII., whose picture she drew in a very superior manner.

FONTANGES, MARIE ANGELIQUE,
DUCHESS OF,

SUCCESSOR to Montespan in the affections of Louis XIV., was beautiful as an angel, but silly as a goose, as Abbé Choisi said. She nevertheless captivated the affections of Louis XIV., who was tired of the pride and the caprice of Madame de Montespan. As soon as she discovered the passion which she had inspired, and had secured her royal conquest, she became haughty and extravagant, spending a hundred thousand crowns a month, and retorting a hundred-fold the disdain she had experienced from Madame de Montespan. She became the general dispenser of the king's favours, and the model of fashion. One day, when she was on a hunting-party, the wind having put her head-dress in disorder, she fastened it with a riband, the knot of which falling over her forehead, this fashion spread all over Europe under her name. The king made her a duchess; but she did not long enjoy the rank, as she died when scarcely twenty years old, in the abbey of Port-Royal, Paris, shortly after an accouchement.

FONTE, MODERATA,

The assumed name of a celebrated Venetian lady, whose real name was Modesta Pazzo. She was born at Venice, in 1555, and became an orphan in her infancy. While young, she was placed in the convent of the nuns of Martha of Venice; but afterwards left it, and was married. She lived twenty years very happily with her husband, and died in 1592. She learned poetry and Latin with the greatest ease; and is said to have had so prodigious a memory, that, after hearing a sermon only once, she could repeat it word for word. She wrote a poem, entitled "Il Floridoro," and another on the "Passion and Resurrection of Jesus Christ." Besides these and other poems, she wrote a book in prose, which was not published till after her death, called "Dei Meriti delle Donne," in which she maintains that women are not inferior in understanding or merit to men. None of her works are now extant.

FORCE, CHARLOTTE ROSE DE
CAUMENT DE LA,

A FRENCH poetess, who died in 1724, aged seventy. Her "Castle in Spain," a poem; and her "Secret History of Burgundy," a romance; her tales, and other works, possess considerable merit; but nothing she wrote has retained a permanent place in French literature.

FOUGERET, ANNA FRANCESCA
DONTREMONT,

Was born at Paris in 1745, in a family where, by example and instruction, she was brought up to know and practise the virtues of a Christian. Her father was an eminent barrister; and her mother, descended from a very respectable family, was a woman of superior ability, and esteemed for her many virtues. Anna was married when very young to M. de Fougeret, receiver-general of the finance. At the head of an establishment of which she had the management, and living in an extended circle of society, she found time to be the instructress of her children, whom she educated in a most careful manner. Her love for her own infants awakened her sympathy for some unfortunates whom circumstances brought under her notice. Her father, who was a director of the hospitals, often deplored the miserable situation of that of the foundlings, where numbers of babes perished for want of proper nutrition, impossible to be given, and from the bad air of overcrowded rooms. The pictures of this distress deeply moved the heart of Madame de Fougere; nor was she satisfied with a barren commiseration; she pondered over the subject until she devised the remedy; but her plans required more money than a private purse could supply. True benevolence is invincible. Madame de Fougere, abdicating all personal merit in this good act, communicated her ideas to the duchess de Cosse, whose rank and power, united with her benevolence and piety, rendered her the fit person to set on foot this useful establishment. Soon all the opulent ladies of Paris became interested, everything was arranged, every obstacle surmounted, and the "Maternal Charity" became an institution.

Louis XVI. and Maria Antoinette headed the list of subscribers, and in 1788 the society began their labours. These were crowned with the utmost success until the whirlwind of 1789 came to disperse the founders and patrons. Amidst the trials to which she was exposed, Madame de Fougere had the opportunity of manifesting the greatness of her mind and the energy of her character. Her husband expired on the guillotine, and she was left to sustain, encourage, and maintain her children; and, by judicious exertion of her abilities, she rescued from confiscation the patrimony of her family. After the restitution of her property she lived in the country, surrounded by a numerous offspring, to whom she was an object of love and veneration. In 1813, a painful malady terminated a life of virtue and good works.

The sagacity of Napoleon discerned the value of the institution devised by Madame de Fougere. He adopted it, and declared it by a decree of the senate an Imperial Institute; and the empress, Maria Louisa, was its directress.

At the restoration of the Bourbons, the dauphiness saw, with much emotion, the signature of her unfortunate mother among the early promoters of this charity. This was enough to enlist her interest; and she, by personal attention and munificent donations, assisted the managers. Since then the funds of the society have been increased by bequests and donations until it has become as flourishing as its benevolent originator could have ever anticipated or desired. But Madame Fougere was its foundress.

FOUQUÉ, CAROLINE AUGUSTE DE LA MOTTE,

BORN in 1773, at Hernhauser. Her maiden name was Von Briest. She married first a gentleman named Von Rochow, from whom she was divorced, in 1800, when she married Charles F. Baron de la Motte Fouqué, the poet of the romantic school. In 1807, she published "Roderic;" in 1809, "Letters on Female Education;" in 1812, "Magic of Nature;" in 1814, "Feodore;" in 1811, "Edmund's Walks and Wanderings;" in 1810, "The Hero Maiden of the Verdi;" and in 1808, "The Desk." She died in 1815.

FRANCISCA, or FRANCES,

A ROMAN lady, was the founder of a convent at Rome, called the Oblates. She followed the doctrines of St. Benedict, and was canonized in 1608. Many marvellous stories are told of the miracles performed by Francisca, who was noted for the religious mortifications she imposed on herself.

FRANKLIN, ELEANOR ANN,

WAS the daughter of Mr. Porden, an eminent architect, and was born in 1795. She early manifested great talent and a strong memory, and acquired considerable knowledge of Greek and other languages. A knot of literary friends, who occasionally met at her father's house, fostered this natural bent of her genius; and their habit of furnishing contributions to a kind of album kept by the party, under the name of the "Salt Box," (selections from which have been printed,) did much towards confirming in her a passionate fondness for poetry. In her seventeenth year she wrote, as her share towards this domestic miscellany, her first poem, "The Veils, or the Triumphs of Constancy," which was published in 1815, with a dedication to Countess Spencer. Three years afterwards appeared a small "Poetical Tribute," under the name of "The Arctic Expedition," suggested by a visit to the Isabella and Alexander discovery ships, which visit led to an acquaintance with Captain Franklin, one of the gallant adventurers, that ended in marriage, after his return from the expedition, in the month of August, 1823. The year previously appeared Miss Porden's principal work, an epic poem on the subject of the third crusade, entitled "Cœur de Lion," dedicated by permission to the king. In June, 1824, the birth of a daughter encouraged hopes in her friends, that a strong tendency to a pulmonary complaint, increased by the bursting of a blood-vessel, in 1822, might be counteracted; but these flattering expectations were soon destroyed, and she died, February 22d, 1825.

FRANZ, AGNES,

BORN at Militsch in Silesia, in 1795, was the daughter of the government councillor, L. Franz. She passed her youth at Schweidnitz, where she wrote the greater number of her fugitive pieces. Her poems were first published in 1826; her Parables were published at Wesel in 1829; Flowers that Pass, at Essen in 1833. Her collected works were published in 1824 at Breslau, under the title of "Glycerion;" and under that of "Cyanen" in 1833, at Essen. In 1834, she edited a portfolio on the Lower Rhine.

FRATELLINI, GIOVANNA,

AN Italian artist, was born at Florence in 1666. She possessed some talent for historical painting; but her chief excellence consisted in painting portraits. As she executed equally well in oil, crayons, miniature, and enamel, Cosmo III. and most of the princes and princesses of Italy sat to her. Her own portrait in the ducal gallery, painted by herself, is a happy instance of her talent. It reprents her in the act of taking the portrait of Lorenzo, her only son and pupil, who died in the bloom of life. It is painted in crayons, and equals the best productions of Rosalba.

FROHBERG, REGINA,

A GERMAN novelist, was born in 1783, at Berlin. Her maiden name was Salamon. She was the daughter of wealthy Jewish parents, and has lived, since 1813, in Vienna. She is quite a prolific authoress, and her works are distinguished for purity of style, true colouring, and a fine display of imagination. The best of these are "Louisa, or the Contest between Love and Obedience," published at Berlin in 1808; "Love and Grief," published at Amsterdam in 1812; and "The Vow," brought out at Vienna in 1816

FRY, ELIZABETH,

AN English lady of the sect of Friends or Quakers, distinguished for her benevolence, and as the originator of the Newgate female committee, was born in 1780. Her father was Mr. Gurney, of Norwich, England; and her brother was the celebrated John J. Gurney. Before her marriage, she established, by her father's consent, a school in his house for eighty poor children.

In 1800, Miss Gurney married Mr. Fry, who generously aided her in her benevolent inclinations. An accidental visit to the prison at Newgate, London, so impressed her with the misery of the women confined there, that she took immediate and effectual means to relieve them. She entered alone a room where a hundred and sixty women and children surrounded her in the greatest disorder; she offered them assistance, and spoke to them words of peace, of hope, and of consolation. They listened in silent astonishment and respect. Mrs. Fry repeated her visit, and passed a whole day with them, reading and instructing them from the Bible. She won their love and their confidence; founded in the prison a school for the children, and societies for the improvement of those more advanced. She drew up rules for their conduct, to which they unanimously consented; and one of their own number was appointed a matron or superintendent, under the inspection of twenty-four women of the Society of Friends. Mrs. Fry was engaged many years in this arduous undertaking. She afterwards travelled through several countries, but always in pursuance of some plan for ameliorating the condition of the poor and friendless.

Born to fortune, and to those charms of person and graces of manner, which, making their possessor the idol of society, sometimes stand in the way of an entire devotion to duty, Mrs. Fry overcame all these worldly temptations. She was blessed with a sweet voice, whose persuasive tones proved no trifling advantage in her labours; and a yet sweeter temper, without which both philanthropy and religion would have been vain in dealing with the erring. In her youth she was more remarkable for seriousness than vivacity.

The latest project of Mrs. Fry was the formation of libraries for the use of the Coast Guards, in their numerous stations round the British Isles; and this, with the aid of her friends and the patronage of government, she lived to see completely successful.

As a wife and mother, indeed in all her domestic and social relations, she was equally exemplary. She died in 1845, aged sixty-nine years. Her death caused a great sensation throughout Europe. It was felt that a star of love and hope had gone down; and none has yet risen to shine with the sweet and cheering lustre for the poor as did this truly angelic woman. She not only practised the most disinterested charity herself, but made it familiar with all under her influence. Her children were taught to consider relieving the poor a pleasure, because their mother did it in such a cheerful spirit. She employed her children as almoners when very young, but required a minute account of their giving, and their reasons for it. After the establishment of the Tract Society, she always kept a large supply of such as she approved for distribution. It was her desire not only to relieve the bodily wants, but also in some way to benefit the souls of the poor. Among other charities, Mrs. Fry acquired the art of vaccination, in order to vaccinate the poor; and, at intervals, made a sort of investigation of the state of the parish where she resided, and persuaded parents to have their children vaccinated; and she sought to influence their minds to escape the contagion of sin by furnishing Bibles and books of instruction to all who had them not.

Thus passed her life in this round of beneficence; beloved and honoured in a degree which queens might envy; and women most renowned for genius might gladly lay down their crowns of laurel at her feet, and thank her for the glory she has conferred on the sex. She was not gifted with what is termed genius: she has left few written records; and these, though expressive of piety, are not like her life, interesting and uplifting in their tendency. It was not her mission to write books; but to leave an example of good works, more impressive and beautiful than the pen can teach. We give a few extracts from her "Journal."

QUESTIONS FOR MYSELF.

First,—Hast thou this day been honest and true in performing thy duty towards thy Creator in the first place; and, secondly, towards thy fellow-creatures; or hast thou sophisticated and flinched?

Second,—Hast thou been vigilant in frequently pausing in the hurry and career of the day, to see who thou art endeavouring to serve; whether thy Maker or thyself? And every time that trial or temptation assailed thee, didst thou endeavour to look steadily to the Delivering Power; even to Christ, who can do all things for thee?

Third,—Hast thou endeavoured to perform thy relative duties faithfully; been a tender, loving, yielding wife, where thy own will and pleasure were concerned; a tender, yet steady mother with thy children, making thyself quickly and strictly obeyed, but careful in what thou requirest of them; a kind, yet honest mistress, telling thy servants of their faults, when thou thinkest it for their or thy good, but never unnecessarily worrying thyself or them about trifles; and to every one endeavouring to do as thou wouldst be done unto?

THE EFFECT OF THE BIBLE ON THE FEMALE PRISONERS.

Another very important point is the excellent effect we have found to result from religious education; our habit is constantly to read the Scriptures to the prisoners twice a day; many of them have been taught, and some of them have been enabled to read a little themselves; it has had an astonishing effect. I never saw the Scriptures received in the same way; and to many of them they have been entirely new, both the great system of religion and morality contained in them; and it has been very satisfactory to observe the effect upon their minds. When I have sometimes gone and said it was my intention to read, they would flock up stairs after me, as if it were a great pleasure I had to afford them.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

[The following rough memoranda, in the form of question and answer, were found in Mrs. Fry's writing among her papers.]

Does capital punishment tend to the security of the people?

By no means. It hardens the hearts of men, and makes the loss of life appear light to them; and it renders life insecure, inasmuch as the law holds out that property is of greater value than life. The wicked are consequently more often disposed to sacrifice life to obtain property. It also lessens the security of the subject, because many are so conscientious, that they had rather suffer loss and sustain much injury, than be instrumental in taking the life of a fellow-creature. The result is, that the innocent suffer loss, and the guilty escape with impunity.

Does capital punishment tend to the reformation of any party?

No: because in those who suffer it leads to unbelief, hypocrisy, and fatalism; in those who remain, to discontent, dissatisfaction with the laws, and the powers which carry them into execution; to hardness of heart, unbelief, and deceit.

Does it deter others from crime?

No: because the crimes subject to capital punishment are gradually increasing. Punishment is not for revenge, but to lessen crime and reform the criminal.

G.

GACON, DUFOUR MARIE A. JOHANNE,

A DESCENDANT of the celebrated poet of the same name, devoted all her fine talents and energies to the study of agriculture and economy. Her best works on these subjects are "Bibliothèque Agronomique," "Dictionnaire Rurale et Recueil Pratique d'Economie Rurale et Domestique." She wrote, moreover, "La femme Grenadier," in 1801; "Les Dangers de la Prevention;" and "Les Préjugés Vaincus;" besides several other works.

GAETANS, AURORA,

OF Saponara, in Calabria, born in 1669. From her earliest years she devoted herself to elegant literature. She had the good fortune to be instructed by the most illustrious men of her age, and to enjoy their friendship; such persons as Leonardo da Capua, il Calabrese, il Vico. She was much admired for her poetry, and belonged to the Accademia Arcadica, under the name of Lucinda Coritesea. She died in 1730. Her poems are to be found in the collection of Bergalli; they are written with exquisite delicacy and taste.

GABRIELLI, CATHARINE,

ONE of the most celebrated singers of the nineteenth century, was born at Rome in 1730. As soon as her great talent was discovered, (by accident,) she received instructions from Garcia (la Spagnaleto) and Porpora. In the year 1747, she sang at the theatre of Lucca, where she was generally admired. Francis I. called her subsequently to Vienna. Metastasio gave her the last finish, especially with regard to the recitative. The operas of this poet gained more celebrity by her than by any other musician. An anecdote is told concerning the extreme capriciousness of this lady. The viceroy of Sicily invited her one day to dine with him and the highest nobility of Palermo. When she did not make her appearance at the appointed hour, he sent a messenger to inform her that she was expected by the party. She was found reading on her sofa, and pretended to have entirely forgotten the invitation. The viceroy seemed inclined to forgive this impoliteness; but when, during the opera, she acted her part with the utmost negligence, and sang all her airs sotto voce, he threatened her with punishment; yet his displeasure seemed to have no other effect but to render her still more stubborn; she declared that she might be forced to scream, but not to sing. She was committed to prison for twelve days; during this time she gave costly entertainments, paid all the debts of the prisoners, and, with great charity, spent large sums of money among them. The viceroy being obliged to yield, she was released amidst the shoutings of the poor. She would never go to England. When offered an engagement at the theatre of London, she said, "I should not be mistress of my own will; whenever I should have a fancy not to sing, the people would insult, perhaps misuse me; better is it to remain here unmolested, were it even in a prison."

In the year 1765, the empress Catharine invited her to St. Petersburg, with the intention to engage her for two months. When her salary was mentioned, she asked five thousand ducats.

"Five thousand ducats!" exclaimed the empress; "none of my field-m Marshals receive so enormous a sum!"

"In this case," replied the songstress, "your majesty has only to engage one of your field-m Marshals to sing."

The empress laughed, and paid the desired sum. Towards the year 1780, Gabrielli went to Milan, where she did her utmost to triumph over and defeat Marchesi. In general, the rest of the singers were afraid of her. Pacchiarotti thought himself lost, when he appeared for the first time with her on the stage. She sang a difficult air peculiarly adapted to her voice, in which she displayed her whole power of singing to such a degree, that poor Pacchiarotti fled, with loud groans, behind the scenes, and could not be prevailed upon to come forth again. She retired from the stage in 1780, and died in 1796.

GAIL, SOPHIA,

WIFE of John Baptist Gail, a celebrated Hellenist, was born about 1779, and died at Paris in 1819. For the arts, particularly music, she manifested an early taste, and began to compose when she was not more than twelve years of age. Among her principal compositions are the operas of "The Jealous Pair;" "Mademoiselle de Launay in the Bastille;" and "The Serenade."

GAILLARD, JANE,

A POETESS of Lyons, living in the sixteenth century. We have found nothing concerning her writings; therefore have only the record of her name, as presented in the collection of Lyonesse authors, to give. Will the numerous band of young ladies who now write "charming sonnets" for the public journals, leave each one, a name which will be remembered after a lapse of three hundred years?

GALLITZIN, AMALIA, PRINCESS,

A LADY distinguished for talents, and a strong propensity to mysticism, was the daughter of count Schmettan, and lived during part of her youth at the court of prince Ferdinand, brother of Frederic the Great of Prussia. She married prince Gallitzin, of Russia; and, as much of his time was passed in travelling, she chose Munster, in the centre of Germany, for her permanent residence. Here she assembled around her many of the most distinguished men in Germany, of whom Hamann and Hemsterhuis were her most intimate friends.

She was an ardent Catholic, and very fond of making proselytes; with the exception of this excessive zeal, she was a very fine woman. Her children were educated according to Rousseau's system. The princess is the Diotama to whom Hemsterhuis, under the name of Dioklas, addressed his work on Atheism. She died in 1806, near Munster. Her only son was a missionary in America.

GALIGAI, ELEONORA,

THE family name of the marechale d'Ancre, was wife of Concini, marechal d'Ancre. Born in very humble life, the daughter of a joiner, and a washerwoman in Italy, she enjoyed for some time an irresistible dominion in France; and perished at last by a judicial sentence pronounced upon her for crimes, some of which were not proved, and others impossible to be committed. She was foster-sister to Mary de Medicis, who loved her with the tenderest affection. It was doubtless the favour she enjoyed with this princess that induced Concini to marry her; for she was exceedingly plain. Her talents, however, made amends for her personal defects. They went to France with Mary de Medicis, whom Madame Concini governed so completely, that she was virtually queen, and afterwards regent of France. Her excessive insolence so disgusted Louis XIII., the son of her protectress, that he gave her up to the envy and hatred of the court. Concini was assassinated by the king's order, and his wife was brought to a trial, in which, for want of other crimes, she was accused of sorcery. Being asked by what magic she had so fascinated the queen, she replied, "By the power which strong minds naturally possess over the weak." She was condemned in May, and executed in July, 1617. She left a son and a daughter. The latter died soon after her mother; the son, though he lost his nobility, retired to Italy, with an ample fortune, which had been accumulated by the avarice of his parents.

The marchioness de Concini was accused, with her husband, of having turned Jews, and of practising magic arts. Her fastidiousness, while at the height of her power, was so great, that the princes, princesses, and first personages in the kingdom, were prohibited from coming to her apartments; and it was accounted a crime to look at her.

GARRICK, EVA MARIA,

WIFE of the celebrated David Garrick, was born at Vienna, February 29th, 1725. Her maiden name was Viegel, under which appellation she attracted the notice of Maria Theresa, empress of Austria, as a dancer, and by her command changed it to Violette, a translation of an anagram of her name. In 1744, she arrived in England, bringing with her a letter from the countess of Stahrenberg to the countess of Burlington, who received her as an inmate of Burlington-house, and treated her with the greatest affection. This circumstance gave rise to a very general but erroneous idea, that Eva or Violette was a natural daughter of the earl's, born before his marriage with the countess.

but the dates of the respective events prove the inaccuracy of the supposition. While under the protection of this noble family, Mademoiselle Violette formed an attachment with David Garrick, and on the 22d of June, 1749, the nuptials were celebrated, with the sanction of the earl and countess; a marriage portion of six thousand pounds being bestowed upon the bride by the former. In 1751 and in 1763, Mrs. Garrick accompanied her husband to the continent; and in 1769, the journals of the day speak highly of the grace and elegance displayed by her at the Stratford jubilee. After the death of her husband, though strongly solicited by several persons of rank and fortune, (among others by the learned lord Monboddo,) to re-enter the marriage state, she continued a widow, residing in her house on the Adelphi terrace, where she died suddenly in her chair, October 16th, 1822, and was buried in the same vault with her husband, near the cenotaph of Shakespeare, in Westminster Abbey, on the 25th day of October in the same year.

The beauty and truth of Mrs. Garrick's character in her conjugal relation chiefly entitles her to a notice in our work. As the wife and widow of David Garrick, she offers an example of the singleness and purity of woman's soul which deserves a record. Miss Hannah More, then a young lady, had been intimate with Mr. and Mrs. Garrick for several years before his decease. On her first visit to the new-made widow, she thus describes her—"Not a sigh escaped poor Mrs. Garrick that she could restrain. When I expressed my surprise at her self-command, she answered—'Groans and complaints are very well for those who are to mourn but a little while; but a sorrow that is to last for life will not be violent or romantic.'" And it did last for life.

GASTON, MARGARET,

WAS born in the county of Cumberland, England, about the year 1755. Her maiden name was Sharpe. Her parents being Catholics, were desirous of giving their daughter better advantages of education, connected with their own faith, than could be found in their country; so Margaret was sent to France, and brought up in a convent. She was very happy in her secluded life; and her conduct in her subsequent history shows that she was well trained. Having two brothers residing in America, she came hither to visit them; and married, in North Carolina, Dr. Alexander Gaston, of Huguenot ancestry. This was about the commencement of the war of our Independence; and Dr. Gaston took a zealous part with his country. He was cruelly murdered, in presence of his wife and little children, by a body of tories in British pay;—the musket which found his heart was levelled over her shoulder!

Her brothers and eldest son died before this sad event. Mrs. Gaston had no relatives in America but her two surviving children, William, a boy of three years old, and an infant daughter. In the eloquent language of Mrs. Ellet, who has given the biography of this interesting lady in her "Women of the American Revolution,"—"Many women, possessing the acute sensibility of Mrs. Gaston, would have been overwhelmed in such a situation; but severe trials served only to develop the admirable energy of her character. Every moment of her being guided by religion, she was strong in its support, and devoted herself to the duties that devolved upon her, with a firmness and constancy by which all who knew her saw that she lived above time and above the world."

"—Her footsteps seemed to touch the earth
Only to mark the track that leads to Heaven."

Though still young when left a widow, she never laid aside the habiliments of sorrow; and the anniversary of her husband's murder was kept as a day of fasting and prayer. The great object of her life was the instruction of her son, and imbuing his mind with the high principles, the noble integrity, and Christian faith, which shone conspicuous in herself. Her income being small, she practised economy to enable her to gratify her dearest wish, and procure for him a complete education; while her maternal tenderness did not dispense with implicit obedience; and strict admonitions, or yet stricter discipline, were employed to correct the faults of childhood and youth. One slight anecdote may give an idea of her method of education. When her son was seven or eight years of age, being remarkable for his aptitude and cleverness, a little schoolmate as much noted for his dullness said to him—"William, what is the reason you are always head of the class, and I am always foot?"—"There is a reason," replied the boy; "but if I tell you, you must promise to keep it a secret, and do as I do. Whenever I take up my book to study, I first say a little prayer my mother taught me, that I may be able to learn my lessons." He tried to teach the words of the petition to the dull boy, who could not remember them. The same night Mrs. Gaston observed William writing behind the door; and as she permitted nothing her children did to be concealed from her, he was obliged to confess having been writing out the prayer for little Tommy, that he might be able to get his lessons.

This cherished son William (afterwards the distinguished judge Gaston, of North Carolina) graduated at Princeton, taking the highest honours of the institution. When he returned home, before his mother embraced or welcomed him, she laid her hands on his head, as he knelt before her, and breathed forth the feelings of her soul in the exclamation—"My God, I thank thee!"

GAUSSEM, JEANNE CATHERINE,

A CELEBRATED French actress, who, for thirty years, enjoyed the applause of the audience in the principal French theatres. She retired from the stage in 1664, and died at Paris in 1767, aged fifty-six years.

GENLIS, STEPHANIE FELICITÉ, COUNTESS DE,

WAS born near Autun, in Burgundy, in 1746. Her maiden name was Duerest de St. Aubin. Though of a good family, she had no fortune; but her beauty, accomplishments, and skill on the harp, introduced her into high circles, where she had the opportunity of cultivating her mind and improving her knowledge of the world. She received many offers of marriage, and accepted the count de Genlis, who, before he saw her, had fallen in love with her from reading one of her letters.

The union was not a happy one; and the tongue of scandal did not spare the character of Madame de Genlis. By this marriage, however, she was allied to Madame Montesson, who was privately married to the duke d'Orleans; and thus it happened that Madame de Genlis was chosen by the duke de Chartres as the governess of his children. She conducted the education of these children entirely herself, and wrote her first works for their instruction. Appearing as an author, she produced in rapid succession "Adele and Theodore;" "The Tales of the Castle;" "The Theatre of Education;" and "The Annals of Virtue;" all of which were much praised. Though she was a warm friend to the revolution, her connexion with the duke d'Orleans rendered her so unpopular, that, in 1793, she was compelled to leave France.

She relates herself, in her "Précis de ma Conduite," that Petion conducted her to London, that she might meet with no obstructions to her journey. About the time of the September massacres, 1792, the duke of Orleans recalled her to Paris. As the governess of his daughter, the young duchess of Orleans, and the friend and confidant of the duke, she had become suspected. She therefore retired, with the princess, to Tournay, where she married her adopted daughter, the beautiful Pamela, to lord Fitzgerald. Here she saw general Dumouriez, and followed him to St. Amand. Not approving of the plan of the general (who had the sons of the duke of Orleans with him) to march to Paris and overthrow the republic, she retired with the princess to Switzerland, in 1793, where they lived in a convent at Bremgarten, a few miles from Zurich. The daughter of the duke of Orleans having at length gone to join her aunt, the princess of Condé, at Friburg, Madame de Genlis retired with her foster-daughter, Henrietta Serey, who was now alone left to her, to Altona. This was in 1794, and there, in monastic solitude, this once gay and brilliant woman devoted herself entirely to literature. She wrote about this time a novel, "The Chevaliers du Lygne," printed in Hamburg, 1795, which contains many republican expressions and very free descriptions. It was afterwards republished in Paris, but with many alterations. The same year (1795) Madame de Genlis wrote a sort of autobiography, which is amusing, but not very reliable. Between her own vanity and the license usually granted to French vivacity and sentiment, the portrait she has drawn of herself is very highly coloured and flattering. At the close of this work is a rather remarkable letter to her eldest pupil, Louis Philippe, in which she exhorts him not to accept the crown of France, even though it should be offered him, because the French republic seemed to rest upon moral and just foundations.

When Napoleon was placed at the head of the government, Madame de Genlis returned to France, and received from him a house; and in 1805, a pension of 6000 francs. He treated her always with respect and favour; and she corresponded with him. But, on the return of the Bourbons, she forgot her obligations to the emperor, and welcomed the restoration of her early friends. This was not strange; but she even stooped to join the detraction of the exiled Corsican, which was not creditable to her heart or mind.

For the last thirty years of her life, her inexhaustible genius continued to pour forth a great variety of works. The whole number of her productions consists of nearly one hundred volumes, and are characterized by great imagination, and purity of style. She died at Paris, in December, 1830.

Among the multitude of her books, the best are those she wrote for the purpose of instructing the children under her charge. We will give a few selections from the "Tales of the Castle."

LAWS.

Laws, replied the baroness, are enacted for the general community: we must not expect generous and delicate sentiments from the multitude; consequently, the laws cannot regulate certain actions and sentiments; were they more severe, they would be observed only by a few, therefore could not contribute to the general good: they confine themselves to forbid manifest violence and injustice, because they are made for the regulation of common and not superior minds. For which reason, you may observe that the man whose probity consists in merely obeying the laws, cannot be truly virtuous or estimable; for he will find many opportunities of doing contemptible and even dishonest acts, which the laws cannot punish. Hence you may comprehend how law may authorize what honour may proscribe; and wherefore it is shameful to go to law in many instances, where you would be certain of gaining the cause.

VIRTUE.

There is no man, however wicked, or however vulgar, but naturally loves virtue, and hates vice. His passions make him act against his conscience; but, while his conscience reproves him for his own errors, it demonstrates more clearly the errors of others, because, with respect to them, he does not reject its testimony. Hence it is that men act ill, and judge well. Feeble and corrupted, they give way to their passions; but when they are cool—that is to say, when they are uninterested—they instantly condemn what they have often been guilty of; they revolt against every thing that is contemptible; they admire every thing generous, and they are moved at every thing affecting.

PREJUDICE.

A prejudice is an opinion formed without due reflection, and which cannot be supported by any good reasons: thus, for example, Mademoiselle Victoire believes, that a bit of rope with which a man has been hanged, carried in her pocket, will make her win at cards. This is a prejudice; for it certainly is not the effect of reasoning on the possibility of the fact, which could first make her give into such a belief. Ask her why she has this opinion, and she will tell you she had it of her aunt, her mother, or her grandmother; and this is all she knows.

All prejudices are not equally stupid with this; but I know many which I think so, and which are yet generally adopted. I have seen women run away frightened at the entrance of a person who nursed another sick of the small-pox or the measles; and I have seen these same women, with great tranquillity, shut themselves up with the physician who attended those very patients. Many other things, of a like kind, may be observed, equally rational with Mademoiselle Victoire's predilection for the hangman's rope.

But there is another species of prejudice, which, far from being ridiculous, deserves to be respected, because it is produced by a lively and delicate sensibility. Let us continue to believe, that twins are united in perfect friendship; that they reciprocally suffer the bodily evils of each other; that a mother would discover her child, whom she had never seen, amid a thousand other children: these are the errors of kind hearts, the consequences of virtuous sentiments, and ought not to be despised.

All opinions which cannot be maintained by reason, and which facts and experiments demonstrate to be false, are certainly prejudices; yet we must be careful how we affirm, that any thing, with the nature of which we are unacquainted, however strange it may appear to us, is chimerical and vain. The history of Alphonso has taught us, that there exists an infinity of phenomena in nature, the causes of which are unknown to man; for which reason we ought only to call those things prejudices, which are not only repugnant to reason, but which are capable of being proved false by facts.

MUSIC.

Can any one be a connoisseur in music, without knowledge of the science?

No; it is absolutely impossible. We have already allowed, that, with the best natural taste imaginable, after long study, after travelling, and observing with attention the varieties of nature, and all the collections of pictures in Europe, an amateur, if he cannot paint himself, never can distinguish all the beauties of a picture visible to a good painter: yet painting is the real imitation of nature; it represents material objects as they are hourly seen; and many parts of it must equally please the ignorant and the learned; the nicer touches of art escape the first, but they cannot help being pleased with an imitation that looks like nature itself.

It is not the same with music. The composer of an opera, no doubt, must find in nature that kind of declamation which his poem requires; but this species of imitation is too abstracted, to be as generally felt as that of painting. Besides, music may have expression, and yet not be good: as, for example, if certain rules of composition be not observed; of which, however, none but a musician will properly feel the want. I own that, in general, it is my opinion that sensibility and good taste, without a knowledge of music, may distinguish the merits of certain passages, where the expression is very happy; may feel the difference of style, and determine whether the melody be agreeable, or common and insipid; but it is impossible they can hear the beauties and defects of complicated harmony; they absolutely do not hear them, they are deaf to the effects of an accompaniment. I maintain (and the proof is easy) that a person who does not understand music, that is to say, who cannot decipher it with facility, and whose youth has not been passed in composing it, will never be a complete judge of it. Let a performer of any note play a voluntary, and give a mixture of good and false concords, and you shall see one of these connoisseurs, who declaim so emphatically on barbarous music, motives, and intentions, listen with delight to discords and unconnected resolutions of harmony, which would make a musician shudder; and bestow the most pompous praises while he listens. And what do people gain, who wish to seem learned in things they know nothing about? They impose on nobody, they talk nonsensically, they judge without taste, they are accused of pedantry by the ignorant, of folly by the well-informed, and they are tiresome and disagreeable to both.

A SCENE IN "THE TWO REPUTATIONS."

Luzincourt, unable to support this incertitude concerning the real sentiments of Aurelia, thought at last of declaring his own, really taking it for granted, that a woman whom he had loved for three years had never discovered his secret.

Full of fears and uneasiness, he went to Aurelia, whom he found just returned from a public sitting of the French Academy. She seemed greatly agitated. "There is no bearing it," said she to Luzincourt; "all is lost; neither justice, reason, or gallantry remain."

"Heavens, madam, what is the matter?"

"A great man has affirmed those nations, where women are best treated, are always most civilized."

"I flatter myself the great man who spoke so well was a Frenchman."

"By no means; he was an Englishman. We are not so civilly dealt with in France. You shall judge when I have told you what I have just heard. A philosopher, desirous of praising a princess, who has been dead these fifty years, could not accomplish his purpose but at the expense of all the princesses, and all the women, who have ever existed or do exist; and that in a single phrase."

"He has been very laconic indeed."

"You shall hear—Though a woman and a princess, said he, she loved learning!"

"The orator ought to have been answered, that though a philosopher, and an academician, he did not, on this occasion, show either much politeness or equity."

"And the less, in that a great princess honoured the assembly by her presence; by which she proved that, though a woman and a princess, she loved learning."

"And did the public approve this speech?"

"They groaned and hissed; that was all they did."

"That was all they could do, I think."

"What! among so many auditors, not one courageous knight to answer for us, and defend us?"

"How could you wish any answer to be given to so foolish a thing? Had you been attacked with any appearance of reason, you would, no doubt, have found defenders. If, for example, the philosophers, instead of accusing women of not loving the belles-lettres, had accused them of the contrary, and endeavoured to turn their passion for literature into ridicule, your knights might then have been of service."

"Why, very true: for women never wrote or cultivated literature so much as at present. What then could this philosopher be thinking of? He was absent, no doubt; mathematicians are subject to be so, and we might well advise them to calculate more and write less. For my part, I own, I am passionately interested in the glory of my sex."

"The sentiment is worthy of you. It is noble and natural."

"It has been said that the age of Louis XIV., which produced so many great men, was the age for great women also: I am afraid that they cannot say as much of this."

"I do not think that fear well founded. True it is, I know no woman who has been appointed to an embassy, or the sister of a common soldier who has married an emperor; but in other respects, I think the balance is in favour of the women of the present age."

"An embassy! an empress! I am sorry to think that can never happen again."

"Oh that I had a throne to offer you!"

"Pshaw! this is not the kind of gallantry I want: give me your proofs in favour of the women of this age."

"And is not your ambition on this head satisfied, madame? We have queens, who, on the throne, afford the brightest examples of the mild and benevolent virtues which honour humanity, and of those shining qualities which constitute heroes. Women, in this age, have written in every branch of literature with the greatest success. The best modern novels are the productions of women; the Peruvian Letters, the Letters of my Lady Catesby, &c., are surely equal to the princess of Cleves and Zaide. Women have not been less distinguished in poetry; many may be cited equal to Madame Deshoulières; and some have even discovered abilities of a higher kind. They have written cantatas, poems, and tragedies. The women of Louis XIV.'s time composed little except works of mere amusement: whereas, within these twenty years, they have written a multitude of truly useful and moral works; and there are at this moment, several women in France, who cultivate letters with reputation in various branches of literature. In England they have the same success; and in Russia, a woman directs the labours of a celebrated academy, of which she is perpetual president: and really, madam, if this will not satisfy you, you are very hard to please."

"You forget the learned ladies of the last century."

"I see you envy Madame Dacier."

"You must own that ladies do not now understand Greek."

"And I must likewise own that men do not either. We learn the Greek alphabet, after which we read translations! then we say we understand Greek, and this is the whole mystery. As to other languages, we meet with many ladies who understand English, Italian, Spanish, and even Latin."

"Latin!"

"Yes; you yourself are acquainted with three."

"What! three women who understand Latin!"

"Yes, madam, who understand Latin. There are Madame N—, Mademoiselle N— her daughter, and Madame the Marchioness de L—, who all understand it as perfectly as the most studious men."

"Understand Latin! and I who have been acquainted with them these three years, never to suspect it! Women then may be modest as well as learned, and scholars without being pedants; nay, without wishing to have their abilities known. But let us continue the comparison between the women of the last century and this. I do not remember any French woman of the age of Louis XIV. who understood mathematics; and we have now Madame du Chatelet—do you know any foreigners?"

"England, Switzerland, Holland, Germany, and Italy, present a crowd of women eminent for their extent and depth of knowledge. A woman has received, even in this age, an honour which incontestably proved her talents were very superior to those of all the learned in her nation, then in existence. A pope, equally distinguished for his understanding and information, Benedict XIV., bestowed on Maria Agnezi, a celebrated mathematician, the place of apostolical professor in the university of Bologna, in 1758."

"A woman apostolical professor! Well, that really delights me. How great must be her merit to pretend to such a place!"

"And does not Benedict XIV., who, to reward superior merit, did a thing so uncommon, deserve a word of praise from you?"

"Oh yes; though a man and a pope, he was superior to vulgar prejudices against women."

"These prejudices will be forgotten when education is better understood, and when women will imagine themselves capable of acquiring all the knowledge and all the arts, as perfectly as the men!"

"We do not think this, and therefore we remain ignorant. All serious studies seem superior to our minds. So, it seems, you think excessive humility makes us frivolous. Well, I am glad you have found out this. But I am uneasy about another thing. No person can deny there have been women of genius; the famous Elizabeth, queen of England, and other heroines, are our proofs: yet it is obstinately maintained, that there are certain works of imagination which require a force and energy that women have not. Thus, for example, it is affirmed no woman can write an excellent tragedy. The tragedies of Mademoiselles Barbier and Bernard, and of Madame de Gomez, were performed with success at first, it is true; but they are not acted at present."

"Remember, madam, since the Cleopatra of Iodelle, only five women have written tragedies that have been performed on the French stage; and you must allow it would have been miraculous, if, out of this small number, one had been found equal to Racine. These five authors, far from having written contemptible works, were successful; and what could reasonably be hoped for more? Think, on the other hand, what an innumerable swarm of tragic writers have preceded and come after Corneille: how many have been condemned, for one who was approved; how many have been forgotten, and how many shall be forgotten? I, therefore, do not see what foundation there is to assert, that to write a tragedy belongs only to men, and that women ought not to pretend to it; it is wrong to judge them till they have been oftener tried. It must be owned that they have written good poetry; that they have wit, understanding, dignity of mind, and feeling; and what more is required to write a good tragedy? Often have they, even in this way, charmed the public at much less expense."

"You speak of women in a very flattering manner; but do not you think they have, in general, treated us with great rigour, and that there never was a less gallant age than the present?"

"This is a sign greatly in your favour; for it proves there is a real competition for superiority between men and women. We are willing enough to praise you, when you are only amiable; but if once you discover eminence in any one thing, we have a right to find fault; for we are the masters, and surely we must maintain subordination. For my part, when I think on the education of women, I cannot conceive how we can help admiring them. Let us suppose that Corneille and Racine had learned nothing from infancy to youth, that is till they were eighteen or twenty, but to dance and play on the harpsichord; and that afterwards they had heard speak only of balls, feasts, and visits Behold them, at that period, obliged to answer numberless messages every morning, and do nothing but write billets, and read the Journal de Paris. Do you think they would then have written Cinna and Athalia?"

"You are in the right; and we have been refused the gifts of genius a little too inconsiderately."

GENTILESCHI, ARTEMISIA,

Was the daughter of Orazio Gentileschi, an Italian historical and landscape painter, who was born at Pisa, but came to London, where he died. Artemisia resided in London for some time with her father, where she painted the portraits of several of the royal family, and many of the English nobility. She died in Italy, in 1642. One of her paintings represents Judith killing Holofernes; it is a picture of deep and terrible passion; the other is the Temptation of Susanna, a work of much ease, softness, and grace. Her talents gained her a wide reputation; and her private life was excellent.

GEOFFRIN, MARIE THÉRÈSE RODET, MADAME,

BORN IN 1699. She was a woman alike distinguished by her qualities of mind and heart, who, during half a century, was the ornament of the most polite and cultivated societies in Paris. An orphan from the cradle, she was educated by her grandmother, and early accustomed to think and judge justly. She afterwards became the wife of a man, of whom nothing can be said, excepting that he left her in possession of a considerable fortune, which she employed partly in assisting the needy, partly in assembling around her a select circle of distinguished persons. Her benevolence was exerted in a touching and delicate manner. An attentive study of mankind, enlightened by reason and justice, had taught Madame Geoffrin that men are more weak and vain than wicked; that it is necessary to overlook the weakness, and bear with the vanity of others, that they, in turn, may bear with ours. Her favourite maxim, therefore, was, "Give and forgive."

From her very childhood she was of a most charitable disposition. She wished to perpetuate her benevolence through the hands of her friends.

"They will be blessed," said she, "and they in their turn will bless my memory." Thus she assigned to one of her friends, who was poor, an income of twelve hundred livres for his lifetime. "If you should grow richer," said she, "distribute the money out of love to me, when I can use it no longer."

In her house the best society in Paris was assembled. Cultivated minds of every description found access to her; none could therefore claim a preference: the mistress of the house herself was far from desiring any precedence; she was only amiable and animating. The abbé de St. Pierre, when she dismissed him, after a long conversation, with the words, "Vous avez été charmant aujourd'hui," addressed to her the well-known and deserved compliment, "Je ne suis qu'un instrument, Madame, dont vous avez bien joué."

"The question is often asked," says La Harpe, "whether this woman, who converses so much with wits, is herself a wit: she is not so, but she possesses a sound judgment, and a wise moderation is the foundation of her character. She exhibits that pleasing politeness which is gained only by intercourse with society; and no one has a more delicate feeling of propriety." Among the great number of strangers who visited her house in Paris, the most distinguished was count Poniatowsky, afterwards king of Poland. He apprised her of his accession to the throne in these words: "Maman, votre fils est roi;" inviting her, at the same time, to Warsaw. On her journey thither (1768) she was received at Vienna in the most flattering manner, by the emperor and empress. The latter, having met Madame Geoffrin, while taking a ride with her children, immediately stopped, and presented them to her. Upon her arrival at Warsaw, she found a room there, perfectly like the one she had occupied in Paris. She returned to Paris, after having received the most flattering marks of respect, and died in 1777. Three of her friends, Thomas, Morellet, and d'Alembert, dedicated particular writings to her memory, which, with her treatise, Sur la Conversation, have been lately republished.

We see in the example of this interesting lady, that neither personal attractions, nor wit, nor genius, are required to make woman lovely and beloved. Madame Geoffrin was not distinguished for these showy gifts and graces; but she possessed what was better—sound judgment, good taste, and warm kindness of heart. Her disinterested benevolence was wonderful. All her sayings breathe this universal charity. We have remarked that her favourite maxim was—"Give and forgive." Another of her sayings was, "We should not let the grass grow on the path of friendship." "Among those advantages which attract for us the most consideration," said Madame Geoffrin, "are good manners, an erect bearing, a dignified demeanour, and to be able to enter a room gracefully; we dare not speak ill of a person who has all these advantages, for they presuppose thoughtfulness, order, and judgment."

She was exquisitely neat in her person, and dressed with great taste; and this was one secret of her power. A slatternly woman can never be loved or respected, however much she may be admired for her talents. Madame Geoffrin died at Paris in 1777, aged seventy-eight.

GETHIN, LADY GRACE,

WAS the daughter of Sir George Norton, of Abbots-Leith, in Somersetshire, England, and born in 1676. She was liberally educated, and married Sir Richard Gethin, of Gethin-grott, in Ireland. Lovely and beloved, and possessed of many and great accomplishments, both natural and acquired, she did not live long enough to display them to the world; for she died in her twenty-first year. She was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a beautiful monument is erected over her; and, moreover, for perpetuating her memory, provision was made for a sermon to be preached in Westminster Abbey, yearly, on Ash-Wednesday, forever. She wrote, and left behind her in loose papers, a work which, soon after her death, was published under the title of "Reliquiæ Gethineæ;" or some remains of the most ingenious and excellent lady, Grace Lady Gethin, lately deceased; being a collection of choice Discourses, pleasant Apothegms, and witty Sentences, written by her, for the most part, by way of Essay, and at spare hours, 1700." This work consists of discourses upon friendship, love, gratitude, death, speech, lying, idleness, the world, secrecy, prosperity, adversity, children, cowards, bad poets, indifference, censoriousness, revenge, boldness, youth, age, custom, charity, reading, beauty, flattery, riches, honour, pleasure, suspicion, excuses, &c. It is at present very scarce.

GHIRADELLI, LAURA FELICE,

THIS elegant authoress has left but one sonnet. But, as with respect to Sappho, we may say—

O suavis anima! qualem te dicam bonam,
Ante hac fuisse, tales cùm sint reliquæ!

She was a native of Bologna, and flourished in 1675.

GINASSI, CATERINA,

WAS born of a noble family at Rome, in 1590. She was the niece of cardinal Domenico Ginassi. She studied painting under Giovanni Lanfranco, from whose designs she executed several pictures in the convent of St. Lucia. She died in 1660.

GLAUBER, DIANA,

WAS sister of John and Gottlieb Glauber, and was born at Utrecht in 1650. John Glauber instructed his sister in the principles and practice of his art; and she devoted herself chiefly to painting portraits. Her style became quite distinguished; and she also designed historical subjects, until she was accidentally deprived of her sight. She died at Hamburg about 1720.

GLENORCHY, WILHELMINA MAXWELL, LADY,

DISTINGUISHED for her piety and benevolence, was born at Preston, in North Britain, in 1742. Lovely, agreeable, wealthy, and allied to a noble house, her premature widowhood, and a severe illness, induced her in her twenty-third year to retire from the gayeties of the world, and devote her time wholly to her religious duties. She exerted herself principally for the education of youth, and trained up hundreds of children to fill useful stations in society. She endowed a free-school at Edinburgh, built four chapels, and founded and endowed schools in different places, besides educating several young men for the ministry, and bestowing large sums in private acts of benevolence. To enable her to carry out these schemes, she denied herself luxuries, and in every way practised the greatest economy. She died in 1780, leaving the greater part of her property to charitable purposes.

Lady Glenorchy had drawn much information concerning the most useful subjects, from reading, from conversation, and correspondence with a numerous circle of worthy friends, and from acute observation of what passed within and around her. She entered into conversation with much affability, and communicated ideas with uncommon perspicuity and readiness. The vivacity of her temper, the justness and sweetness of her remarks, could not fail to render her company acceptable to any society. But important obligations of a spiritual kind afforded her little leisure or inclination for mixed company. Her courage in avowing and endeavouring to promote on every occasion an attachment to the gospel, was truly admirable. None had more boldness, nor more ability in introducing religious discourse, and directing the attention of those with whom she conversed to subjects that were spiritual and edifying. None could sit, for any time, at her table or in her company, without hearing some truths, which ought to be profitable to their souls. In her religion she wore no morose or forbidding appearance. Her temper was cheerful, her conversation and manners, though remote from the dissipation of the age, exhibited piety in a pleasing form, and conveyed the idea that, "wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are paths of peace."

GLEIM, BETTY,

KNOWN as a writer on German literature and female education, was born in 1781. Her grandfather, J. L. W. Gleim, and several literary friends, contributed greatly to the development of her natural talents. From her earliest youth, she felt a strong bias towards the calling of a teacher. She considered herself in duty bound to devote her life to the amelioration of the mental condition of her sex. She established a female school, which continued to flourish for a long time as a model institute for the region of the country in which she lived. Her work on Cookery obtained for her quite a celebrity as a housekeeper, and went through seven or eight editions. She next published "The German Reader." Then followed "The Education of Females in the Nineteenth Century." Soon afterwards appeared "The Education of Women and the assertion of their dignity in the various Conditions of Life." She also prepared several primary grammars, and a number of other school-books, upon various topics. Her works have proved of much utility, and her life was a lesson to all who wish to do good to their race. She died, March 27th, 1807, at the Institution founded by herself, a fitting monument of her earnest philanthropy.

GODEWYCK, MARGARETTA,

WAS born at Dort in 1627, and was instructed in design and drawing by Nicholas Maas, by whose instructions she acquired a fine taste in painting landscapes, which she ingeniously diversified with views of rivers, cascades, villages, groves, and distant hills, that rendered her compositions very pleasing. This lady was not more admired for her paintings in oil, than for her needle-work, executing the same kind of subjects which she expressed with her pencil, and with an equal appearance of nature and truth, in embroidery. She died in 1677.

GODWIN, MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT,

THE first wife of William Godwin, better known however by her maiden name of Wollstonecraft, was born on the 27th of April, 1759. At the time of her birth her father owned a small farm in Essex, from which he afterwards, in 1768, removed to another farm, near Beverley, in Yorkshire. Mary Wollstonecraft's early years were thus spent in the country, and she had no better opportunities of education than were furnished by the day-schools of Beverley, where she resided from her tenth to her sixteenth year. When she had attained this age, her father, having entered into a commercial speculation, removed from Beverley to Hoxton, near London. While she resided at Hoxton, Godwin was a student in the Dissenters' College of that place, but they did not then meet.

Mary Wollstonecraft's early years were not passed happily. Her father appears to have been a man of no judgment in the management of a family, and of a most ungovernable temper. "The despotism of her education," says Mr. Godwin, in his unaffected and interesting memoir of his wife, "cost her many a heart-ache. She was not formed to be the contented and unresisting subject of a despot; but I have heard her remark more than once, that when she felt she had done wrong, the reproof or chastisement of her mother, instead of being a terror to her, she found to be the only thing capable of reconciling her to herself. The blows of her father, on the contrary, which were the mere ebullitions of a passionate temper, instead of humbling her, roused her indignation." A woman of exquisite sensibility, as well as of great energy of character, she was thus led early to think of quitting her parents and providing for herself. She went first to live as companion to a lady at Bath, and afterwards, in 1783, in concert with two sisters and also a friend for whom she had conceived an ardent attachment, she opened a day-school at Islington, which was very shortly removed to Newington Green. Mr. Godwin, who is well qualified to give an opinion, speaks in high terms of her pre-eminent fitness for the teaching of children; but the call of friendship having carried her for a time to Lisbon, and the school having been mismanaged in her absence, she found it necessary on her return to give up this plan of subsistence. She almost immediately obtained the situation of governess in the family of Lord Kingsborough.

Mary Wollstonecraft had by this time made an attempt in authorship. She had, in 1786, written and published, in order to devote the profits to a work of charity, a pamphlet entitled "Thoughts on the Education of Daughters." On leaving Lord Kingsborough's family, in 1787, she went to London, and entered into negotiations with Mr. Johnson, the publisher, with a view of supporting herself by authorship. The next three years of her life were accordingly spent in writing; and during that period she produced some small works of fiction, and translations and abridgments of several valuable works, for instance, Salzmann's Elements of Morality, and Lavater's Physiognomy, and several articles in the Analytical Review. The profits of her pen, which were more than she needed for her own subsistence, supplied aid to many members of her family. She helped to educate two younger sisters, put two of her brothers out in the world, and even greatly assisted her father, whose speculative habits had by this time brought him into embarrassments. Thus for three years did she proceed in a course of usefulness, but unattended by fame. Her answer, however, to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution, which was the first of the many answers that appeared, and her "Vindication of the Rights of Women," which was published in 1791, rapidly brought her into notice and notoriety.

In 1792, Mary Wollstonecraft went to Paris, and did not return to London till after an interval of three years. While in France she wrote her "Moral and Historical View of the French Revolution;" and a visit to Norway on business, in 1795, gave rise to her "Letters from Norway." Distress of mind, caused by a bitter disappointment to which an attachment formed in Paris had subjected her, led her at this period of her life to make two attempts at suicide. But it is a striking proof of her vigour of intellect that the "Letters from Norway" were written at the time when her mental distress was at its height, and in the interval between her two attempts at self-destruction.

In 1796, Mary Wollstonecraft became acquainted with William Godwin, the celebrated philosopher and political writer. A mutual attachment was the result; and as they, unfortunately, held similar opinions respecting the ceremony of marriage, they lived together, unwedded, for six months; when finding the necessity of legitimatizing the child which would otherwise be an outcast from her birth, they were married. Mrs. Godwin died in child-bed a few months afterwards, leaving her infant daughter, who subsequently became the wife of Percy Bysshe Shelley, and has given ample proof that she inherits the talents of both her parents.

Mr. Godwin mourned the death of his wife deeply. In 1798 he edited her posthumous works, and also published a small memoir of her, which is eminently marked by genuine feeling, simplicity, and truth. The style of this Memoir is different from the other productions of Godwin, which he ascribed to the influence the genius of his wife had exercised over his own mind; he concludes thus: "This light was lent to me for a very short period, and is now extinguished forever."

Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin was endowed with great mental powers, and an unusual degree of feeling; but these gifts were of little avail to herself, or to the promotion of that improvement of her own sex, which she most ardently desired. Yet the errors of her life and writings were more the result of her unfortunate early training, than any want of principle. The brutal cruelty of her father made her believe in the necessity of woman's becoming able to defend herself. She did not see that the true way to remedy the evils of society was to increase the moral power of the world; that woman is the depositary of this power; and that she must cultivate, in Christian meekness, her heavenly gifts; and thus, by the exhibition of moral graces, and by her influence in training her sons, finally win man to use his physical strength and mental power for her protection and enlightenment. In short, that to bring about the true Christian civilization, which only can improve the condition of our sex, the men must become more like women, and the women more like angels.

GOMEZ, MAGDALENE ANGELINA PAISSON DE,

A FRENCH author, was the daughter of Paul Paisson, a player, and born at Paris, in 1684. She married M. de Gomez, a Spanish gentleman, of small fortune, in whose circumstances she was deceived. She, however, procured sufficient, by her writings, to live at St. Germaine-en-Laye; she died there, in 1770. Her works were numerous, chiefly romances, which were well written, and have been much esteemed. Those most celebrated were "Les Journées Amusantes," 8 vols.; "Crementine," 2 vols.; "Anecdotes Persans," 2 vols.; "Les Cent Nouvelles," 8 vols. She also wrote several tragedies, which were unsuccessful.

GONZAGA-COLONNA, JULIA,

DUCHESS of Traietto, and countess of Fondi, was married, when very young, to duke Vespasian Colonna, a man older than her father; but it seems he gained her heart. She was, in a few years after her marriage, left a widow, rich, exceedingly beautiful, and "the great attractions of her person were surpassed, if possible, by the qualifications of her mind." The first noblemen in Italy made proposals for her hand; but notwithstanding the duke her husband had been old and infirm, she paid the highest respect to his memory, and determined never to marry a second time. The fame of her charms extended beyond her own country, and at length reached the Ottoman Porte. The sultan, Soliman II., determined to obtain her by force, as he could not gain her by other means. The commander of his navy, Ariadne Barbarossa, undertook to seize and carry her off; arriving at Fondi, in the night, with two thousand soldiers, he found little difficulty in scaling the walls. The inhabitants of Fondi, alarmed by the appearance of the invaders, and ignorant of the purpose for which they had come, rushed out of their houses, uttering the most doleful shrieks. The beautiful duchess, awakened by these cries of terror, escaped from her chamber-window, and fled to the mountains, where she was assailed by fresh terrors, for a desperate banditti made these mountains their haunt. She fell into their hands; but, moved by her appeals, or restrained by divine providence, these outcasts treated her with respect, and restored her to freedom.

The duchess devoted her time chiefly to literature, and her genius, beauty, and virtues, gained her many flattering tributes from the distinguished philosophers and poets of that age. Bernardo Tasso, father of Torquato, complimented her by name in his Amadis; and after her decease, which occurred April 19th, 1566, Ariosto thus commemorates her:

"Giulia Gonzaga che dovunque il piede
Volge e dovunque i sereni occhi gira
Non pur ogn' altra di beltà la cede,
Ma come Dea dal cejl scesa l'ammira."

Julia was suspected of Lutheranism; and though she never acknowledged this, yet as she died without the usual Catholic ceremonies, the presumption is, that she was Protestant in her heart.

GONZAGA, LUCRETIA,

An illustrious Italian lady of the sixteenth century, was as remarkable for her wit and learning, as for high birth. She wrote such beautiful letters, that the utmost care was taken to preserve them; and a collection of them was printed at Venice in 1552. There is no learning in her letters, yet we perceive by them that she was learned; for, in a letter to Robertellus, she says, that his Commentaries had shown her the true meaning of several obscure passages in Aristotle and Æschylus. All the wits of her time commended her highly; and Hortensio Lando, besides singing her praises, dedicated to her a piece written in Italian, "Upon moderating the passions of the soul." They corresponded, and more than thirty of her letters to him have been printed. In one of these she blames him for grieving at his poverty: "I wonder," she writes, "that you, who are a learned man, and so well acquainted with the affairs of this world, should yet be so strangely vexed at being poor: as though you did not know that a poor man's life is like sailing near the coast, whereas that of a rich man resembles the condition of those who are in the main sea. The former can easily throw a cable on the shore, and bring their ship safe into an harbour; whereas the latter cannot do it without much danger and difficulty."

We learn from these letters that her marriage with John Paul Manfrone was unhappy. She was not fourteen when she was married to him against her own consent; yet she treated him with due respect and obedience, though his conduct gave her great uneasiness. He engaged in a conspiracy against the duke of Ferrara; was detected and imprisoned by him; but, though condemned, not put to death. She did all in her power to obtain his release; applied to every man of importance in Christendom to intercede for him; and even solicited the Grand Seigneur to make himself master of the castle where her husband was kept. But her endeavours were vain, for he died in prison, after having shown such impatience under his sufferings as made many persons imagine that he had lost his senses. She lived afterwards in honourable widowhood, though several men of rank were her suitors. On being solicited to contract a second marriage, she answered, with indignation, "Scarcely have I dried the tears, and suppressed the sighs, which the destiny of my unfortunate husband extorted from me, when you press me to form new engagements. Know you not, that second marriages have been deemed unchaste? Virgil makes his Dido call them criminal. No, I will have no other husband than Jesus Christ, to whom I am resolved to dedicate my future life." On another occasion, she frankly declared, that she had suffered too much in a conjugal state again to subject herself to the yoke, from which God had freed her, even though a husband, richer than Croesus, wiser than Lelius, or handsomer than Nireus, should offer himself. Of four daughters which Lucretia bore to her husband, two only survived, whom she dedicated to a conventual life. Her writings were held in so much esteem, for the graces of her style, that even the notes she wrote to her domestics were carefully collected, and many of them preserved in the edition of her letters. She was a kind mistress, careful even to the settlement of her domestics in life, as a reward of their services. She wrote many letters to her friends and acquaintances on various subjects, in a strain of admirable morality; and in all her conduct was an example to her sex, and a blessing to society.

GONZAGA, COLONNA IPPOLITA.

DON Ferrante Gonzaga, one of the most renowned captains of the emperor Charles V., had very singular ideas on the subject of education; ideas that met with little approval among his own sex at that day, and would find as little at present. He said that all exercises of the head and intellect tended to render men good for nothing; that military discipline, the use of arms, skill in horsemanship, were to be taught young noblemen; their moral training was to be patience, perseverance, long-suffering, bravery. As to women, it was quite another thing; their domain was in-doors; and as it was good for the world that science and literature should advance and embellish life, and add to its comforts, somebody must attend to these; nothing more clear, then, argued don Ferrante, than that this is "woman's mission."

He had an opportunity of acting upon this theory, for he was the father of ten sons, all younger than his daughter Ippolita, who was born in 1535. She had, from her infancy, masters of the first intelligence for every science; and nature having endowed her with uncommon ability, her progress in every department of literature soon rendered her famous. Her father, becoming governor of Milan, brought her into a brilliant and courtly circle, where her personal charms, and the wealth and importance of her family, attracted many suitors, undeterred by her extraordinary learning. She formed a marriage of love with Fabrizio Colonna, a Roman nobleman, who had distinguished himself in a military capacity. This union seems to have been one of great happiness; but it was of short duration. Fabrizio died in the flower of youth. His widow, after the manifestation of violent grief, sought solace in literature. Her house soon became the resort of all the eminent writers of the age; the most extravagant tributes of admiration were offered to her by the poets; nor were scientific or grave writers behind-hand in pouring out homage to a woman whose beauty, high rank, and talents, seemed to warrant this sort of adulation. In the meantime, her brothers grew up in the greatest ignorance; her uncle, the cardinal Ereule, bishop of Mantua, interceded in favour of the heir of the family, don Cesare; he urged his brother to allow his eldest son some few of the advantages he had lavished on his daughter! In vain! Don Ferrante, firm to his theory, refused that the smallest part of the "ample page of knowledge" should be "unrolled" to the modern Cæsar.

Ippolita formed a second union with the count Caraffa, but it was productive of nothing but misery. The count Caraffa took umbrage at the crowd of literati and artists who surrounded his wife. She was not willing to abandon her habits and tastes; discord was fomented by the count's mother, a narrow-minded woman, who detested her daughter-in-law: these disputes resulted in a legal separation; upon which occasion Ippolita received a letter from her father breathing the tenderest consolation, and recalling his darling to the bosom of her family. She was received with tenderness, but her spirits were broken. She gradually declined in health, and died at the age of twenty-eight.

She left a volume of poems, among which is celebrated, a sonnet written on the death of Irene of Spilimberg.

GOTTSCHED, LOUISA ADELGUNDE VICTORIA,

Was born at Dantzic, in 1713. Her maiden name was Kalmus. When only sixteen years of age, she married professor Gottsched, of the Leipsic university. She aided her husband in all his literary labours; and appeared, in a short time after her marriage, as an authoress under her own name. Her style is pronounced by critics as superior to that of her husband; though he enjoyed a great reputation as an author. She wrote a number of melo-dramas, and a very fine tragedy, "Panthæa." Her death occurred in 1762.

GOUGES, MARIE OLYMPE DE,

A NATIVE of Montauban. During the revolution she espoused the cause of the people, and made Mirabeau the hero of her writings. But the enormities of the Jacobins disgusted her; and when Louis XVI. was dragged before the tribunal she had the courage to demand the privilege of defending him. This heroic conduct, and her attacks on Marat and Robespierre, marked her out for death. She was guillotined November 3d, 1792, aged thirty-eight. She wrote several dramas. Her character as a woman was by no means irreproachable.

GOURNAY, MARY DE JARS, LADY OF,

A FRENCH woman of wit and learning, was related to several noble families in Paris, but born in Gascony, in 1565. She had a strong turn for literature, and was so delighted with Montaigne's Essays, that, on her father's death, she adopted Montaigne in his stead, even before she had seen him. When he was at Paris in 1588, she visited him, and prevailed on him to pass two or three months with her and her mother, the lady Gournay. Mademoiselle de Jars became so wedded to books in general, and Montaigne's Essays in particular, that she resolved never to have any other associate. Nor was Montaigne ungrateful for her admiration. He foretold, in his second book of Essays, that she would be capable of first-rate productions. The connection was carried through the family. Montaigne's daughter, the viscountess de Jamaches, always claimed Mademoiselle de Jars as a sister. In 1634, after Montaigne's death, she revised and reprinted an edition of his Essays, with a preface, full of the strongest expressions of devotion to his memory.

She published a volume of prose and verse in 1636, called "Les Avis et les Presens de la Demoiselle de Gournai." She was never married, but received a small pension from the court. She died in 1645, at Paris.

GRACE, MRS.

The maiden name of this ingenious woman is not known. She was the daughter of a shoemaker, and without any regular instruction, succeeded so well in painting portraits as not only to support her family, but also to realize twenty thousand pounds. She frequently exhibited with the Society of Artists in London; and in 1767 produced an historical picture. She left London for Homerton, where she died about 1786.

GRAFFIGNY, FRANÇOISE D'HAPPONCOURT,

Was the daughter of a great-niece of the celebrated engraver Callot. Her disposition gentle and serious, her judgment excellent, she was benevolent and affectionate, and much esteemed by her numerous friends. Her "Lettres Peruviennes" obtained great celebrity. Their variety of description, richness of imagery, and impassioned interest, have been justly admired. She also composed a comedy of the genre larmoyante, which contains many ingenious thoughts, but is negligently finished.

Madame de Graffigny sometimes told with mortification, that her mother, having inherited a vast number of the copperplates of the great Callot, sent one day for a brazier and had them all melted down, and made into kitchen utensils.

In her married life she suffered much unkindness from an unworthy husband. Becoming a widow, in 1740 she went to Paris in the suite of Mademoiselle de Guise, little foreseeing the honours that awaited her in the literary world. Her reputation was formed in the capital while she was unconscious of it. Several men of letters engaged her assistance in a periodical production that had a vogue at that time. She wrote for them a tale entitled "Bad examples produce as many virtues as vices." This story is filled with maxims, of which the very title is one. Madame de Graffigny began the career of an author at rather a late period of life; but no want of spirit or animation is to be objected to her writings. Besides many other dramatic and imaginative works, she composed three or four little plays for the young, which were represented in Vienna by the children of the emperor, who gave her a pension. These were of a moral tendency, and written with a characteristic simplicity. She died in 1758.

GRAHAM, ISABELLA,

Was born in the county of Lanark, Scotland, in 1742. Her parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Marshall, educated her carefully and religiously. In 1765, she became acquainted with Dr. John Graham, a physician of Paisley, whom she afterwards married, and by whom she had four children. Soon after their marriage, her husband was ordered to his regiment, then in Canada. Four of the happiest years of her life were spent in that country, when Dr. Graham was ordered to Antigua, where he died, in 1774. Mrs. Graham then returned to her father in Scotland, where, by taking charge of the education of some young ladies, she supported her aged father, herself, and her children.

In 1789, Mrs. Graham returned to America, and opened a seminary for young ladies in New York, in which she was very successful. She was also eminent as a public benefactor, being the projector, the founder, and one of the most efficient members, of the "Widow's Society," the "Orphans' Asylum," and a "Society for the Promotion of Industry." She devoted her time, talents, influence and earnings, to the building up of these useful charities; even performing the office of teacher for some time in the Orphans' School, before the funds were sufficient to pay an instructor. Few women have accomplished such efficient services for public good as did this truly noble woman; she not only worked herself in the cause of her heavenly Master, but she had that peculiar faculty, the gift of persuasion, which moved the hearts of many to work with her, who, without such an exemplar and monitor, would never have entered on these plans of doing good. Mrs. Graham was also gifted with genius; her talents, hallowed by piety, and devoted to duty, were of the high order which would have gained her a wide reputation for literature, had she lent herself to its pursuits. Her familiar letters are models of the best style; and the fragments of her poetry, found among her papers, entitled "Provision for my last Journey through the Wilderness," &c., show the poetic feeling which slumbered in her heart, or rather was absorbed by her love of God and her ceaseless service in His cause. She had, in this life, the reward of seeing her exertions crowned with wonderful success; and the blessing of a peaceful and happy death seemed the fitting close of an earthly career which was to open for her an eternity of glory and blessedness. She died, July 27th, 1814. But her spirit has not passed away; it animates her descendants; her daughter, Mrs. Bethune, and the only son of this daughter, Rev. George W. Bethune, who carry on and out the holy principles of benevolence of Isabella Graham. Her "Life and Writings" are widely known, many editions having been published in Scotland and England; and probably more than fifty thousand copies have been printed in America. We give only one extract, a poem. Its pious resignation will comfort those who mourn as she mourned.

WIDOWHOOD.

Written in the Island of Antigua shortly after Dr. Graham's death

Hail! thou state of widowhood,
State of those that mourn to God;
Who from earthly comforts torn,
Only live to pray and mourn.

Meanest of the number, I
For my dear companion sigh;
Patiently my loss deplore,
Mourn for one that mourns no more.

Me my consort hath outrun,
Out of sight he quite has gone;
He his course has finish'd here,
First come to the sepulchre.

Following on with earnest haste,
Till my mourning days are past,
I my partner's steps pursue,
I shall soon be happy too;

Find the ease for which I pant,
Gain the only good I want;
Quietly lay down my head,
Sink into my earthly bed.

There my flesh shall rest in hope,
Till the quicken'd dust mount up;
When to glorious life I'll rise,
To meet my husband in the skies.

GRANT, ANNE,

WHOSE maiden name was Mac Vicar, was born at Glasgow, Scotland, in February, 1755. When a child, she came with her father, who was an officer in the British army, to America, and spent some time in the interior of New York. While residing near Albany, Miss Mac Vicar was introduced to the notice of Madame Schuyler, wife, or widow rather, of Colonel Philip Schuyler; and to this "American lady," the English maiden, afterwards Mrs. Grant, acknowledges she owed "whatever of culture her mind received." Respecting the effect which a residence in the then American colonies had, Mrs. Grant, many years afterwards, says: "I was fond of it to enthusiasm, and spent the most delightful and fanciful period of my life in it, for mine was a very premature childhood. The place where I resided was the most desirable in the whole continent; there my first perceptions of pleasure, and there my earliest habits of thinking, were formed; and from thence I drew that high relish for the sublime simplicity of nature which has ever accompanied me. This has been the means of preserving a certain humble dignity in all the difficulties I have had to struggle through."

She returned to Scotland in 1768, and in 1779 married the Rev. Mr. Grant, of Laggan, by whom she had several children. On the death of her husband, in 1801, being obliged to resort to her pen for subsistence, she wrote "The Highlanders, and other Poems," "Memoirs of an American Lady," "Letters from the Mountains," "Essays on the Superstitions of the Highlands of Scotland," &c. She died on the 7th of November, 1838, at Edinburgh, where she resided during the latter part of her life, and where she was the centre of a circle of accomplished and literary people. From 1825 till her death she enjoyed a royal pension of one hundred pounds yearly, which, with the emoluments derived from her writings, and some liberal bequests, rendered her quite independent.

Among the productions of Mrs. Grant, her "Memoirs of an American Lady" ranks the first in interest and power; but all she wrote was good. Sir Walter Scott has thus given testimony to her worth and genius:

"The character and talents of Mrs. Grant have long rendered her, not only a useful and estimable member of society, but one eminent for the services which she has rendered to the cause of religion, morality, knowledge, and taste. Her literary works, although composed amidst misfortune and privation, are written at once with simplicity and force; and uniformly bear the stamp of a virtuous and courageous mind, recommending to the reader that patience and fortitude, which the writer herself practised in such an eminent degree. Her writings, deservedly popular in her own country, derive their success from the manner in which, addressing themselves to the national pride of the Scottish people, they breathe a spirit at once of patriotism, and of that candour which renders patriotism unselfish and liberal. We have no hesitation in attesting our belief that Mrs. Grant's writings have produced a strong and salutary effect upon her countrymen, who not only found recorded in them much of national history and antiquities, which would otherwise have been forgotten, but found them combined with the soundest and best lessons of virtue and morality."

We subjoin a poem of Mrs. Grant's, which is characteristic of her turn of thought and her cherished feelings.

ON A SPRIG OF HEATH.

Flower of the waste! the heath-fowl shuns
For thee the brake and tangled wood—
To thy protecting shade she runs.
Thy tender buds supply her food;
Her young forsake her downy plumes,
To rest upon thy opening blooms.

Flower of the desert though thou art!
The deer that range the mountain free,
The graceful doe, the stately hart,
Their food and shelter seek from thee;
The bee thy earliest blossom greets,
And drains from thee her choicest sweets.

Gem of the heath! whose modest bloom
Sheds beauty o'er the lonely moor;
Though thou dispense no rich perfume,
Nor yet with splendid tints allure,
Both valour's crest and beauty's bower
Oft hast thou decked, a favourite flower.

Flower of the wild! whose purple glow
Adorns the dusky mountain's side,
Not the gay hues of Iris' bow,
Nor garden's artful varied pride,
With all its wealth of sweets, could cheer.
Like thee, the hardy mountaineer.

Flower of his heart; thy fragrance mild
Of peace and freedom seem to breathe;
To pluck thy blossoms in the wild,
And deck his bonnet with the wreath,
Where dwelt of old his rustic sires,
Is all his simple wish desires.

Flower of his dear-loved native land !
 Alas, when distant far more dear !
 When he from some cold foreign strand,
 Looks homeward through the blending tear,
 How must his aching heart deplore,
 The home and thee he sees no more !

GREVILLE, MRS.,

WIFE of Fulke Greville, was a celebrated wit and beauty in English society during the last century. She wrote, about 1753, a "Prayer for Indifference," which was long very popular. The beautiful Mrs. Crewe was the daughter of Mrs. Greville. Her maiden name was Fanny M'Cartney. Mrs. Greville was the author of "Maxims and Characters," published in 1756, and some other works; but none are now of much account except the

PRAYER FOR INDIFFERENCE.

Oft I've implored the gods in vain,
 And prayed till I've been weary;
 For once I'll try my wish to gain
 Of Oberon the Fairy.

Sweet airy being, wanton sprite,
 That lurk'st in woods unseen,
 And oft by Cynthia's silver light
 Tripp'st gaily o'er the green;

If e'er thy pitying heart was moved,
 As ancient stories tell,
 And for th' Athenian maid who loved
 Thou found'st a wondrous spell;

Oh deign once more t' exert thy pow'r !
 Haply some herb or tree,
 Sov'reign as juice of western flower,
 Conceals a balm for me.

I ask no kind return of love,
 No tempting charm to please;
 Far from the heart those gifts remove
 That sighs for peace and ease:

No peace nor ease the heart can know,
 Which, like the needle true,
 Turns at the touch of joy or woe,
 But, turning, trembles too.

Far as distress the soul can wound,
 'Tis pain in each degree;
 'Tis bliss but to a certain bound,
 Beyond, is agony.

Take then this treacherous sense of mine,
 Which dooms me still to smart;
 Which pleasure can to pain refine,
 To pain new pangs impart.

Oh haste to shed the sacred balm !
 My shattered nerves new string;
 And for my guest, serenely calm,
 The nymph Indifference bring.

* * * * *
 And what of life remains for me
 I'll pass in sober ease;
 Half pleased, contented will I be,
 Content but half to please.

GREY, LADY JANE,

Was an illustrious personage of the blood-royal of England by both parents; her grandmother on her father's side, Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, being queen-consort to Edward IV.; and her grandmother on her mother's, lady Frances Brandon, being daughter to Henry VII., and queen-dowager of France. Lady Jane was born in 1537, at Bradgate, her father's seat in Leicestershire, and very early gave astonishing proofs of her talents. She was considered superior to Edward VI., who was about the same age, and was thought a prodigy. She embroidered and wrote beautifully, played admirably on various instruments, and accompanied them with a voice exquisitely sweet and well cultivated. These, however, were only inferior ornaments in her character; and, far from priding herself upon them, from her parents' severity in exacting them, they became a source of grief rather than pleasure.

Her father had himself an inclination to letters, and was a great patron of the learned. He had two chaplains, Harding and Aylmer, both men of distinguished learning, whom he employed as tutors to his daughter; and under whose instructions she made such proficiency as amazed them both. Her own language she spoke and wrote with the utmost accuracy; and she not only understood the French, Italian, Latin, and Greek, but spoke and wrote them with the greatest freedom. She was also versed in Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic; and all this while a mere child. She had a sedateness of temper, a quickness of apprehension, and a solidity of judgment, that enabled her to understand the sciences; so that she thought, spoke, and reasoned, upon subjects of the greatest importance, in a manner that surprised all. To these endowments were added the loveliest graces of woman, mildness, humility, and modesty. Her natural fondness for literature was much increased by the severity of her parents in the feminine part of her education; for, by the gentleness of her tutor, Aylmer, in the fulfilment of his duties, he won her to love what he taught. Her alliance to the crown, and the great esteem in which the marquis of Dorset, her father, was held both by Henry VIII. and Edward VI., unavoidably brought her sometimes to court; and she received many marks of Edward's favour. Yet she generally continued in the country at Bradgate.

It was there that the famous Roger Ascham was on a visit in August, 1550; and all the rest of the family being out hunting, he went to the apartment of the lady Jane, and found her reading Plato's Phædon in the original Greek. Astonished at this, he asked her, why she lost such pastime as there must needs be in the park; at which she answered, smiling, "I wist all their sport in the park is but a shadow to that pleasure that I find in Plato. Alas, good folk, they never felt what true pleasure meant."

This naturally leading him to inquire how a lady of her age had attained to such a depth of pleasure, both in the Platonic language and philosophy, she made the following remarkable answer:

"I will tell you, and I will tell you a truth which perchance you will marvel at. One of the greatest benefits which ever God gave me is, that he sent me so sharp and severe parents, and so gentle a schoolmaster. For when I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speak, keep silence, sit, stand, or go, eat, drink, be merry or sad, be sewing, playing, dancing, or doing anything else, I am so sharply taunted, so cruelly threatened, yea presently sometimes with pinches, nips, and bobs, and other ways (which I will not name for the honour I bear them) so without measure misordered, that I think myself in hell, till time come that I must go to Mr. Aylmer, who teacheth me so gently, so pleasantly, with such fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing while I am with him; and, when I am called from him, I fall on weeping; because, whatever I do else but learning, is full of grief, trouble, fear, and wholly misliking unto me. And thus my book hath been so much my pleasure, and bringeth daily to me more pleasure and more, and that in respect of it all other pleasures in very deed be but trifles and troubles unto me." Ascham was deeply affected by this speech and interview.

In 1553, she was married to lord Guilford Dudley; and, shortly afterwards, reluctantly accepted the diadem, which the intrigues of her father and her father-in-law had induced. But ascending the throne was only a step on her way to the scaffold. Nine days only did she wear the crown; the nation acknowledged the right of Mary, eldest daughter of Henry VIII.; and the lady Jane and her husband were sent to the Tower. They had committed a crime against the state, in accepting the sovereignty which by birth belonged to Mary; but as she had suffered no loss, and the offenders were so young, and had been persuaded by others, it was hoped their lives would be spared. But the boon of mercy was not for them; and in February, 1554, they were brought to the block.

Although the queen, seeming to desire the salvation of her victims, sent the most learned and subtle priests to exhort the lady Jane to a change of faith, she defended her opinions with ability and resolution; and her part in this conference is highly commended by bishop Burnet, and other ecclesiastical historians. She wrote several letters in her confinement, one to her sister, in Greek, exhorting her to maintain, in every trial, that fortitude and perseverance of which she trusted to give her the example. Another one was addressed to her father's chaplain, Dr. Harding, who had apostatized from his religion, imploring him to prefer his conscience to his safety. She also wrote four epistles in Latin, two of them the night before her execution, on the blank leaves of her Greek Testament.

She refused to consent to her husband's entreaties for a last interview, alleging that the tenderness of their parting would overcome their fortitude, and that they should soon meet where no disappointment, misfortune, or death could disturb them.

As she beheld from her window her husband led to execution, having given him a token of her remembrance, she calmly awaited her own fate. On her way to the scaffold, she was met by the cart that bore the lifeless body of lord Guilford; this forced from her some tears, that were quickly dried by the report of his courage and constancy.

Sir John Gage, constable of the Tower, entreated her to give him some token of remembrance, and she presented him with her tablets, in which she had just written three sentences in Greek, Latin, and English, suggested by seeing the dead body of her husband; importing that he, whom human laws had condemned, would be saved by Divine mercy; and that if her own fault deserved punishment, it would, she trusted, be extenuated by her youth and inexperience. At the scaffold, without breathing a complaint against the severity of her punishment, she attested her innocence of intentional wrong; her crime, she said, had not been ambition, but a want of firmness in resisting the instances of those whom she had been accustomed to revere and obey. She concluded her remarks with a solemn profession of her faith, and devoutly repeated a psalm in English.

The executioner knelt to implore her forgiveness, which she granted readily, adding, "I pray you, despatch me quickly." Then kneeling, and saying, "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit," she meekly submitted to her fate. She was hardly seventeen at the time of her death.

We are glad to record, for the credit of that age, and of humanity, that the cruel fate of this lovely lady was universally pitied; and the memory of her virtues has ever excited the highest admiration.

On the wall of the room in which the lady Jane was imprisoned in the Tower, she wrote with a pin the following lines:

"Non aliena putes homini quæ obtingere possunt:
Sors hodierna mihi, cras erit illa tibi."

"Think not, O mortal, vainly gay,
That thou from human woes art free;
The bitter cup I drink to-day,
To-morrow may be drunk by thee."

"Deo juvante, nil nocet livor malus,
Et non juvante, nil juvat labor gravis,
Post tenebras spero lucem."

"Harmless all malice if our God is nigh;
Fruitless all pains, if he his help deny.
Patient I pass these gloomy hours away,
And wait the morning of eternal day."

GRIERSON, CONSTANTIA,

Was born in the county of Kilkenny, in Ireland. She was considered an excellent scholar, not only in Greek and Roman literature, but in history divinity, philosophy, and mathematics. She gave a proof of her knowledge of Latin by her dedication of the Dublin edition of Tacitus to Lord Carteret, and that of Terence to his son, to whom she also wrote a Greek epigram. She also composed several fine poems, in English; and was a woman of exemplary piety and virtue. What made these extraordinary talents yet more surprising, was, that her parents were poor, illiterate, country people, and she had no instruction but the little the minister of the parish gave her, when she found time from her needle-work, to which she was closely kept by her mother.

When Lord Carteret was lord-lieutenant of Ireland, he obtained a patent for Mr. Grierson, her husband, to be the king's printer; and, to distinguish and reward her uncommon merit, had her life inserted in it. Whether owing to her own desire or the envy of those around her, very few of her various and beautiful writings were ever published. She died in 1733, at the early age of twenty-seven.

GRIFFITH, ELIZABETH,

A NOVELIST and dramatic writer of some eminence, first distinguished herself by "The Letters of Henry and Frances," which contained the genuine correspondence between her and her husband before their marriage. She also wrote "Memoirs of Ninon de l'Enclos," the "Morality of Shakespeare's Dramas Illustrated," three novels, four comedies, and "Essays addressed to Young Married Women." She died in Ireland, in 1793.

GRIGNAN, FRANCES, COUNTESS DE,

DAUGHTER of the celebrated Madame Sevigné, was born in 1646. In 1669, she married Count Grignan, an officer of high rank at the court of Louis XIV. Her residence in Provence with her husband, and at a distance from her mother, was the cause of the writing of those excellent letters which passed between the mother and daughter. She had two daughters and one son. Her life owes all its celebrity to the interest excited by the letters of her mother. The death of the Countess de Grignan occurred in 1705.

GROTIUS, MARY,

DAUGHTER of Baron Reigesberg, of Zealand, was married to the renowned Hugh Grotius, July, 1608. She proved herself worthy of her illustrious husband; was his confidant and counsellor in all his pursuits, and by her fortitude and persevering affection sustained him in every reverse of fortune. When, in 1619, he was sentenced, for his political writings, to imprisonment for life in the fortress of Louvestein, she petitioned to accompany him. This was granted, on condition that if she went into the prison she should never come out. She agreed to this, but finally was allowed to go out twice a week. In prison, Grotius devoted himself entirely to his literary pursuits, while his true wife was studying how to effect his liberation. She accomplished this in the following manner.

She had been permitted to borrow books of his friends for him, and when he had used the books, they were carried back in a chest in which his linen was carried to and from his laundress. The first year his guards were very exact in examining the chest; but being used to find nothing in it besides books and linen, they grew remiss, and did not take the trouble to open it. Madame Grotius observed this, and proposed her plan. She represented to her husband that it was in his power to get out of prison, if he would put himself into this chest. But to prevent any danger to his health, she caused holes to be bored opposite to where his face was to be, so that he might breathe freely; and persuaded him to try if he could remain shut up in that confined posture (the chest was only three and a half feet in length) as long as it would require to go from Louvestein to Gorcum. Finding it might be done, she then watched for a favourable opportunity to make the attempt. The commandant being called away, this faithful wife contrived to get her husband carried out in the chest, as though it were filled with books, while she remained in prison, pretending that he was very ill. Thus Grotius escaped, and went to Paris, where he had many friends. She was, for a time, confined and treated with great rigour; but finally released, and allowed to join her husband.

Subsequently, when he wished to return to Holland, she went first to prepare the way. And then, when she made a journey into Zealand, to pick up the remains of their fortune, his biographer observes: "Time passed horribly with Grotius till the return of his wife. She had always been his consolation in adversity. In truth, the most important works of this wonderful man owe their perfection, if not their origin, to her. She encouraged his plans, assisted him in preparing his writings for the press, and was his guardian and guiding angel through all the perils and perplexities of his life."

GROUCHY, SOPHIA,

SISTER of Marshal Grouchy, and widow of the celebrated French philosopher, Condorcet, was a successful writer and translator. She translated two works of Adam Smith into French; and she added "Letters on Sympathy," in which Madame Condorcet supplies some omissions of the author, whom she examines, modifies, and often combats. Her translation is remarkable for the elegance and purity of its style, the ideas and severity of philosophical language. This lady composed a treatise for the education of her daughter, which remains unpublished. She died in 1822 universally regretted.

GUILLAUME, JACQUETTE,

A FRENCH lady of the seventeenth century, wrote a work entitled "Les Dames illustres: où, par bonnes et fortes Raisons, il se prouve que le sexe féminin surpasse en toute sorte de Genre le sexe masculin." In this performance, published in 1665, the writer attempts to prove the superiority of the female over the male sex, through the whole human and animal creation. The style is elegant and unaffected, and the examples and observations show knowledge and research. She did not, however, dwell sufficiently on the kind of superiority she claimed for woman over man—that it was moral, not mental or physical power which the female sex was ordained to wield. Nor did she distinguish sufficiently between the manifestations of the distinctive characters of man and woman: that the power of the first was centred in the reason and the will; of the last, in the conscience and the affections. She had never studied the Bible, which is the grand charter of woman's rights, and the only true expositor of her duties.

GUIZOT, CHARLOTTE PAULINE,

Was born in Paris, in 1773. Her father, M. de Meulan, lost all his fortune by the Revolution, and dying in 1790, left a widow and five children almost totally destitute. Pauline de Meulan, the eldest, commenced writing in order to contribute to the support of her family. Her first attempt was a novel, which was successful, and then she became one of the most popular contributors to a journal established at Paris, called "The Publiciste." In 1807, while suffering under an illness brought on by over-exertion, which compelled her to give up writing, the only resource of her mother and herself, she received an article written in happy imitation of her style, accompanied by an anonymous letter, in which she was informed that till her health should be restored, a similar article should be sent to her for each number of the Publiciste. These articles came with the utmost regularity; and on her recovery, she discovered the writer of them to be M. Guizot. He had heard of her, read and admired her writings, and they soon became friends. In 1812, Mademoiselle de Meulan married her benefactor; and though she was fourteen years older than her husband, their union was a very happy one. The purity and severity of her moral nature exercised great influence over her husband; and she also assisted him in his literary labours. The perfect accord of their sentiments rendered this easy for her, and he thus gained for himself increased honour and fame. She died in 1827. Her first works were novels, called "The Contradictions," and the "Chapel of Ayton." She afterwards published "Essays on Literature and Morals." In 1821, she gave to the public a work for youth, called "Raoul the Scholar," which has been translated into English, and enjoyed extensive circulation. This was followed by "Letters on Domestic Education," the best monument Madame Guizot has left of her talents and fame. Among all the French female authors, no one has more consistently and constantly advocated the cause of truth and good morals than this excellent lady.

GUIZOT, ELISE MARGARETTA,

Was born in Paris, in 1804. Her father, James Dillon, sprang from a branch of the Irish family of that name, which followed James II. of England in his banishment to France. He married Henrietta de Meulan, sister of Pauline, the first wife of M. Guizot. Madame Dillon was left a widow at an early age, with small means, and the charge of two children, Elise and Pauline. She, however, proved herself equal to this difficult situation. Frugal, simple in her tastes, gifted with an hereditary quickness of intellect, she brought up her daughters in a most admirable manner. Elise, from the dawn of her understanding, manifested unusual aptness for acquirement, and extraordinary love for study. Upon the death of her mother, which occurred while she was a very young girl, she assumed the responsibility of managing the family and bringing up her sister Pauline. These duties she discharged with zeal and discernment, until the illness of her aunt, Madame Guizot, of the preceding sketch, for whom she entertained a peculiar affection, required her society and skill as a nurse, during an excursion to the baths of Plombieres. Madame Guizot was much older than her husband, whom she loved with that affection peculiar to woman, which regards the advantage of its object. Setting aside personal considerations, she felt that her husband's happiness would be secured, if at a proper time after her death he could obtain the hand of a young lady whose mind and character she had herself formed, and whose tastes and habits were, as she knew, perfectly congenial with his. She therefore recommended to him this marriage, which actually took place after the lapse of over a year of mourning was expired. This union seems to have been fraught with happiness to both parties. Madame Elise Guizot preserved her simplicity as wife of the minister, and used her influence, and added fortune only to promote plans of utility and beneficence. M. Guizot's political and literary life is too well known to demand any detail; but that he has maintained through every temptation and trial his consistency of principle, and his untarnished honour, is doubtless to be ascribed, in a great measure, to the purity of heart and uncommon culture of mind which distinguished his two successive wives. Even after their decease, the memory of their pious examples was to him as guardian angels amid the perils of power and the seductions of flattery. Madame Elise Guizot died in 1833, universally regretted, leaving three young children to her husband's care. She was beloved by all her connexions; the warmth of her heart being as remarkable as the brilliancy of her intellect. She wrote some works of an ethical character; several novels, somewhat in the style of those of Miss Martineau; and she was a constant contributor to the "Revue Française," in valuable Essays upon English, German, and Italian Literature.

GUYARD, ADELAIDE SABILLE,

WAS born at Paris in 1749, and acquired a merited reputation by her portraits in miniature, crayons, and oil. She married M. Vincent, a distinguished artist. She died in 1803, partly of grief at the destruction of a favourite picture which had cost her several years' labour, by the revolutionary fanatics.

GUYON, JEANNE MARIE BOUVIER DE LA MOTTE,

THE friend of the celebrated Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray, and memorable for her sufferings in defence of her religious opinions, was the descendant of a noble family, and born at Montargis in France, April 13th, 1648. At seven years of age she was sent to the convent of the Ursulines; here the sensibility of her constitution and temper, aided by the impressions received in a monastic life, gave her an early propensity to enthusiasm. The confessor of Henrietta Marie, widow of Charles I., struck by the character and ardour of the young devotee, presented her, when scarcely eight years old, to the queen, who, but for the opposition of her parents, would have retained her in her family.

Jeanne was desirous of taking the veil, but was overruled by her father, who obliged her to marry M. Guyon, a wealthy gentleman. This union was not a very happy one; and at the age of twenty-eight Madame Guyon was left a widow, with two sons and a daughter, of whom she was appointed sole guardian. The first years of her widowhood she devoted to the regulation of her domestic affairs, the education of her children, and the management of their fortune; in which employments she discovered great energy and capacity. By these occupations, however, she was not prevented from conforming to the ceremonials of the Catholic church, which she continued to observe with a rigorous austerity.

In the midst of these duties, she was suddenly seized with a spiritual impulse; and, under the delusions of a heated imagination, she abandoned the common affairs of life, to deliver herself up to sublime chimeras. She went to Paris, where she became acquainted with M. d'Aranthon, bishop of Geneva, who prevailed on her to go to his diocese, to perfect an establishment founded by him at Gex, for the reception of newly converted Catholics. She went to Gex in 1681, accompanied by her little daughter. Some time after, her relations demanded of her a resignation of her office of guardian to her children, together with their fortunes, which amounted to forty thousand livres. She readily consented to this; and, reserving only a moderate income for herself, consigned over to her family the bulk of her property. The community of Gex, observing her liberality, asked the bishop to propose to Madame Guyon that she should bestow a pension on their house, and thereby constitute herself its superior. Her rejection of this proposal, on the plea of disapprobation of the regulations of the community, gave offence to the sisterhood and their patron, by whom she was desired to leave the house.

She then went to the Ursulines at Thonon, whence she proceeded to Turin, and thence to Grenoble: at length, by the invitation of the bishop, who venerated her piety, she retired to Verceil. After an absence of five years, which she had spent in teaching her doctrines, she returned, in 1686, to Paris, with a view of procuring medical aid. During her wanderings she had composed two tracts, entitled "A Short and Easy Method of Prayer," and "The Song of Songs, interpreted according to its Mystical Sense." Her irreproachable conduct, added to the novelty of her doctrines, which recommended prayer, contemplation, and divine love, as the sum and substance of religion, procured her many converts. The principles of Madame Guyon, which savoured of Platonic philosophy, diffused themselves daily throughout Paris, under the name of Quietism. Letters, from the provinces in which she had lived, complaining of the spread of her doctrines, completed their triumph by stimulating the curiosity of the multitude. The church, alarmed at a heresy which disparaged ceremonial devotion, prepared to resist the attack. Father la Combe, a Barnabite, and confessor to Madame Guyon, was the first who suffered. He was imprisoned. Madame Guyon herself was next confined, January, 1688, in the convent des Filles de la Visitation, where she was strictly interrogated, and detained for eight months. Her deliverance was at length effected by Madame Miranion, the superior of the convent, who represented her case to Madame de Maintenon. This lady pleaded her cause with Louis XIV., who liberated her, and she was introduced at St. Cyr, a convent erected by Madame de Maintenon.

Soon after her liberation, Madame Guyon was introduced to Fenelon, who became her disciple and friend. She was also distinguished by the notice of the dukes de Chevreuse and Beauvilliers men of merit and talents, and by ladies of the first distinction, who were attracted as much by the graces of her person and manners as by her doctrines.

The cry of heresy was again raised by the church, which, by its anathemas, gave importance to the sect it sought to crush. Madame Guyon was persuaded by her friends to submit her cause and her writings to the bishop of Meaux; who, after a conference with her, and perusing her papers, declared his satisfaction. The fury of the church was not, however, allayed; and an order was procured for the re-examination of the doctrines of Madame Guyon; who, in the mean time, retired to the convent of Meaux. Bossuet was at the head of the committee of examination, and Transeau, Fenelon, and the bishop of Chalons, were associated. At the end of six months, thirty-four arti cles were drawn up by the commissioners, to which Fenelon added four, to prove the harmlessness of Quietism. The thirty-four articles were signed by all the examiners, March 10th, 1695. Madame Guyon also put her signature to them, and signed a submission to censure passed by the bishop of Meaux the preceding April, against her tracts; by which she declared, that she had never meant to advocate anything contrary to the Catholic, apostolic, and Roman church. To this the bishop added an attestation, purporting that he was satisfied with the conduct of Madame Guyon, and had continued her in the participation of the holy sacrament. Thus acquitted, she returned to Paris, in the hope of finding safety and repose.

But the rage of bigotry was not yet exhausted; Madame Guyon became involved in the persecutions of Fenelon, and in less than a year was imprisoned, first in the castle of Vincennes, then in the convent Thomas à Geràrd, and at last in the Bastille. At a meeting of the general assembly of the clergy of France, in 1700, no evidence appearing against her, she was once more set at liberty.

She then went to visit her children, and settled near them at Blois. The remainder of her life she passed in retirement. The walls of her chamber, the tables and furniture, were covered with her numerous verses, which were printed after her death in five volumes, entitled "Cantiques Spirituels, ou d'Emblemes sur l'Amour divin." She also left twenty volumes of "Commentaries on the Bible;" and "Reflections and Explanations concerning the Inner Life;" and "Christian Discourses;" "Letters to several persons;" her own "Autobiography;" a volume of "Visitations;" and two volumes of "Opuscules." She died, June 9th, 1717.

G WYNNNE, ELEANOR,

BETTER known as Nell Gwynn, (her real name was Margaret Symcott,) rose from an orange-girl of the meanest description, to be the mistress of Charles II. of England. She first gained her bread by singing from tavern to tavern, and gradually rose to be a popular actress at the Theatre-Royal. She is said to have been exceedingly pretty, but below the ordinary height. In her elevation she showed great gratitude to Dryden, who had befriended her in her poverty. She was also faithful to her royal lover, and after his death retired from the world and passed the remainder of her life in seclusion. She died in 1691, and was pompously interred in the parish church of St. Martin's in the Fields; Dr. Tension, then vicar, afterwards bishop of Canterbury, preaching her funeral sermon. This sermon, it was reported, was shortly afterwards brought forward by lord Jersey to impede the Rev. doctor's preferment; but queen Mary, having heard the objection, answered gravely, "What then? I have heard as much; this is a sign that that poor unfortunate woman died penitent; for, if I can read a man's heart through his looks, had she not made a pious and Christian end, the doctor could never have been induced to speak well of her." This repentance is not recorded of any other mistress of the profligate king. "Poor Nelly" was the victim of circumstances, not the votary of vice; and of the inmates of that wicked and corrupt court, she only has won pity and forgiveness from posterity. She deserves this; for she was pitiful to others. In the time of her prosperity she never forgot to relieve distress; and at her death she left a fund for annual distribution at Christmas among the poor debtors, which is to this day distributed in the prisons of London. From Nell Gwynne descended the dukes of St. Albans.

H.

HABERT, SUSAN DE,

WIFE of Charles Jardin, an officer of the household of Henry III. of France, who became a widow in 1585, at the age of twenty-four, when she devoted herself to literature, especially philosophy, divinity, and the languages. She was a pious as well as learned woman. She died in 1633.

HALKET, LADY ANNE,

WHOSE extensive learning and voluminous theological writings place her in the first rank of female authors, was the daughter of Mr. Robert Murray, of the family of Tullibardine, and was born at London, January 4, 1622. Her father was preceptor to Charles I., and her mother subgoverness to the duke of Gloucester and the princess Elizabeth. Lady Anne was carefully educated by her parents in every polite and liberal science; but theology and physic were her favourite studies; and she became such a proficient in the latter science, and also in surgery, that the most eminent professional men, as well as invalids of every rank, both in Britain and on the continent, sought her advice.

Being a staunch royalist, her family and herself suffered with the misfortunes of Charles. She married, in March, 1656, Sir James Halket, to whom she bore four children, all of whom died young excepting her eldest son Robert. It was to him she addressed her admirable tract, "The Mother's Will to the Unborn Child," under the impression that she should not survive its birth. She died in 1699. During her lifetime there were published of her writings no less than twenty-one volumes, chiefly on religious subjects. She was a woman of the most singular and unaffected piety, and of the sweetest simplicity of manner; this, together with her great talents and learning, procured her the universal esteem of her contemporaries. She also left thirty-six books in manuscript, containing "Meditations."

HAMILTON, ELIZABETH,

WAS born in Belfast, in the year 1758. Her father was a merchant, of a Scottish family, and died early, leaving a widow and three children. The latter were educated and brought up by relatives in better circumstances;—Elizabeth, the youngest, being sent to Mr. Marshall, a farmer in Stirlingshire, married to her father's sister. Her brother obtained a cadetship in the East India Company's service, and an elder sister was retained in Ireland. A feeling of strong affection seems to have existed among these scattered members of the unfortunate family. Elizabeth found in Mr. and Mrs. Marshall all that could have been desired. She was adopted and educated with a care and tenderness that has seldom been equalled. "No child," she says, "ever spent so happy a life, nor have I ever met with anything at all resembling our way of living, except the description given by Rousseau of Wolmar's farm and vintage." A taste for literature soon appeared in Elizabeth Hamilton. Wallace was the first hero of her studies; but meeting with Ogilvie's translation of the Iliad, she idolized Achilles, and dreamed of Hector. She had opportunities of visiting Edinburgh and Glasgow, after which she carried on a learned correspondence with Doctor Moysie, a philosophical lecturer. She wrote also many copies of verses—that ordinary outlet for the warm feelings and romantic sensibilities of youth. Her first appearance in print was accidental. Having accompanied a pleasure party to the Highlands, she kept a journal for the gratification of her aunt, and the good woman showing it to one of her neighbours, it was sent to a provincial magazine. Her retirement in Stirlingshire was, in 1773, gladdened by a visit from her brother, then about to sail for India. Mr. Hamilton seems to have been an excellent and able young man, and his subsequent letters and conversations on Indian affairs stored the mind of his sister with the materials for her Hindoo Rajah, a work equally remarkable for good sense and sprightliness. In 1778, Miss Hamilton lost her aunt, whose death was a heavy blow to the happy family. For the ensuing six years she devoted herself to the cares and duties of the household, her only literary employments being her correspondence with her brother, and the composition of two short papers which she sent to the Lounger. Mr. Hamilton returned from India in 1786, in order that he might better fulfil an important duty intrusted to him, the translation of the Mussulman Code of Laws. It would not be easy to paint the joy and affection with which he was received by his sister. They spent the winter together in Stirlingshire, and in 1789, when her kind friend and protector, Mr. Marshall, died, she quitted Scotland, and rejoined her brother in London. Mr. Hamilton was cut off by a premature death, in 1792. Shortly after this period commenced the literary life of Elizabeth Hamilton, and her first work was "The Letters of a Hindoo Rajah," published in 1796. The success of this work decided her to pursue the career of authorship. She wrote, successively, "The Modern Philosophers;" "Letters on Education," an excellent book; "Memoirs of Agrippina," a work of great research; and "Letters to the Daughters of a Nobleman." This was published in the year 1806; and soon afterwards Miss Hamilton became an active promoter of the House of Industry, at Edinburgh, an establishment for the education of females of the lowest class. For the benefit of these young persons she composed a little book, "Exercises in Religious Knowledge," which was published in 1809, receiving the sanction of Bishop Sandford and Mr. Alison. The previous year, 1808, she published her most original, popular, and useful work, "The Cottagers of Glenburnie." Of this novel, or moral tale, a learned reviewer remarks: "It has probably been as effective in promoting domestic improvement among the rural population of Scotland as Johnson's Journey to the Hebrides was in encouraging the planting of trees by the landed proprietors. In both cases there was some exaggeration of colouring, but the pictures were too provokingly true and sarcastic to be laughed away or denied. They constituted a national reproach, and the only way to wipe it off was by timely reformation. There is still much to accomplish, but a marked improvement in the dwellings and internal economy of Scottish farm-houses and villages may be dated from the publication of the 'Cottagers of Glenburnie.'"

She wrote two works after this, "Essays on the Human Mind," and "Hints to the Directors of Public Schools;" the subject of education being her favourite theme. Her health was delicate for several years before her decease, but neither disease or time had power to disturb her cheerful serenity of soul. As a maiden lady, she preserved her dignity and showed her good sense by never attempting to play the juvenile. In her own pleasant manner she thus describes herself;

With expectation beating high,
Myself I now desire to spy;
And straight I in a glass surveyed
An antique lady, much decayed,
Whose languid eye and pallid cheek
The conquering power of time bespeak.
But though deprived of youthful bloom,
Free was my face from peevish gloom.
A cap, tho' not of modern grace,
Hid my grey hairs, and decked my face;
No more I fashion's livery wear,
But cleanly neatness all my care;
Whoe'er had seen me must have said,
There goes one cheerful, pleased old maid."

Mrs. Hamilton, as she was styled after she had put on her cap, has shown, in all her works, great power of analysis; she had studied well the human mind, and the best writers on metaphysics and morals may gain hints from her application of the truths of philosophy how to make their knowledge of practical use, particularly in the art of education. She has shown how the doctrine of the association of ideas may be applied in early education to the formation of habits of the temper, and of the principles of taste and morals. And also, she has shown how all that metaphysicians know of sensation and abstraction, can be applied in the cultivation of the attention, the judgment, and the imagination of children.

But more important still is the influence her writings have had in awakening the attention of mothers, and directing their inquiries rightly—much by exciting them to reflect upon their own minds, and to observe what passes in the minds of their children: she has opened a new field of investigation to women—a field fitted to their domestic habits—to their duties as mothers, and to their business as preceptors of youth, to whom it belongs to give the minds of children those first impressions and ideas which remain the longest, and which influence them often, the most powerfully, through the whole course of life.

Mrs. Hamilton died, after a protracted illness, which she bore with sweet patience, and devout submission to the will of God, on the 23d of July, 1816, aged fifty-eight.

A few extracts from her “Private Letters” are of interest in rightly understanding her character.

THE BENEFITS OF SOCIETY.

To persons who have the power of selection, a capital affords opportunities of mental improvement that are of incalculable advantage; for with regard to the effects of society upon the mind, your observation is too just. Like the evil spirits in Pandemonium, we shrink into the dimensions of the place we are appointed to occupy, or that we seem in the opinion of others to occupy—never expanding to improper stature, but as we are excited by sympathy with our compeers. If the mind be thus cramped in early life, (as is generally the fate of my sex,) it is a thousand to one that it remains stationary for ever, never making an attempt to rise above the level of its immediate associates; and even where it has been enabled to expand, it is so much easier to sink to the level of others, than to raise the minds of others to a level with our own, that few in such circumstances do not sink. It is only by the love of reading that the evil resulting from the association with little minds can be counteracted. A lively imagination creates a sympathy with favourite authors, which gives to their sentiments the same power over the mind as that possessed by an intimate and ever present friend; and hence a taste for reading becomes to females of still greater importance than it is of to men.

Of all the privileges enjoyed by the lords of the creation, there is none so estimable as having it in their power to form a society of their own liking. Any young man in the station of a gentleman may, with agreeable manners, make his acquaintance with characters of a superior stamp: he may gradually introduce himself to the notice, at least to the company, of those from whose conversation he can reap instruction, and is under no necessity of being confined to the society of uncongenial minds; whereas poor women cannot escape out of the rubbish in which they may happen to be buried, but at the expense of many rubs and scratches.

ON IMAGINATION.

I perfectly agree with you in considering castles in the air as more useful edifices than they are generally allowed to be. It is only plodding matter-of-fact dulness that cannot comprehend their use. I do not scruple to confess to you, as I find you are a sister adept in this art of freemasonry, that I owe to it three-fourths of my sense, and half of my virtue. It is by giving scope to the imagination, that one becomes thoroughly acquainted with the real dispositions of one's own heart; it is by comparing the ardent efforts of exalted virtue, formed by the fancy, with what conscience tells us we have performed, that we are instigated to improvement, and by tracing the combinations of which our castles have been composed, we acquire such a knowledge of our own minds, as at once enlightens the understanding, and betters the heart. I seriously believe that the great disadvantage of perpetually living in a crowd is the check it puts upon the free excursions of imagination.

Was ever Bath belle as much improved by walking in the crowded Crescent, as you and I have been by a solitary ramble, when, at the magic touch of fancy, a new creation has arisen around us? By most of the pious people and pious writers I have met with, the imagination is treated as a sort of evil spirit, that must be exorcised and laid at rest; but, in my opinion, it is very impious, and surely very ungrateful, thus to treat the first of blessings, without which judgment will be but a sour old maid, producing nothing. Let us marry them, and we shall do better, for it is evident neither of them was meant for the single state.

From “The Cottagers of Glenburnie.”

A PEEP AT SCOTTISH RURAL LIFE FORTY YEARS AGO.

Our party then drove off, and at every turning of the road expressed fresh admiration at the increasing beauty of the scene. Towards the top of the glen the hills seemed to meet, the rocks became more frequent and more prominent, sometimes standing naked and exposed, and sometimes peeping over the tops of the rowan-tree and weeping birch, which grew in great abundance on all the steepy banks. At length the village appeared in view. It consisted of about twenty or thirty thatched cottages, which, but for their chimneys, and the smoke that issued from them, might have passed for so many stables or hogsties, so little had they to distinguish them as the abodes of man. That one horse, at least, was the inhabitant of every dwelling, there was no room to doubt, as every door could not only boast its dunghill, but had a small cart stuck up on end directly before it; which cart, though often broken, and always dirty, seemed ostentatiously displayed as a proof of wealth.

In the middle of the village stood the kirk, a humble edifice, which meekly raised its head but a few degrees above the neighbouring houses. It was, however, graced by an ornament of peculiar beauty. Two fine old ash-trees, which grew at the east end, spread their protecting arms over its lowly roof, and served all the uses of a steeple and a belfry; for on one of the loftiest of these branches, was the bell suspended which, on each returning Sabbath,

"Rang the blest summons to the house of God."

On the other side of the churchyard stood the manse, distinguished from the other houses in the village by a sash window on each side of the door, and garret windows above; which shewed that two floors were, or might be, inhabited; for in truth the house had such a sombre air that Mrs. Mason, in passing, concluded it to be deserted.

As the houses stood separate from each other at the distance of many yards, she had time to contemplate the scene, and was particularly struck with the number of children which, as the car advanced, poured forth from every little cot to look at the strangers and their uncommon vehicle. On asking for John Macclarty's, three or four of them started forward to offer themselves as guides; and running before the car, turned down a lane towards the river, on a road so deep with ruts, that, though they had not twenty yards to go, it was attended with some danger. Mrs. Mason, who was shaken to pieces by the jolting, was very glad to alight; but her limbs were in such a tremor, that Mr. Stewart's arm was scarcely sufficient to support her to the door.

It must be confessed that the aspect of the dwelling where she was to fix her residence was by no means inviting. The walls were substantial, built, like the houses in the village, of stone and lime; but they were blackened by the mud which the cart-wheels had spattered from the ruts in winter; and on one side of the door completely covered from view by the contents of a great dung-hill. On the other, and directly under the window, was a squashy pool, formed by the dirty water thrown from the house, and in it about twenty young ducks were at this time dabbling.

At the threshold of the door, room had been left for a paving-stone, but it had never been laid; and consequently the place became hollow, to the great advantage of the younger ducklings, who always found in it a plentiful supply of water, in which they could swim without danger. Happily Mr. Stewart was provided with boots, so that he could take a firm step in it, while he lifted Mrs. Mason, and set her down in safety within the threshold. But there an unforeseen danger awaited her, for there the great whey pot had stood since morning, when the cheese had been made, and was at the present moment filled with chickens, which were busily picking at the bits of curd which had hardened on the sides, and cruelly mocked their wishes. Over this Mr. Stewart and Mrs. Mason unfortunately tumbled. The pot was overturned, and the chickens, cackling with hideous din, flew about in all directions, some over their heads, and others making their way by the hallan (or inner door) into the house.

The accident was attended with no further bad consequences than a little hurt upon the shins: and all our party were now assembled in the kitchen; but, though they found the doors of the house open, they saw no appearance of any inhabitants. At length Mrs. Macclarty came in, all out of breath, followed by her daughters, two big girls of eleven and thirteen years of age. She welcomed Mrs. Mason and her friends with great kindness, and made many apologies for being in no better order to receive them; but said that both her gudeman and herself thought that her cousin would have stayed at Gowan-brae till after the fair, as they were too far off at Glenburnie to think of going to it; though it would, to be sure, be only natural for Mrs. Mason to like to see all the grand sights that were to be seen there; for, to be sure, she would gang mony places before she saw the like. Mrs. Mason smiled, and assured her she would have more pleasure in looking at the fine view from her door than in all the sights at the fair.

"Ay, it's a bonny piece of corn, to be sure," returned Mrs. Macclarty with great simplicity; "but then, what with the trees, and rocks, and wimplings o' the burn, we have nae room to make parks o' any size."

"But were your trees, and rocks, and wimplings of the burn all removed," said Mr. Stewart, "then your prospect would be worth the looking at, Mrs. Macclarty; would it not?"

Though Mr. Stewart's irony was lost upon the good woman, it produced a laugh among the young folks, which she, however, did not resent, but immediately fell to busying herself in sweeping the hearth, and adding turf to the fire, in order to make the kettle boil for tea.

"I think," said Miss Mary, "you might make your daughters save you that trouble," looking at the two girls, who stood all this time leaning against the wall.

"O, poor things," said their mother, "they have not been used to it; they have enough of time for wark yet."

"Depend upon it," said Mrs. Mason, "young people can never begin too soon; your eldest daughter there will soon be as tall as yourself."

"Indeed she's of a stately growth," said Mrs. Macclarty, pleased with the observation; "and Jenny there is little alint her; but what are they but bairns yet for a' that! In time, I warrant, they'll do weel enough. Meg can milk a cow as weel as I can do, when she likes."

"And does she not always like to do all she can?" said Mrs. Mason.

"O, we mauna complain," returned the mother; "she does well enough."

HAMILTON, LADY,

BEFORE her marriage, Emma Lyon, or Harte, was the daughter of a poor servant woman, from Wales. Emma was placed at service, when about thirteen; and at sixteen she went to London, where she first assisted in a shop, and afterwards became chambermaid to a lady of rank. She soon lost this situation in consequence of her devotion to reading plays and romances, and became a maid-servant in a tavern. She afterwards lived with a captain in the navy, as his mistress, and when abandoned by him, was reduced to the lowest pitch of degradation. While being exhibited by a quack doctor as the goddess Hygeia, she ensnared Charles Greville, by whom she had three children. He was on the point of marrying her, when the loss of his offices prevented him; and he sent her to Naples, where his uncle, Sir William Hamilton, was ambassador. She was first the mistress of Sir William, but he married her in 1791. She had naturally good talents, and having studied diligently to supply all the deficiencies of her education, she became eminent for her social attractions. Being a great favourite of the queen of Naples, she had no lack of followers. Soon after Lady Hamilton's marriage, her acquaintance with Nelson commenced, who became madly in love with her. It is asserted, and has never been disproved, that those violent measures which Nelson used on his return to Naples, in 1799, contrary to the articles of capitulation, were urged on by Lady Hamilton, as acts of vengeance on her personal enemies. When Sir William Hamilton was recalled to England, Nelson resigned his command, and accompanied them to London. Here she had a daughter, whom she called Horatia Nelson. After Sir William's death, his widow retired to Merton Place, a country-seat which Lord Nelson had bought for her. Here she resided till the death of Lord Nelson, in 1805. Again abandoning herself to her inclinations, and being reduced to a small pension, she left England for France, and died near Calais, in 1815. Lady Hamilton was beautiful and artful; the ascendancy she gained over men was used for evil purposes; but that she did thus rule the brave, and lead the honourable man down into the depths of infamy, shows the wonderful power of female influence.

HARCOURT, HARRIET EUSEBIA,

WAS born, in 1705, at Richmond, Yorkshire, England. She travelled over Europe with her father, and at his death, in Constantinople, in 1733, she returned to England; and as she inherited a large property, she began to establish a convent on her Yorkshire estate, and another in the western isles of Scotland. These institutions were composed chiefly of foreign ladies. A system of perfect equality prevailed in these convents, over which each presided in turn. The members could withdraw from the society when they chose, on the forfeiture of the sum of one hundred pounds. They only devoted a portion of their time to religious exercises, and the rest was spent in amusements, the study of the fine arts and sciences, and embroidery.

Miss Harcourt was beautiful and graceful in her person, and had a taste for music, painting, and drawing, which had been highly cultivated. She died at her seat in Richmond, December 1st, 1745, in the thirty-ninth year of her age, bequeathing the greater part of her fortune to her institution, on condition that the society should be supported and continued according to its original design, and to the directions she left in writing. But she had been the soul of the society; after her decease, it was soon dissolved.

HASER, CHARLOTTE HENRIETTA,

A CELEBRATED singer, born at Leipsic, in 1789, was the daughter of the director of music in the university there. In 1804 she was engaged at the Italian opera at Dresden. Her superior voice, her fine execution, and her attempt to combine the advantages of the German and Italian methods, gave her a brilliant success. Distinguished for the correctness of her morals and her great modesty, she was received with applause at all the most celebrated theatres in Italy and Germany. She married Vera, a lawyer at Rome, and retired from the stage.

HASTINGS, ELIZABETH,

DAUGHTER of Theophilus earl of Huntington, deserves a place in this collection, from the number of her public and private charities, which were perhaps never equalled by any of her sex. Congreve speaks of her, in the forty-second number of the Tattler, as the "Divine Aspasia;" and in the forty-ninth number of the same work gives a farther account of her: "Her cares," says her biographer, "extended even to the animal creation; while over her domestics she presided with the disposition of a parent, providing for the improvement of their minds, the decency of their behaviour, and the propriety of their manners. She would have the skill and contrivance of every artificer used in her house, employed for the ease of her servants, and that they might suffer no inconvenience or hardship. Besides providing for the order, harmony, and peace of her family, she kept great elegance in and about her house, that her poor neighbours might not fall into idleness and poverty for want of employment; and while she thus tenderly regarded the poor, she would visit those in the higher ranks, lest they should accuse her of pride or superciliousness." At her table her countenance was open and serene, her voice soft and melodious, her language polite and animated. It might truly be said of this lady, that "her mind was virtue, by the graces drest." The sympathy, tenderness, and delicacy, which accompanied her liberalities doubled their value: she was the friend and patroness, through life, of Mrs. Mary Astell; to whom, her circumstances being narrow, she frequently presented considerable sums. Her benefactions were not confined to the neighbourhood in which she lived; to many families, in various parts of the kingdom, she gave large annual allowances. She also maintained a charity-school, gave exhibitions to scholars in the universities, and contributed to the support of several seminaries of education. To this may be added her munificence to her relations and friends, her remission of sums due to her, in cases of distress or straitened circumstances, and the noble hospitality of her establishment. To one relation she allowed five hundred pounds annually, to another she presented a gift of three thousand pounds, and to a third three hundred guineas. She acted also with great liberality towards a young lady, whose fortune had been injured in the South-sea scheme: yet the whole of her estates fell short of three thousand pounds a year. It was by economy and strict self-denial that this noble lady was enabled thus to extend her bounties. Her favourite maxim was, first to attend to justice; secondly, to charity; and thirdly, to generosity.

She died in 1770, aged thirty-nine. Previous to her decease, she destroyed the greater part of her writings; so that her talents must be estimated from her works of benevolence, not from the productions of her pen, although she had a very superior mind. She would never marry, preferring, in a single and independent life, to be mistress of her own actions, and the dispenser of her own income.

HASTINGS, LADY FLORA,

WAS the eldest daughter of Francis, Marquis of Hastings, who made himself notorious as Lord Rawdon for the severity with which he treated the Americans who fell into his power during the revolutionary war. Lady Flora was born in 1806; and from her childhood manifested a fondness for study and literary pursuits. Beautiful and accomplished, distinguished also for genius and piety, she was selected by that eminent pattern of the virtues in courtly life, the Duchess of Kent, to be one of her ladies of the bed-chamber. While in this station Lady Flora was attacked with a disease which caused an enlargement of her liver, and gave rise to suspicions injurious to her reputation. These cruel surmises, although proved utterly unfounded, no doubt aggravated her illness, and hastened her death, which took place at Buckingham Palace, July 5th, 1839. Her fame was now unspotted, and her premature death was deeply mourned by the court and nation. She had collected her poems, which were published after her decease, by her sister. These effusions evince the purity of her sentiments; and the gentle melancholy they breathe make a deeper impression on the heart of the reader, because it seems to shadow forth her sad fate. The following, among her poems, have been much admired:—

ITALY.

Oh! name it not, there is a spell
Around its memory clinging,
To which I would not bid farewell,
For all the future's bringing.

The skies of radiant Italy!
Oh! they are deeply blue;
And nothing save their kindred waves
Can match their sapphire hue.

No little clouds e'er flit across,
To dim their heavenly light;
Would that my soul were pure as thers
As spotless and as bright!

The gales of balmy Italy!
Oh! as they fleet along,
They bear upon their downy wings
The treasured wealth of song.
They linger through the blooming scene—
Where once my footsteps roved;
And they are free, though I am not
To kiss the flowers I loved.

The songs of tuneful Italy!
They wake within the heart
Those visions of the olden time,
Which will not thence depart.
And freedom, love, and honour bright,
Rise from the dust again.
Would that my feeble lyre could wake
The spirit-stirring strain!

The flowers of sunny Italy!
Oh! blissful is their doom;
A brief, bright space to bloom, then sins
Untrodden to the tomb.
Still breathing fragrance as they droop
Beneath the golden ray;
Oh thus were 't mine to sigh my soul
In ecstasy away!

The tombs of holy Italy!
The earth where heroes trod;
Where sainted martyrs glorified
In death th' Incarnate God!
Where all is bright, and pure, and calm,
On earth, in air, and sea.
O Italy! amongst thy tombs,
Hast thou not one for me?

THE SWAN SONG.

Grieve not that I die young.—Is it not well
To pass away ere life hath lost its brightness?
Bind me no longer, sisters, with the spell
Of love and your kind words. List ye to me.
Here I am blessed — but I would be more free;
I would go forth in all my spirit's lightness.
Let me depart!

Ah! who would linger till bright eyes grow dim,
Kind voices mute, and faithful bosoms cold?
Till carking care, and coil, and anguish grim,
Cast their dark shadows o'er this fairy world;
Till fancy's many-coloured wings are furled,
And all, save the proud spirit, waxeth old?
I would depart!

Thus would I pass away — yielding my soul
A joyous thank-offering to Him who gave
That soul to be, those starry orbs to roll.
Thus — thus exultingly would I depart,
Song on my lips, ecstasy in my heart.
Sisters — sweet sisters, bear me to my grave...
Let me depart!

HAUFFE, FREDERICA,

COMMONLY called the Seeress of Prevorst, was born in 1801, at Prevorst, a little village among the mountains of Wirtemberg, not far from Löwenstein. Her father was game-keeper or district forester, and Frederica was brought up in the most quiet simplicity. She early showed great sensibility to spiritual influences, which her family endeavoured to discourage. At the age of nineteen she was married to Mr. Hauffe, and went to reside at Kürnberg. There she was attacked by a singular illness which lasted for seven years, during the latter part of which she was attended by Dr Kerner, a well-known German physician and poet who has since published an account of her, highly coloured, probably, by his own imagination. The last three years of her life were spent at Weinsberg. She saw, or imagined she saw, and held converse with spirits; and the system of philosophy she revealed, and which she had, apparently, acquired from her close communion with the spirit-world, is singular, from its being the production of a woman entirely uneducated in such matters. Frederica Hauffe died at Löwenstein on the 5th of August, 1829.

HEDWIG, AMELIA VON,

ONE of the most celebrated German poetesses, was born at Weimar, August 16th, 1776. Her maiden name was Von Imhoff. When only eight, she could speak English and French as readily as her own tongue; and her talent for poetry had already begun to develop itself. When she was twelve she lost her father; and the lady who took charge of her kept her so constantly occupied, that she had no time for writing. She was about fourteen when she went to live at Weimar, where she became acquainted with several of the most celebrated poets of the time. Schiller, happening to see a poem of hers, invited her to his house at Jena, where she became acquainted with Goethe. She was afterwards appointed Lady of the court at Saxe-Weimar, where she was married to Lieutenant-General Von Hedwig. Madame Von Hedwig was a poetess of the higher order, one whom Goethe praised for her true Parnassian inspirations. At his request she composed the "Legend of the Three Wise Men of the East," a romance in twelve cantos. She also wrote a number of legends, all displaying great poetic genius; while her lyrics, her patriotic songs, and her idyls, have added many a leaf to her wreath. She was a fertile prose writer, and also translated several works from the Swedish. William Howitt says of this popular author, "Her well-known Saga of the Wolfsbrunnen near Heidelberg, was taken bodily possession of by Grattan, author of "Highways and Byways," who lived for some time near the scene of the Saga. His "Legend of the Wolfsbrunnen" is literally that of Madame Von Hedwig, except that he has inverted her story, putting her first part second, and the second first." Nor is Mr. Grattan the first man who has stolen from the literature of female writers the plots, ideas, and even productions, that have made his best title to fame. Madame Von Hedwig is probably deceased.

HELVÉTIUS, MADAME,

Was daughter of Comte Lignville, and married, in 1751, Claude Adrien Helvétius, who afterwards became celebrated for his talents. Madame Helvétius was very beautiful and accomplished. Being the niece of Madame Graffigny, by whom she was brought up, she had been educated with great care. Helvétius was passionately fond of his wife, and after their marriage they lived chiefly in retirement at Voré, enjoying the pure pleasures of domestic life. After his decease, which occurred in 1771, Madame Helvétius removed to Auteuil, where her house became the resort of the most distinguished literati and artists of the time. Among other great men, Dr. Benjamin Franklin was a frequent visitor and a warm friend of Madame Helvétius. She was then far advanced in years; but her good sense, cheerful kindness, and highly cultivated mind, rendered her the favourite companion of intelligent men. She is an example of the superiority of cultivated intellect over personal beauty; her youthful charms were soon gone; her mental graces improved to the last, and made her society sought and her friendship valued as long as she lived.

HEMANS, FELICIA DOROTHEA,

Was the second daughter and fourth child of a family of three sons and three daughters. She was born in Duke street, Liverpool, on the 25th of September, 1794. Her father, Mr. Browne, was a native of Ireland, and her mother, a Miss Wagner, was of Venetian origin. As a child, Felicia was remarkably beautiful, and she early gave indications of her poetic genius, which was encouraged by her accomplished mother. When Miss Browne was about five years old, domestic embarrassments led her father to remove to Gwrych, in North Wales.

That land of wild mountain scenery, and ancient minstrelsy, was the fitting place to impart sublimity to her youthful fancies, and elevate her feelings with the glow of patriotism and devotion. She began to write when very young; her first printed poems, entitled "Early Blossoms," were issued in 1808, when she was fourteen.

In 1809, her family removed from Gwrych to Bronwylfa, near St. Asaph's, in Flintshire, where she resided for sixteen years, and wrote many of her works. It was during this year, 1809, that the great event of her life took place—her introduction to Captain Hemans. The young poetess was then only fifteen, in the full glow of that radiant beauty which was destined to fade so early. The mantling bloom of her cheeks was shaded by a profusion of natural ringlets, of a rich golden brown; and the ever-varying expression of her brilliant eyes gave a changeful play to her countenance, which would have made it impossible for any painter to do justice to it. No wonder that so fair a creature should excite the admiration of a gallant captain. And the love on both sides was ardent and sincere; for Captain Hemans, soon after their introduction, was called upon to embark with his regiment for Spain. On his return, in 1812, they were married.

Mrs. Hemans' eagerness for knowledge continued to be intense, and of her industry, volumes, still existing, of extracts and transcriptions, are evidence. The mode of her studies was very desultory to outward appearance, as she loved to be surrounded by books of all sorts and languages, and on every variety of topic, turning from one to another. And this course, it is said, "she pursued at all times—in season and out of season—by night and day—on her chair, her sofa, and bed—at home and abroad—invalid, convalescent, and in perfect health—in rambles, journeys, and visits—in company with her husband, and when her children were around her—at hours usually devoted to domestic claims, as well as in the solitude of the study and bower."

In the year 1818, Captain Hemans' health requiring the benefit of a warmer climate, he determined upon repairing to the Continent, and eventually fixed his residence at Rome. At this time a permanent separation was not contemplated by either party, and it was only a tacit and conventional arrangement, with a frequent interchange of correspondence relative to the education and the disposal of their children. But years rolled on, and from that time till the hour of her death, Captain and Mrs. Hemans never met again. She continued to reside with her mother at Bronwyflla, and had the five boys left under her care; a sufficient proof that nothing more than incompatibility of pursuits and uncongeniality of temper were the moving causes of the separation.

Notwithstanding the peculiarity of her situation, in consequence of this separation, her talents, her amiable qualities, and the increasing popularity of her writings, continued to secure to Mrs. Hemans the warm attachment of several distinguished friends, among whom were Bishop Luxmoore and Bishop Heber; with the latter she became acquainted in 1820, and he was the first literary character with whom she ever familiarly associated. To him she submitted the commencement of a poem, entitled "Superstition and Revelation," which was, however, never completed by her, and at his suggestion, she was first led to offer her "Vespers of Palermo" to the stage. This play, completed in June, 1821, was, after many theatrical delays, acted at Covent Garden, in December, 1823, but proved a failure. It, however, led to a correspondence with the poet Milman, who kindly interested himself in its behalf; and it was subsequently acted in Edinburgh with considerable success,—with an epilogue written by Sir Walter Scott.

The death of her beloved mother, which occurred in 1827, was an irreparable loss to Mrs. Hemans; she had now no one to whom she could cling for protection; and her sensitive, dependent nature, made the maternal shelter and security necessary to her happiness—almost to her own existence. As the care and education of her five sons now devolved entirely on herself, she was induced to leave Wales, where her heart still clung, and settle at Wavertree, a small village near Liverpool, where she hoped to find superior advantages of education for her boys.

During the many years that Mrs. Hemans resided with her mother, the anxieties and responsibilities of house-keeping had never fallen to her lot, and her time and thoughts might be and were almost exclusively devoted to poetry and literature. But now domestic cares forced themselves upon her attention, and butchers' and grocers' bills intruded, as she observes, "in frightful array." In these household duties she felt but little interest, being, as she playfully describes herself, "little better than a grown-up Rosamond, (Miss Edgeworth's naughty girl,) who constantly lie in bed till it is too late to get up early—break my needles (when I use any)—leave my keys among my necklaces—answer all my amusing letters first, and leave the others to their fate." Elsewhere she says, "I am now for the first time in my life holding the reins of government, independently managing a household myself, and I never liked any thing less than ce triste empire de moi-même."

In the summer of 1829 she visited Scotland, where she was cordially received by many distinguished persons, among others, by Sir Walter Scott, with whom she spent two or three weeks very delightfully. When bidding her farewell, he said: "There are some whom we meet, and should like ever after to claim as kith and kin, and you are one of these." On one occasion he observed: "One would say you had too many accomplishments, Mrs. Hemans, were they not all made to give pleasure to those around you." In 1830, Mrs. Hemans visited the Lakes, where she formed a personal acquaintance with Wordsworth, whose writings she had always admired. Mrs. Hemans was delighted with the scenery at Rydal Mount, and concluded to hire a residence called Dove's Nest, beautifully situated in a very romantic spot on the banks of Windermere; she thus describes it in one of her letters:

"The house was originally meant for a small villa, though it has long passed into the hands of farmers, and there is, in consequence, an air of neglect about the little demesne, which does not at all approach desolation, and yet gives it something of touching interest. You see everywhere traces of love and care beginning to be effaced—rose-trees spreading into wildness—laurels darkening the windows with their luxuriant branches—and I cannot help saying to myself, 'Perhaps some heart like my own in its feelings and sufferings has here sought refuge and found repose.' The ground is laid out in rather an antiquated style, which, now that nature is beginning to reclaim it from art, I do not at all dislike. There is a little grassy terrace immediately under the window, descending to a small court with a circular grass-plot, in which grows one tall white rose-tree. You cannot imagine how I delight in that fair, solitary, neglected-looking tree. I am wri ting to you from an old-fashioned alcove in the little garden, round which the sweetbriar and the moss-rose tree had completely run wild; and I look down from it upon lovely Windermere, which seems at this moment even like another sky, so truly is every summer cloud and tint of azure pictured in its transparent mirror."

In 1831 she left England with her children, to take up her residence permanently in Dublin. The next four years were passed busily and rather pleasantly by Mrs. Hemans, who continued to write unceasingly, though a gradual decline in her health was perceptible to her friends. At the close of the year 1834 her health became very precarious, and the following spring brought symptoms of her approaching dissolution. The closing scene has been impressively described by one of her friends:

"Mrs. Hemans was now too ill to leave her room, and was only laid upon a couch during the daytime, occasionally suffering severely. But all was borne with resignation and patience, and when not able to bear even the fatigue of reading, she had recourse to her mental resources, and as she lay on her sofa, she would repeat to herself whole chapters of the Bible, and page after page of Milton and Wordsworth. Her thoughts reverted frequently to the days of her childhood—to the old house by the sea-shore—the mountain rambles—the haunts and the books which had formed the delight of her childhood. She was wont to say to those who expressed pity for her situation, that 'she lived in a fair and happy world of her own, among gentle thoughts and pleasant images;' and in her intervals of pain she would observe, that 'no poetry could express, nor imagination conceive, the visions of blessedness that flitted across her fancy, and made her waking hours more delightful than those even that were given to temporary repose.' Indeed her sister observes, 'At times her spirit would appear to be already half-etherealized, her mind would seem to be fraught with deep and holy and incommunicable thoughts, and she would entreat to be left perfectly alone, in stillness and darkness, 'to commune with her own heart,' and reflect on the mercies of her Saviour."

On the 15th of March, after receiving the holy sacrament, she became extremely ill, but a temporary improvement took place, and on the 26th of April, she dictated to her brother, (for she had for some time been constrained to employ an amanuensis,) her "Sabbath Sonnet," the last strain of the sweet singer of the hearth, the home, and the affections.

On Saturday, the 26th of May, she sank into a peaceful slumber, which continued all day, and at nine o'clock in the evening her gentle spirit passed away without pain or struggle.

Her remains were deposited in a vault beneath St. Anne's Church, Dublin, almost close to the house where she died. A small tablet has been placed above the spot where she is laid, inscribed with her name, her age, and the date of her death, and with the following lines from a dirge of her own;

"Calm on the bosom of thy God,
Fair Spirit! rest thee now!
Ev'n while with us thy footsteps trod,
His seal was on thy brow.
Dust to the narrow home beneath!
Soul to its place on high;
They, that have seen thy look in death,
No more may fear to die."

In perusing the poems of Mrs. Hemans, we are struck with her wonderful perception of the beautiful! This seems to be her peculiar gift. Whatever be the scene described, the character or object introduced, she always gathers around her images and allusions of exceeding beauty; and these selected with a moral taste so pure and refined, that it seems to have shed the lustre of heaven upon the things of earth.

And yet, over these bright visions, incomparable in loveliness as they are, is the blending of human cares and sorrows, and the shadow of Nature's decay. Nothing is satisfying, nothing is abiding. She saw the perfectness of the Creator's works in their most attractive forms; but she saw that Death was in the world, and that all which was made was subject to the Destroyer.

Hence the sadness which pervades nearly all her poems, with the exception of those she wrote towards the close of her career. It was not her own blighted hopes that gave to her harp its note of woe. Hers is the lament for the lot of humanity, dwelling amid so much beauty which must fade and perish like the crushed flower; and in the midst of the joy and harmony which for her pervaded all Nature, she yet could not avoid discerning, with the spirit of the mystic prophetic,

"The low footsteps of each coming ill."

And so wonderfully was her genius endowed with the power of expressing "thoughts which create thoughts" in the minds of others, that there is scarcely a human heart but is moved by these strains of feeling or imagination. The truth of the description is acknowledged at once. For, though many of the moving scenes in the poems of Mrs. Hemans were undoubtedly fictitious, yet the feelings, the struggles, the sorrows bear the seal of reality. She saw with her mind's eye and felt in her own soul all that she has portrayed. And thus she compels the sympathy of her readers to follow her bidding, and by the dream of the poet to interpret their own feelings, and struggles and sorrows.

Still there is none of the gloom of misanthropy in the strains of Mrs. Hemans. She had naturally a cheerful, even mirthful disposition, as her private letters show; and she had the loving, hoping heart of a true woman. She was the poet of home. Around the hearth she gathered the sweetest and saddest images of her fancy. There was her throne of power, to the muse of man unapproachable. In these domestic attachments, and in her sympathy with her own sex, may be found the main causes of her unparalleled success in the choice of subjects. This purity and justness of moral taste, which always selects the theme best suited to the position of the writer, is a beautiful element in the character of a literary woman.

We consider her example of refined moral taste in directing the efforts of female genius as of inestimable benefit to the young imaginative reader; and so purely beautiful did her poems appear, that we scarcely knew when to pause in our selection. Mrs. Hemans does, in truth, merit the gratitude as well as admiration of her sex, for she has exalted the genius of woman, and shown an example of excellence in private life,—thus proving that the cultivation of the highest gifts of intellect are not incompatible with the performance of our humblest duties.

The crowning grace of her genius however was her love of the good. In her earlier studies she searched for this in objects of sense or creations of fancy. But the shadow of change and decay marred the loveliness of Nature, and the spirit of the poet grew restless and sad. In her last years, looking upward as well as inward, she found, in contemplation of the "Eternal God," the perfection she adored. And how ardently her soul

"Sought the light,
Studious of that pure intercourse begun,
When first her infant brows their lustre won;
So, like the mountain, did she grow more bright
From unimpeded commerce with the sun,
At the approach of all-involving night."

In respect to the religious dignity which she attached to her profession, there is a passage in one of her letters which fully unfolds her feelings and her hopes; thus she writes, about a year previous to her death:—"I have now passed through the feverish and somewhat visionary state of mind often connected with the passionate study of art in early life; deep affections and deep sorrows seem to have solemnized my whole being, and I now feel as if bound to higher and holier tasks, which, though I may occasionally lay aside, I could not long wander from without some sense of dereliction. I hope it is no self-delusion, but I cannot help sometimes feeling as if it were my true task to enlarge the sphere of sacred poetry, and extend its influence. When you receive my volume of 'Scenes and Hymns,' you will see what I mean by enlarging its sphere, though my plan as yet is very imperfectly developed."

She speaks here of the passionate study of art in early life. And this is not the least of her merits,—that she did study, early and late, her whole life long, making poetry, as it deserves, no less a subject of science than a gift of genius. She was above the miserable disparagement of labour, and learning, and the advice of the world. She profited continually by them all; and the critics have in no respect rendered her fuller justice, than in noticing the astonishing progress indicated by her successive productions.

Thus, then, is her poetry distinguished. Others have possessed her imagination, her taste, her ambition, her art, her glowing feeling, her Christian principle; but they did not all undertake, and they were not all competent if they had, to devote the exercise of every energy, effectually, to the one object of her labours,—the composition of a model which might perfectly represent what female poetry is and should be. This Mrs. Hemans has done. She had a genius worthy to be the representative of that of her sex,—and she sounded the depths of its capacities of exertion and suffering, and trained them, with every faculty, to do justice to herself, her sex, her race, her Creator, in the discharge of the true office of the profession she chose,—the illuminating or figuring forth of truth, (as Sydney describes it,) and especially of the truth most worthy of the work,—which it most concerns men, as such, to feel the force of,—and which, also, she was herself best qualified so to set forth—"by the speaking picture of poetry." She wrote not only as none but a woman could write, but so wrote as that, in her department, neither her predecessors, or successors, of her own sex, have been, or will be, able to surpass her.

Mrs. Hemans was a Briton by birth, but, as we think, her delicate purity of nature was truly American. One of her biographers says that Mrs. Hemans "always cut out of her books whatever was coarse;" a proceeding which resembles very nearly the instinctive delicacy of character so frequently ridiculed by English travellers and writers as peculiar to the women of America. No doubt this unison of feeling has contributed to give the poetry of Mrs. Hemans such wide and wonderful popularity in our republic. An English critic, noticing the writings of Mrs. Hemans, remarks—"The peculiar beauties of her poetry were first pointed out to us by our transatlantic brethren." Yes, the true feminine loveliness—there is no other term so appropriate—of her muse, has won the heart of the American people. We understand, we appreciate the sweet purity of her productions: nor can her own countrymen hold her works in higher estimation, or cherish her memory with more true regard than do her millions of friends and readers in this our "green forest land."

Her principal works were, "The Domestic Affections," 1812; "Restoration of the Works of Art to Italy;" "Welsh Melodies," 1822; "Siege of Valencia, and the Last Constantine," 1823; "Vespers of Palermo," 1823; "The Forest Sanctuary," 1826; "Records of Women," 1828; "Songs of the Affections," 1830; "National Lyrics," 1834; "Hymns for Childhood," 1834; "Scenes and Hymns of Life," 1834. The selections we give are chiefly descriptive of or incidental to woman—the theme of power with Mrs. Hemans.

THE SWITZER'S WIFE.

Werner Stauffacher, one of the three confederates of the field of Grutli, had been alarmed by the envy with which the Austrian Bailiff, Landenberg, had noticed the appearance of wealth and comfort which distinguished his dwelling. It was not, however, until roused by the entreaties of his wife, a woman who seems to have been of an heroic spirit, that he was induced to deliberate with his friends upon the measures by which Switzerland was finally delivered.

Nor look nor tone revealeth aught
Save woman's quietness of thought;
And yet around her is a light
Of inward majesty and might. M. J. J.

* * * * *

Wer solch ein herz an seinen Busen druckt
Der kann fur herd und hof mit freuden fechten.
Wilhelm Tell.

It was the time when children bound to meet
 Their father's homeward step from field or hill,
 And when the herd's returning bells are sweet
 In the Swiss valleys, and the lakes grow still,
 And the last note of that wild horn swells by,
 Which haunts the exile's heart with melody.

And lovely smiled full many an Alpine home,
 Touch'd with the crimson of the dying hour,
 Which lit its low roof by the torrent's foam,
 And pierced its lattice through the vine-hung bower:
 But one, the loveliest o'er the land that rose,
 Then first looked mournful in its green repose.

For Werner sat beneath the linden-tree,
 That sent its lulling whispers through his door,
 Ev'n as man sits whose heart alone would be
 With some deep care, and thus can find no more
 The accustomed joy in all which evening brings,
 Gathering a household with her quiet wings.

His wife stood hush'd before him,—sad, yet mild
 In her beseeching mien;—he mark'd it not.
 The silvery laughter of his bright-hair'd child
 Rang from the greensward round the shelter'd spot,
 But seem'd unheard; until at last the boy
 Raised from his heap'd-up flowers a glance of joy,

And met his father's face: but then a change
 Pass'd swiftly o'er the brow of infant glee,
 And a quick sense of something dimly strange
 Brought him from play to stand beside the knee
 So often climb'd, and lift his loving eyes
 That shone through clouds of sorrowful surprise.

Then the proud bosom of the strong man shook;
 But tenderly his babe's fair mother laid
 Her hand on his, and with a pleading look,
 "Thro' tears half quivering, o'er him bent, and said,
 "What grief, dear friend, hath made thy heart its prey,
 That thou shouldst turn thee from our love away?"

"It is too sad to see thee thus, my friend!
 Mark'st thou the wonder on thy boy's fair brow,
 Missing the smile from thine? Oh! cheer thee! bend
 To his soft arms, unseal thy thoughts e'en now!
 Thou dost not kindly to withhold the share
 Of tried affection in thy secret care."

He look'd up into that sweet earnest face,
 But sternly, mournfully: not yet the band
 Was loosen'd from his soul; its inmost place
 Not yet unveil'd by love's o'er-mastering hand.
 "Speak low!" he cried, and pointed where on high
 The white Alps glitter'd through the solemn sky:

"We must speak low amidst our ancient hills
 And their free torrents; for the days are come
 When tyranny lies crouch'd by forest-rills,
 And meets the shepherd in his mountain-home.
 Go, pour the wine of our own grapes in fear,
 Keep silence by the hearth! its foes are near.

"The envy of the oppressor's eye hath been Upon my heritage. I sit to-night
 Under my household tree, if not serene,
 Yet with the faces best-beloved in sight:
 To-morrow eve may find me chain'd, and thee—
 How can I bear the boy's young smiles to see?"

The bright blood left that youthful mother's cheek;
 Back on the linden-stem she lean'd her form,
 And her lip trembled, as it strove to speak,
 Like a frail harp-string, shaken by the storm.
 'T was but a moment, and the faintness pass'd,
 And the free Alpine spirit woke at last.

And she, that ever through her home had moved
 With the meek thoughtfulness and quiet smile
 Of woman, calmly loving and beloved,
 And timid in her happiness the while,
 Stood brightly forth, and steadfastly, that hour,
 Her clear glance kindling into sudden power.

Ay, pale she stood, but with an eye of light,
 And took her fair child to her holy breast,
 And lifted her soft voice, that gather'd might
 As it found language:—"Are we thus oppress'd?
 Then must we rise upon our mountain-sod,
 And man must arm, and woman call on God!

"I know what thou wouldst do,—and be it done!
 Thy soul is darken'd with its cares for me.
 Trust me to Heaven, my husband!—this, thy son,
 The babe whom I have borne thee, must be free!
 And the sweet memory of our pleasant hearth
 May well give strength—if aught be strong on earth.

"Thou hast been brooding o'er the silent dread
 Of my desponding tears; now lift once more,
 My hunter of the hills! thy stately head,
 And let thine eagle glance my joy restore!
 I can bear all, but seeing thee subdued,—
 Take to thee back thine own undaunted mood.

"Go forth beside the waters, and along
 The chamois-paths, and through the forests go;
 And tell, in burning words, thy tale of wrong
 To the brave hearts that 'midst the hamlets glow.
 God shall be with thee, my beloved!—Away!
 Bless but thy child, and leave me,—I can pray!"

He sprang up like a warrior-youth awaking
 To clarion-sounds upon the ringing air:
 He caught her to his breast, while proud tears breaking
 From his dark eyes, fell o'er her braided hair,—
 And "Worthy art thou," was his joyous cry,
 "That man for thee should gird himself to die

"My bride, my wife, the mother of my child!
 Now shall thy name be armour to my heart;
 And this our land, by chains no more defiled,
 Be taught of thee to choose the better part!
 I go—thy spirit on my words shall dwell,
 Thy gentle voice shall stir the Alps—Farewell!"

And thus they parted, by the quiet lake,
 In the clear starlight: he, the strength to rouse
 Of the free hills; she, thoughtful for his sake,
 To rock her child beneath the whispering boughs,
 Singing its blue, half-curtain'd eyes to sleep,
 With a low hymn amidst the stillness deep.

GERTRUDE, OR FIDELITY TILL DEATH.

The Baron Von der Wart, accused, though it is believed unjustly, as an accomplice in the assassination of the emperor Albert, was bound alive on the wheel, and attended by his wife Gertrude, throughout his last agonizing hours, with the most heroic devotedness. Her own sufferings, with those of her unfortunate husband, are most affectingly described in a letter which she afterwards addressed to a female friend, and which was published some years ago, at Haarlem, in a book entitled Gertrude Von der Wart, or Fidelity unto Death.

Dark lowers our fate,
 And terrible the storm that gathers o'er us;
 But nothing, till that latest agony
 Which severs thee from nature, shall unloose
 This fix'd and sacred hold. In thy dark prison-house
 In the terrific face of armed law,
 Yea, on the scaffold, if it needs must be,
 I never will forsake thee.

Joanna Eastle

Her hands were clasp'd, her dark eyes raised,
 The breeze threw back her hair;
 Up to the fearful wheel she gaz'd—
 All that she loved was there.
 The night was round her clear and cold,
 The holy heaven above,
 Its pale stars watching to behold
 The might of earthly love

"And bid me not depart," she cried,
 "My Rudolph, say not so!
 This is no time to quit thy side,
 Peace, peace! I cannot go.

HE

Hath the world aught for me to fear,
When death is on thy brow?
The world! what means it—mine is here—
I will not leave thee now.

* I have been with thee in thine hour
Of glory and of bliss;
Doubt not its memory's living power
To strengthen me through this!
And thou, mine honour'd love and true,
Bear on, bear nobly on!
We have the blessed heaven in view,
Whose rest shall soon be won."

And were not these high words to flow
From woman's breaking heart?
Through all that night of bitterest woe,
She bore her lofty part;
But oh! with such a glazing eye,
With such a curdling cheek—
Love, love! of mortal agony,
Thou, only thou shouldst speak!

The wind rose high,—but with it rose
Her voice, that he might hear:
Perchance that dark hour brought repose
To happy bosoms near;
While she sat striving with despair
Beside his tortured form,
And pouring her deep soul in prayer
Forth on the rushing storm.

She wiped the death-damps from his brow,
With her pale hands and soft,
Whose touch upon the lute-chords low,
Had still'd his heart so oft.
She spread her mantle o'er his breast,
She bathed his lips with dew,
And on his cheeks such kisses press'd
As hope and joy ne'er knew.

Oh! lovely are ye, Love and Faith,
Enduring to the last!
She had her meed—one smile in death—
And his worn spirit pass'd.
While ev'n as o'er a martyr's grave
She knelt on that sad spot,
And, weeping, bless'd the God who gave Strength to forsake it not!

THE GRAVE OF A POETESS.*

"Ne me plaignez pas—si vous saviez
Combien de peines ce tombeau m'a épargnées!"

I stood beside the lowly grave;—
Spring-odours breathed around,
And music, in the river-wave,
Pass'd with a lulling sound.

All happy things that love the sun
In the bright air glanced by,
And a glad murmur seem'd to run
Through the soft azure sky.

Fresh leaves were on the ivy-bough
That fringed the ruins near;
Young voices were abroad—but thou
Their sweetness couldst not hear.

And mournful grew my heart for thee,
Thou in whose woman's mind,
The ray that brightens earth and sea,
The light of song was shrined.

* Extrinsic interest has lately attached to the fine scenery of Woodstock, near Kilkenny, on account of its having been the last residence of the author of Psyche. Her grave is one of many in the church-yard of the village. The river runs smoothly by. The ruins of an ancient abbey that has been partially converted into a church, reverently throw their mantle of tender shadow over it.—Tales by the O'Hara Family.

HE

Mournful that thou wert slumbering low
With a dread curtain drawn
Between thee and the golden glow
Of this world's vernal dawn.

Parted from all the song and bloom
Thou wouldst have loved so well,
To thee the sunshine round thy tomb
Was but a broken spell.

The bird, the insect on the wing,
In their bright reckless play,
Might feel the flush and life of spring,—
And thou wert pass'd away!

But then, even then, a nobler thought
O'er my vain sadness came;
Th' immortal spirit woke, and wrought
Within my thrilling frame.

Surely on lovelier things, I said,
Thou must have look'd ere now,
Than all that round our pathway shed
Odours and hues below.

The shadows of the tomb are here,
Yet beautiful is earth!
What seest thou then where no dim fear,
No haunting dream, hath birth?

Here a vain love to passing flowers
Thou gav'st—but where thou art,
The sway is not with changeful hours
There love and death must part.

Thou hast left sorrow in thy song,
A voice not loud, but deep!
The glorious bowers of earth among,
How often didst thou weep!

Where couldst thou fix on mortal ground
Thy tender thoughts and high?—
Now peace the woman's heart hath found
And joy the poet's eye.

THE MOTHER'S LOVE.

— There is none,
In all this cold and hollow world, no fount
Of deep, strong, deathless love, save that within
A mother's heart.—It is but pride, wherewith
To his fair son the father's eye doth turn,
Watching his growth. Ay, on the boy he looks,
The bright glad creature springing in his path,
But as the heir of his great name—the young
And stately tree, whose rising strength ere long
Shall bear his trophies well. And this is love!
This is man's love!—What marvel?—You ne'er made
Your breast the pillow of his infancy,
While to the fulness of your heart's glad heavings
His fair cheek rose and fell, and his bright hair
Waved softly to your breath?—You ne'er kept watch
Beside him till the last pale star had set,
And morn, all dazzling, as in triumph broke
On your dim weary eye: not yours the face
Which, early faded through fond care for him,
Hung o'er his sleep, and, duly as heaven's light
Was there to greet his wakening. You ne'er smoothed
His couch, ne'er sung him to his rosy rest, Caught his least whisper, when his voice from your
Had learned soft utterance; pressed your lips to his
When fever parched it; hushed his wayward cries,
With patient, vigilant, never-weari'd love!
No! these are Woman's tasks!—In these her youth,
And bloom of cheek, and buoyancy of heart,
Steal from her all unmarked!

WOMAN AND FAME.

Thou hast a charmed cup, O Fame,—
A draught that mantles high,
And seems to lift this earthly frame
Above mortality.
Away! to me—a woman—bring
Sweet waters from affection's spring.

Thou hast green laurel-leaves that twine
 Into so proud a wreath—
 For that resplendent gift of thine,
 Heroes have smiled in death.
 Give me from some kind hand a flower,
 The record of one happy hour.

Thou hast a voice, whose thrilling tone—
 Can bid each life-pulse beat,
 As when a trumpet's note hath blown,
 Calling the brave to meet.
 But mine, let mine—a woman's breast—
 By words of home-born love be blessed.

A hollow sound is in thy song,
 A mockery in thy eye,
 To the sick heart that doth but long
 For aid, for sympathy,
 For kindly looks to cheer it on,
 For tender accents that are gone.

Fame, Fame! thou canst not be the stay
 Unto the drooping reed,
 The cool fresh fountain in the day
 Of the soul's feverish need:
 Where must the lone one turn or flee?—
 Not unto thee, oh! not to thee!

SONG.

"Oh, cast thou not
 Affection from thee! in this bitter world
 Hold to thy heart that only treasure fast,
 Watch—guard it—suffer not a breath to dim
 'The bright gem's purity!'"

If thou hast crush'd a flower,
 The root may not be blighted;
 If thou hast quench'd a lamp,
 Once more it may be lighted:
 But on thy harp or on thy lute,
 The string which thou hast broken
 Shall never in sweet sound again
 Give to thy touch a token!

If thou hast loosed a bird,
 Whose voice of song could cheer thee,
 Still, still he may be won
 From the skies to warble near thee
 But if upon the troubled sea
 Thou hast thrown a gem unheeded,
 Hope not that wind or wave shall bring
 The treasure back when needed.

If thou hast bruised a vine,
 The summer's breath is healing,
 And its cluster yet may glow
 Through the leaves their bloom revealing;
 But if thou hast a cup o'erthrown,
 With a bright draught fill'd—oh! never Shall earth give back that lavish'd wealth,
 To cool thy parch'd lip's fever!

The heart is like that cup,
 If thou waste the love it bore thee,
 And like that jewel gone,
 Which the deep will not restore thee;
 And like that string of harp or lute
 Whence the sweet sound is scatter'd;—
 —Gently, oh! gently touch the chords,
 So soon for ever shatter'd!

MAN AND WOMAN.

"—— Women act their parts
 When they do make their order'd houses know them.
 Men must be busy out of doors, must stir
 The city; yea, make the great world aware
 'That they are in it; for the mastery
 Of which they race and wrestle'"

Knowles.

Warrior! whose image on thy tomb,
 With shield and crested head,
 Sleeps proudly in the purple gloom
 By the stain'd window shed;

The records of thy name and race
 Have faded from the stone,
 Yet through a cloud of years I trace
 What thou hast been and done.

A banner from its flashing spear
 Flung out o'er many a fight;
 A war-cry ringing far and clear,
 And strong to turn the flight;
 An arm that bravely bore the lance
 On for the holy shrine,
 A haughty heart and kingly glance—
 Chief! were not these things thine?

A lofty place where leaders sate
 Around the council board;
 In festive halls a chair of state,
 When the blood-red wine was pour'd;
 A name that drew a prouder tone
 From herald, harp, and bard;
 —Surely these things were all thine own,
 So hadst thou thy reward!

Woman! whose sculptur'd form at rest
 By the arm'd knight is laid,
 With meek hands folded o'er thy breast
 In matron robes array'd;
 What was thy tale? — Oh, gentle mate
 Of him the bold and free,
 Bound unto his victorious fate,
 What bard hath sung of thee?

He woo'd a bright and burning star,
 Thine was the void, the gloom,
 The straining eye that follow'd far
 His oft-receding plume;
 The heart-sick listening while his steed
 Sent echoes on the breeze;
 The pang—but when did fame take heed
 Of griefs obscure as these?

Thy silent and secluded hours,
 Through many a lonely day
 While bending o'er thy broider'd flowers
 With spirit far away;
 Thy weeping midnight prayers for him
 Who fought on Syrian plains;
 Thy watchings till the torch grew dim,—
 These fill no minstrel strains.

A still sad life was thine! — long years,
 With tasks unguerdon'd fraught,
 Deep, quiet love, submissive tears,
 Vigils of anxious thought;
 Prayers at the cross in fervour pour'd,
 Alms to the pilgrims given;
 O happy, happier than thy lord,
 In that lone path to heaven!

THE SPELLS OF HOME.

There blend the ties that strengthen
 Our hearts in hours of grief,
 The silver links that lengthen
 Joy's visit when most brief.

Bernard Barton.

By the soft green light in the woody glade,
 On the banks of moss where thy childhood play'd
 By the household tree through which thine eye
 First look'd in love to the summer sky,
 By the dewy gleam, by the very breath
 Of the primrose tufts in the grass beneath,
 Upon thy heart there is laid a spell,
 Holy and precious—oh! guard it well!

By the sleepy ripple of the stream,
 Which hath lull'd thee into many a dream,
 By the shiver of the ivy leaves
 To the wind of morn at thy casement eaves.
 By the bee's deep murmur in the limes
 By the music of the Sabbath chimes,
 By every sound of thy native shade,
 Stronger and dearer the spell is made.

By the gathering round the winter hearth
 When twilight call'd unto household mirth,
 By the fairy tale or the legend old
 In that ring of happy faces told,
 By the quiet hour when hearts unite
 In the parting prayer and the kind "Good-night!"
 By the smiling eye and the loving tone,
 Over thy life has the spell been thrown.

And bless that gift! — it hath gentle might,
 A guardian power and a guiding light.
 It hath led the freeman forth to stand
 In the mountain battles of his land;
 It hath brought the wanderer o'er the seas,
 To die on the hills of his own fresh breeze
 And back to the gates of his father's hall
 It hath led the weeping prodigal.

Yes! when thy heart, in its pride, would stray
 From the pure first loves of its youth away —
 When the sullying breath of the world would come
 O'er the flowers it brought from its childhood's home —
 Think thou again of the woody glade,
 And the sound by the rustling ivy made,
 Think of the tree at thy father's door,
 And the kindly spell shall have power once more!

WOMAN ON THE FIELD OF BATTLE.

Where hath not woman stood,
 Strong in affection's might? a reed upborne
 By an o'er-mastering current!

Gentle and lovely form
 What didst thou here,
 When the fierce battle-storm
 Bore down the spear?

Banner and shiver'd crest,
 Beside thee strown,
 Tell, that amidst the best,
 Thy work was done!

Yet strangely, sadly fair,
 O'er the wild scene,
 Gleams, through its golden hair,
 That brow serene.

Low lies the stately head,—
 Earth-bound the free;
 How gave those haughty dead
 A place to thee?

Slumberer! thine early bier
 Friends should have crown'd,
 Many a flower and tear
 Shedding around.

Soft voices, clear and young,
 Mingling their swell,
 Should o'er thy dust have sung
 Earth's last farewell.

Sisters, above the grave
 Of thy repose,
 Should have bid violets wave
 With the white rose.

Now must the trumpet's note,
 Savage and shrill,
 For requiem o'er thee float,
 Thou fair and still!

And the swift charger sweep
 In full career,
 Trampling thy place of sleep,—
 Why camest thou here?

Why?—ask the true heart why
 Woman hath been
 Ever, where brave men die,
 Unshrinking seen?

Unto this harvest ground
 Proud reapers came,—
 Some, for that stirring sound,
 A warrior's name;

Some, for the stormy play
 And joy of strife;
 And some, to fling away
 A weary life;—

But thou, pale sleeper, thou,
 With the slight frame,
 And the rich locks, whose glow
 Death cannot tame;

Only one thought, one power,
Thee could have led,
 So, through the tempest's hour
 To lift thy head!

Only the true, the strong,
 The love, whose trust
 Woman's deep soul too long
 Pours on the dust!

LANDING OF THE PILGRIM FATHERS

The breaking waves dashed high
 On a stern and rock-bound coast,
 And the woods against a stormy sky
 Their giant branches tossed;

And the heavy night hung dark,
 The hills and waters o'er,
 When a band of exiles moored their bark
 On the wild New England shore.

Not as the conqueror comes,
 They, the true-hearted, came;
 Not with the roll of the stirring drums,
 And the trumpet that sings of fame:

Not as the flying come,
 In silence and in fear;—
 They shook the depths of the desert gloom
 With their hymns of lofty cheer.

Amidst the storm they sang,
 And the stars heard, and the sea!
 And the sounding aisles of the dim woods rang
 To the anthem of the free.

The ocean eagle soared
 From his nest by the white wave's foam,
 And the rocking pines of the forest roared—
 This was their welcome home!

There were men with hoary hair,
 Amidst that pilgrim band;—
 Why had they come to wither there,
 Away from their childhood's land?

There was woman's fearless eye,
 Lit by her deep love's truth;
 There was manhood's brow serenely high,
 And the fiery heart of youth.

What sought they thus afar?
 Bright jewels of the mine?
 The wealth of seas, the spoils of war?—
 They sought a faith's pure shrine!

Ay, call it holy ground,
 The soil where first they trod!
 They have left unstained what there they found—
 Freedom to worship God.

SABBATH SONNET.

How many blessed groups this hour are bending
 Through England's primrose meadow-paths their way
 Toward spire and tower, 'midst shadowy elms ascending
 Whence the sweet chimes proclaim the hallowed day!
 The halls, from old heroic ages grey,
 Pour their fair children forth; and hamlets low,
 With whose thick orchard-blossoms the soft winds play,
 Send out their inmates in a happy flow,
 Like a free vernal stream.—I may not tread
 With them those pathways,—to the feverish bed
 Of sickness bound;—yet oh, my God! I bless
 Thy mercy, that with Sabbath peace hath filled
 My chastened heart, and all its throbbings stilled
 To one deep calm of lowliest thankfulness.

THE POETRY OF THE PSALMS.*

Nobly thy song, O minstrel! rushed to meet
 Th' Eternal on the pathway of the blast,
 With darkness round him as a mantle cast,
 And cherubim to waft his flying seat.
 Amidst the hills that smoked beneath his feet,
 With trumpet voice thy spirit called aloud,
 And bade the trembling rocks his name repeat,
 And the bent cedars, and the bursting cloud;
 But far more gloriously to earth made known,
 By that high strain, than by the thunder's tone,
 Than flashing torrents, or the ocean's roll;
 Jehovah spoke through the inbreathing fire,
 Nature's vast realms forever to inspire,
 With the deep worship of a living soul.

HENRIETTA OF ENGLAND,

DAUGHTER of the unfortunate Charles I. of England, and grand-daughter of Henry IV. of France, married, in 1661, Philip of France, duke of Orleans, and brother of Louis XIV.; but this marriage was not a happy one. However, she was a great favourite with the king, who often joined in the brilliant assembly of rank and genius which she collected around her. She also had much influence over her brother, Charles II. of England; and negotiated an important treaty with England against Holland, which the most skilful diplomats had long solicited in vain.

This princess died at St. Cloud, in 1670, at the age of twenty-six. There were some suspicions that she was poisoned. She was universally regretted; her sweetness of manners, and her grace and beauty, rendering her a great favourite. Bosuet pronounced her funeral oration.

HENDEL-SCHÜTZ, HENRIETTA.

THIS celebrated woman, in whom her native country recognises one of its first tragic actresses, and her age the greatest pantomimic artist, was the daughter of the eminent tragedian, Schüler. From her fourth year, she received instruction in declamation and dancing. In the latter art she was so accomplished, even when a child, that she was engaged for the ballet of the Berlin Royal Theatre, of which her father was a member. The celebrated Engel, at that time director of the Berlin Theatre, seems to have duly appreciated her rare talents, for he took her to his house, and instructed her in history, mythology, versification in languages, and declamation. In her sixteenth year, she united herself to the excellent tenor-singer, Eunike (in Berlin), and both were engaged, first at the Prince's Theatre, at Maintz, then at Bonn. There she was undoubtedly prima donna. In the year 1792, they were invited to Amsterdam, where the new German theatre opened for the first time (November 11th, 1793), with Kotzebue's drama, "The Indians in England." She performed the part of Gurli, and the audience was enraptured. The French Revolutionary war, which seemed to threaten Holland, soon put an end to the German theatre. Mrs. Eunike, therefore, left Amsterdam, and went to Frankfurt on the Maine, in October, 1794. There her talent for pantomime was awakened by the celebrated painter, Pfarr. He showed her, among others, Rehberg's plates of the attitudes of Lady Hamilton; also some drawings of William Fischbein (a German), in Naples. After these models she studied the art of pantomime; but she spent twelve years in practising, before she ventured on a public exhibition. It is generally acknowledged, that the Hendel-Schütz has much enlarged and elevated this art; her pantomime representations were a series of fine attitudes, not only in the antique, but also in the modern styles, and in the former as well in the Egyptian and Greek, as in the latter in the Italian and Germanic characters. They were, however, not mere imitations of statues and paintings; she endeavoured, by an instructive succession of interesting images of antique and modern mythology and history, to represent to the eye the most important changes of antique and modern plastic art; so that a critic says, "In representing, in a chronological order, the different styles of plastic art, the principal traits of the history of art pass in moving pictures before the eye of the spectator, which are as instructive to the mind as they are pleasing to the eye." Besides, she possessed the still greater gift of inventing practical poetical attitudes, and representing them in a suitable style, so that the German artist seems vastly to have surpassed her English predecessor (Lady Hamilton). In the mean time, she and her husband accepted an invitation to go to Berlin, where she remained for ten years. Here she separated herself from her first husband, and married Dr. Mayer, whom she accompanied to Stettin; this second union was likewise dissolved; and then (1806) she became the wife of Dr. Hendel. Seven months after, death deprived her of her third husband, who, as chief physician of the French hospitals, died a victim of the typhus fever. Circumstances induced her to appear again on the stage. In October, 1807, she undertook a long artistic journey; and when in Halle, she became acquainted with the son of the celebrated philologist, Schütz; he (the son) was at that time engaged at the University of Halle, as Professor of the Fine Arts. With this gentleman she entered again into the bonds of matrimony, when Napoleon arrested the University, for which reason Professor Schütz exchanged the academical course for the theatrical profession, and acquired, both in tragedy and comedy, an honourable place among the German dramatic artists. Mr. and Mrs. Schütz did not limit themselves to the principal cities of Germany, but visited also Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, and their fame spread far and wide. In the summer of 1819, they went to Paris, where the pantomimic talent of Mrs. S. was acknowledged in the most select circles by competent judges. They settled afterwards in Halle, where Mr. S. was again engaged as professor. The general conclusion is, that Mrs. Hendel-Schütz, as a pantomimic artist, stands unrivalled in Germany.

* This and the preceding, are the two last strains, the dying strains of this sweet poetess. Truly her mind seemed breathing inspired notes, while her pure spirit was stealing gently away to join the angelic choir in that "better land," where "sorrow and death may not enter."

HERBERT, MARY, COUNTESS OF PEMBROKE,

MARRIED Henry, Earl of Pembroke, in 1576, and lived in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. She was the sister of Sir Philip Sydney; whose "Arcadia," from being dedicated to her, was always called by the author himself, "The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia." A great encourager of letters, and a careful cultivator of them herself, she translated a tragedy from the French, called "Annius," in 1595; and is also supposed to have made an exact translation of the Psalms of David into English metre; and also wrote "A Pastoral Dialogue in Praise of Astræa." She died at her house in Aldersgate-Street, London, September 25th, 1601. Osborn, in his memoirs of the reign of king James, says, "She was that sister of Sir Philip Sydney to whom he addressed his Arcadia," and of whom he had no other advantage than what he received from the partial benevolence of fortune in making him a man, (which yet she did, in some judgments, recompense in beauty,) her pen being nothing short of his. But, lest I should seem to trespass upon truth, I shall leave the world her epitaph, in which the author doth manifest himself a poet in all things but untruth:

"Underneath this sable hearse
Lies the subject of all verse;
Sydney's sister, Pembroke's mother.
Death! ere thou hast killed another,
Fair, and good, and wise, as she,
Time shall throw a dart at thee."

These lines were written by Ben Jonson.

HERITIER, MARIE JEANNE L', DE VILLANDON,

WAS born at Paris in 1664, daughter of Nicholas l'Heritier, a French poet, from whom she inherited a talent for poetry. She was also esteemed for the sweetness of her manners, and the dignity of her sentiments. The academy of the "Jeu Floraux" received her as a member in 1696, and that of the Ricovrati in Padua in 1697. She wrote a translation in verse of sixteen of Ovid's Epistles; an English tale, called "La Tour Tenebreuse;" "Les Caprices de Destin;" another novel; and a novel in verse, called "L'Avare Puni;" with a few other poems. She lived a single life, and died at Paris in 1734, aged seventy. We give one specimen of her style.

RONDEAU.

A une Jeune Demoiselle.

C'est grand hazard, si l'on voit deux esprits
Avoir chez eux mêmes desirs nourris.
Vous n'aimez rien qu'amour et badinage;
Mais moy qui hais leur importun bagage,
Mon cabinet me tient lieu de réduits.*

Là du savoir j'examine le prix,
Et puis m'occupe à frivoles écrits;
Car si par fois je fais passable ouvrage,
C'est grand hazard.

* Boudoir.

Aussi mon cœur de renom n'est épris,
Et d'Apollon je n'ai l'art entrepris
Que pour bannir l'oisiveté peu sage:
Quand trop on est de loisir au bel âge,
Sans coqueter avec maints favoris,
C'est grand hazard.

HERON, CECILIA,

THE third daughter of Sir Thomas More, was born in 1510, and, with her sisters, received a learned education. She possessed a thorough knowledge of Latin, and corresponded with Erasmus in that language. She was married very early in life to Giles Heron, Esq. Nothing of her private history is recorded.

HERSCHEL, CAROLINE LUCRETIA,

SISTER, and, for a long time assistant, of the celebrated astronomer, was born at Hanover on the 16th of March, 1750. She is herself distinguished for her astronomical researches, and particularly for the construction of a selenographical globe, in relief, of the surface of the moon. But it was for her brother, Sir William Herschel, that the activity of her mind was awakened. From the first commencement of his astronomical pursuits, her attendance on both his daily labours and nightly watches was put in requisition; and was found so useful, that on his removal to Datchet, and subsequently to Slough—he being then occupied with his reviews of the heavens and other researches—she performed the whole of the arduous and important duties of his astronomical assistant, not only reading the clocks and noting down all the observations from dictation as an amanuensis, but subsequently executing the whole of the extensive and laborious numerical calculations necessary to render them available to science, as well as a multitude of others relative to the various objects of theoretical and experimental inquiry, in which, during his long and active career, he at any time engaged. For the performance of these duties, his majesty king George III. was pleased to place her in the receipt of a salary sufficient for her singularly moderate wants and retired habits.

Arduous, however, as these occupations must appear, especially when it is considered that her brother's observations were always carried on (circumstances permitting) till daybreak, without regard to season, and indeed chiefly in the winter, they proved insufficient to exhaust her activity. In their intervals she found time both for actual astronomical observations of her own and for the execution of more than one work of great extent and utility.

The observations here alluded to were made with a small Newtonian sweeper constructed for her by her brother; with which, whenever his occasional absences or any interruption to the regular course of his observations permitted, she searched the heavens for comets, and that so effectively as on no less than eight several occasions to be rewarded by their discovery, viz. on August 1, 1786; December 21, 1788; January 9, 1790; April 17, 1790; December 15, 1791; October 7, 1793; November 7, 1795; and August 6, 1797. On five of these occasions (recorded in the pages of the "Philosophical Transactions" of London) her claim to the first discovery is admitted. These sweeps, moreover, proved productive of the detection of several remarkable nebulae and clusters of stars previously unobserved, among which may be specially mentioned the superb Nebula, No. 1, Class V., of Sir William Herschel's catalogues—an object bearing much resemblance to the celebrated nebula in Andromeda, discovered by Simon Inarius—as also the Nebula V., No. 18; the 12th and 27th clusters of Class VII.; and the 45th, 65th, 72d, 77th, and 78th, of Class VIII. of those catalogues.

The astronomical works which she found leisure to complete were—1st. "A Catalogue of 561 Stars observed by Flamsteed," but which, having escaped the notice of those who framed the "British Catalogue" from that astronomer's observations, are not therein inserted. 2. "A General Index of Reference to every Observation of every Star inserted in the British Catalogue." These works were published together in one volume by the Royal Society; and to their utility in subsequent researches Mr. Baily, in his "Life of Flamsteed," pp. 388, 390, bears ample testimony. She further completed the reduction and arrangement as a "Zone Catalogue" of all the nebulae and clusters of stars observed by her brother in his sweeps; a work for which she was honoured with the Gold Medal of the Astronomical Society of London, in 1828; which Society also conferred on her the unusual distinction of electing her an honorary member.

